Leonard said, “Oh God,” and dashed for the toilet. I heard him in there upchucking, which prompted me to do the same. I let fly into a trash can all my bad lobster, wine, and culinary accouterments. It wasn’t all that good going in, but it certainly had smelled better than it did now, and it had looked better too.

The ship leaned way port and I felt as if it would never right itself. I let out with an involuntary cry. I heard Leonard yell in the bathroom, then I heard him upchucking again.

The ship came up high and went starboard and it was all I could do to hold the trash can so the contents didn’t slop out.

A little later the commode flushed and Leonard came out and lay on his bed and moaned.

He said, “Oh, God, kill me. Kill me now.”

“Fuck the seasickness,” I said. “I’m scared to death.”

I managed to set the TV on the floor, and by bouncing off the wall, I made it to the bathroom where I poured the glorious contents of the trash can into the commode and flushed it. I sat the trash can in the little shower stall, but it rolled out and I hit the wall and banged the back of my knee against the commode.

I lodged the trash can between the wall and the commode and tried to make it back to my bed. I understood what was meant by sea legs now. I didn’t have some. In fact, I’d have given anything for us to have run up on a spit of land, a reef, any damn thing solid.

I just knew we were going to flop so far to one side we’d never right ourselves. I kept thinking about that movie The Poseidon Adventure, where the ship turned over and trapped people underwater.

I swear, at times it felt as if that damn ship were actually lying completely on its side, then it would fling itself upright and go the other way. You could hear the ocean banging on the sides of the ship. It made you realize how fragile, what a paper cup the thing was, and it made you realize even more how fragile you were as a collection of blood and bone. All I could think about, after that realization, was just how dark and deep the goddamn ocean was.

I managed to wobble, fall, and crawl over to the closet, reach in a side pocket of my suitcase, and pull out Dramamine tablets. I punched a couple out of the aluminum side and gave Leonard one. I took the other. No less than two minutes later Leonard said, “Hell, give me another one of them sonsabitches.”

I did. I took another. It wasn’t easy swallowing them dry, but now that I had found my bed again, and was clinging to it like a raft, I couldn’t bring myself to let go and make for the bathroom.

Frank truth of it was, I was scared blind, shitless, and paralyzed. No argument. When it comes to the baddest sonofabitch on the block, nature wins hands down every time. Well, nature and that eighteen-year-old guy I had fought.

It wasn’t until early morning that the ship ceased to pitch. I had felt horrible all night, slept fitfully, even whimpered a bit. Leonard had whimpered too, so I felt better about it. My manhood was still intact, because he wouldn’t tell if I didn’t.

Leonard slept while I washed up, brushed my teeth, and started for the deck. On the way up, I discovered a middle-aged woman and two children sleeping on the landing near the hatch door that led outside. The woman sat up from the pallet she had made and looked at me as I reached the door.

“We nearly sank last night,” she said. “I thought it would be better if we were close to the lifeboats.”

“It was scary,” I said, “but not that bad.” I was braver, now that it was all over.

“Oh, yes it was,” she said.

One of the children, a little girl, lifted up on an elbow. A teddy bear tumbled out of her covers. She looked about nine. She said, “Mama said fuck.”

"Dear," the woman said. "Ssshhhhh."

"I said it several times last night myself," I said. "Some other things too."

The woman gave me a nervous grin. The little girl smiled. The other kid, girl or boy, I couldn't tell way the kid was wrapped up in the covers, didn't wake up. I went out on deck.

It was clear now. The water was bright blue and so was the sky and the sun was a great fat wafer of burning gold. The shadow of the ship lay on the clear water like an organized coat of oil. It fled with us as we pushed onward, probably running about twenty-two knots.

There were others on the deck, leaning against the rail like me, and there were some in lawn chairs against the wall of the deck, and there was a young couple with chairs close together, kissing, looking as if at any moment they might strip and go for broke. No one looked as if anything had been out of the ordinary last night. And truthfully, it probably had not. For a landlubber like me, a big wave seen at a distance is frightening enough, let alone knocking and swinging about a ship I'm in. For all I knew, the crew might well have found it relaxing, like a rocking chair.

While I was standing there, looking out at the water, Big Bill came up and lit a cigar. "That was some night," he said.

I turned and smiled at him. He was dressed in blue jeans, a cowboy shirt with the sleeves rolled, and house shoes. His gray hair coiled and rumpled in the wind like some invisible hand wadding up stringy cotton.

"I'll say it was some night. I lost my lobster."

"Not much of a loss. Sort of ruined the honeymoon atmosphere in our cabin, that's what I'm trying to tell you. We were just down to business when all that started. Pretty soon were just two naked bodies rolling around on the floor clutching at each other saying shit."

"Worse ways to go," I said.

"I suppose that's true. I got upset, got dressed, came out for a look, like it would do me good to know. Waves were washing all along the deck here. Scary. I went back in and up front and outside. Waves were jumping over the deck, way up there. It was one spooky experience, I guarantee. Cigar?"

"No thanks."

Leonard came on deck then. He greeted Bill, who offered him a cigar.

"Is it Cuban?" Leonard asked.

"Nope. Not this one."

Leonard took it and lit it. He said, "You know there's a woman behind the door there, on the stair landing with two kids?"

"Saw her when I came out," I said.

"Me too," said Bill. "She was there last night when I came out for a look. I was surprised they hadn't locked the doors. Safety seems a little scant to me."

"Her little girl informed me Mama had said fuck," I said.

"Yeah," Leonard said, "she told me the same thing."

"Me too," Big Bill said. "You know, this cruise stuff sucks. I'm excited for when we get to Mexico and dock. I want to get some land under my feet and an enchilada in my mouth, wash it down with some tequila. Me and Mama might like to dance too. You know, I was out here early to smoke, and they were pushing a covered body along the deck in a wheelchair, took it through that door over there."

"No shit?" Leonard asked.

"No shit. I asked one of the crew what happened. He said an old guy died last night. Apparently the old fella had taken this cruise several times, thought he'd like to do it one last time, and last time it was."

"I can't believe anybody does this on purpose twice," Leonard said.

"He croaked in all that high seas business," Bill said. "My guess is it scared him to death. They got him in a meat locker or something down below."

"I can see it now," Leonard said. "A sheet-covered corpse in a wheelchair in the food freezer with our dinner lobster and a bag of green peas in his lap."

"Maybe it wasn't the rough seas killed him," I said. "Maybe it was the food."

On that note, we went to eat breakfast in the buffet dining area.

* * *

Later in the day we shot skeet off the back of the ship. If there's one thing I can do it's hit a target with almost any kind of long gun. Leonard did fair, but I was really on, and me and Leonard got to betting with Big Bill and this other guy, a Yankee named Dave who looked to be about sixty and turned out to be my and Leonard's age, late forties.

I made about ten dollars off the deal, and Leonard made five. We used our gains to buy drinks for all of us in the bar. I was the only one not drinking liquor. We sat and drank and talked for a while. It wasn't anything special, just talk. Bill and the Yankee were all right if you didn't have to see them on a daily basis. Then again, there's days I feel that way about all Yankees, but I promise I'm trying to get over it.

Later in the day Leonard and I walked around the ship, bored to death. Finally we holed up in our cabin and read. I read from a good Larry McMurtry book about the size of a cement block. Leonard read from The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn and laughed out loud a lot.

We had dinner in the buffet room that night. Leonard had made his point and didn't care if he pissed the doorman off again or not.

The food wasn't any worse or any better than where we had eaten the night before, just more casual. I couldn't help but think about that dead guy, maybe in the food locker. Did they have a morgue on board? Maybe. Surely people died on these things now and then. Perhaps more than now and then.

We went to a bad floor show later. I had seen better high school productions. It was a tribute to rock and roll with a Filipino rock and roll band that had probably learned its material that afternoon. Little Richard would have had a heart attack, and I bet Buddy Holly was rolling over in his grave.

The singers were so awful they hurt my feelings and their dancing was a bit more like contained stumbling to music. I noticed however that I kept my eye on one of the female dancers who wore only feathers and had big tits, and I got to thinking about what Leonard had told me, and I had to sit there and do some deep soul searching. I kept my eyes on the tits just the same. I can get over bad dancing.

That night the sea was rough again, but not as rough as the night before. I went up once to check the night seas, and on the landing was the lady and her kids and the teddy bear. The kids seemed to think this was all great fun, but the mother had her back against the wall and she had carried a trash can out with her and she had that in her lap, puking. The teddy bear was hanging tough.

I opened the door, but when a mist of sea washed into my face, I closed it. Wasn't anything I wanted to see out there. I had taken to carrying a packet of Dramamine in my pocket, and I gave it to the lady and her kids.

"It takes time to work," I said, "but it does work. It won't do anything for being scared, however. You know, you'd really be more comfortable in your cabin."

"No," she said.

"Yes, ma'am. You're the boss."

I went downstairs and to bed. About midnight I began to think the woman had the right idea. Perhaps I should get our trash can and go up and join her to be close to the lifeboats. The sea really began to pitch us.

When morning crept up the sea still tossed but the day was bright and things seemed less frightening. About midday we came to the coast of Mexico. It was a thin strip of brown in the distance.

The sea was bad and the ship could not go into shore, as there was no proper place for it to dock. The ship anchored and they sent out from shore what they called a tender—a small boat to haul us tourists in.

While we were waiting on the tender, we saw the snotty doorman from the dining area. He looked at us, then stuck his hand out to Leonard.

"I'm sorry about the other night."

Leonard nodded, stuck out his hand to accept the apology.

They shook. No one offered to shake my hand. I felt kind of left out.

The guy said, “Going ashore, huh?”

“Oh yeah,” Leonard said. “What time do we need to come back?”

The man paused as if remembering.

“Four-thirty.”

“Okay. Good.”

“Yeah. Well. Have a good time.”

“Sure.”

The guy went down the corridor.

I said, “He’s all right, I guess.”

“No, he’s still an asshole.”

I had been to Mexico many times, but never this spot, so I was reasonably interested in going ashore. Besides, I was ready to do anything to get off the ship, and I thought maybe Leonard and I might get a good meal in a restaurant or café. We went to the purser’s desk, signed up for a tour to some Mayan ruins called Tulum, then got in the departure line.

The tender tossed up alongside the ship and we had to walk out to the side of it on a rickety collapsible dock and try to jump on board when it wasn’t leaping too high or too low on the waves. A woman nearly caught her leg between the boat and the ship but pulled it back just in time to the delighted screams and yells of those on our little platform and those who had already boarded the tender.

More screams and sighs came when a kid, eight or nine, tore lose from his parents and leaped when the tender went down and landed on deck with a thud and got up laughing. When his mom and dad got on board the tender they promptly whipped his ass to the delight of us all.

An elderly man vomited over the side and a young woman I had my eye on lost her straw hat to the wind. It hit the ocean, the waves leaped on it, and it was gone. I could have jumped in the water to save it so I could be her knight in shining armor and maybe get laid.

I balanced the idea.

Big waves.

Pussy.

Big waves.

Pussy.

Naw. Waves too big. Pussy uncertain. She might just thank me. And the idea of drowning with a woman's straw hat in my hand didn't appeal to me.

One thing, though, she didn't have big tits. I'd have to tell Leonard that later as an example of my maturity. I wouldn't mention the dancer from last night and what I had thought about her.

On board, Leonard and I seated ourselves next to Big Bill and his wife. We were then borne by a chugging motor and churning waves toward shore, tailed by black diesel smoke.

There were lots of folks throwing up over the side and one idiot thought a log floating in the water was a whale and started screaming about it. When the log bumped against the boat he shut up and looked straight ahead like maybe he had spotted an important smoke signal in the distance that only he could translate.

Our tender pilot seemed oblivious to it all. Logs. Whales. He didn't give a shit. He was probably more concerned about capsizing. Two guys with blankets and trinkets wandered about trying to sell them to us. No bites from anyone, but that didn't stop them from making the rounds several times, the prices dropping dramatically with each tour.

I looked back at our ship. A real cruise ship was anchored not far from it. It looked twice as big as the Titanic. Our ship looked like some kind of fishing lure next to it.

I wondered if that poor woman and her children on the landing were coming ashore with their trash can on the next tender. I wondered why I had ever thought this would be fun.

I wondered what Brett was doing right now. I wondered if she wondered what I was doing. I wondered if Tillie was making big bucks pulling the train in Tyler. I wondered about that poor girl in the hospital with her face stomped in.

Hell, I didn’t have it so bad.

10

IT WAS A SHORT ROUGH TRIP in high seas but we finally edged alongside the dock and got off to the sound of one woman praying.

The two guys with the blankets got off too and walked alongside us. They hadn't even noticed the pitch of the sea. You would have thought they had been on a rocking horse. The price for their goods, which was in American dollars, continued to drop dramatically as we walked.

Still, no bites from us or anybody. Their wares were damn near free by the time we stepped off the dock onto land. They went away with their stuff, dissolved into the crowd as if they had never been.

Tough way to make a buck.

It felt funny standing on solid land after being at sea for a couple of days. Funny, but good.

Leonard and I walked along looking at people and sights like the tourists we were. We stopped in a cantina and had some food. When we got up to leave, I saw the woman from the boat who had lost her hat. She had her dark hair tied back and was tall and quite lovely in white shorts and a blue halter top, had one of those Audrey Hepburn necks.

On the way out I put on my best smile as we walked by her table, said, "I saw what happened to your hat."

A string of hair had fallen out of her 'do and across her forehead. She looked up at me with dark sensitive eyes, said in a voice that even in Brooklyn would make you wince, "No shit. Who didn't?"

Guess she wasn't looking for love.

We went out and along the boardwalk by the sea. I had sort of hoped, foolishly, of course, that Leonard would let it slide.

"Well sir," he said, "it's good to see you haven't lost your touch with women."

Playa del Carmen is a fishing village on its way to becoming a resort spot, a kind of Mayan Riviera, but not quite. Underneath it all, behind and betwixt the new hotels, is still the small Mexican fishing village that it has always been.

We did the Tulum tour. Went out there by bus. It was about an hour from Playa del Carmen. There was lots of scrubby land and little shacks with tin roofs along the way. All I could think was there wasn't enough shade. It wasn't like where I came from, East Texas, wooded and wet. It was like South or West Texas. Bleak. Why had this land become populated? Had someone actually thought: Hell, ain't this great. Let's just stop here. To me, it looked like the spot where the devil went to shit.

Far as I'm concerned, any place you can see unobstructed by trees farther than you can throw a rock makes me nervous.

Maybe that was it. It had had trees, then some industrious types had come along, cut down the trees, killed the wildlife, fucked what they couldn't kill, and stayed because they were too tired to do anything else. Or a wheel came off a cart or something.

We stopped at a couple of places where you could buy straw sombreros and the rare artwork of the area: little carved trinkets that said MEXICO on them. They were turned out in droves for all of Mexico and shipped across country by truck, but when you talked to anyone there, they were, to hear them tell it, the only ones who had these little items and they had of course all been made by hand, their very own hands. Since two or three feet away was another vendor with the same stuff, you had to wonder if they actually thought anyone really believed this.

They had some pretty neat chess sets carved out of obsidian, and I looked at those but didn't buy. I didn't need it and didn't want to carry it. Leonard bought a sombrero. It had a big wide band that read: MEXICO. He insisted on wearing it, even on the bus. He looked like an idiot.

Tulum was neat. It was built by the Mayans on a cliff overlooking the Caribbean. It was a fortress city, and you could certainly see how it served its purpose. A mountain goat would have needed grappling equipment just to start up the side of the cliff next to the sea. Before time took its toll, the city must have been quite snug with this barrier at its back and the great buildings of solid stones all around to protect it.

There was a temple called El Castillo that had two columns depicting serpents, and a real serpent, a large lizard that looked as if he might do close-ups for dinosaur movies, was crouched on the stone floor next to one of the columns. He looked at us in that slow lizard way, seemed to say, Hey Mack, you're invading my home.

Or maybe, like us, he was just a tourist and thought we were one of the sights.

We spent a couple hours there looking at the ruins, thinking about how the people there must have lived, then we took the bus back.

We still had a couple hours till four-thirty, so we went walking, looking at the sights, such as they were. Leonard needed to go to the local post office to buy a card and stamp so he could mail a little note to John. It was a real chore just getting one of the two workers there, a man and a woman, to come to the desk. They had a private conversation going and appeared in no hurry to stop it. They turned and looked at us like we were intruding, and went on with their conversation.

"How do you say, Hey dickhead, in Spanish?" Leonard asked me.

Finally the guy came over. Leonard made a few gestures, indicating what he wanted. The worker spoke to him in English, grinning as he did it. He then explained how to say dickhead in Spanish.

Leonard paid him, got pesos in change.

The guy said, "Someone give you the hat?"

"Bought it."

"With your own money, señor?"

Leonard didn't respond to that. He went over and wrote a short note to John using a windowsill as a desk. He gave it to the guy behind the desk and the guy dropped it in an out box and smiled at Leonard's hat some more. We left.

“It’s a good hat,” Leonard said.

“For what?”

“Keeping the sun off.”

“It’s more like an eclipse, Leonard. It looks like something goes on a stick over a table by poolside.”

“You wanted one.”

“Did not.”

“Did too.”

“I wouldn’t be caught dead in something like that.”

“It’s just that I’ve got the balls to do what I want and you don’t, that’s what’s got you irritated.”

“I’m not irritated.”

“Are.”

“Are not.”

It was just one of our usual goofed-up days. We might as well have been home in the States. We were unpopular and pissed off wherever we went.

About four we went down to the dock to catch the tender back to the ship. The tender was there with our original pilot standing on the deck, helping people on board, but out in the bay, no ship. Least not our ship.

We talked to the pilot. Our Spanish sucked. His English was good. He told us the Sea Pleasure had left at three-thirty. For a moment I thought we hadn’t changed our watches, crossed a zone or something, had lost an hour. But we had the right time.

Leonard said to the pilot, “You’re sure?”

The guy, who was short and gold-toothed, said, “You see the ship you want, señor?”

Leonard took a theatrical look out at the water.

“Nope.”

The pilot shrugged.

“Could it have sunk?” Leonard asked.

“Funny, you are, señor. I got to take people out to the real cruise ship now. And whatever you pay for that hat, it is too much.”

We walked back up the dock, stunned.

“That lying little ferret,” Leonard said. “I gave him an opening and he took it and told me the wrong time. I see him again, I’m gonna beat him until he has flashbacks.”

“Of what?”

“Me beatin’ him.”

“Can I hit him a couple of times?”

“If there’s anything left, of course. You are my best friend.”

11

WE DECIDED we might as well plan on being in Playa del Carmen for a day or two, so we ended up at a little pink stucco hotel where we rented a double. The room smelled of damp carpet and the bathroom smelled of urine beneath the warped linoleum.

Upstairs we sat on one of the beds and sorted our money. Most of what I had gotten for my heroic deed was back home in the bank, but I had more in traveler’s checks in my luggage on the ship, right next to my clean underwear and socks. I had some bucks in my wallet, two hundred dollars in traveler’s checks, and a charge card with a low limit on it. Leonard had a hundred dollars in assorted bills and a very ugly hat.

“Okay, we got enough for a couple nights, maybe three we need to spend them,” I said. “That also includes food, phone calls we need to make, and maybe some clean underwear.”

“I didn’t know you changed yours,” Leonard said.

I ignored that, said, “Okay, so what’s first?”

“I vote on the underwear for you, but I suppose the thing to do is call John, get him to arrange some plane flights, nearest airport and all that, then we find a way to get to the airport, fly to New Orleans, get a cab to where the ship will dock, get our luggage, cripple the asshole who lied to us about the departure time, break his dick in three spots, cover his balls in peanut butter, pack his asshole with a pound of pure cane sugar, and hold him down in an ant bed.”

“Might I point out this is all your fault.”

“That so?”

“If you hadn’t fucked with him in the first place this wouldn’t have happened. All you had to do was put on a jacket or go to the buffet.”

“I didn’t want the buffet, and I didn’t want to wear a jacket.”

“And you see the results.”

“That pompous motherfucker just thinks he got off scot-free with me. Besides, you said you wanted to hit him some.”

“I want to hit you some too. But we’ll make a phone call instead.”

We looked around the room. No phone. Downstairs they wouldn’t let us use the one in the office and there wasn’t a pay phone. Suddenly there was a language barrier. The desk clerk indicated he had no idea where we might find a phone.

I asked him if there was a Holiday Inn anywhere near. He just grinned at me. Now I was the Ugly American.

We went outside and around the corner and started walking in the direction of the post office. Had we seen a pay phone in the post office? We were uncertain. As we walked, Leonard’s hat provided me with a lot of shade. Which I needed. I was pretty warm. Not as humid as East Texas, but still warm, and by this time it was late afternoon.

The post office was closed.

“What the hell?” I said.

“They keep their own hours,” Leonard said.

We walked along the littered beach a ways and actually found an old-fashioned phone booth. But the phone was missing. Someone had torn it out. Some of the phonebook was there, though, just in case it was needed.

“Maybe we could just put a message in a bottle,” I said. “Toss it in the ocean.”

“I’m game,” Leonard said.

The beach was nice, and we decided for no good reason at all to just keep walking along it. I think, subconsciously, we were trying to get away from town, as if that would take us away from our miseries. There was a long wooden dock, and we walked on the sand next to that and watched the boats, some with sails, some without, bobbing in the slate-colored water like tops. Above us seabirds soared, made noises like insane laughter.

As we walked, no phone booth materialized but we saw three men coming toward us. They were stocky guys. One of them wore a coat, which seemed odd for the weather. We veered left around them and they turned and spread out and said something in Spanish.

One of them, a guy with a thick mustache, showed us a knife and a big grin. He said something in Spanish we didn't understand, but the big knife was speaking loud and clear and needed no translation.

It was at that moment that I remembered some of the literature I had read on the boat: Don't wander off from the main areas. Play del Carmen is a beautiful, quaint little town with the amazing ruins of Tulum nearby. But off the beaten path, thieves often rob tourists at knifepoint on the outskirts.

"Bad day for this," Leonard said to the trio, but they just smiled at us. I watched carefully. The other two didn't pull knives, but one of them did pull a machete from under his coat. I had sort of thought that coat was suspicious.

I didn't feel up to fighting a machete, but I didn't feel all that inclined to give them my money.

"Dinero," one of them said.

"We've already eaten," Leonard said.

"He means money," I said. "Not dinner. Dinero."

"I know that."

"I think we should give it to them."

They were circling us, waiting on us to make some kind of decision.

"What if we give it to them and they cut us anyway?" Leonard said.

"It's still going to work out the same, they're going to end up with the money. We give them the loot, we got a chance."

"That what you want to do?"

I watched the guy with the machete ease around in front of me. Leonard and I had now ended up back to back, sort of rotating with the guys as they went around us.

All three were speaking Spanish, and shaking their hands at us like we should fill them.

"What I want," I said, "is to stick that machete up his ass, crank it around like I'm trying to start a prop plane."

“Stop moving, and let them make their move,” Leonard said.

“It’s the machete worries me,” I said.

“What, the knife don’t bother you?”

The guy with the machete grunted and his arm went up, brandishing the weapon. I went to him, got under his arm before it dropped, got a hand on his elbow, one on his wrist. I had tried to move to his outside, but couldn’t, so I was inside. I held the wrist with one hand and shot my elbow into his face, flicked his wrist, and the machete went away and we went down, him on top. He tried to choke me, but I rolled out from under him and pushed him aside. He came up and had both hands on my shoulders. I kicked at his balls, but he moved his leg in the way, so I kicked to the inside of his legs a couple of times, real quick, and the second shot made him go down. I kneed at his face, but he grabbed my leg and we were rolling on the ground again. I flipped him over, landed on top, bit a chunk out of his ear and pounded him a couple times and got up.

I caught a glimpse of Leonard out of the corner of my eye. He had lost his hat and the mugger with the knife was standing in the middle of it. Leonard knocked the guy with the knife down, but the man still had the knife. The other guy grabbed Leonard’s arms from behind, and Leonard stomped his feet and shins, and the guy was letting go as the man with the knife leaped forward and the blade went into Leonard’s stomach. I let out a scream, then the guy I had been fighting was on me again.

I flicked my fingers against his eyes and he groaned and got out of my way.

Leonard was down and the guy with the knife was stabbing him again. I got there just in time to slide behind the guy, reach around, and rake both hands across his face, gouging one eye deeply.

The guy shrieked like a rat with a boot heel on its back. He turned, lunged. I went sideways and he went past. I hit him with everything I had, right behind the head with a hammer fist. He went down and didn’t move. The guy who had been holding Leonard had him down now and was punching. Leonard brought a leg up and over the guy’s head, swept him off, got up holding his stomach. He said, “Watch out!”

When I turned, the machete man had recovered his weapon. He was coming toward me. The other guy came at Leonard. Leonard scooped sand, threw it in his eyes, sidestepped, and shot out a sideways kick that took the guy's knee out. It cracked as loud as a bullwhip. He yelled even louder as he went down.

The machete man charged me.

He was so wild, all I had to do was move and he went stumbling past me. When I turned, Leonard had gone down from his wounds, was lying in the sand, bleeding, unconscious. Maybe worse.

I had done all right the first couple of times, but a machete is a machete, and all it took was for him to make one correct move and for me to make one mistake.

Somehow I was aware of the sun turning red, dying somewhere behind the city. A gull shrieked loudly overhead, cheering us on. Then the guy with the machete began to stalk me, slow and steady, the machete cocked at his side.

I glimpsed something in my peripheral vision. Another man. He wore a blue baseball cap and also carried a machete.

I was about to reach for my wallet, throw it to the guy, hope for the best, when the second machete bearer ran past me. I ducked, but he didn't swing. He just kept going, right to the other man with the machete.

Machetes clanged together. The man who had joined the fray on our side was good. He was not swinging wildly like the other guy. He was warding off the man's strikes with the flat of the blade, using his free hand to slap and grab. Pretty soon he had the other man by the arm and was pulling him down. Using the flat of the blade, he knocked our attacker unconscious.

Our rescuer promptly marched over to the two downed men. One of them was out, the other was clasping his knee with one hand, holding the other hand up as if to push our savior away.

Our fella said something in Spanish and the man on the ground began to crawl away, leaving his unconscious buddies.

The man turned toward me, the machete held by his side. I wondered if I were his next victim. He might have merely been eliminating competition. I eyed the machete lying on the ground, judged if I could reach it quickly.

Nope. Too far away.

The man grinned at me. He had a gold tooth and the sun caught the tooth and made it sparkle. He had on a thick white cotton shirt and pants, and sandals. Although he had moved well and looked younger while in motion, I could see now that he was seventy if he was a day. The hair under his baseball cap was gray, nearly white, and he had gray stubble on his face.

He turned to Leonard, knelt beside him.

I rushed over. Leonard was bleeding. He opened his eyes.

"Have they gone home?" he asked.

"In a manner of speaking," I said.

The man said something in Spanish, and neither Leonard nor I responded. He came back in English.

"Policía. Not good."

"They're police?" I said.

He nodded. "Off duty."

"Oh," I said. "That's good, Leonard. They're off duty."

"Oh good," Leonard said. "You know, this hurts. Bad."

"They are corrupt," said the man.

"No shit," Leonard said.

"They are from Cozumel. They come here to make extra money."

"Nice," Leonard said. "A part-time job … Look, I'm gettin' kind of queasy here."

"Come," the man said. "We must go. My boat."

We got on either side of Leonard, helped him up, carried him toward a fishing boat tied at the dock.

"What about my hat?" Leonard asked.

"Well," I said, "if you want it with a hole in the crown. One of those fuckers' feet went through it. If you had ears like a mule, you might want it."

"Typical," Leonard said.

We climbed on board the boat with some difficulty, stretched

Leonard out on the deck and opened his shirt.

“Not so bad,” the man said. “Had worse.”

“Yeah, but it’s me that’s got this one,” Leonard said.

“I will fix it. Beatrice!”

A very attractive, slightly heavy, thirtyish woman with shoulder-length hair dark as a miner’s dream came onto the deck. She looked miffed. She wore a black short-sleeve sweatshirt, earrings with silver dangles, blue jeans, and black canvas shoes. She smelled like fresh soap and had a look on her face made me think she could have beaten puppies to death and enjoyed it. I noticed that the tip of her right pinkie was missing and the skin was puckered there and visible was the faint shine of yellow bone.

The man said something in Spanish. The woman looked at us, sighed, went back inside the cabin, reappeared with first-aid gear in a plastic box. She squatted beside Leonard, opened the kit.

The man took out some alcohol, some other disinfectants, and went to work. As he worked, he said something to the woman. She went away. A moment later the anchor was up and the motor was humming. We were moving out into the ocean.

The man turned to me suddenly, smiled, said, “Ferdinand.” He stuck out his hand. I shook it.

“How is he?” I asked.

“Oh, he is good. Got good skin.”

“Haven’t I always said I have good skin, Hap?”

“Always,” I said.

“One wound pretty good in the stomach,” said Ferdinand. “But it is not so deep.” He pulled a large needle and thick thread from the box.

“Oh shit,” Leonard said.

“Hold his head,” Ferdinand said.

“You don’t have to do that,” Leonard said. “Just sew.”

Ferdinand started right in. After the first pass, Leonard said, “Hold my goddamn head, Hap. Hold my legs. Sit on me. Do something.”

I held him as best I could, and Ferdinand made eight stitches.

12

TIME FLIES when you're having a big time.

I don't know exactly when I fell asleep, but I awoke lying on the cabin floor by the bunk where Leonard lay. The woman was asleep on the bunk across the way. I barely remembered us going inside the cabin. Nothing like a good fight and a knifing of your best friend before dinner.

'Course, we might not get any dinner.

I got up, went out of the cabin, onto the deck. It was dark and the moon was up. The sea was a giant basin filled with ink. The boat lifted up and down like a carnival ride. I had never been so sick of water in all my life.

The old man was up top at the controls. I climbed up there and he turned and grinned at me.

"You sleep a little?" he said.

"Yes sir," I said. "Thank you. Thank you very much."

I could see a string of lights out in the distance, along the shoreline. They looked like lightning bugs pinned to a display board coated with black velvet.

"I didn't even know I was sleepy," I said.

"It is fear, my friend. I do not say you are a coward. But we all have fear. It exhausts."

"Been there before," I said. "How bad is he really cut?"

"Not so bad. Not good. Not bad. No cut is good. It did not go deep."

"I appreciate your help. Can I ask why you helped?"

"Why not? I do not like many men on two. Though, you two do pretty good. I think they not have the machete, the knife, you might have been all right."

"You saw it all?"

"From my boat. I was coming in, I saw it. I pulled to the dock. I've seen them do that before. Take money from tourists. They try and rob me once."

"How'd that work out?"

"They did not have a knife. I did not have a knife. But I am strong."

"They're really police?"

"I recognized them. Cozumel. They come here, do what they like, go back across the water."

"Won't they know who you are?"

"I do not think so."

"Well, I hope not. Are you out here to hide from them? I mean, out this late. It must have been some hours now."

"It has been a few hours. I went out to sea some. To fish."

"You went fishing?"

"It is what I do."

"Catch anything?"

"No. That is sometimes what I do. Catch nothing."

The lights of the shore grew closer. I started to say something about having a room rented in Playa del Carmen, but then decided to hell with it. It didn't matter.

As we neared the lights, Beatrice came up the ladder. Other than the fighting chair where Ferdinand sat, there were a couple of deck chairs up there. Beatrice took one of them, and I took the other.

She said, "Your friend is sleeping good. I believe he will be okay."

"Thanks to you two."

She made a kind of grunting noise. "My father, he is always helping someone. He gets no help from anyone else, but he is always helping someone."

"That is what it is about, Beatrice," the old man said. "Is that not the way of God?"

"If it is, let him do it."

"Beatrice!" Ferdinand said.

She sat quietly for a while. She said, "I'm sorry." Then to me: "I fear for my father. The police, they are very corrupt here in Mexico. If they know what he did, he could be imprisoned. Hurt. Here, the police, they do as they please."

We cruised the water for what seemed like a long time, and though the lights came closer, they did not come close enough fast enough. It seemed as if we were perched on the lip of forever, unable to move forward.

Finally we arrived at the dock in Playa del Carmen. A young, shaggy-haired boy, maybe twelve, in blue jeans and a dirty Disney T-shirt with Mickey's head faded into nothing, ran out to the boat and climbed on board. He started when he saw me, but Beatrice spoke to him and Ferdinand laughed.

"He has been taught that all Americans are dangerous," said Ferdinand. "His name is José and he works a little for me. He waits for the boat to come in and helps me carry the fish and do little chores. Tonight, I have no fish. Just you two. You are my fish. Go ashore. I will lock up the boat. José and his brothers will stay with the boat."

"What brothers?" I asked.

"They will be along. You best look after your friend. Beatrice will help you."

Beatrice and I went inside the cabin and stirred Leonard. He groaned when we woke him. We helped him up. He tried not to act like someone in pain, but he couldn't help it. I said, "Maybe he needs a doctor."

"That could be," Beatrice said. "I have some antibiotics. I can give him those. It will be a while before we are where I can get them."

I considered this. I asked Leonard what he thought.

"Well," he said. "I've felt better. But I've had a lot worse. I think if I get some antibiotics, some rest, I'll be all right."

Beatrice helped me take Leonard off the boat and onto the dock. I had no idea what was going to happen from there. Neither she nor her father owed us anything. They could have just turned us loose in the night. Fact was, they had put themselves in considerable jeopardy to aid us. But I was relieved when Beatrice said, “We’ll take your friend to our home for tonight. I want you and him to leave tomorrow. Do you understand that?”

“Sure,” I said.

“I am sorry for your friend, but we do not need enemies. My father makes enemies often.”

“I bet he makes friends often too,” I said.

“Enemies seem a little more determined than friends,” she said. “Friends have a way of going away when you need them.”

“That isn’t my experience,” I said. “It depends on who you call friend.”

She had one of Leonard’s arms draped over her shoulder, and I had the other. He was groaning as we walked along.

I followed Beatrice’s lead. We ended up out back of a stucco building where there were cars sitting in a dark lot near a sign painted on the side of the building. The sign was for some kind of Mexican pastry and the moon made it shiny and white and surreal there in the night.

Beatrice unlocked an old white van and we got inside. The interior was well worn, seats ripped up, patches of cloth hanging from the ceiling. The van had no back seat and was empty of possessions, except for some tow sacks in the back. We placed Leonard on those. I made as comfortable a pillow as I could for him out of a spare sack. He said, “I lost my goddamn hat.”

“Just goes to show,” I said, “the day hasn’t been a total loss. But we’ve discussed what happened to the hat.”

“We have?”

“You weren’t feeling too good at the time, but yes, we discussed it. One of our muggers stepped through it.”

“Oh yeah. I remember.”

I climbed in the passenger’s seat and Beatrice started the van. I said, “What about Ferdinand? He said he was coming.”

“He always says that, but he does not come. He stays with the boat with José and his brothers. I think he likes it that way. He loves that boat. If he were coming, he would have come.”

The van coughed and sputtered and rolled forward with a protesting lurch, banged into a couple of potholes, crunched gravel, and off we went.

We drove along bad roads for an hour or so. It had grown very dark because clouds had bagged the moon. There was just the van's headlights on the road, and a little glow from the dash light that shone against Beatrice's face and gave it a ghostly appearance and made her little silver earrings float about her ears like spectral fish swimming in the ether.

We talked a little, but nothing to take note of. We just rode on into the night until we came to some sparsely wooded hills that swelled on either side of the road, and we were swallowed by them. Somewhere along there, without meaning to, due to the rocking of the van, the kind of day I had had, I drifted off to sleep, and it was the dying of the motor that brought me awake.

It was a simple house, part adobe, part thatch, just like you see in the movies about Mexico. There were scrubby trees in the yard and an old white Ford without tires or wheels sitting out to the side of the house. Prickly pear had grown up all around it and the moon was out from behind the clouds again and I could see the car was stuffed with all manner of junk.

Beatrice helped me wake Leonard and get him into the house. I held Leonard up while she lit lamps. I didn't see an electric light or refrigerator. The house was very small. Three rooms. Two of the rooms were bedrooms, the other was a kitchen of sorts with an old wooden stove. After we got Leonard stretched out on a bed in one of the bedrooms, slipped off his shoes, she took me outside and showed me where the outdoor convenience was. It was a leaning rectangle of graying slats with a tin roof and it smelled just like what was under it. Beatrice seemed a little embarrassed by it all.

We went back inside and she got a large jar of pills and brought them out. "Antibiotics," she said.

"Jesus, that's certainly the economy version," I said.

"You can buy them like that here. Not like in the States."

"Do you go to the States often?"

"Not anymore," she said. "I lived there once. I studied archaeology at the University of Texas. Austin."

“I’ve always been interested in archaeology.”

She gave me a curious eyeballing.

“Seriously,” I said, and told her about having done some digs here and there when I was young, Caddo Indian stuff in East Texas mostly. I had been the shovel boy for a nice amateur archaeologist named Sam Whiteside. She talked about going to the University of Texas, then the University of Mexico, and how she had graduated with a degree in anthropology and archaeology.

She got some water and the pills and took them to Leonard. He was sweating slightly and had a fever. He was only partially awake.

“These,” she said, shaking the jar of pills, “should get the infection down. He has not lost much blood. Tomorrow, he rests some, eats, then you go.”

“Okay,” I said, trying not to think too far ahead.

“We’ll give him the pills now,” she said.

“But not all of them?”

She smiled. “Not all of them. Just a few.”

“Leonard,” I said, waking him. “Time to take your medicine.”

I supported his head on my arm while Beatrice gave him the pills and held the glass so he could sip water. When that was finished, I lowered Leonard back onto the bed and he went to sleep immediately. Beatrice blew out the light and we went out of there.

In the kitchen she lit the lamps and poured some water from a pitcher into a basin, gave me a bar of lye soap. I used it to wash my face and hands. When I was finished, she handed me a towel.

“We do not have many conveniences,” she said. “I had nice things in the States, but here my father is very poor and he lives as he has always lived.”

“That’s quite all right,” I said. “I thank you for helping us.”

She opened a metal box on a shelf and took out a loaf of long, brown, home-baked bread. She split it down the middle, made slices from that. She removed a big cake of flaking cheese from the storage box, cut slabs from it, put them on the bread. She poured wine from a bottle into two fruit jars and gave me one of the jars. I don’t really like wine, but I wasn’t about to be rude. Not after all she and her father had done for us.

We sat in some old but comfortable chairs at a cheap table supported by wobbly aluminum legs and ate our bread and cheese and drank our wine.

The bread was full of flavor, and the cheese was sharp. I even found I liked the wine. At that point, however, having not eaten in some hours, I think I might have enjoyed a steaming slice of dog shit on a roof shingle.

As we ate, we talked. “I earned my degree,” she said, “but I never used it. I came back here when my mother died to take care of my father. I have been here ever since.”

“Your father looks like a capable man to me,” I said.

“In many ways he is, but he cannot take care of himself at home.”

“Maybe he can,” I said.

She smiled at me. It was a lovely smile. “You don’t understand what’s expected of me.”

“By your father?”

“By my past. I have been raised to do the woman’s work.”

“You went to the university. That’s certainly a modern enough approach. Does your father expect it of you? Staying home, I mean?”

“No. But I expect it. I feel I’m failing if I do not do it. I know I do not have to, yet I do.”

“Maybe you should change your thinking.”

“My thinking is changed, but my doing is the same.”

I smiled at her. “That’s one way to put it. Do you work on the fishing boat?”

She nodded. “And do other things. I go on the boat to keep from staying here. No one lives near here. There is nothing to do. I do not like the boat, but I have my father there, and I can keep busy with the baiting, the cleaning of the fish.”

“I assume you sell the fish.”

“Yes. What do you do? Are you on vacation?”

“I’m a security guard at a chicken plant.”

She grinned wide, and she looked very beautiful when she did that. It gave her deep dimples. Her eyes were bright in the lamplight. I loved the way she spoke English, the way her accent curled around the words and made them sexy.

We talked for a long time. She poured more wine. I meant not to drink it, but I was geared up and nervous. By the time I finished the second jar of wine, I was beginning to feel a little sleepy.

She told me about her life and her disappointments, and they were all tied to tradition and how her mother had lived and how she had tried to break away from it, but couldn’t. It had stayed with her like a disease. She loved her mother and what she had done, but didn’t feel it was for her—and yet, here she was, in many ways taking her mother’s place. A woman over thirty and not getting younger and feeling she was missing out on the world.

“There is never any money,” she said. “My father cares little for money. He works. He makes enough to feed us, to get oil for his lamps, a few items here and there. He wants nothing else. He sells his fish too cheap. He does not have money, he does without. It does not bother him.”

“But it bothers you.”

“I do not ask to be rich, but I would like to have nice clothes. Some things. Is that so bad?”

“No,” I said. “It isn’t. Fact is, I haven’t had all that much myself. It’s my fault. You can want too much, but you can want too little as well. I think I’ve wanted too little. Your father, he seems content, and that’s fine. But it’s all right you want something more. I think he could do without you, he had to. He seems independent.”

She smiled at me, reached to take my glass, touched my hand. She leaned forward, stared at me. “Would you kiss me?”

It didn’t seem like a chore. “Yes I would,” I said, and did. I liked it so much, I did it again. I don’t know exactly how it happened, but the next moment she was out of her chair and in my lap, and we were kissing deeply. She smelled good, her hair was soft, and her lips were sweet.

Still, part of me felt bad about the whole thing. Sort of like I was cheating on Brett. But Brett had gone her own way. I had no reason to feel guilt. No reason at all.

Another part of me felt as if I were taking advantage of a lonely woman who had had too much wine, but that part wasn't speaking too loudly. Hell, I had had too much wine.

I kissed her deeply. She ran her hand between my legs and took hold of me and squeezed, and soon I had her in my arms and was carrying her to the empty bedroom. I laid her on the bed and helped her undress, pulling her shoes off, her jeans, her sweatshirt over her head, unfastening her bra and removing her panties.

I stood by the bed and removed my clothes and removed my wallet and took out a prophylactic and gave it to her. She laid it beside her. I climbed onto the bed. She stroked me and finally took the rubber from the package and slipped it over me, then she spread her legs and took hold of her knees and pulled them up so that they were damn near touching her ears.

I entered into her, and in spite of the prophylactic, it felt so good, and it had been so long, I almost came on the spot. It was tempting to just go ahead and let it go, but I fought being selfish. I did the times tables for a while, till they got beyond me, then I tried to remember how to cook a couple of Mexican dishes and thought about the theme songs from favorite TV shows, finally got hold of myself. Then I was relaxed, making love, keeping control on my needs, administering to hers. She knew just how to coax me along, knew what to whisper in my ear, where to put her fingers, how to touch me.

We did it in that position for a while, then she rolled over and I took her from the rear.

Finally, to both our satisfaction, we finished in the traditional position, her letting go first, then me.

It wasn't as wild as it was with Brett, who could do more tricks with a six-inch dick than a monkey could with a hundred feet of grapevine, but Beatrice's love-making was slyer than Brett's, calculated as if by script.

She was certainly a woman of experience, and it was exactly what I needed, and from all observation, what she needed as well. As that ol' Merle Haggard song goes, "It ain't love, but it ain't bad."

We lay together and I thought about the day. I had been on a cruise, off a cruise, seen famous ruins, been in a fight. My best friend had been knifed, we had been saved by a wild old Mexican with a machete who turned out to be very nice and had a lovely daughter, and Leonard's awful hat had been destroyed. The lovely daughter had fed me and fucked me, and now I lay me down to sleep.

I wondered what Brett was doing.

Maybe what I had been doing.

Wrong approach.

I closed my eyes.

I pulled Beatrice close.

And wondered again what Brett was doing.

No future in that.

Finally, I slept.

13

NEXT MORNING I ROSE while Beatrice slept, dressed, went in to check on Leonard. He opened his eyes when I walked into the room.

“Morning,” I said.

“Morning. My, you look happy. Been poundin’ the possum, ain’t you?”

“Now that you mention it, yes.”

“I can always tell. You have that smug look and the eyes get hooded, like Robert Mitchum.”

I sat on the edge of the bed. I said, “Now what?”

“Well, now that you’ve had what you need, have taken advantage of a poor peasant girl—”

“Hah.”

“—I don’t think we want to stay here.”

“Very good. But that isn’t exactly a plan. How’re you feeling?”

“Like I’ve been wiped, flushed, and I’m on my way out to sea. I’m bored enough to collect farts and name them, yet I don’t feel like I could do much. I’m lucky I had good stomach muscles, or I’d be dead.”

“You’re lucky he had a short knife,” I said. “Your stomach muscles aren’t that good.”

“And yours aren’t good at all.”

“What I have are table muscles. They’re more subtle. Look, I’ll see if Beatrice will take us into town. Maybe we can make a phone call there.”

“How would we get out of here? Get back to the U.S. Pontoon boat?”

“I haven’t a clue. Question is, are you up to it?”

Leonard tried to rise, said, “You know what? I’m not up to it.”

“Then we better not arrange a way out yet. You don’t need to travel, you feel that bad.”

“You don’t hear me fighting with you.”

“Then you are hurt,” I said. “I’ve never known you to give in to me that easy.”

“You got a point, bucko.”

“Lie down. I’ll see I can rustle you up some breakfast.”

I left out of there, discovered Beatrice was up and moving toward the kitchen. I followed. She smiled at me.

“Last night was very good,” she said.

“Yes it was.”

“It meant something to me, but I do not want you to think it meant everything. Do you understand?”

“I do.”

“Good. Are you hungry?”

“I am. And so is Leonard.”

“How is he?”

“Better, but not up to snuff. I know you want us to leave out, Beatrice. And we will. But maybe another day or two for Leonard to rest.”

Suddenly she became very hard. “One more day. No more than that.”

“Fine,” I said. “One more day.”

She put some grounds in a pot and started coffee. It was so dark and rich with aroma it made my nose hairs quiver. I had a feeling it wasn’t decaf. She located some more bread and cheese and took it to Leonard. We sat in the room with him and ate the same. Beatrice brought us cups of coffee. After two cups I felt as if I had been blackjacked and ass-kicked.

In spite of the food and coffee, Leonard drifted back to sleep. Beatrice smiled at me. She wiggled her finger for me to come, stood up, and went out of the room.

We went back to her bedroom and went to bed. We made love one more time. I was lucky she wasn't like Brett. I wouldn't have had enough rubbers.

At least it had been that way for a while.

After we lay together for a while, Beatrice led me out on the back porch and showed me how a shower was set up there with a pull chain. The water was in a big tin reservoir. It was put there by the rain and sometimes brought in from outside, but there was only so much water, she said, so we showered together. Which wasn't something I considered a drawback.

As I soaped her up in the pink morning light her breasts, damp with the water from the homemade shower, were dark and slick under my touch, and the thick nipples were tantalizing. I liked the way the soap foamed over them and the way the water plastered her hair to her head, which in the light of day I could see held streaks of gray. I liked the way the water beaded in her pubic hair. Her eyes were deep and dark, her face was full of an expression that showed me there was plenty to like and a lot that was hard to understand. She was a real mystery. I liked that. I liked it so much I kissed her.

* * *

About two that afternoon I helped Leonard make it out to the outdoor convenience, stood by outside while he finished, trying to stand far enough away I didn't have to hear the usual bathroom sounds.

"It's great to have a valet," Leonard called through the toilet walls.

"Yeah, well, just don't ask me to wipe your ass for you."

"Hap?"

"What?"

"There's a Mexican catalogue in here."

"It's Mexico, you moron."

"I mean, that's what you wipe your ass with. Pages from it."

"Ouch."

Back in the house, Beatrice, dressed in a simple white cotton dress with red and purple flowers stitched on it, searched through her shelf of books, found Leonard a book in English, Andrew Vachss's Dead and Gone, left it with him along with a bottle of water, bread and cheese, and a cup of coffee.

She and I drove into town so I could try and make some kind of arrangements to get home. As we drove along with the sand blowing up and making clouds on the road, she said, "I was supposed to be at the boat this morning, to help."

"What are you going to tell your father?"

"I will not tell him that I was servicing you."

"I hear that. Hey. Wasn't I servicing you too?"

"You were. You did good."

"Great. Good dog. Want me to fetch your slippers?"

Beatrice laughed her musical laugh.

"Will he be mad?" I asked.

"No. He does not make me work on the boat. It is as I said last night. I feel obligated."

"Thanks for going against your obligation this morning."

"That is all right. Even the obligated must have, how do you say it, ashes hauled?"

"Close enough. But, you know, I hate it for your father. I mean, he helps us out, then we mess up his schedule. I make love to his daughter."

"He likes to take José out. José goes with him often. José or his brothers. He enjoys being able to give them a little money. They are even poorer than we are. Father catches quite a few fish. But if he caught all the fish in the ocean, he would only make so much money. It is not a rich life, the life of a fisherman."

"I hear that."

In town we stopped at a little café near the dock. Outside the café the smell was briny and strong of fish. Inside the café there was the smell of cooking fish, and that unique smell of hot sauces and fresh tortillas.

I used some of the money I had to treat Beatrice to lunch, reminded myself to stop by later and get something for Leonard.

We had spicy fish with beans and rice and tortillas. As we ate, I halfway expected one of the cops from across the bay to come in, but that was probably just fearful thinking. Even though the towns of Playa del Carmen and Cozumel were separated only by water, it was enough water unless the renegade cops made regular pilgrimages here.

When we finished, Beatrice had coffee while I found a pay phone that worked near the restaurant and called John's number using my calling card. I got the answering machine. I left a message outlining briefly what had happened. Where we were.

I called Charlie.

"Yes."

"Hey, Hap. You gettin' any cruise ship pussy?"

"No. Actually I'm in Playa del Carmen, Mexico."

"Hey, getting any señorita pussy?"

"Actually, yes."

"Female chihuahuas don't count."

"You're just as funny as clown shoes."

"Hey, I know it."

"Listen. I got a little problem."

"Oh, shit."

"No. Nothing like that. Not the usual."

"Anybody dead?"

"Not yet."

I gave him the shortened version of events.

"Damn. Is Leonard bad?"

"Not bad, but hell, he took a knife. No little thing. It could have been a lot worse. It's a small cut, not too deep. Which is a good thing. This isn't exactly a medical Mecca here."

"You guys. You're somethin'. You could fuck up a wet dream. What do you need?"

"Well, mainly I wanted you to know what happened to us. And I think I'm going to need some money wired until I can get to my money on board the ship. Then I can pay you back."

"How much you need?"

“Well, we’ll have to arrange for plane tickets. Stuff like that. I’ve got some money. But, since I’m not certain how long Leonard’s going to have to recoup, if we’re going to have to take a hotel or not, maybe a couple thousand. Three would be better.”

“Shit. Ask for ten. Same thing.”

“I know, Charlie. Maybe you could loan me some, a little from Marvin—”

“—Marvin’s in a fuckin’ wheelchair. What’s he gonna do? Run a little soapbox derby for extra bucks?”

“You know my deal. I’m actually good for it for once. And besides, even when I’m not good for it, I pay it back, don’t I?”

Charlie sighed. “I can ask.”

“Brett might loan you a little for me. Between the three of you, you might could scrape it up. Shit, man. A thousand would probably do it, we had to. Oh, and John, of course. He’s probably got the whole thing.”

“Why didn’t you call him?”

“I did. He wasn’t home.”

“So I was second choice?”

“Pretty much.”

“Look. I’ll see what I can do. Give me John’s phone number.”

I gave it to him.

“You know Brett’s?”

“I do.”

“I wouldn’t count on much there. I’m just being wistful. John’s probably the best bet.”

“All right. Who else?”

“I think that’s about all the people who like me. And some of them are a mixed bag. There’s a lawyer friend named Veil, but I have no idea where he is these days. And besides, I’m not sure he and Leonard truly like one another.”

“I know Veil,” Charlie said.

“You do?” I said.

“Everyone knows Veil. You got a number I can call you?”

“No. The lady we’re staying with doesn’t have a phone.”

“She the one you’re doing the hole punch with?”

“That’s an indelicate way of putting it. But yes. We’ll only be there today, though. Tomorrow, we have to head out.”

“Didn’t turn out so good, huh? Bad in the sack?”

“She was fine.”

“Hell, I meant you.”

“I was quite good, actually. She told me so.”

“Now there’s something you can depend on.”

“Charlie, I don’t know where to wire the money. I guess what I’ll do is call you back tomorrow, see if you could raise it, then I’ll let you know where to send it. I get the money I can book a plane flight.”

“Haven’t you got a credit card?”

“I do. But it’s one of those that has a low credit limit.”

“A kiddie card.”

“Pretty much. Something like three hundred dollars. I might even have enough with that and my cash and Leonard’s to put together two plane flights, but if we need to eat, anything goes wrong, well, we’d be screwed. Besides, I need to slip these people a little something. They didn’t ask, but the old man literally saved our lives. He patched Leonard up good and just in time. Without him and the antibiotics his daughter gave us, Leonard might be deceased.”

“All right, Hap. Give me a call tomorrow.”

“Done deal,” I said.

I went back to the café and joined Beatrice for coffee. The coffee was rich and black and almost took my breath away. Same as Beatrice’s eyes.

“When does your father come in?”

“Usually midday. And then he goes back. He used to stay on the boat all day. But now he fishes very early, comes back, goes out again late. He does not go too far. He does not have to. He seems to know where the fish are. This is one of the places he sells the fish to, this café. Perhaps the fish we ate is one he caught.”

“Doesn’t it bother you to eat a fish you know personally?”

“Not at all.”

“That seems inconsiderate.”

“Fuck the fish,” she said.

She saw me glancing at her little finger, the one with the tip missing.

“You wonder what happened?”

“Yeah. I guess so.”

“Fishing line. A shark was caught. He jerked, the line tangled. It took off the tip of my finger.”

“I didn’t mean to stare.”

“It is all right.”

We wandered around Playa del Carmen, looking at the tourist shops. Actually, after one shop I was pretty much worn out. The rest were the same ol’ same ol’, but I put up with it because Beatrice seemed to think she was showing me a good time.

She suggested a ferry over to Cozumel, but I wanted to be available when her father showed and I didn’t want to give those cops the chance to see me again. I told her so.

“Of course,” she said. “I wasn’t thinking.”

All I could think about was Leonard back at their home, wounded, with nothing but bread and cheese to eat. I ought to get back there, and maybe it would be best to get him closer to town right away, one of the hotels. I might even be able to find a doctor, provided Charlie could rouse enough money.

I said, “Since you need us out tomorrow, we could walk around and see if I can find a hotel for me and Leonard. We actually had a room rented, but we didn’t show last night. We might can get a room there again.”

She didn’t hesitate. “Very well.”

We ended up at a different, cheaper, but nicer hotel. It was white stucco with a large palm near the front and a sign that translated something like the House of Siesta. Out front was a medium-sized yellow dog that looked croaked. It lay in the hot sun like a flapjack on a griddle. When we stepped over the dog, it wagged its tail, just to let us know it didn't need burying.

Inside, Beatrice spoke Spanish to the man behind the desk. He had rooms.

"Shall I set you up?" she said.

I had been watching a couple of very large cockroaches practice sumo style shoving in the corner of the room. Kind of made me feel homesick, actually.

"Yes. Make it two nights. I want to give Leonard a little time to rest, time for the money to get here."

She talked to the desk clerk. I gave him my charge card. Signed some papers. When he gave me back my card, Beatrice said, "Tonight, you two stay with us. I arranged for you a night after that. That is enough, is it not?"

I was surprised after what she had told me about wanting Leonard and me out, but I said, "Should be. If not, I can extend it. It doesn't look as if people are knocking the doors off this place to get in."

"It's nicer than our home," Beatrice said.

I felt bad, but didn't know what to say, so let it go.

As we left the hotel, I said, "Why are you letting us stay tonight? I had the feeling you needed us out."

"You are why. I thought maybe we do tonight what we did last night. As for why I want you out, well, I have personal reasons. They are not your fault."

"I can live with that," I said.

We wandered around for a while, but her father didn't show at the dock. We finally went back to the café and bought some coffee and sat at a table and talked.

"Have you ever wanted something so bad, and you had it in your hand, and you let it slip away," Beatrice said. "Just one decision, and everything changed."

"Beatrice, it's the story of my life."

"I had my chance in the States. But I came back here to be a Mexican woman in the tradition of my mother. Why? I know better. Why did I do that?"

"Perhaps you were worried about your father?"

“I like to think so. I told you that last night. But it is more. It is like I am imprinted, and I keep doing the same thing. I cannot go backward now, not easily. I have squandered so much, so much time. I would like the big score, you know?”

“I know. I’ve tried that myself. It can happen, the big score. Win the lottery. Gamble and hit the jackpot. But most likely you don’t win the lottery, you don’t hit the jackpot. Slow and steady wins the race.”

“I am nearly thirty-five, and I have not begun my race. I ran it for a while, but in the wrong direction. Correct that. I ran in the right direction, but like an idiot I turned and came back the way I had run. Now I am at the starting line again. And I am tired, Hap.”

“I’m not trying to get into your life. I don’t know your life that well, Beatrice. But why not go back to the States? You’ve got the education. There are opportunities there. You said your father doesn’t expect you to be here. He’d understand. He’d want the best for you.”

“Too hard,” she said. “I would have to get more education to actually get a good job in archaeology. That takes money. I do not have money.”

“Work and earn money. Then take the courses you need.”

“Work at what?”

“You have enough education to get a job. At a small museum maybe.”

“It takes too long. I need the money right now, so I can take the classes. So I can have freedom. I am sick of having nothing, Hap. Physically sick.”

“Maybe we want too damn much,” I said.

“That could be,” Beatrice said. “But you know what? I want it just the same.”

14

LATE THAT AFTERNOON the old man's boat came in. We were at the dock waiting. When the boat arrived and was tied at the dock, the kid, José, jumped off, Spanish tumbling out his mouth so fast you could almost see the words.

"It is Father," Beatrice said. "He has been hurt."

We both rushed to the boat, climbed on board.

Ferdinand was lying on the bed in the boat cabin. His leg was bound up in white cloth and there was a lot of blood.

He and Beatrice spoke to one another in Spanish. When they finished, she sat beside him on the bed. I leaned against the door frame. The old man smiled at me.

"Señor. How are you today?"

"I'm good. But you're not. What happened?"

"Stupid accident. I do this all my life, and now I do this stupid thing. I hooked a small shark. I brought it in, and in the process of hitting it in the head, it came off the hook and wiggled on the deck and bit my lower leg. It is not bad. It was a very little shark."

"He cannot walk," Beatrice said. "I consider that bad."

"No, señor. It is not bad."

"Bad enough. I hope you doctored it as well as you doctored my friend."

"I stitched it up myself."

Beatrice leaned over and looked at the bloody bandage. She started removing it.

"It is fine," said the old man.

Beatrice let out her breath. "It is not fine. My heavens, Father. It is terrible. You need to see a doctor."

Ferdinand spoke to her in Spanish.

She looked at me. “He says he cannot afford a doctor.”

“Do you know where one is?”

“Yes.”

“Then let’s get him there.”

José had come back onto the boat. He looked in at the old man, his eyes wide. The old man spoke to him. The boy immediately began to unload their catch.

“José and his brothers will help sell it in the marketplace. Father will give them nearly half of it. They do not deserve half of it. Only the boy went out.”

“He works hard,” said Ferdinand. “His family is poor.”

Beatrice barked a laugh. It wasn’t a happy laugh.

“Father, you are something. Come, let us get you up from there.”

The doctor wasn’t home. I sat on the doctor’s porch with Ferdinand while Beatrice went to find him. It was nearly dark when she finally came back, an old man plodding along beside her.

He looked like something out of a Humphrey Bogart movie. He wore a white linen suit that looked as if he had slept in it. Scuffed black shoes run-down on the sides and a shirt that had been last washed during the Mexican Revolution, and then only because he had been caught out in the rain. He had salt-and-pepper hair and the front of it hung down on his forehead as if it were too ill to consider being combed.

I heard him call Ferdinand by name, then the rest of it was in Spanish, which left me out. They apparently knew each other well.

I helped the old man up. He was stiffer than before. As the doctor came to help me, I could smell liquor on his breath.

We got Ferdinand inside the house. There were clothes piled up and a couple of men’s magazines on the couch with naked señoritas on the cover. One was open to a centerfold and there was a German shepherd in the picture with a lady one could no longer describe as young. In fact, she looked as if she might have been more at home with a horse.

The doctor paused long enough to flip the magazine closed and toss it off the couch.

I glanced at Beatrice. She looked at me and shook her head. We sat Ferdinand on the couch. The doctor disappeared into the other room.

Ferdinand said, “They are not his magazines. He has a very crazy son. He is my friend’s shame. He lives here with his father.”

“The question is,” I said, “does the son have a German shepherd?”

“I do not think so.”

The doctor came back carrying a bag. He pulled up a chair in front of the couch, sat in it, carefully lifted the old man’s leg, placed the foot on the chair in front of him and began removing the bandages.

The injury was pretty bad. You could see where the old man had poured some kind of red stuff over the wound, and it wasn’t bleeding badly, just sort of oozing, but it was too deep and too wide for stitches, though the old man had tried.

The doctor clucked over it for a moment. He got a bottle of whiskey out of his bag and gave it to Ferdinand. Ferdinand unscrewed the cap, took a snort. The doctor took the bottle back, took a snort himself. He offered us some. Beatrice and I declined.

The doctor went away, came back with a pan of water. He went to work on the leg, cleaning it, snipping away the thread where the old man had tried to sew what couldn’t be sewed.

I went out on the front porch. The smell of the wound bothered me. I had smelled far too many wounds in my lifetime. Beatrice came with me.

She said, “He will be out of work now.”

“What about the kid, José? Or his brothers? Can’t they work for him? Help you out.”

“They would expect to be paid.”

“If you catch fish, pay them. If you don’t—”

She laughed. “It is so easy for you, is it not. Being an American.

There is always money.”

“I don’t know what you think you know, honey, but one thing is for damn certain, I haven’t got any money. Leonard and I own a dime and we let each other carry it from time to time, but heaven forbid we should spend it.”

Beatrice shook her head. “My father owes money, you see. He has to make it back. He will pay the doctor from his catch. Give him fish. We need every fish to make every peso we can. Not only to live, but to pay back his debt.”

“He borrowed money?”

She looked at me with those beautiful, soulful dark eyes.

“He borrowed for me … It is not your business, Hap.”

“Very well,” I said.

She studied me for a moment, as if trying to make certain I wasn’t going to wrestle it out of her. When she decided I wasn’t, she told me anyway.

“He borrowed from a man who adds much interest. He borrowed so that I could go to the United States, to the university. He has been paying it off all along. And I, well, I did nothing with my time there.”

“You chose to come back. You could have done something with your education if you wanted.”

“Let me put it this way. One night I am in the U.S., and I am out with friends, and they order fish. And I am looking at the fish, and thinking, this is what my father does, and he is doing it every day so I can be here. I decided to come home, help him earn the money back. This was more important. I knew he would never pay it off. The debt would be there. It was right for me to assume the debt.”

“What about what you told me before? Being like your mother. Or feeling obligated to be that way.”

“That is part of it too, Hap. If I were smart, I would have got a job and helped pay off the debt. My degree would have helped do that. Instead, I come back and live like a peasant to pay off this big loan by helping him fish. What kind of thinking is that, if it is not the thinking of someone who believes they are trying too hard, and wrongly, to rise above their station.”

"If you'll forgive me, Beatrice. It's stupid thinking."

"I know. But I do it just the same. Let me tell you why I want you to leave tomorrow. My father has a charter. A big important charter. Men who want to fish. They have agreed to go out three days. They will pay a lot for this. Far more than the cost to fish. They are rich Americans and my father has guaranteed them each a trophy fish. There is a place where there are plenty of great fish. My father knows it. If the fish are not there, we do not make as much. And I must be very kind to one of these men."

"I don't think I like the sound of that."

"I am not yours, Hap."

"I didn't mean it that way. I don't like the idea of any woman having to be nicer to a man than she wants to be."

"I have met this man. He is not my favorite. But this money, it could pay off our debt to this other man I told you about."

I was liking the sound of it less and less. But Beatrice was right. It was not my problem. And she was not my woman.

"What happens if you don't find the fish?"

"This man my father owes. He is a man with much pride. More pride than the need for money. He can be unpleasant."

"Jesus, Beatrice. Your father is in to a loan shark?"

"He is more than a shark. He is a school of sharks. One time a man owed him and did not pay, and this shark, Juan Miguel, he had the man killed, the body skinned, boiled, and sold his skeleton to a medical school."

"That sounds like a story to me, Beatrice."

"This is Mexico, Hap. Stories like that are real here. The final word is this. We owe him money. We are behind in our payments. He has threatened my father. He and his thugs."

"Your father doesn't seem worried."

"He is worried. But he keeps it to himself. He will seem even more congenial now than before. It is his way of dealing with disaster. Tomorrow he will lose the big charter because of this, and then there will be no way to pay the money."

"My God, how much could he owe?"

"In American money, it would be eighty thousand dollars."

“Christ. A fishing trip, even if these guys catch ten trophy fish apiece, won’t pay for that.”

“But it will keep him at bay. We have managed to pay some of the debt already.”

“He loaned a fishing peasant eighty thousand dollars? He’s an old man. How would he think he’d ever pay that off?”

“The debt is his, then it passes to me. He pays what he can, and I continue to pay throughout my life. With interest, of course.”

“You should have stayed in the U.S.”

“Then they take it out on my father.”

“Then he should have come to stay with you.”

“It is his debt, and he feels obligated to pay it. It is not like for you, Hap. He could not just go to a bank and get a loan.”

“Hon, I couldn’t get a bank to loan me the time of day.”

She studied me carefully, to make sure I was serious. She sighed abruptly and looked off toward the ocean. I had the uncomfortable feeling she might be waiting for me to offer her money.

I said, “Seems to me it would still be worth sharing with José and his brothers. That would be the best way, wouldn’t it? Have them help you fish, pay as you go.”

“My father does not want to give away his place to fish. José and his brothers, they are good boys, but they would tell others. They work for whoever they have to work for. I do not blame them. But this place, my father needs to keep it secret.”

“If it’s so full of fish, why does he often go without fish? Today he didn’t come back with fish. Except the shark that bit him.”

Beatrice didn’t answer.

“Listen, Beatrice. I’m just an ol’ East Texas boy, but I’m not dumb. And I mean no disrespect, but what you’re telling me, it doesn’t add up. I hate to be one to talk about welshing on a debt, but in this case, where your life is in danger, why don’t you just run for it. Go to the States and forget it. Pay it back later if you feel you owe it. When you can.”

“You cannot run from Juan Miguel. Don’t worry, Hap. I have told you more than I should. Really, this is not your business.”

It never is, I thought.

We walked back into the main part of town and ordered some food for Leonard. They wrapped it in brown paper and put it in a sack. I went back to the doctor's house. The doctor loaned the old man a pair of crutches, and he used them to go with us back to his boat.

Beatrice and I helped him secure it, then we made our way to their car, and Beatrice drove us to their place.

On the way, the old man talked very pleasantly to me. You would have thought nothing had happened to him. That this injury didn't matter. He acted like someone eccentric and wealthy who didn't worry about money.

Beatrice, on the other hand, was quiet. A cloud seemed to have descended over her. Or perhaps I should say a darker cloud. From the moment I met her there hung about her a grimy aura of disappointment, as if all her ambitions were living things that she had seen slaughtered.

At their place I checked on Leonard first thing. He said, "It's about time you came back. Hell, I'm bored. I read the Vachss book. Great. I got up enough energy to look for more books I wanted to read, but there wasn't much in English that interested me. Where's Beatrice? The old man? What's his name?"

"Ferdinand. By the way. He had an accident."

"Accident? What kind of accident?"

I told Leonard all about it. Gave him the details of the day.

"I'll be damned. Where is he?"

"With Beatrice in the kitchen. Fixing some food. I brought you some. I thought we'd be back a lot earlier. Sorry. Hope you weren't too hungry. I was going to get you some vanilla cremes or wafers, but couldn't find any. Actually, I didn't look that hard."

"Gee, thanks."

I sat down on the edge of the bed and handed Leonard the grease-stained sack. Inside were burritos and tacos.

"Think you got enough?" Leonard said, peeking into the sack.

“I figured you’d be hungry.”

“You’re right. I ate the bread and cheese right away. Got bored. This smells great … What about us going home? You made a call, right?”

“Right. Go ahead, eat.”

“Something’s wrong? It always is, so why wouldn’t it be now.”

“I didn’t say that.”

While he ate, I said, “You know, I heard a joke the other day at the chicken plant.”

“Oh no. I don’t want to hear it. Your jokes suck, Hap. And that means things aren’t going well. You always try and soothe me with a joke. It only makes it worse. So just cut to the chase.”

“I didn’t say I had bad news.”

“But you do. I know you well enough to know something’s come up.”

“All right. I have some bad news.”

“I knew it.”

“Well, considering I have some bad news, you might want to hear my joke.”

“Just skip the joke and go straight to the news.”

“Then you’ll never hear this great cowboy and Indian joke.”

“I can see now you’re going to tell the joke. No matter what I say or do, short of killing you, you’re going to tell me this goddamn joke. Am I right?”

“I heard it from a fella out at the chicken plant.”

“You said that. How bad is the news on the other side of it?”

“Not that bad.”

“Oh, for heaven’s sake. Go ahead … Wait. Why me, man? Can’t you just save these for someone who cares? I hate jokes. You always do this when I’m sick or injured. Which, come to think of it, when I’m around you, is pretty frequent. I got to tell you, Hap. I been thinkin’ I want to put my feet up some. Know what I’m saying?”

“You want to put your feet up.”

“I mean, I love you, brother, but there’s something about us, when we mix together, it makes shit. Know what I'm sayin'?"

"I do."

"Maybe we could call one another, have lunch, go to a movie. Double-date. Me and John. You and whoever … But man, we plan something big together, I seem to always get shot, knifed, beat, et cetera. And come to think of it, you look pretty good. You aren't cut up or banged up."

"I got a few bumps. And hey, I been on the bad end before. Don't make yourself too special. Now the joke. There's this cowboy—"

" 'Shit. Go for it."

"—and he's captured by Indians. The chief says, It's the custom of our tribe to give the condemned man three days of granted wishes. Stuff besides 'I want to go home.' That kind of thing."

"This sucks already. You can't tell a joke to save your life."

"So, the chief says, Cowboy, you got three days and a wish a day. Use them wisely. What do you want first? Cowboy says, Let me talk to my horse.

"Cowboy calls his horse over, whispers in the horse's ear, horse thunders off, and just before sundown the horse shows up with a beautiful redhead on its back."

"Man or woman?"

"In my story it's a woman. Has to be for the story to work. You'll see."

"All right."

"Cowboy takes the redhead into the tent and they make love, he puts her on the horse, and the horse thunders off, taking the redhead back to town. Or wherever.

"Next day. Oh yeah. The horse has come back. That's important."

Leonard sighed.

"Chief says, This is your second day, your second wish. What'll it be? Cowboy says, Let me talk to my horse. He whispers in the horse's ear, and off thunders the horse.

"Near dark, horse shows up with a beautiful blonde on its back. Cowboy and the blonde go into the tent where he's held captive, and make love. He puts the blonde on the horse, and the horse takes her away.”

“Don’t forget the horse comes back again … Am I right?”

“Yeah. The horse comes back. So, the horse is back, and it’s the last day, and the chief says, Pick this wish wisely, cowboy, because it’s your last.

“The cowboy sighs, says, Let me talk to my horse. He calls the horse over and grabs it by the ears and puts his face close to the horse’s face. He says to the horse, Listen, stupid. Read my lips. POSSE. POSSE.”

I paused.

“Yeah,” Leonard said. “So.”

“Think about it …”

“Oh, I get it. Now isn’t that funny. The horse thought he was saying pussy. You heteros are just full of fuckin’ fun. Hap, I want to go home. Tell me what happened with the phone call.”

I told him.

“You got us a room in town, though, right?”

“That’s right.”

“So the worst is a little delay?”

“Well, yes. But …”

“Oh, shit. No.”

“Don’t panic.”

“Don’t hesitate.”

“I’m supposed to call Charlie tomorrow. He’s setting things up. But way I see it, Ferdinand saved our lives. You’re out of it anyway. Why don’t I sort of help them out on the boat.”

“You can’t even float a paper boat, Hap, let alone go out on the ocean and fish. Didn’t you learn anything from our short cruise?”

“Yeah, don’t insult the guy at the ship’s restaurant. You’re blaming me, but think about who really got us into this mess.”

“It was your idea to go on a cruise.”

“Actually, it was John’s.”

“You’re right. When we get home we’ll kill him.”

"I bet he's watching that Kung Fu thing right now."

"Could be. Or he's taping it. Him and Charlie probably call each other up and talk about the characters."

"You see, Leonard, way I see it is, I can at least volunteer to be a deckhand till the old man gets better. It's a bad wound, worse than yours, but he can probably get around in a few days. Beatrice and I can take care of business till then. And there's another thing."

"There always is."

"Ferdinand owes some money."

"Define 'owes some money.' "

"I think I should help you to the outdoor convenience."

"I didn't ask to go."

"I think you should go anyway."

"Well, actually, I do need to go."

"Good, that way I can tell you in private."

Leonard rolled to the side of the bed. "Hell, I can walk by myself. I feel a lot better."

"But you'll humor me."

"If I must."

Leonard put on his shoes. I put my arm around him and helped him outside. It was fairly dark and the moon was up and it was a fragmented moon. Clouds scuttled across the sky and in the distance I saw sheet lightning rage across the horizon. You could smell rain in the air, but it was still some distance away.

As we walked, I told Leonard the story Beatrice told me. He went inside the outhouse, and I stood outside, leaning on it, talking to him, finishing up my story through a split in the walls.

"Let me see," Leonard said. "She went to the States, and her father provided the money with a bad loan. She got a degree, but then felt sorry for her father. She was being driven by an inner force to return and do traditional Mexican woman things. And now she's in a tight spot with someone named Juan Miguel who might kill her and sell her bones to research, and she's going to pay a big chunk of the money by sponsoring a three-day fishing trip to a secret place where fish live, but the old man doesn't seem to go there on a regular basis even if he is living on crumbs and owes a gangster thousands of dollars. Duh."

"Maybe it's just worth more to him to go there when he's got rich tourists. It could be like that."

"And when I come out of this outhouse I could be white, bowlegged, and have a vagina, but it isn't likely. Bottom line is, you're gonna help her, aren't you. And, of course, you would like me to help."

"That sounds about right. Hurry up, man, it stinks."

"You think it's rough out there, you ought to be in here."

"What d'you say, Leonard? Shall we help?"

"I say when it comes to women you are so goddamn dumb as to make a box of tenpenny nails seem high on the IQ scale."

"You think she trained a shark to attack her father so she could get me on their boat and make a work slave of me?"

"No. It's broader than that. Damn. This catalogue is not a good idea. Maybe they could at least spring for some toilet paper. I think I ripped myself."

A moment later Leonard came out of the outhouse. I put my arm around him and started helping him back to the house, even though he didn't need the help. We went slowly so we could continue talking.

"You will wash your hands at the house, won't you?" I said.

"Just the one I wipe with. Which, by the way, is the one I have around your shoulder right now."

There was one little sad tree in the yard, and we went over to that. It was only a little taller than we were. Its limbs were gray and scaly, like a snake shedding its skin; they were spread out wide, like gapped fingers in the moonlight.

Leonard leaned against the tree's bent trunk. He said, "As your queer friend, I don't have the same blind side to women you do. A queer can look at things head-on, my honky. Least as far as men and women go."

"How is Beatrice, a woman I just met, giving me the screw? Outside of the actual screw, I mean."

"She's one of life's victims. Woe is me. Everything happens to her. I think her father, nice man that he is, may not have his head on just right either. Call it a hunch.

“Look. Don’t get me wrong. I’m glad she and her father helped us, but I say tomorrow morning we head into town and get that hotel room and plan our way out of here.”

“Well, she hasn’t exactly asked me to help. Maybe she doesn’t even want me to help. She even told me she wants me and you out of here tomorrow. Probably because all of this coming down. But I think with her father on crutches, she might need some help. That’s all I think there is to it.”

“If she doesn’t want you to help, then don’t. Don’t force it.”

“I just hate to see anyone bullied.”

“I promise you, this whole business she’s telling you, it’s got a light coating of slime on it. Maybe she doesn’t intend for you to get involved. Maybe she knows the whole thing sucks the big old donkey dick. I don’t know. But it’s not our business. So let’s just walk away.”

I stood quiet for a moment. I looked at Leonard leaning against the tree. He wouldn’t be much help anyway. Not by tomorrow. Did I really need to run off and help Beatrice and her father pay a debt that wasn’t mine? She wasn’t even my woman. Not really. She had said so herself.

“You know what, Leonard? I’m gonna fool you. I’m gonna do just what you say. For once. You’re right. This isn’t our problem.”

15

EARLY NEXT MORNING it was very humid and I awoke sweaty. I had been given a pallet on the floor in the room where Leonard slept in the bed. Beatrice had slept on a pallet in the kitchen, and the old man had slept in her bed.

In the middle of the night I awoke to see her standing at the open doorway of the room where Leonard and I slept. She wore a thin white thigh-high nightgown. Her legs were dark and sexy in the shadows. She smiled when she realized I was looking at her. I could smell her perfume from where I lay. It smelled dry and earthy.

I got up, she took my hand. We went to her pallet in the kitchen. Beatrice was soft and sweet and I only thought of Brett a little.

Before daylight, I returned to the room where Leonard lay wide awake.

“You’re so bad,” he said.

“You said it,” I said, and lay down on my pallet and went to sleep.

It wasn’t a good sleep. When I awoke I was exhausted and my bones felt as if they had been sawed up, put in a blender, then poured back into my body. I was sweaty. I rose and wrapped up my blankets and pillow and put them on the bed next to Leonard. Who, of course, was snoring like a man who had just won the lottery.

I slowly moved my body, heard my knees and ankles and hips pop. I got up and limped about. I didn’t find Beatrice.

The old man was in the kitchen. He was on his crutches by the stove. The kitchen smelled of coffee and something baking. The aroma filled my head and made my stomach growl.

“I am baking some bread for breakfast,” Ferdinand said. “I have some butter. We can eat it together. Maybe your friend will be hungry then. Is he doing better?"

"Much better, thanks to you. He ought to be up and around today."

"It was not too bad a wound. He lost some blood. That was the most of it. The blood. I wish I had a steak to feed him. Steak is good when you lose blood. I know a man down the road who owes me a goat. Perhaps later we can get him to give me the goat and we can butcher it and cook it. It is not a steak, but it is meat."

"Perhaps," I said. "Where is Beatrice?"

"She has gone into the town," Ferdinand said. Like Beatrice, I loved hearing him talk. It was musical even when he spoke English. He spoke nearly perfect English. But the way he emphasized or accented certain words made it sound so unique. I liked the way he looked too. The way I would have thought Hemingway's Santiago must have looked in The Old Man and the Sea.

"She said she will come back for you," Ferdinand said.

I was thinking about the boat gig she told me about. What had happened to that? I couldn't help myself, I said, "Not to meddle, but didn't she tell me she had an important job that the two of you were to do today?"

"You are right. We are supposed to do a job. I have told her I cannot. Even though we must and it is important. We cannot. She has gone to tell the men we cannot and that we must delay the job if they will delay. Otherwise, no job. Did she tell you the job?"

"Very little," I said.

"I would like to do the job. It pays well, but I cannot. This is the first time in twenty-five years I have been injured that I do not fix it myself. Like I fix your friend."

"You did a good job."

"I am too old. I cannot fix myself. I cannot deal with it the way I once did."

"No reason to."

"I do a lot of things, allow a lot of things now that I would not allow before. I am nowhere the man I once was."

The old man's gaze took a position over my shoulder. I turned and saw Leonard shuffling in. He found a chair and sat.

Leonard said, "I don't know if I thanked you properly or not, sir. But thank you. You did us both a great favor. You're good with that machete."

"The machete was part of my life growing up. For work, for play, and for fighting."

"Play?" Leonard asked.

"Play fighting. We fought using the flat of the blade. The art of machete fighting is nearly lost, my friend."

"I can see that," Leonard said.

The old man smiled.

When the bread was done it came out flat and blackened in spots. We put some real butter on it and had coffee. It wasn't a gourmet meal, but it wasn't bad either.

We sat around the table and talked about this and that, the weather, life, women. I didn't mention Beatrice, of course, but from the way the old man looked at me, it was obvious he knew what his daughter and I had been doing. Once he stared at me long enough and hard enough I added too much sugar to my coffee.

When we finished all of that coffee, he brewed us more and we drank that, and by noon he had found a bottle of wine and was drinking heavily from that.

Neither Leonard nor I touched the wine.

About two o'clock Ferdinand passed out in his chair and Leonard and I put him in his bed, took off his shoes, and propped a pillow under his head.

"I like the old bastard," Leonard said. "He tells good stories."

"He's worried," I said. "He's trying to put his mind on other things."

"There you go worrying about other people's problems again."

"You said you like him."

"I said I like him. I didn't say I wanted to raise him. We get home, I'll buy you your own old man. Better yet, you can take care of me. Hold my balls up while I wash."

"That'll be the day."

We went back to the kitchen and got the last of the coffee. We had already gone through two pots, and now, with another cup of coffee poured up, I felt as if I might be able to levitate, in an agitated sort of way, of course.

There were a couple of chairs on the front porch, so we went out there and sipped our coffee. It was hot outside and the coffee made us sweat twice as bad.

We hadn't been out there long when we saw a dust cloud coming from the south, a red clay swirl against a bright hot sky. Pretty soon, out of the cloud, came Beatrice in the van. When she braked to a stop, the dust continued on, as if it had disgorged her. It passed over the house and made us duck our heads and cough. When I looked up there was a coating of it over what remained of my coffee. I leaned out of my chair, past the edge of the porch, and poured it in the dirt.

Beatrice practically leaped from the car. Her hair was up. She wore jeans and an oversized red shirt with white deck shoes. There was a sweat line around her neck and sweat blooms under her arms. She saw us on the porch, sauntered over a little too casually.

"How are you this morning?" she asked.

We both answered in the affirmative.

"And you?" I said.

"Well enough. Are you ready to go into town?"

"I suppose we are. Maybe you could show us a store or two where we can buy a few things. We left some stuff at the other hotel, but we haven't the inclination to go back for it."

"Some bellhop is wearing Hap's new underwear right now," Leonard said.

"I will just check on my father, wash a little, change clothes, then we will go."

She rushed inside quickly, as if she might burst into tears at any moment. I started to follow. Leonard took hold of my arm.

"Leave it be, buddy. It's not your problem. You can't solve everyone's problems. Look at it this way. You can't even solve your own."

"Point," I said. "Damn good point."

A little later, when Beatrice had herself together, looking fresh in a blue blouse, she drove Leonard and me into town, to the hotel where I had rented us a room.

After Beatrice had gone up with us to see our room, which though not fancy was nice, I walked her back to her car.

She opened the door, said, "You have been very kind."

"I have to say the same."

"I have been loving, have I not?"

"You have."

"No complaints?"

"No complaints," I said. "You'll give our best to your father?"

"Of course," she said.

She got in the car, pulled the door to. The window was open, she leaned out of it.

"I think, in another time, things could have been different," she said.

I wasn't sure I wanted them to be that different. I liked her, but I didn't love her. I loved Brett, goddamn me.

Still, I couldn't help myself. "How did it go?"

"Go?"

"You know. With the men who wanted to rent your boat?"

"You don't want to know," she said, and I saw a tear well up in her eye. I started to push it, remembered Leonard's advice.

"Whatever you say," I said.

"Goodbye, Hap."

"Goodbye, Beatrice."

She drove away, and I thought that was the end of it.

16

I WAS IN THE HOTEL ROOM, taking off my shoes, getting ready to lie back on my bed and rest a bit, when Leonard, who was already reclining on the other bed, said, “You know what we should do, Hap?”

“I hope you’re not going to suggest anything sexual.”

“Nope. I didn’t bring any of my devices with me. But, now that you mention it, we could catch a mouse and grease him up, let him run up our ass. That might be fun.”

“We don’t have a mouse.”

“There are little black turds next to that hole in the wall to the left of the electric socket by the TV set. So that tells me there are mice.”

“Now you’ve piqued my excitement. But alas, we’ve nothing to grease the mouse with.”

“You’re right. And who’s to say we can catch one? They’re pretty fast, you know.”

“All right, I bite. What should we do?”

“Stay.”

“Stay? I thought you wanted to go.”

“I wanted to get you away from that woman. Women make your head mushy. I tell you, she’s a manipulator.”

“Not much of one. She dumped us off and went home.”

“It would have been just a matter of time, Hap. What we ought to do is just go ahead and turn this into a vacation. Have Charlie wire us some money just like you planned. But we do it a little different. We can get a flight out of Cancun in a couple weeks, be home a few days before we’re supposed to go back to work.”

“Don’t you want to see John?”

“Of course. I love him. But this is our chance for a vacation.

We've never really had one. Not a real one. Not a good one. Things we do tend to go wrong. This could be different."

"We've already been abandoned by our own cruise ship."

"Yeah. Well, you're right."

"Cruise ships are noted for their hospitality. Their ability to deal with cantankerous assholes. Yet, somehow, you found a way to piss them off."

"It was just that one guy."

"You've been in a fight. You've been knifed. That's not quite as good as being shot, but it ought to count for something. And your hat was destroyed."

"True. You're right. It's not a totally different kind of trip for us, is it? There's some of the old charm still there. But the rest of it, we can make it uneventful. We get up late. We eat late. We wander around town. Maybe go fishing. Get out on the water."

"I don't like water. I've seen all of it I want to see."

"We could see the sights. I wouldn't even mind going back to Tulum. Wouldn't it be nice just to hang? Nobody trying to kill us. No one beating on us. It could be rejuvenating."

"People do try to hurt us a lot, don't they?"

"On the nosey. Maybe that should tell us something."

"What?"

"I'm not sure. I think we irritate people."

"We? You got a mouse in your pocket?"

"If I did, we'd be in business. A dry mouse, but in business … But tell me, Hap. Doesn't that sound like a pretty damn good idea?"

"A dry mouse?"

"A real vacation."

"You know, it doesn't sound too bad at that."

Early the next morning I went downstairs and expanded our stay at the hotel to a week. I put it on the charge card, knowing full well I was working on the edge. It might not take more than a couple of pennies for it to be full.

I didn't want to use the hotel phone, because the prices were jacked up, so I walked down the street to the same pay phone I had called from before, dialed Charlie to let him know our plans. He seemed bored to hear I was calling. When I told him what we had in mind he wasn't bored any longer.

He had already raised some money, and was surprised we were staying. So was I, but I was glad to break him out of his boredom. I consider it a kind of special accomplishment to rattle Charlie.

I told him Leonard wanted a real vacation and I felt like I owed it to him. So far, this one hadn't been as bad as our other outings.

Charlie agreed that it hadn't been as bad as it sometimes gets. He also agreed to wire us the money, tell John we were all right, and explain our plans.

On my way back to the hotel I was surprised to see Beatrice sitting in her car out front. When she saw me walking up, she got out, leaned on the hood.

The jeans she was wearing were so tight they must have made her ankles swell. She had on a halter top that was working overtime to hold her breasts in. The sun struck her black hair and made it the color of a raven's wing. There were little brown freckles on her shoulders I hadn't noticed before, but now, out in the full sunlight, they showed clearly. I liked them.

I said, "Don't tell me this is a coincidence."

"I was trying to decide if I wanted to go in and ring your room. I did not expect you to be out so early."

"I had a phone call to make."

"You are not leaving already?"

"That seems like a funny question. You know I was supposed to."

"Yes."

"Leonard and I changed our minds. We're going to stick a few days."

"Good. Good. I need to talk to you."

"We can go upstairs," I said.

Leonard greeted Beatrice with as much enthusiasm as his suspicious mind could muster, and we all went downstairs together and over to a little café for breakfast. The café was fairly crowded and there was the sound of European and American voices all over the place. A cruise ship had most likely sent in its passengers on a tender. We found a table in the corner, ordered coffee and food, waited a long time for it.

While we waited, Beatrice said, “I have had a situation arise.”

“Oh?” said Leonard. “Really?”

I gave him a hard look. He gave me back a dreamy smile.

Smug sonofabitch.

“You have problems with me?” Beatrice said.

“I just don’t like to be fed shit and told it’s tapioca,” Leonard said. “My buddy, Hap, he don’t mind some shit for tapioca. He even gets to like it now and then.”

“I do not understand,” Beatrice said.

“Look, I’m not trying to be offensive,” Leonard said.

“You are doing a very good job of it,” she said.

“All right. Take it like you want to take it. But I think you can smell a sap good as a shark can smell blood. I think you’ve got a scam going and you’re playing him into it, which means you’re playing me into it. It happens to him, it happens to me.”

“You think that, Hap?” Beatrice asked.

“He’s right more than he’s wrong,” I said.

Beatrice hung her head and stared at the table. She looked soft and cute and childlike. I wanted to reach across the table and slap Leonard.

“Well,” Beatrice said, “I did not set out to ask you for anything. I met you by accident, you must admit that. My father and I did help you in your time of need.”

“So now you need help?” Leonard said.

“I do.”

“You and about three million other women Hap knows. Not to mention guys, pets, et cetera.”

“Ah ha,” I said. “You rescued an armadillo once.”

“I admit it,” Leonard said. “That was another fine mess you got me into, if you'll recall."

He was right. There was nothing to say.

Our food arrived. We drank coffee and ate, waiting for Beatrice to drop the next shoe. Hopefully a very small shoe, like a flip-flop maybe. But no, that would be too easy. I figured it would be a boot. Steel-toed. Very heavy.

She ate and we paid up and left.

Outside she said, "Hap, can we talk?"

"Alone, you mean?" Leonard said.

"Yes," she said.

"That figures," Leonard said. "He's no good alone, lady. But then you know that, don't you? Don't ask him to do anything you wouldn't ask me to do, because you ask him, you're asking me."

"It does not have to be that way," Beatrice said.

"Yes it does," Leonard said, and walked away. He called back: "I'll be at the hotel. Crying."

"Will he really?" Beatrice said.

"In a manner of speaking," I said. "Come on, let's walk and talk."

We went along the shoreline on a concrete walk. The sea was bright green, as if lit from below by an emerald light. In the distance I could see the brown line that was Cozumel and against that the horizon. The ocean stank of oil and dead fish and up close to shore there were plastic wrappers and aluminum cans washing against the blinding white sand.

"Now that Father is injured, he cannot do any more than drive the boat."

"What about you?"

"I am company."

"Ah. Company. To this man you told me about."

"Yes. This rich American and his friends. They are here in Mexico for a short time. This one who arranged it all. He wanted to fish the other day. When my father could not go out, he was ready to cancel. We would lose all the money. I tried to convince him with words to wait. To give Father just a couple of days. He could be on the boat then. He didn't want to listen. So I convinced him with something besides words."

"You slept with him?"

"If this man I slept with is a pig, the one Father owes is a butcher … It is not for me, Hap. It is for my father. If I don't make the money, the men my father owes will kill him. They may kill me."

"What are you asking, Beatrice?"

"Help me. Just for a day or two. Please."

Leonard said, "Once more into the breach."

We were sitting at the café again, just me and him, having coffee. Leonard was feeling pretty good. His appetite was back.

"You know she's just jerkin' you?" he said.

"Yep. I know."

Leonard sipped his coffee. "I don't care she slept with this guy. That's her choice. I don't see that as something pathetic. You aren't jealous, are you?"

"We aren't in love, if that's what you mean. But it hurts my pride some. She slept with me, then she slept with the other guy to make sure he went fishing. Worse yet, she has a hotel room and is staying in town tonight. I doubt it's just because she wants to be close to the sea."

"More favors?" Leonard asked.

"I suppose."

"Maybe he was just a better lay. I bet that was it."

"Thanks for being concerned with my pride."

"Don't mention it … So we're going to be conned into being sailors."

"You can con me all you want, and I'm no sailor. Actually, I think she wants us to bait hooks, that kind of thing."

"Believe it or not, that takes skill."

"Aren't you the one said you wanted to go fishing?"

"Yeah, but I wanted someone else to bait my hook."

Next morning, Leonard and I arose early and couldn't find anything open to have breakfast, so we walked on over to where Ferdinand's boat was docked. Ferdinand's boat was being loaded with bait by José.

"I thought we were the crew," Leonard said.

"When it leaves dock, we are."

I climbed on board. I found Ferdinand on crutches. "Where is Beatrice?" he asked.

"That is what we were wondering, señor."

About that time a large man and two other men came up the dock and climbed on board the boat.

One of the men was about thirty-five, tall and stocky with close-cut blond hair and burning blue eyes. He wore a loose blue shirt and tan khaki slacks and white deck shoes.

Right off I thought he was an asshole. I also thought he was the guy Beatrice had screwed to maintain the fishing charter. He looked too damn smug and in charge to be anyone else. The guys with him were both about his age and were dressed similarly. One was thin and had dark brown hair and a mole on the side of his face that could have been painted with eyes, mouth, and nose, and passed off as a Siamese twin.

The other guy was a handsome, average-sized black man. I watched to see if Leonard checked him out.

He did.

Blondie said, "We goin' or what?"

Ferdinand smiled, straining at it I'm sure. He said, "Yes. We are waiting on Beatrice."

"Beatrice," he said. "She's not here?"

"Ferdinand just said that to see if you'd ask if she's really here," I said.

"Yeah," Leonard said. "She's hid. We're all going to start searching the boat for her in a minute. Whoever finds her gets a gummy bear."

"And who are you two?"

I wanted to tell him I was the guy that was going to throw him off the boat, but it wasn't my boat and I was here to help, not make matters worse.

“A friend,” I said.

“And him?” Blondie said, nodding at Leonard.

“I jes do duh coffee and put fishes on duh hooks,” Leonard said. “I’s known as Unca Leonard.”

“That’s funny,” Blondie said.

“Why thank ya, suh. I’s got me uh liddle niggra minstrel act I’s been workin’ on.”

The black guy laughed. Mole Face was smiling. José finished loading bait, then, sensing tension, disappeared like morning fog.

“Look,” I said. “We’ll go back to the hotel and see what’s up.”

“I’ll go with you,” Blondie said. “I left her early this morning so I could run some errands. She’s supposed to be here. I’m gonna give her a piece of my mind.”

“I wouldn’t give her too much,” I said.

“Yeah, and why’s that?”

“Because I might not like it.”

“And I don’t know you got mind to spare,” Leonard said. “I think you use most of it just getting up in the morning.”

Blondie snorted, looked at Leonard. “Lost the minstrel act, didn’t you?”

The veins on the sides of Leonard’s neck expanded.

“Whoa,” the handsome black guy said. “It’s cool. It’s cool. Let’s not get off on the wrong foot. We’re down here to fish.”

“Yeah, and this charter hasn’t been nothing but a problem,” Blondie said. “I’m ready to chuck the whole thing.”

“Hey,” Mole Face said. “You got some poontang out of it, didn’t you … Oh, sorry, old man. I forgot she was your daughter.”

Ferdinand didn’t say anything. He just looked stunned.

I put my hand on his shoulder. “It’s all right. Me and Leonard will go check on her.”

He nodded.

We climbed off the boat. Me, Leonard, and the blond asshole.

“You don’t have to come,” I said to Blondie.

“Yeah, but I want to,” he said. “I left her this morning, I told her to hurry along. One thing I hate’s a woman that doesn’t do as she’s told.”

“You asswipe,” Leonard said. “I’ve got a mind to knock your nose on the other side of your head.”

“Don’t push it, buddy,” Blondie said.

Leonard laughed. It actually scared me, and I love him. I figured Blondie, if he had a couple of brain cells left, must have felt his stool go loose.

At that very moment Beatrice came rushing up, breathless. Boy, was Blondie glad to see her. I saw a bit of color come back to his face.

Beatrice was holding her side, showing she had been hurrying. Her hair hung wet around her face. She had on a shorty towel robe, flip-flops, and was carrying a large yellow plastic bag. She saw us staring at her.

“What?” she said.

“You’re making us wait,” Blondie said.

“I’m sorry, Billy,” she said. “Really.”

She almost started to cry. I noticed she had a bit of a black eye.

I took hold of her arm, nodded at the eye, said, “He do that?”

“Wha … Oh, no. I slept on my hand or something. I am fine.”

“She bumped her head on the headboard last night,” Billy said. “When I was putting it to her from behind.”

Beatrice felt me tense. She said, “Please, Hap. Please. I’m not bothered, you shouldn’t be.”

I let my breath out slowly. “All right.”

“You’re not needed here,” Billy said. “In fact, why don’t you and your man here stick to shore.”

“I need them along,” Beatrice said. “They’ll bait the hooks.”

I knew then why she had really wanted us along. She was afraid of this joker.

Billy looked at Leonard. “Now you’ve nothing to say?”

“I was concentratin’,” Leonard said. “Tryin’ to decide how hard I’d have to pull your head for it to come off.”

Billy tried not to show he was bothered, but his bobbing Adam’s apple betrayed him and the Elvis sneer he manufactured trembled. “Come on,” he said. “Let’s fish.”

17

As we boarded the boat behind Beatrice and Billy, Leonard said, “What I suggest is we finish out the day, I whip his ass. If he still wants some, you can have him.”

“We’ll flip for first later.”

Beatrice took us aside, said, “Father will show you how to bait the hooks. It is hard at first, but when you have baited a few, it will be easy.”

We set the boat free of the dock and chugged out into deeper water. The day was hot, the sky blue, spotted with clouds as white as Santa’s whiskers. The diesel exhaust, combined with the motion of the boat, the heat, made me feel ill. Within fifteen minutes I was vomiting over the side. Pretty soon thereafter, Leonard was doing the same.

Billy was sitting in the fighting chair, drinking a cold beer he’d pulled from the ice chest. He laughed. “Couple old sea salts.”

As we hung over the side of the boat, Leonard said, “I’m mortified.”

“Did you bring the seasickness pills?”

Leonard shook his head. “Afraid not.”

* * *

It was a long day. I had only thought it was hot. Now it turned hot. The sardines in the big plastic buckets smelled ripe as disease.

Ferdinand showed us how to bait the sardines on hooks. It was harder than it looked. But after only a few fish came off the hooks and I had poked only five or six holes in my hand, and Leonard had managed to rediscover his East Texas heritage by teaching everyone on the boat all the curse words known to humanity in English, we had it going.

A little fishing was done en route, but nothing was caught. We moved out into deeper water. The sea was bobbing and rolling at first, but as we went out farther it became more violent. Not stormy, just active. The diesel smoke that had made us sick before was worse now, and the waves were enormous.

Leonard and I went back to tossing our guts over the side, then dry heaving.

Billy loved our predicament. He had a strong stomach, so therefore he thought he was a strong man. He gave the rod to the black guy, whose name was Landis, and stood near us with his beer, slurping it.

“What you boys need is a big old bowl of greasy chili.”

“You motherfucker,” Leonard said. “I didn’t feel so bad, I’d stick that bottle up your ass, see if it would help you float.”

Billy moved on. The boat chugged on.

Out where it was deep, the waves rose up around us in blue-green mountains, then dropped away, as if swallowed by an earthquake. The little boat rode up the waves, and down the other side, then the mountains appeared again.

I had only thought the cruise ship we were on was small and scary. All I could think about was one of those waves crashing on top of us, carrying us down into that bottomless water.

In time we got used to it enough we could work baiting the hooks. Landis fished for an hour and got bites, the bites took his bait and we rebaited, but no luck.

The guy with the mole on his face took a turn. His name was Jason. He sat down in the chair and slipped on the waist and shoulder straps.

I baited his hook and he sat with the butt of the rod in the swivel and waited. He fished for almost an hour, then there was a click on the rod and the line began to sing like electricity charging through a wire.

“I got something,” he said.

“No shit,” Billy said. “Hold on to him.”

I looked out at the water. The line had gone taut. Jason tightened the drag, jerked back on the rod. The rod bent slightly.

"Now I've got him," Jason said.

"You've got him when he's on the boat," Billy said.

The fish cut to the right and the line moved with him. Jason hit him again, burying the hook. He said, "He's not too big. He's nothing."

Jason rapidly cranked the fish on deck. It was a barracuda.

Ferdinand came out of the cabin on crutches. He had one hand dangling off the crutches and in it he held a sawed-off baseball bat. He lifted one crutch from under his arm and laid it on the ground and leaned forward and used the bat to whack the flopping barracuda on the head.

Ferdinand had a pair of shears in his back pocket. He dropped the ball bat, pulled them out, managed himself to a squatting position, put the barracuda's head between the blades, and snapped down hard. The head nearly popped off. Ferdinand snapped down again, and this time the head came loose. He cut the line that held the barracuda to the rod, tossed the barracuda's head into the ocean.

He crutched into the cabin, came out with a metal box. He opened it, and quickly, expertly, he tied a large hook to the cut line.

"Bait it," he said.

I reached into the bucket of stinking fish and did just that.

Ferdinand took a large knife from the box, cut the barracuda open, and dumped its guts into the water. He put the barracuda into a large ice chest just inside the door to the cabin.

Jason said, "That's my fish and that's just about my hour."

"You're next, Billy," Landis said.

"A barracuda," Billy said, "that's no kind of fish."

"Sometimes the barracuda is all the fish you hit," Ferdinand said. "Barracuda are good to eat. I can sell them to the restaurants. There are people who like to eat them, thinking they are eating a very dangerous fish. They are not really that dangerous."

“Well, if he’d wanted to mount him he’d have been shit out of luck, wouldn’t he?” Billy said. “Way you snapped it up and cut off its head. What if we don’t want to sell it to a restaurant? Maybe Jason here wants him on his wall.”

“No,” Jason said. “No problem. Go ahead. Take your turn.”

“When I catch my fish, I want him on the wall. So don’t fuck with him. You hear, old man?”

“I hear,” Ferdinand said.

“Let’s let the lady fish,” Billy said.

“That is all right,” Beatrice said. “I see enough fish.”

“No,” Billy said. “I insist.”

Beatrice looked at him, said, “Very well.”

“You don’t want to fish, don’t fish,” I said.

“No, it is all right,” she said.

Beatrice took off the short cloth robe. Underneath she was nearly wearing a bathing suit. There was almost enough cloth there to hide a quarter if someone shaved it around the edges with a pocketknife. The suit was black, one of those things with a string that went up her ass and covered nothing. The top just managed to fit over her nipples. I could tell she didn’t wear that sort of thing regularly. The skin on her buttocks and around her breasts was lighter than the rest of her, which was deeply tanned. Her pubic hair, which had not been waxed or shaved, escaped at the edges like little black tentacles waving to the public. What cloth was there clung to her snugly and showed the shape of what the old romance novels called her womanhood.

Though Beatrice was probably new to that kind of bathing suit, she wore it naturally, as if unbothered by scrutiny, but I thought I saw in her eyes a look I had seen before.

Late at night, while driving, a cat had darted in front of my car, and I’d hit it. When I got out to see if there was hope, the cat had looked up at me, dying, its eyes hot and savage, terrified in the glow of my flashlight. Even out there in the brutal sunshine, Beatrice’s eyes looked that way.

My guess was Billy had bought that little get-up for her and expected her to wear it, and she was doing just that.

I looked at Ferdinand out of the corner of my eye. I could tell from the look on his face he wasn't happy. That kind of bathing suit wasn't exactly the sort of thing a daughter wore around her father.

I baited Beatrice's hook.

She thanked me, seated herself in the fighting chair, strapped in, and cast. She was very good at it. The line went far out and into the rolling water. She put the butt of the rod in the swivel. She took a beer from Jason and sipped it. Billy stood by her chair for a while; then, bored, he got another beer and sat on one of the benches built into the side of the boat.

It was sticky and the bobbing of the boat no longer made me sick. It rocked me pleasantly. I watched Beatrice for a while as she reached inside her yellow bag beside the fighting chair, took out suntan lotion and began to apply it. I observed carefully as she rubbed it on the tops of her feet, up her ankles, all along her legs, and finally her flat stomach and the tops of her breasts. I felt the boss change positions in my pants.

She finished that, took large sunglasses from her bag and put them on, picked up her beer again and sipped it. I began to feel sleepy. I sat against the side of the boat, leaned against one of the benches, drifted off, thought of home, and Brett.

Brett wasn't as young as Beatrice. Or quite as firm. Or as brown. But God almighty she had it going. I missed her. I wished she missed me too. I wished I was ten years younger, handsome, had five million dollars and three more inches on my dick and my hair wasn't thinning. While I was at it, I threw in wishing for a pastrami sandwich on rye and immortality.

Of course, wishes are wishes. As my dad used to say, wish in one hand and shit in the other and see which one fills up first. The same can be applied to prayer. Shit in one hand and pray in the other. Within moments you can determine the real power of prayer.

I was awakened by the singing of the line. I sat up to see Beatrice drop her beer foaming onto the deck, reach out, and take the rod from the swivel.

"You got something," Billy said.

"No shit," Leonard said.

The line went tight and Beatrice jerked the rod, hit the fish, and it jumped. It was long and enormous. A sailfish.

"Goddamn," Billy said. "Look at that. That's record size. Don't you lose him. Hit him again."

And she did. The line went even tighter. Beatrice was pulled forward against the straps of the fighting chair. I could see one of her nipples peeking over the top of her bikini. It looked brown and friendly.

Beatrice tightened the drag. The line veered to the right, wide. Then back to the left, like a thin saw cutting lumber.

"Loosen the goddamn drag," Billy said.

"It's all right," Beatrice said.

"I know fishing. Loosen the drag."

"So do I," said Beatrice. "My father owns a fishing boat."

"Don't you talk back to me."

"Sorry," Beatrice said, and loosened the drag.

I was suddenly up and standing next to Billy.

"You keep talking to the lady like that, and you'll be swimming home," I said.

"Lady?" Billy said. "Look at those tits and ass hanging out. You call that a lady?"

At that moment I tensed to hit him, but Leonard took hold of my arm.

"It's their show," he said softly. "For the moment."

I took a breath, stepped away back to the bench, and sat down.

All right, I told myself. This is her game. Let her play it. She wants it like this. She knows what she's doing. It sucks. But it's her game.

Ferdinand worked the controls, reversed the boat and slowed the speed, gave the big fish room to run.

"I have one on my wall that's a record," Billy said. "And it's not near big as that one. I've never seen one that big. And a goddamn woman hooks it. Don't you lose it. You hear?"

"Yes, Billy," Beatrice said.

Acid boiled around in my stomach. I looked at Ferdinand. He was stoic. My admiration for him was fading. Surely he knew the score. He must, or he wouldn't let this shit go on. And if he knew the score, then that meant he wanted Beatrice to do what she was doing.

Leonard sat down beside me.

"Just be cool," Leonard said.

The rod was bending. Billy said, "Loosen the goddamn drag."

"It will hold," she said.

"Loosen it."

She did. The line sang, vibrated like a violin string. The fish went wide to starboard.

"Look at that cocksucker run," Jason said.

The fish leaped.

I've never seen anything so incredible. Up it went. The sunlight hit the fish and it was many colors. Red and blue and gunmetal gray. Its veins appeared to stand out under its flesh. Nothing like it would look the moment it hit the deck, dying. Its color would fade. It would fade even more on the trip to shore. It would lose all of its real color in the taxidermist's shop. It would end up dead and mounted on someone's wall over their couch. A living, twisting, multicolored piece of magnificence turned to a hard, leathery, listless shadow of its former self.

The fish struck the water and disappeared.

The line slacked. The pole began to straighten.

"Hit him again," Billy said.

She did. With a pull and a grunt. Then she hit him again.

Sweat pops were coating her forehead now, running down her chin and chest. The bathing suit was damp with it. A convention of sweat beads gathered in her belly button and made the bits of exposed pubic hair limp. The muscles in her legs and arms coiled and knotted, as if being braided from the inside. She pressed her little feet hard against the footrests.

"It's too big for her," Landis said.

"No," Billy said. "She can land it. It's the biggest fucking sailfish I've ever seen. It's a goddamn dinosaur."

Beatrice worked the line, the drag. It was obvious she knew what she was doing, probably better than Billy, but it was just too much fish. It might have been too much fish for anybody.

Billy poured a cold beer down her back.

“Chill out and hang in,” he said.

I looked at Leonard. “Let me just knock a tooth out.”

“Not yet. Don’t fuck her game for your pleasure.”

Beatrice hit the big fish again, solid, and it leaped. Pinned itself against the sky like a brooch on heaven’s chest. Hung there for what seemed way too long to be natural. Then, finally, even it was overcome by the laws of gravity, and down it went, slicing into the water.

“It’s like a goddamn submarine,” Jason said.

The line went solid again, jerked Beatrice against the straps. They were starting to cut into her shoulders, making red lines.

“You take the line,” Beatrice said. “You want him. You fish him.”

“No, honey,” Billy said. “You’re going to bring him in.”

“I cannot,” Beatrice said. “I am much too tired.”

“You’re stronger than you think. I know. I’ve been on the receiving end of your power. If you can fuck all night long, you can fish all night long.”

I glanced at Ferdinand. He was red. He gunned the boat’s motor.

“Hey, old man,” Billy yelled up at him. “You’re pulling the line too tight doing that.”

“Sorry,” Ferdinand said, and cut the engine back.

“I want this fish, Beatrice,” Billy said. “You want to give me what I want. What I’m paying you gives me what I want, and then some. You fuck this up, you’ll pay. You know that.”

“Yes, Billy. Oh, God, Billy, please. My back feels like it is breaking.”

“You’re okay.”

“My arms. I cannot hold them up.”

“Sure you can.”

“You want the goddamn fish,” I said. “You take it. She’s hurting."

"Nothing worth doing is easy," Billy said. "It's her fish, and she'll land it."

"Please, Billy," Beatrice said. "You can have it. It could be you caught it in the first place."

Then I really got it. He was mad Beatrice had caught the big fish instead of him, and he was punishing her with it.

I called to Ferdinand. "Cut it out. Let's take the boat in."

He looked at me, his mouth moved at one corner, but he said nothing.

Billy said, "I'm paying ten, no, twenty times … You hear me, old man, twenty times what you get for a charter. So you do it my way. Beatrice will do it my way."

"It is okay, Hap," Beatrice said. "I can land him. I can do it."

"You don't look like you could hold your leg up," I said, "let alone land that monster."

"I can," she said.

The boat stopped and the great fish sounded, dove way down into the deeps. The rod bent into a bow. Beatrice was beginning to shake. Her face was pale and her eyes looked as if they might roll up into her head. She was stretched forward in the straps so that her back was away from the fighting chair, exposed. I could see the cords of muscle there, knotted like the Gordian knot.

"She can't take much more of this," I said. "This is silly. I'll take the fish if you won't."

"You won't do any such thing," Billy said. "It's her fish and she'll land it. She caught it, she can bring it in."

"Billy," Beatrice said. "I feel faint."

He poured beer over her head. "Here, this'll freshen you up."

Beatrice shook the beer from her hair, began to cry silently.

Landis said, "Maybe it is enough, Billy."

"I say when it's enough," Billy said. "You just sit."

Landis shrugged. He might have a conscience, but it wasn't a strong one. Jason pulled a fresh beer from the cooler, popped it, looked off in the distance, possibly in search of Atlantis.

The rod began to bob up and down and the line on the reel was running out. The fish was still diving down.

Leonard said, “Lady, anytime you say it’s finished, trust me, it’s finished.”

Billy sneered at Leonard.

Leonard looked at him and smiled. “And I might finish it before it’s finished.”

Ferdinand came out of the cabin. “I have killed the engine. The fish will sound. And will keep sounding. It is too much for her. My daughter cannot take much more. I must ask you to take the fish, señor.”

“Me and Beatrice made a deal,” Billy said. “She does what I say for a while, and you get a whole lot of reward out of it.”

“I know,” said Ferdinand. “But it is not enough. Not for such a thing as this.”

My skin had begun to crawl. Not only because of what Billy was doing, but that her father was allowing, and worse yet, Leonard and I were allowing it. I couldn’t imagine anything being worth this.

Billy slipped his hand beneath her bathing suit and began massaging a breast.

The shears Ferdinand had used on the barracuda lay on the deck behind the chair. I picked them up and cut the line. The rod snapped back like a whip. The line jumped over the side of the boat and the fish was gone.

Billy turned. But before I could hit him, Leonard was there. Leonard stuck the tips of his fingers in Billy’s eyes. Billy’s hands went to his face and Leonard kicked him hard in the balls. Billy went to his knees.

I looked at Landis and Jason. They were both on their feet. Jason dropped his beer onto the deck. It rolled up against the side of the boat and foamed.

I said, “I wouldn’t.”

“Naw,” Leonard said. “Come ahead.”

I was still holding the shears in my hand. Leonard had Billy by the hair, grinding his knuckles into the top of Billy’s skull. He pulled Billy forward onto his face, dropped his knee across Billy’s neck.

“Taste that boat,” Leonard said. “Learn to like it. I plan on feeding it to you.”

Beatrice was crying. “You do not know what you have done,” she said.

“Maybe not,” I said. “But enough is enough. Ferdinand, take this boat back to port. And don’t anyone give me any shit about it.”

“Oh, no,” Leonard said. “Please give me some shit. I’m already sweaty and worked up now. And I’m bleeding again. So I’m mad enough to need some shit. Come on, either of you pussies. I want some shit.”

No one gave him any shit.

Ferdinand gunned us toward shore.

18

THAT NIGHT in our hotel, Leonard, wearing fresh bandages, propped himself up in bed with pillows. He said, “I enjoyed our fishing trip. Didn’t you?”

I was sitting in a chair at the desk, drinking a diet cola. “So much,” I said.

“Just a little rest. A vacation …”

“That’s enough. I was trying to help the old man.”

“You’re always helping someone, Hap. Except yourself. And by the way, what do you think of the old man now?”

“I think he saved our lives, and he’s a good old man, but … I don’t know. That stuff with those dipshits. What’s up with that?”

“She’s a masochist, Hap. Where the fuck have you been all your life? Or maybe she has this big daddy thing goin’ with Billy Boy. Boss me, and I’ll be your slave shit.”

“She seems intelligent.”

“Probably is. She’s just fucked up. Leave it at that.”

“Or she’s in some real deep shit and she and her old man are doing what they need to do to survive.”

“Your idea was we were there to protect her today. We did that. In spite of the fact I’m not so sure she wanted it. We haven’t been invited back tomorrow.”

“At least I won’t have to put those nasty sardines on a hook.”

“Do you know how long I had to shower to get that fish smell off?”

“You mean after we went fishing today, or before?”

“That’s funny, Hap. Real funny. And I give up on the vacation.”

“You talked me into staying.”

“I know, and it was a mistake. We cannot take a vacation, Hap.

It is not in the cards. Least not together. I miss John."

"Admit it. He might be your lover, but is he as much fun as me?"

"Trust me, Hap. You're not fun. And who knows, you might even call Brett and she might even like you calling."

"I must admit I think about her."

"She's all right, that one. You should try and stick with her."

"I have."

"No. When she gives you a little bit of coolness, you bail. Every woman you meet can't beat a drum all the time and blow a trumpet. They got to have their moments."

"Like you know anything about women, Leonard. You're a queer."

"But a smart queer. Brett, she's all right. We've known each other for a while now, Hap, old buddy, and I finally figured out why you don't stick with women."

"You mean besides the ones that double-cross and try to kill me?"

"Besides them."

"You mean like the one falls in love with a good friend and then goes off and gets killed."

"Well, besides her too."

"What's the answer, O Sage Queer?"

"What you got to do, my man, is give your relationships some breathing space. You're working so hard to have a relationship, you don't just let it happen. Hang with the moment, buddy."

"That's it? Hang with the moment? What kind of fuckin' advice is that? You haven't exactly had the best love life in the world either, if you'll recall."

"Got me there, but at least I figured out your problem. You meet a woman, you get that charge of being in love. That romantic, sexual rush, and then it gets everyday, and you don't know how, or don't have the character—"

"Watch it."

"Don't have the character to make it work when it gets into the everyday. I'm not one of those says a relationship should be a job. That's the case, get a part-time at the 7-Eleven. I am sayin', it ain't all about moony eyes and exchanging body fluids."

"This from the guy telling me that the size of John's hammer was what you were really impressed with."

"It is impressive. But … I been away from him awhile, and, you know, I'm beginning to rethink things. Not about the size of the hammer. I still like that part. But about love and life."

"Oh, shit. Love and Relationships by Leonard Pine. Save it. Write a column."

"Hey, listen to me, buddy. That's how I realized I'd turned a corner with John. I just let things be."

"You hung with the moment."

"Exactly. Bottom line. Don't try so hard. And this one. Beatrice. Let it go. She's about two dogs short a sled team."

"I think I'll go to sleep now, Socrates."

"Fine. Just when you get in bed, try not to show so much skin. I don't like seeing you in your underdrawers."

"I thought queers liked men in their underwear."

"Not you."

"Well, you snore in your sleep."

"Yeah, and you fart. No wonder you can't keep a woman."

I slipped off my pants and shirt, turned off the light, climbed into my bed. I lay there silent for a while. I said, "Do I really fart in my sleep?"

Leonard snickered.

"Do I?"

Leonard snickered again.

"Do I?"

"Sometimes."

"What times?"

"When you fart. Now sleep tight, and don't let the bedbugs bite. And finally, my good man, shut the fuck up, will you?"

"Leonard?"

"Christ. What?"

"You may be right. It's tough loving someone and doing it right."

"Talk about tough, you ought to be a homo. You know me and John we can't even hold hands without people going bonkers. You, you can hold hands with a woman, no one thinks that's weird. I hold hands with John, people stand and stare."

"I've seen you hold hands with John. In public."

"I didn't say I didn't do it, but it isn't comfortable. Our love is ridiculed when folks can't just accept it. What the fuck harm does it do them?"

"None at all, Leonard. And if it's any consolation, I think John is a good catch. You done good. I don't know how. But you did."

"Good night, Hap."

"Good night, Leonard."

Next morning, early, there was a pounding on our door.

I sat up in bed. Leonard was already on his feet, stepping into his pants. "Who is it?" he said.

"Billy. From the boat."

"Yeah," Leonard said. "Just the man I don't want to see."

I pulled on my pants, was slipping on my shirt when Leonard opened the door.

Billy was standing there fuming, his fist clenched. His bright Hawaiian shirt was almost too much that time of morning.

"She here?"

"Who?" Leonard asked. "Helen of Troy?"

"You know who I mean."

"Beatrice?" I said.

"Yeah. Her. Where is she?"

"She's not here," Leonard said.

"Goddamn it," Billy said, reaching under his shirt, pulling out a small snub-nose revolver. "You're gonna tell me—"

It was quick, the way Leonard grabbed Billy by his shirtfront and started slapping him. I'm not exactly sure how many times he slapped Billy. It was too quick and economical to tell. It was over before it started. The slapping. And the disarming.

Leonard tossed the gun on the floor, stuck two fingers in Billy's nostrils, stepped behind him, jerked him to the floor.

Billy said, "Goddamn."

Leonard dislodged his fingers from Billy's nose, knelt behind him, wrapped his forearm around Billy's neck and squeezed. "Are you gonna be good, Billy," Leonard said, "or am I gonna have to open up an economy-size can of whup-ass?"

"I'm cool," Billy said.

"You ain't got enough time in your life to learn how to be cool," Leonard said. "What do you think, Hap?"

"We could kill him, cut him up, leave him under the bed."

"I like that."

"I was just looking for Beatrice," Billy said.

"I thought you were spending the night with her," I said.

"Can you please stop choking me?"

"You get up, play nice, and don't talk so loud," Leonard said, "you and me can tolerate one another."

Leonard stood up.

Billy stood up. Took a swing at Leonard. Leonard ducked it, grabbed the pistol off the floor, brought it around and caught Billy upside the head with it. Billy went down so fast it was like he'd stepped in an open manhole.

Leonard leaned over, tapped him again with the little gun, said, "You just think Rodney King took a beatin'. Wait'll I get through."

"Hold up, Leonard," I said. "That's enough. Save your strength. We may have to bury him later. And you don't want to open your wounds."

Leonard took a deep breath, tossed the pistol on the bed.

"Take a chair, my man," Leonard said.

Billy got his feet under him, went over and sat down at the little table. Blood was running from his nostrils, dripping onto his colorful shirt. His cheeks were bright and finger-marked.

I went in the bathroom, got some toilet paper, stuff you could use to sand your furniture, gave the wad to Billy.

He pressed it against his nose.

“You didn’t have to do all that,” he said.

“No,” Leonard said. “I didn’t have to. But I wanted to. Don’t ever pull a gun on me, motherfucker. I’d been in a worse mood, you’d have to hire a winch truck to get that little shooter out of your ass.”

“I thought she was here,” Billy said. “I’ve spent more money on that bitch than the Republican party did their last election. I figure I got a right to know where she is. Me and her had a deal.”

“You’re spending money on her,” I said. “You don’t own her.”

“That’s a matter of opinion. I stayed with her last night. We had a fight. I wasn’t happy with you guys. I didn’t want you around, and she said fine, and then she really pissed me saying she fucked Hap here. That true, Hap?”

“I don’t usually fuck and tell, but in your case, I’ll make an exception. Yes. And I really, really enjoyed it.”

“She told me she got herself in some kind of shit with a gangster or something. She needed money. Lots of it.”

“So you took advantage of that?” I said.

“It was a deal she wanted to make,” Billy said.

“Yeah,” Leonard said, “and while you had her bent over a barrel, you thought you’d core her ass with your money. Am I right?”

“I came to her father about a fishing charter,” Billy said. “He was recommended. Goddamn, I need more toilet paper.”

This time Leonard came back with a wet towel. Billy took it, pressed it against his nose.

“Old man told me what he’d charge, and I agreed. Then I met Beatrice. She and I had a drink. We talked. She said she needed help. She needed money. She could make it a hell of a fishing trip, and in the meantime I could drop my line in her little water hole, if you know what I mean. Provided I came up with lots of money. She wanted too much money. Even for a good-looking ass like hers.”

“So you had some ideas?” Leonard said.

"Yeah. I said, you do what I like. What I say for three days, and we fish too, I'll pay off the bill."

"How much is the bill?" I asked.

"Seventy-five or eighty thousand. It wasn't an exact figure."

I looked at Leonard. "You were actually going to pay her that much?"

"I figured I ought to fuck her old man too, for that price. Not that I wanted to, understand me."

"You have that kind of money?"

"Out the ass. That's no money to me."

"Are you going to pay her anything now?"

"I don't know. Probably not."

"So why are we hearing all this?" I asked.

"Because I can't find her and the deal's off. I'm giving the old man the money for the fishing trip. One day, but that's it. She threw me out last night, wouldn't answer her door this morning. I thought she was here."

"What would you care?" I said. "You were thinking about not paying the money. Right?"

"I don't like losing tail to someone else," Billy said. "Especially someone made me look like an asshole. And I've spent money on her, put her up in that hotel. She thinks I'm going to pay for today, her not letting me in like that, not answering the door, she can kiss my ass."

"No one had to work hard to make you look like an asshole," Leonard said. "You were riding high there, my man. And understand you're getting this from the smartest nigger in the world."

"Smartest nigger in the world?" Billy said.

Leonard leaped off the bed, slapped Billy so hard it knocked him off the chair.

"I can say that," Leonard said. "You can't. How'd you vote last presidential election?"

"What?" Billy said, afraid to get off the floor.

"You heard me. You vote Republican or Democrat? And don't tell me what you think I want to hear.”

“Republican.”

“That saves you one whack,” Leonard said.

“But it makes me want to hit you,” I said. “Both of you.”

“Look,” Billy said. “I’m through with all this. I’ll give her father the money, be on my way.”

“I don’t trust you to give anyone anything,” I said. “And I think we should walk over to where Beatrice is, try that knock again.”

We spent a little while cleaning Billy up. We even let him take off his shirt and rinse the blood out. We decided he could have his gun back. Without the ammunition.

Leonard said, “Don’t let me see you pull that again, even if it’s just to scratch your ass. You hear?”

“I hear,” Billy said.

We walked over to the hotel where Beatrice was staying. It was a pretty good walk, took about thirty minutes.

We tried the phone in the lobby, but she didn’t answer. The elevator was broken. We walked upstairs and Billy showed us the room. He knocked.

No answer.

I knocked and called her name.

No answer.

I beat on the door.

Still no answer.

Billy took a turn hammering on the door. “Wake up, you cunt,” he said.

I touched his arm gently. “Don’t say that.”

“I was kind of expecting a guy to answer in his drawers,” Leonard said. “I figured she got rid of both you bastards and got someone else.”

“A guy in his drawers, huh?”

“Yep.”

“Or, if your luck was in, without them.”

“Don’t tease me, Hap.”

“Are you …?” Billy said to Leonard.

“Careful,” Leonard said.

“But you beat me up.”

“And quite handily, I thought.”

Billy dropped his head. It hadn’t been his last two days. Lost his girl. Lost his fish. Got his ass beat by a queer. Several times.

I went downstairs, told the man in charge I couldn’t wake the lady. He understood enough English to get the idea I wanted him to unlock her door, but he wouldn’t do it. I offered him twenty-five dollars to check and see she was all right, but he wouldn’t do that either. So much for Mexican corruption.

I went back upstairs and knocked again. I looked at Leonard. He said, “Enough of this using our brains and politeness. I suggest we resort to good old East Texas brawn and assholism. Stand back.”

He jumped at the door.

He hit it solid and hard. So hard it knocked him backward on his ass. He got up, said, “Let’s do it together.”

“She could already be at the dock,” I said.

“Good thought,” Leonard said. “Glad you came up with that. Maybe a minute or two earlier would have been better.”

“You’re supposed to go out again,” I said. “Right, Billy Boy?”

“Well, yeah. But I told her I wasn’t going out today. Not after last night. I told her that when she threw me out.”

“Maybe she just left and went home,” I said.

“Fuck it,” Leonard said.

“What the hell,” I said.

We hit the door with our shoulders, splintered it at the frame. We hit it two more times before it fell in. Even though it was morning, the curtains were drawn and it was dark in there. I switched on the light. There was a hallway, a bathroom on the left, and at the end of the hallway, on the left, was the bed.

Beatrice was on it. Her mouth was stuffed with something and her bikini top had been used to strap whatever was in her mouth firmly in place. Her throat was cut, wide and deep. Her head hung off the bed. Blood had dripped into her hair and some of it hung in ropy strings across the sheets where it had dried. Her face had been cut on. Someone had taken an axe or a machete to her as well. Her hands and feet were chopped off. The nubs of bone were clean, so the blade had been sharp and the blows had been swift.

There was a chair by the desk in the room, and there were four deep slashes in the seat of it; it had been used to prop up Beatrice's hands and feet for chopping. There were sprays of blood on the chair and on the wall near it. I didn't see her hands or feet lying around anywhere.

On the floor by the bed were a couple of knotted rubbers. They might have belonged to her tormentors or to Billy. Right then it didn't seem to matter.

"One goddamned thing," Billy said. "It wasn't suicide."

I turned to hit him, but Leonard was too quick. There was a sound like someone cracking a stick over their knee, and Billy flew back against the wall, hit his head against it hard enough to dent the sheetrock. His ragdoll body nodded to the left, collapsed to the floor.

"I was just made to hit that motherfucker," Leonard said.

I went quickly into the bathroom and splashed my face with water. I felt Leonard's arm on my shoulders.

"Easy, man," he said.

I raised up, moved away from the sink, then Leonard was splashing water on his face. "Goddamn," he said.

I looked where he was looking. The tub. In it were Beatrice's hands and feet.

The manager, having heard all the racket, arrived about then. He saw the shattered door, Billy on the floor, said something in Spanish. When he came forward, saw what was on the bed, he screamed and darted out of there.

Leonard and I got hold of Billy, dragged him into the hall. He didn't wake up. Or if he did he was smart enough to not let us know.

I reached back inside the room, cut off the light, waited for the policía.

19

THE COPS CAME and got us, thought we might have done it. It didn't help that Billy had a gun on him, even if it didn't have bullets. The police thought we were all buddies.

We were shoved into a Mexican jail with cockroaches big enough to work in an iron foundry, rats that reminded me of a roadside attraction. The guard, a tall, mustached man with a slight belly, looked like he'd nail our balls to a log and give us a knife to free ourselves.

Something about him, and the jail, didn't give me great confidence in the Mexican judicial system. I tried to tell them about Juan Miguel, and how I thought he might have done it or had it done. They listened to me, but said nothing. I might as well have been talking to those monoliths on Easter Island.

He did manage to ask in English where the knife was.

I realized then they were looking for the murder weapon. Obviously, we hadn't beat Beatrice to death with Billy's revolver, nor had we used it to cut her up.

Not finding the weapon seemed in our favor. We certainly hadn't flushed it down the commode or hid it in our ass.

I reconciled myself with that. No murder weapon. What didn't reconcile me was that jail and those goddamn rats.

Christ, they were big.

Once, many years ago, I stopped at a little trailer parked beside the road that was painted up with exciting pictures of behemoth rats, and above the painting was a sign that read: SEE THE GIANT RATS OF SUMATRA. I couldn't resist. I paid my money, went inside, found them to be shaved possums. I said as much to the lady who owned the exhibit. She said, "Yeah, you're right." No embarrassment at all.

I said, "Everyone in East Texas knows a danged possum when they see it, shaved or not."

"I know," she said. And that was the end of that. She didn't offer to give my money back. She didn't care I knew they were shaved possums. It's like the world's largest gopher I heard about. You pay and go in and it's the world's largest all right, only it's a stone statue of a gopher and they've already got your money.

The rats in the jail were near as big as those possums, only they were very much card-carrying rats. They came through a hole in the wall big enough to put your fist through—up to your elbow. They came at night, scampered and sniffed and nibbled about. I assumed they'd bite. I kept both feet on my bunk, watched them in the dark.

Rats. The dark. It brought me back to thinking about Beatrice. I didn't want to think about her, but I did. Thought about what human rats had done to her by lamplight. Slowly, methodically.

But why?

The money her father owed?

Wouldn't they let her pay it back after the fishing trip?

Why would anyone want money that bad?

Who in the hell had her father been in dutch with anyway?

Who was Juan Miguel?

What would be the point in killing her?

Break a finger maybe. I could see that.

But she's dead, how do they get their dough back? What's the advantage of dead over a living person you could hound for dollars?

Did it become a matter of pride over commerce?

She had to have let them in. The door was sound. But why would she? Did she think she could reason with them? Perhaps she had part of the money. Maybe she thought she'd have it all, that Billy would cool and she would talk him into doing what she wanted. She was probably used to that. Talking men into doing what she wanted.

No answers. Just questions.

So here we were, in a Mexican jail. Me, Leonard, and an asshole. It was a horrible place. Small and tight, all three of us in a damp cell with all those rats and one horribly stained shitter between us.

You had to sit right out there in the open and take a crap. Somehow I found that the most humiliating part of it. Me working out turds that, because of the food, came out like bricks, and Billy watching.

I don't know why he watched. Maybe he had nothing else to do. Maybe he liked to watch people shit. He certainly seemed to be watching me as I folded the thick toilet paper so I could do my duty.

After about midday of the second day, me shitting, Billy watching, I wiped my ass and rubbed the paper in Billy's face. He tried to fight back, but he was just big and strong and had no skills. I kneed him inside his thigh and dropped him. I got hold of his hair while he was on his knees and gave him a couple of shots with a swinging elbow.

I regretted that. Got shit on my elbow. Had to wash it in the sink with a pumice soap that nearly took the skin off.

Billy lay down on the floor then, shit on his face, whining. I felt like a bully, but not so much that an hour later, when he was showing signs of recovery, I did it again.

Hit him with an elbow I mean.

Had to use the soap again. Got it off his face and on my elbow. That was starting to irritate me as well. It was like washing up with lathered gravel.

Why couldn't he have washed his face?

That way, I hit him it would have been clean skin.

I know I wouldn't go around with doo-doo on my face. No sir.

"Isn't he fun to hit?" Leonard said. "I'm thinking about giving up sex just to save energy to hit him."

"In here you've given up sex," I said.

"So I can hit him lots."

I made a vow that I'd check my watch every hour, and on the hour I was going to kick Billy's ass. But I'd try and keep my elbow, hands, and feet off the shit on his face. That crack he had made about Beatrice's death not being suicide was still rubbing me raw. For that matter, I didn't know for a fact he didn't do it. I doubted he had. Somehow it didn't strike me as his style. He was abusive, but I doubted he was a murderer. He might kill by accident he got mad enough, bitch-slap her to death, but I doubted he'd plan anything like that. Torture. Amputation. Then bringing us over to see his handiwork. Nope. Billy wasn't that calculating.

But he did deserve an hourly ass whipping.

However, the meanness went out of me. Billy eventually felt better, washed his face with the bad soap and stayed in the corner away from us.

Leonard, who heard me make the vow to whip his ass on the hour every hour, was a little disappointed in my caving in. He thought it was the liberal in me. But we decided, liberal or not, it was the best thing all around.

Later on, I felt a little ashamed of myself for doing what I did.

Caving in like that.

After a couple days had gone by—because in Mexico nobody gets in a hurry—they began to seriously suspect we might not have done it. The authorities allowed me to send word back to the States in the form of a phone call. I got hold of Charlie. Told him to come see what he could do, and to bring any kind of help he could bring. The Army might be a good idea.

While we sat and waited, Leonard said, "I don't know how you do it, Hap. You've just got the knack."

"What?"

"Trouble. You step in it the way kids step in mud puddles. You just can't go around it, and when you try to jump over it, you fall in it. It's a knack, brother."

"Poor Beatrice," I said.

"Yeah," Leonard said. "Poor Beatrice. And poor Ferdinand. I wonder about him."

We had warned the Mexican authorities that Ferdinand's life might be in danger as well, but again they gave us the Easter Island treatment. It was the same when we told them about Billy's friends. That was about as exciting to them as egg salad.

"If Ferdinand is alive," I said, "you don't think he thinks we did it, do you?”

“Naw. Hey, Billy Boy.”

Billy, who was sitting against the wall with his head hung, looked up.

“Go over there and put your goddamn nose in the corner. I’m sick of looking at you”

Billy went, stood with his nose in the corner like a child.

“When I judge fifteen minutes, I’ll let you out of the corner,” Leonard said, “but don’t you fuckin’ look at me, you hear?”

“Yeah,” Billy said.

“Change that to Yes sir, Mr. Pine, sir, or you ain’t even imagined the beating you’ll take, you piece of shit.”

“Yes sir, Mr. Pine, sir.”

“Now you’re cookin’ with gas.”

We were sitting close together on Leonard’s bunk, talking quietly. I said, “You don’t think Billy did it, do you?”

“No. I think he got thrown out the night before, just like he said. He didn’t get the lovin’ he thought he was gonna get, and the next mornin’ he was still mad, and when she didn’t answer the door, he thought you were casting your harpoon, so he got the gun and came to scare you.”

“But you scared him.”

“I did. But, if you had answered the door, you would have scared him. Maybe not as good as me, but good enough.”

Next afternoon Charlie arrived with Jim Bob Luke.

Charlie had gotten rid of the straw boater and had gone back to his porkpie. He was also wearing a Hawaiian shirt as usual.

Jim Bob is a private investigator and hog farmer out of Pasadena, Texas. A friend of Charlie’s. He saved my life once.

He was wearing a blue western shirt with silver snaps, jeans that looked as if they had seen a lifetime of rodeos, and a white hat, creased, the brim turned up sharply on both sides. He had a little feather in the hatband and a toothpick in his mouth. The hatband was made out of rattlesnake hide and it still had the head on it, but he probably could have done without it.

He came and peeked at us through the bars.

“Damned, if this ain’t the Ritz-Carlton, and you boys are uglier than I remember.”

“And you’re just as sweet as I remember,” Leonard said.

“Gettin’ lots of hog pussy, Jim Bob?” I said.

“Just if they get muddy,” Jim Bob said. “That’s the way I like it. They twist them little curly tails and it’s all I can do not to cream my jeans.”

“You’re a sick sumbitch, Jim Bob,” I said.

“I tell you,” Jim Bob said, “you boys got a way of gettin’ your dicks between the ground and a horse hoof, don’t you?”

“Hap does. And I suffer because of it.”

“Leonard, you’re a fuckup that’s got an excuse,” Jim Bob said. “Without Hap, you’d fuck up on your own. It’s just you boys’ nature. I know. I’m the same way. Damn, it smells like a goddamn fart in here.”

“They feed us a lot of beans,” I said.

Charlie hadn’t said a word. He took off his porkpie hat and slapped it on his thigh for some reason. His face wore the look of a very tired man or maybe just one who wished he had a better class of friends.

“I’ve got Veil in the other room talking,” he said.

“No shit,” I said.

“No shit,” he said.

Veil had helped Leonard once after he burned down a crack house. His defense was basically Leonard thought he was exterminating rats by destroying it. It worked. Leonard got away with a warning. If there was anyone who could legally get us out of this thing, it was Veil.

Veil wasn’t a big guy, average height, black hair gone gray, a slightly Mediterranean look, one good eye, the other covered with a black pirate patch. He had the demeanor of someone who could roll strikes in a bowling alley with his nuts.

“What’s Jim Bob doing here?” Leonard asked. “I mean, I’m glad you might have brought him along to hold my dick while I pee, but what else is he good for?”

"My hogs speak highly of me," Jim Bob said. "Except for the ones I take to the packin' plant. I reckon their opinion of me lowers dramatically about then."

"We thought there might be trouble getting you out," Charlie said, "so I brought Jim Bob. He kind of likes trouble."

"Don't say that," Jim Bob said. "I don't like trouble. I just know how to deal with it … All right, I sort of like it."

"Well, I don't," I said. "Get us out of here."

"What about him?" Charlie said, pointing at Billy.

"He's on his own."

"Friends he had with him seem to have bailed," Leonard said.

"He guilty of anything?" Charlie asked.

"Birth," Leonard said.

Jim Bob, Charlie, and Veil took a room at the hotel, and Veil did his thing. Arguing with the law via translator. I thought with Veil on the case we'd be out that afternoon, but we weren't.

Billy, who was free to take his nose out of the wall, said, "You know, I didn't mean to start it off so bad with you guys."

"Sure you did," I said.

"All right, but I'm sorry now."

"I'm sorry I ever met you," Leonard said.

"Likewise," Billy said. "I'm sorry I ever came to Mexico."

Leonard said, "I'm sorry my best friend, my brother, talked me into a fucked-up cruise, got me left in Mexico, stabbed, and then into this shit. That's what I'm sorry of."

"Maybe if we'd taken another cruise line," I said.

"Look," Billy said. "I just want to get straight with you guys. I didn't do this to Beatrice. I wanted to fuck her, not kill her."

"You have such a way with words," I said.

"Yeah, well, maybe I'm not silver-tongued, but I got a few dollars. I'll get out of this."

"You're so rich, how come your lawyers aren't all over this?" I said. "I got my lawyer on it, and I'm not rich."

"Hey, you're a hero," Leonard said. "Remember? You got money in the bank.”

“It’s dwindling,” I said.

“It’s my father,” Billy said. “He’s making me suffer a little. He thinks I need to learn a lesson. I know him. I know that’s what he’s doing. I called him, had to leave a message. He could maybe be out of the country, though. So, would you please call him for me if you get out first?”

“Say you’re a chickenshit cocksucker,” Leonard said. “You hear me?”

“All right. I’m a chickenshit—”

“That’s enough,” Leonard said. “I just wanted to know you’d do it. Give me the number.”

“Can we bury the hatchet?” Billy asked. “Well, maybe that’s not what I should have said, considering Beatrice.”

“Maybe not,” Leonard said. “I get your drift. Unless it turns out you had something to do with this—like we’ll ever know—consider it buried. At least as long as we’re in this jail cell.”

“Let me ask you something, Billy,” I said. “If you’re without money now, waiting on your father, what were you going to pay Beatrice with?”

“Well, I would have had to get the money from my father.”

“Would you really have done that?”

“Probably not,” he said. “Will you still call my father?”

“Sure,” I said. “We’ll call once. He’s not there, you’re shit out of luck. I’m not going to make it a career.”

“Thanks. I’ll find a way to write out the phone number for you. You know, that guy in the cowboy hat is right. It does smell like a fart in here.”

“Yeah,” Leonard said, “and I smell it best when you open your mouth.”

20

NEXT DAY we were out. I don’t know what Veil did, but we were out. Basically, I think it was because they didn’t have the evidence to hold us and Veil was one persuasive, smart sonofabitch. But I knew in Mexico, they can hold you anyway, so I figured some money had changed hands.

It didn’t help Billy any. He was there when we left, looking like a friendly dog in the animal shelter, hoping someone would pick him before they came with the needle.

Although Veil and I had known each other for years, in an off and on sort of way, I couldn’t quite figure Jim Bob being in Mexico. We weren’t bosom buddies. Me and Leonard had only met him once before. But he’d apparently taken a liking to us, or maybe he was just bored with hogs, or owed Charlie a favor.

All I knew for certain was once, when the chips were down, and my balls were literally on ice, Jim Bob saved my life. It was a tense situation, punctuated with gunfire and death. But the way Jim Bob acted, you would have thought he had shown up to have a manicure and a massage.

I don’t know I’d vouch for it being true, but Charlie once said Jim Bob was so cool and tough he made Leonard look like a sissy.

One thing for certain, those two ever went at it the sparks would fly so high and hot the moon would catch on fire.

We gathered at a table in the hotel where Jim Bob, Veil, and Charlie were staying. Charlie and Jim Bob were sharing a room. Veil had one of his own. That’s the way Veil is. On his own. Even when he was with you he was on his own.

We bought some food at a café, had it wrapped, brought it up to the hotel. Tamales and fish stewed in some kind of sauce, tortillas and sodas.

We ate while we talked.

“So can we go home?” I said.

“Sooner the better,” Veil said, eyeing me with his good eye. The tan Armani suit he was wearing looked as if it might have been previously worn by one of Jim Bob’s hogs. “Mexican law officials have a way of changing their minds.”

“Or they run out of the money you gave them,” Charlie said.

“So money was paid,” I said. “Jim Bob, was it you?”

“Why the fuck would I do that? I don’t even know you.”

“Oh.”

“It was Charlie,” Veil said.

“Sorry, Charlie,” I said. “It’s just you’re so tight with money I wouldn’t have guessed.”

“Yeah,” Charlie said. “It was my money, and I’m missing it already. I had plans for it. I was gonna do some work on my trailer. Maybe get me a blow-up fuck doll and a refrigerator with an ice maker.”

“They’re nice,” Leonard said. “John’s got one.”

“A doll or a refrigerator with an ice maker?” Charlie asked.

“The refrigerator,” Leonard said. “You got me, you don’t need no blow-up doll … Besides, those male dolls, the dick doesn’t hold air worth a damn. And the balls collapse right away.”

“Don’t suck so hard,” Jim Bob said. “Besides, Charlie gets one, he’ll want a ewe or a heifer. Right, Charlie?”

“Eat shit,” Charlie said.

“Thanks again, Charlie,” I said. “Seriously, we appreciate it.”

“Jim Bob paid for the rooms,” Charlie said. “I only go so far.”

“Thanks,” Leonard said.

“Shit,” Jim Bob said, “I didn’t have nothing to do. Divorce cases lately, and I’m sick of that. I had to sneak around last week and take photos of a fat husband cheating on his fat wife, and he wasn’t even porkin’ some kind of blond bimbo. Had him another porker. It was like I was back at my place, sittin’ in the backyard watchin’ the hogs fuck. Gettin’ that on film, that was ugly. I think there ought to be some kind of law against it.”

“I think there is,” Veil said.

“What the hell were they doin’?” Leonard said. “Fuckin’ out in the open?”

“They had them a picnic spot,” Jim Bob said. “I’d tracked them to it before. It was night. They thought they were safe. But I have an infrared camera. I snuck up on ’em, first I thought two hot air balloons had come down in the park and were bouncing together. But nope, it was just two really fat, ugly people.”

“Your friend, Veil, here,” Charlie said, “you owe him some money too. He put up some of the air flights.”

Veil grinned at me. It was the kind of smile barracudas are famous for. I knew he didn’t want the money, but he sure wanted to make me think he did. It was his idea of a joke. Veil didn’t travel in humor circles much so he kind of laughed at what amused wolves.

“So you all helped us,” Leonard said.

“I brought everygoddamnbody,” Charlie said. “I didn’t have any idea what you two morons might be into. It’s usually pretty deep shit. Actually, I think you got out easy this time. They could have held you until Mexico had a solid economy. In other words, for life.”

“And I want you to know it’s appreciated,” Leonard said. “On the other hand, that appreciation is going to have to go a long goddamn ways. I haven’t got any money to pay you back with. Hap does, though.”

I sighed. “Yep. And it seems to be disappearing faster than sweat on an Eskimo’s lip.”

“I don’t believe they call themselves Eskimos anymore,” Charlie said. “They’re Inuits. Eskimos is not an accepted term anymore.”

“Yeah,” Leonard said, “and the name of the black race isn’t nigger anymore either, but I still hear it.”

“Actually,” Charlie said. “Black is passé. You are now an African-American.”

“Charlie,” Leonard said. “You can kiss my woolly black African-American ass.”

We got transportation to Cancun up the way, flew out of there that afternoon, caught another flight in Mexico City, then headed to Houston Intercontinental. Veil didn't go with us. Next thing we knew he was gone. We neither saw nor heard him slip out. He was at the airport with us one moment, then he wasn't.

It didn't worry me. That's the way he operated. Showed up when you needed him, disappeared like the Lone Ranger. Or the Patched Ranger in this case.

Veil had his own agenda.

The flight from Cancun made me sick. It was a prop. It was all we could get. It bucked and weaved and threatened to strike the ground. Out of Mexico City it was a jet and a better flight.

Charlie and Leonard sat together, along with a red-faced man in a plaid jacket that liked to talk. I could hear him all the way in the back of the plane where I sat next to Jim Bob. Or almost next. The seat between us was empty. It was occupied by Jim Bob's hat.

I talked to Jim Bob about the events that led up to Beatrice's death. I figured I owed him as much of an explanation as possible, considering he'd left his hogs at home with a farmhand and had come all the way down to Mexico to help spring us.

I said, "They let us off easy as they did, I guess they feel certain we didn't do it? You talked to them. Do they have any idea who did it?"

"No. They sort of like your blond friend for it, but they don't sound real convinced. I speak damn good Spanish, amigo, and believe me I quizzed them. I'm always curious, even if it isn't any of my business. Especially if it isn't any of my business. They just think you guys are gringo assholes down there for Mexican poontang. They think Beatrice was whoring. Did you know she was a call girl?"

"What?"

"That's right. An expensive one. Or at least had been."

"Are you positive?"

"According to them. They say they knew her. But, keep in mind, those boys might lie to an old cowboy."

"Drugstore cowboy."

"Hogs may not be cattle, but they got to be tended to."

"I can't believe it."

"Really, hogs are a lot of work."

"I mean about Beatrice."

"Oh, well, as I said, that's what I was told. Said she usually worked pretty high-end, but in the last few years they hadn't heard from her. Then this. They think she tried to pull a trick, pick up a little extra, got the wrong man, someone who wanted more than a ride in the tunnel, and he did her in."

"Did they say why?"

"Because he wanted to. Bad hombre."

"So they don't really think Billy did it?"

"Being honest, I'm not sure what they think."

"Yeah, they were fairly inscrutable."

"I hate to perpetuate a stereotype, but those fellas were about as crooked as a dog's hind leg. Enough money and they'd think Walt Disney did it."

"He's dead."

"See what I mean."

"I guess it could have happened that way. But it would have been just what Beatrice feared. This Juan Miguel."

"Yeah. It could have been revenge against her father."

"What I'd like to know is where in hell was Ferdinand."

"The police would like to know too. That way they could pistol-whip him and have him explain a few things. I reckon you guys weren't Americans, you'd have gotten the bad end of a rubber hose. Irritating the American consulate, though, is not something they like. Pees in the tourist water."

"Ferdinand took off? That seems odd, considering what happened to his daughter."

"Maybe he could see the handwriting on the wall, Hap. He knew this Juan Miguel would want him next, and him being killed wasn't going to bring his daughter back, so he took off in his boat."

I stewed over these revelations the rest of the way to Houston. At the airport, we caught a shuttle to airport parking. We rode back to LaBorde in Jim Bob's near-thirty-year-old, blood-red Cadillac, festooned with curb feelers. Inside, fuzzy dice and baby shoes dangled from the mirror, and on the windshield were silhouettes of dogs and people with slash marks through them.

"You fix this car up like this?" Leonard said. "Or is it some kind of punishment you got to bear?"

"This sonofabitch can outrun the Concorde," Jim Bob said.

"But does it stay on the ground?" Leonard asked.

"Sometimes," Jim Bob said.

"Jim Bob," Leonard said. "Thy middle name is class."

"Veil ride down with you guys?" I asked.

"Nope," Charlie said. "I called him, and he just sort of showed up at the jailhouse in Mexico. How long you known that guy?"

"Long enough," I said. "I don't see him that often, but trust me, he's aces with me."

"Seems it's the same with him," Charlie said. "I called him like you said, said you were in trouble, and he didn't even wait to find out what kind of trouble. He said, Yes, and where is he?"

"He's kind of an asshole, actually," Leonard said. "But he's an asshole worth having on your side."

"You're an asshole," Charlie said.

"I know," Leonard said.

"You too," Charlie said to me.

"I know."

"Don't even say it, Charlie," Jim Bob said.

21

We arrived in LaBorde just after dark, dropped Leonard off at John's house. When John opened the door he let out a yell. They embraced. With his arm around John's shoulders, Leonard turned and waved at us. John waved too. As they went inside a shape low to the ground came out of the dark, waddled into the light.

Bob the armadillo. The critter followed them inside while Leonard held the door open.

"Now that's weird," Jim Bob said.

"His name is Bob," I said. "He likes vanilla cookies, slow walks in the rain, and he doesn't carry leprosy like many armadillos."

Through the open door I could see warm yellow light and there was the sound of classical music playing.

Leonard closed the door.

I rolled up the window and we rode on.

My place was dark as a hit man's plans. Even in the dead of summer, it looked cold. When I got out of the car—the Red Bitch, Jim Bob called it—I could smell the stench of charred wood from the apartment below. Upstairs, where I lived, seemed like the place where a body ought to be laid out on a cooling board. My pickup was parked in the yard. No one had stolen it. No insurance money for me. No new transportation. Just this piece of shit.

"You guys don't stay up too late watching movies and spitting water," I said.

"Piss off," Charlie said, rolled up his window, and away they went.

He may have quit smoking, but late at night, or when he was tired, he grew kind of irritable.

I didn't have my key. I realized it when I was halfway up the stairs. No problem. I trooped downstairs, found the spare I keep in a metal box under a brick, went up, unlocked my door, and went inside.

The place smelled stale as an old maid's closet.

I turned on the light.

No dog jumped up to greet me.

Brett didn't come out of the back room in a negligee.

A small spider scrabbled across the floor, perhaps in greeting.

I stepped on it.

A few roaches were scuttling about in the kitchen. Making a sandwich perhaps.

I sat down at my kitchen table.

I got up and locked the door.

I sat down at the table again.

A roach darted out of the corner, stopped about three feet away. Perhaps he thought this was his home now and I was an intruder. He finally got tired of trying to stare me down, rushed away.

I noticed there were rat turds next to the refrigerator. I wondered if rats would use a sandbox like a cat. I wondered if I could train them. It was nice to know these were just average-sized rats. Not like the ones in the Mexican jail that could be saddled.

At least I hoped they were average size. Maybe the Mexican rats had flown in with us, ridden in Jim Bob's trunk and had hustled into my house when I arrived.

Maybe I needed a lot of rest.

I got a diet cola out of the fridge. I didn't have an ice maker either.

I sat down at the table again.

I drank half the soda.

No roaches came back out to see me.

I didn't really want to think about rats anymore.

I was never going to have an ice maker.

It was tough having all these important things to think about.

I went to bed.

I was so tired, disappointed, and low on self-esteem, I couldn't even manage enough energy to abuse myself.

Next morning I lay in bed for a while and thought about that poor girl in the hospital, wounded by some nut for no reason. I thought about Beatrice, and I felt weak and lonely, like a pine straw being buffeted by the ocean. Lately I was having a lot of those thoughts, feeling my mortality. Realizing more strongly than ever before that I had lived more life than I had left, and I wasn't liking that revelation at all.

I often told myself I didn't mind aging, but now I found myself constantly wishing I was young and that I could do it all over again, and differently.

Wished my hip didn't hurt so bad, that all those places where my ribs were broken had not been broken. When I was young my fight injuries, received while defending myself, or just because I shot my mouth off when I shouldn't, were a badge of honor. Now the badges hurt. The pins that held them to me were buried in my hide too deep and time was causing them to go deeper. The badges were feeling heavy as anvils; they were tugging at the pins; they weren't worth wearing.

I got up slowly, twisting gingerly to make cracking noises come from my back, hip, knees, and ankles. I felt like something made of Tinkertoys, but screwed down way too tight and somehow rotten at the center, fearing that if I turned just a little too far in one direction the whole of me might come undone.

While I was brewing coffee, I noticed the light blinking on my answering machine. I looked at it, saw it registered five messages.

I listened to them. A couple were phone sales. But three of them were from Brett. Two supported the first. The first I played over three times so I could hear her voice.

"Hap. This is Brett. You know what, life sucks if you let it. I've been letting it. No more feeling sorry for myself. My daughter is going to turn tricks if I want her to or not. I'm thinking about getting a new puppy and a wax job. One or the other. Or maybe I'll get a puppy and give that little scooter a wax job. Give me a call. Better yet, come by and see me. Bring your dick."

Pure Brett. I was at a stage in my life where I really hoped it was more me she wanted to see than the dick. Though, like all males, I could tolerate that part if I had to. No arm twisting necessary.

While my coffee brewed I looked for something to eat, but there was only spoiled milk and moldy bread. I put the bag of bread and the plastic milk carton in the trash.

I showered, dressed, poured up a cup of coffee, went down to my car and out of there.

I went by a little café and bought some biscuits and bacon, drank their coffee. I drove to the hospital then, went up to where Sarah Bond still had a room.

I didn't know if I was allowed or not, but I opened the door and slipped in. She was asleep. She didn't have as many tubes and wires in her this time, but she looked only marginally better. Her face was pale as Lazarus before Jesus raised him. She was still patched and taped up. Only a little of her face showed. I reached over, patted her hand, and went out.

As I walked down the hall to the elevator, I thought about what Leonard had told me once. About how things didn't happen for a reason, they just happened. And he was right. But Sarah being attacked, me trying to help her, had set a series of events in motion.

I wondered if things would have been different for Beatrice had I not come along. Maybe I shouldn't have cut that fishing line, put her and Billy at odds with one another. I could have let her do what she wanted to do, as distasteful as it might be to me. She might have gotten her money if I had. Might have paid her bills and spared her life.

I wondered if Brett was on duty. We had met in this hospital. It was a very romantic memory. She had stuck a needle in my ass.

I went down to the desk and asked. She wasn't on duty, still worked the night shift. Of course, I knew that. I was just hoping against hope. I drove over to her place.

The yard was ripe with sunburned brown grass, and a lawn chair had been gathered up and near turned over by the foliage. It was as if the lawn had grassy hands and it was using them to tip the chair.

I went up and knocked on the door. Gently at first.

No answer.

Less gently.

I heard someone moving behind the door.

I hoped it wouldn't be some man.

That would certainly be a disappointment.

Brett opened the door. She was wearing an oversized T-shirt and slippers made like bears. Her red hair was wadded around her face. She smiled slightly, said, "Well, if it isn't Hap Collins. Come on in."

"I've missed you," I said.

"You sure you haven't just missed what's between my legs."

Brett was like that, vulgar, to the point. Being Gilmer High School Sweet Tater Queen some many years ago hadn't gone to her head.

"I missed that too," I said. "I was thinking maybe that's all you missed about me."

"Well, I missed what was between your legs, Hap, but there's plenty of that around."

"Oh, good. Now I feel better."

"I finally think I've got my head on straight. Killing people can kind of dig itself in deep, like a tick. I think I pulled off the body but the head's still in me."

"That's one way of putting it."

"You don't have some other floozy you're porkin' do you?"

"No. But God how I've tried."

"There hasn't been anyone else, Hap. Not for me."

"Well, there has been someone else, but … that's over."

"Wasn't the same as with you and me, was it?"

"Nothing is. Also, she's dead."

"That'll kill a relationship, all right. Sorry I said that. Are you still sad about it?"

"Darlin', I'm always sad about something."

"Sit down, sweetie, tell me all about it. I haven't had breakfast.

Want some? Breakfast, I mean."

"Just ate. But I'll drink coffee with you."

Brett clanged some stuff around, came back with a piece of toast for herself, poured us coffee. We sat down at the table. She put one hand on my leg.

"I really have missed you," she said.

"Same."

"I know about how you saved that girl. You saved my girl too, Hap. You saved me. You're always trying to save somebody. Everybody but yourself. You ever think about that?"

"Sometimes."

"I don't want you to think I didn't appreciate what you did for me and my daughter."

"I admit, I wondered. I shouldn't. That isn't the way you're supposed to be. You do something with the best of intentions, it's supposed to be with the best of intentions and nothing else. But I did wonder. Leonard chastised me for it."

"Leonard's a mutant."

"That must be it."

"The rest of us wonder about those kinds of things. Hap, it isn't that I'm ungrateful. Or that I don't love you. I adore you. It's just that I've been a little lost. Tillie went right back to takin' strokes for money."

"Yeah. You told me."

"Can you believe that?"

"Leonard said she would."

"Again, Mr. Know-It-All."

"I get to thinking he's so smart, what in hell is he doin' hangin' around with me?"

Brett laughed. I loved that laugh. It was rich and smoky.

"Tillie may not have changed like I hoped," she said, "but I like to think she's safer. As safe as anyone can be in that business."

"I hope so, Brett."

"You know I went to the Gilmer Yamboree this year. I told you I rode a float there once. When I was a teenager."

“Yep. You were Sweet Tater Queen. I’ve seen the photographs. The float is a giant sweet potato. As I recall, you told me you thought it looked like a giant turd.”

“That’s right. And you know what, they didn’t even have a goddamn sweet tater over there this year. Not even as a float.”

“Modernization, what you gonna do? Everybody’s eatin’ McDonald’s french fries. There’s people don’t even know you don’t make french fries out of sweet taters.”

“Actually, you can,” Brett said, “but they don’t taste right. But, shit, you’d think they could find a sweet potato somewhere … Hap, this woman. The one who’s dead. Did you love her?”

“No. I didn’t love her.”

“Do you want to tell me about her?”

“Maybe not just now.”

“You want to leave this shitty coffee and go sweat up the sheets?”

“Boy, do I.”

I guess it was about a week later. Me and Brett had taken to living with one another, and it was working out fine. She had gotten neither puppy nor wax job nor waxed puppy. She did let me shave her pubic hair, however, and I liked that.

We had her daughter, the whore, visit from Tyler. She had dinner with us. Tillie decided she was going to spend the rest of her time taking the basic courses at Tyler Community College, turning tricks less and less. Perhaps a career as a brain surgeon was in her future.

Or maybe she just wanted to learn how to count up her trick money better at the end of the day; run her own whorehouse.

Brett’s son, Jimmy, had finally gotten rid of his Christian Scientist girlfriend. Or rather fate had gotten rid of her for him. She died. Should have had that kidney checked when it first acted up. But she believed in the power of prayer. Her God, however, had other plans. So Jimmy was free. And doing better. Had gone on a bender to Mexico, Brett said. Came home with a box of Chiclets, a sombrero, and a dose of the clap. Nothing penicillin couldn’t clean up. He was no longer teaching Aikido; having gotten beaten up in Mexico he decided he needed more lessons.

Anyway, Brett and I were together again. She had only one new rule for me, having doled it out after I had told a friend she was nursing. I was told to say she was a nurse and never say she was nursing. Brett thought it sounded like she was wet-nursing a baby.

“Could I just say you’re nursing me?” I asked.

“No, you cannot.”

Me and Leonard were back to work at the chicken plant. We were happy as people can be protecting chickens. I learned to never make friends with incoming chickens. Under the circumstances, even a chicken knew it was insincere. You could see it in their eyes, way they held their heads.

One afternoon before Brett and I went to work, we went over to my apartment to start cleaning it out. I had decided at the end of the month to let it go. I had pretty much moved in with Brett anyway. We were talking about marriage and a different house that we might rent, or even buy. Some place big enough to hold all our things and anything else that might come to us. I was seriously thinking about trying to start a real career. As always I was stalled on knowing exactly what. I thought about President of the United States for a couple hours, but I didn’t really want to move out of East Texas. Astronaut was an idea, but considering I disliked flying any more than I had to, I had to rule that out. Plantation owner was another thought. But I didn’t have any land or money and Leonard wasn’t the butler type, so I had to dismiss that. I thought about what was most likely. I kept coming up with chicken plant guard.

It was depressing.

I was thinking more and more about Charlie and Hanson, their offer to work for them.

At my place me and Brett cleaned out the refrigerator, tossing stuff in the trash, packing up the good stuff to take over to her place. There was a lot more trash than good stuff.

While we were at it, Charlie came by.

The door to my place was open. I had quit running the air conditioner, trying to save money. It was a time of the year when it was starting to cool down a little. Nothing to get excited about. No igloos were about to go up. We were merely having a mild streak.

Charlie came in and took off his hat. He smiled. I knew it wasn't for me. It was for Brett. She was wearing white shorts and her pale lightly freckled legs were a wonderful thing to see. Her bright red hair was cut so that it fell around her face like a feathered helmet. She had on a loose top and no bra. She was one of the few older women I knew who could get away with that, though it was her claim her days as a swinging tit were almost over.

"Hey, Charlie," she said.

"Hey, Brett. Good God, woman. What do you see in this man?"

"I don't know," she said.

Charlie and I shook hands. Charlie said, "I've come by a few times, but haven't caught you."

"I'm mostly at Brett's," I said.

"I'm glad to see you two back together. How's Leonard?"

"He's good. We only see each other at work these days. He's got John and I've got Brett."

"Good for both of you. Me, not so good. I got Hanson. We're putting together our agency, you know?"

"That's right," I said. "Got clients yet?"

"Not really. We're not quite ready. I've been enjoying my retirement till the money runs out. I been lookin' for you because I wanted to thank you for payin' the money back from the Mexico thing."

"You're welcome. I owed it. You saved my bacon. You're lucky I had some money and could pay it back in one chunk."

"I'd have liked to let it go, but …"

"Don't be ridiculous."

"I can make some coffee, Charlie," Brett said. "We were thinking about having some."

"That would be nice."

Charlie sat on the couch, put his porkpie hat on the armrest.

"You're moving out?"

"I am."

"Well, that kind of log-jams the other reason I came by."

"And that is?" I asked.

"I wanted to see I could stay here one night soon, So I could have my trailer painted. And boy, does it need it. I bought it off a couple had a bunch of kids. They must have wiped shit on the walls, way that place stank. I got some cheap new furniture in storage. Been sleeping on a pallet. It's killing my back. I was gonna do the painting myself, but I'm a shitty painter. Fact is, I'm bringing in painters to repaint what I fucked up. I started trying to do it, but a brain-damaged chimpanzee could have done a better job. Thing is, the smell. Not just from the kids, but the new paint. Man, I can't take it. I thought about staying with Hanson, but his wife doesn't like me. I thought I'd ask you. That doesn't work out, I can ask John and Leonard. I thought it just being you it would be easier, but I see it isn't just you anymore. And you're moving out."

"Well, Hanson's wife just doesn't know your charm," Brett said.

"Yeah, charming, that's my goddamned middle name."

"I hear you, honey," Brett said. "When they were passing out ass, I thought they said class, and I asked for a lot of it. And I got it."

"It looks all right to me," Charlie said.

"I'm not complaining," Brett said. "It sure beats being bony when you fall on it."

I said, "I've got another week or two on this place, Charlie. You can stay here. I'm stayin' at Brett's, so you'd have it to yourself. I can leave the coffee, any of this food you want. Though the rotten stuff might not be too appetizing."

"No. That's all right. Well, just the coffee."

"Not a problem."

I gave him my spare key.

"I can start tonight?"

"Sure," I said. "I've spent my last night here."

22

As I GROW OLDER, my belief in a higher power has not only disintegrated, it's become negative. As my lawyer friend Veil once said, "If there's a God, let him explain babies with AIDS."

I think about the silliness of it. This whole God thing. Two teams praying before a football game. Not to get injured is all right, but they're also praying to win. As if the Wildcats are more in God's favor to win a fuckin' football game than the Beavers.

How does God judge that? Best-looking cheerleaders? Quarterback with the best hairdo? Linebacker with the biggest dick? What's the criteria on that?

In other words, what the hell was God's plan for doing what he did to me and mine?

So, here's what happened. I'm trucking along happy-like. Living with Brett. Playing house. Eating good. Going to work at the chicken plant. Not exactly the life of a high roller, but like the GED, the Good Enough Diploma that's almost a high school diploma, I had a Good Enough Life, which was almost like a real one.

One morning after I got off work, I drove over to my place to tell Charlie if he needed a few days more, he had them. Until the end of the month actually. On that date, the landlord, a real shithead of a guy, was going to level the apartment and put the property up for sale.

I drove over there. Charlie's car was in the yard. I parked next to it, started up the stairs. When I reached the top I saw the door was splintered at the frame. The door itself hung slightly open.

I felt a cold chill get hold of the short hairs on my neck and shake them. I felt a tightening in my stomach, a shrinking of my testicles.

I still had on my guard outfit, including gun, so I pulled the revolver, a .38, and went on up, thinking, Good God, don't let that motherfucker I fought at the chicken plant be up here. Anything but that.

I don't know exactly why that came to mind, but that was my first thought. He had escaped, was looking for me, had gnawed a hole through the jail bars with his goddamn teeth, and now he was waiting to leap on my head, bite my skull, and suck out my brain.

I eased up to the door frame, listened. Off in the distance I heard a kid yell and a dog bark. I gingerly pushed the door completely open.

Inside the apartment the only sound was a drip from the sink.

I slipped inside. It was a little dark. The blinds were drawn, but it wasn't a place a person could hide, unless he was a leprechaun or the Invisible Man. I pointed the revolver around just for the hell of it. I called Charlie's name.

He didn't answer.

I was reminded of something else.

The hotel room in Mexico. The bed with Beatrice on it.

All of a sudden the apartment seemed like a place I'd never been and didn't want to be. The ceiling was too low, the walls too close. I thought the floor might tilt up and drop me off the edge of the world.

I called Charlie's name again, this time real loud. Just for good luck I cocked back the hammer on the .38.

As I moved inside my feet bogged in something wet on the carpet. I lifted them. They were sticky. The carpet was like the carpet of an old theater gummy with spilled soft drinks and smashed candies.

The carpet only partially covered the living room. The rest was wooden floor, and parts of it were coated in something congealed. It had seeped out from behind the couch. My nostrils quivered with the stench of it; sort of road kill meets dried copper baking slowly in a smutty oven.

I put one knee on the couch and leaned over and looked down.

There was a burst of blackness that struck me in the face, sent me stumbling back, swatting.

Flies.

I took a breath, put a knee on the couch, and looked over again. Now I knew why Charlie hadn't answered. You can't yell loud enough for someone in that state to hear.

Charlie lay behind the couch. He wore only jockey shorts. His throat had been cut. But before that he had been worked on. He was missing some teeth. His nose and cheeks had been cut on, as if whittled. He wore an expression that seemed to say, "Oh, shit." His hands were tied behind his back with strips of one of my sheets or maybe a pillowcase.

The flies were settling on him again.

I couldn't help myself. I let out a little bark of pain and fear and bounced off the couch.

I wiped my feet on a dry part of the carpet. I was trembling so bad I thought I was literally going to shake my gun belt off.

I started to back out of the doorway, but I gathered up my courage. It was like trying to gather up ten pounds of yarn and poke it in a two-pound basket. But I did it. I went to the bedroom. Opened the door and yelled. I don't know why I yelled. To scare whoever might be in there. To encourage myself. Hard to say.

The bed was blood-drenched. The stench in there was strong enough to grow legs and dance up the wall. There was a bloody handprint on the wall. As if someone had leaned there, tired from his work. Or maybe Charlie broke free, pushed his attacker back, forcing him to put out a hand to keep from falling.

But whoever it had been was fast enough to catch up with a wounded man. And he had. And he had cut Charlie's throat.

As for the handprint, it was huge.

A little suitcase sat on its side by my chair. On the chair were Charlie's clothes, a Hawaiian shirt draped over the back of it. The shirt pictured a bursting sunset against a blue-green sea, bordered by palm trees and a strip of beach. On the seat of the chair, on top of his gray slacks, was his porkpie hat. Beside the chair, his Dr. Scholl's shoes with black and red clocked socks sticking out of them like tired tongues.

I eased the rest of the way into the room and looked around. I even bent down and looked under the bed. Lots of cobwebs. I opened the closet door.

Empty, except for a dead beetle.

I took a deep breath. I checked out the bathroom.

I pulled back the shower curtain.

Nothing.

I holstered my gun, went to the front room, picked up the phone, called Leonard first. I don't know why, but things go wrong, I call him. It's a wonder I don't call him when I have a hangnail. When I explained, he said, "Goddamn. Godalmightydamn. Charlie? You're sure?"

"I'm sure."

"You're absolutely sure."

"He's behind the goddamn couch, Leonard. He's cut up. It's him. I'd let you talk to him, but he's dead. Dead, goddamn it."

"Easy. I'm coming over … You all right, Hap?"

"Peachy."

I dialed 911 next, told the police who I was, gave them the address and details.

I went outside, took off my gun belt, put it on the front seat of my car. I didn't want any gun-happy cops popping me.

I sat down on the bottom step of the apartment and took in long, slow breaths. I was away from the stench of blood, but I could still smell it. I felt as if it had soaked into my skin. In the distance I could hear a siren. More than one.

Then I really began to think about who was upstairs. My good buddy, Charlie. I thought about what had occurred, how horrible it had been, and that it must have been meant for me.

As I've pointed out, I'm not exactly a lucky man. But I did get a bit of luck. The head honcho on the case knew me. His name was Jake. I had met him several times but I could never remember his last name. He had been a patrol cop when I first met him. He was a detective now. Part of that was due to Charlie leaving, opening up a position. He and Charlie had been friends.

He was a big dark-haired guy with a belly made pregnant by too many beers and not enough exercise. He had a naturally sad face, and today it was sadder. He wore a very nice suit and very nice shoes. I found myself looking at his shoes a lot. I didn't like the fact I was all teary-eyed. Even under such circumstances one tries to be macho. It's expected.

We were leaning on my car, talking. I was giving him the poop I knew. Which, of course, was limited. I didn't mention the Mexico thing. I knew I should have. I even knew they were connected, but right then I didn't mention it.

Leonard drove up. The cops didn't want to let him see me, but Jake signaled him through.

"You okay, brother?" Leonard said.

"I suppose," I said. "I'm not exactly up for Pancho's Mexican buffet, but I guess I'll make it."

One of the blue suits came over, said, "There's a handprint in blood on the bathroom wall. It's big. If the rest of that motherfucker goes with the hand he'll be just a little smaller than a Tyrannosaurus rex."

"You getting prints?"

"I'm just a blue suit, like you used to be, Jake, but I thought of that. We do that when we do police work. We take photographs and try not to step in stuff."

"All right, all right," Jake said. "I get you."

"Did I say this motherfucker is big?" the blue suit said. "I mean big."

"You said he was big," Jake said.

"He's so big he hurts my feelings. I wear like a size eight shoe. Everyone's bigger than me, but this motherfucker, he's bigger than everyone else."

"We get the point," Jake said. "Go supervise. Get a doughnut. Something. You're gettin' on my nerves."

"Now that you're a detective I get on your nerves."

"Ned, you always got on my nerves."

Ned went away. Jake said, "You have no idea why this happened?"

"I think whoever it was was looking for me," I said. "Charlie was in the wrong place at the wrong time. It could have been robbery. They wanted something I didn't have. I had moved most of my stuff out. Disappointed, they took it out on Charlie. It could have been like that."

"Could be that way," Jake said. "But before you said robbery, you said they were looking for you. You kind of tacked that on, like maybe you wished you hadn't said the first part. Why would they be looking for you?"

"I live here. Charlie isn't normally here. Maybe someone had a grudge and came to settle it."

"What I know about you guys, lots of people could have grudges. You got any names of these grudge holders?"

"You'll need a computer," Leonard said.

"Yeah, but I can't think of anyone who would do this," I said.

"So no one comes to mind?" Jake said.

I shook my head. "No. Not really."

"What about you, Leonard? You know Hap well. Anyone you can think of would want him dead."

Leonard put his arm around my shoulder. "No."

"And Charlie was here why?"

"He was going to stay a couple nights while his trailer was painted."

"You wouldn't hold back anything, would you, Hap?"

"I don't think I am."

"That's not quite an answer either way."

"No, it isn't, Jake. I'm a little rattled right now. You'll have to forgive me. I just found a good friend with his throat cut. Tends to make a man tense and a little confused."

"Hey, he was my friend too," Jake said.

"I know."

"You called Leonard, obviously. I don't suppose you called and told Hanson. They were like brothers, you know."

"I do know," I said. "No. I didn't call Hanson."

"I'll take care of that. You got some place to go?"

"I'm staying with my girlfriend. Brett Sawyer."

"He'll be with me for a while," Leonard said. "You know my address."

"Who in law enforcement doesn't?" Jake said.

"I can give you my boyfriend's address too."

"Oh. Well …"

"Forgot I was queer, didn't you?"

"Bingo. You just don't … I don't know …"

"Act queer?"

"Well, yeah."

"Guess what? Some of us don't wear feather boas. But just so you don't feel all confused, me and John, sometimes we hold hands and kiss and I did give him a little promise ring."

"Man, I don't want to hear that," Jake said. "Your boyfriend's address isn't necessary. Give me Brett's address, Hap, and go. I need to ask any more questions, I'll look you up."

I gave him the address, started to get in my car.

Jake said, "I assume the gun on the seat goes with the guard uniform?"

"Goddamn, you are a detective," I said. I was trying to come across as cool and calm and still ripe with humor, but the words came out flat and a little desperate. It's funny the way men try to be men.

"Follow me to my place," Leonard said. "We can talk."

When we got to John's, and Leonard explained what happened, John immediately put a pot of water on the stove. Leonard once told me when things get tense, first thing John did was heat water and make tea.

"Motherfucker thinks he's from England," Leonard said.

"Tea is soothing," John said. "I've got some cookies. Vanilla, of course."

"You put ice in tea," Leonard said. "Anything else is un-American. Besides, I like milk with vanilla cookies. We got the wafers or the ones with the creme in the middle?"

"Like it matters to you," John said. "Vanilla cookies with shit in the center would be all right for you. Long as they're vanilla."

We sat at the table while the water heated. Leonard said, "You didn't mention Mexico to Jake."

"No, I didn't. And you didn't either."

"You thought Jake didn't need to know, I couldn't see any reason to mention it. But it's too much like Mexico to be coincidence."

John poured hot water into cups with tea bags in them. He said, "May I ask why you didn't tell the police? You want the killer caught, of course."

"I want his ass. I want it personally. Beatrice was a fool, but she was all right at the center. She didn't deserve to die and then have it all swept under the rug. I left that to the Mexican police. Obviously, it didn't work out. I don't think it'll ever work out. I been thinking about that. Me just going off to let it work out in whatever manner it worked out. It's in my craw."

"Frankly," Leonard said, "it's in my craw too. She and her old man did help us when we needed it."

"Damn right. And Charlie, he was a good friend. He was staying at my place and was killed because whoever did this thought it was me. I want to get even."

"Doesn't that violate your kinder and gentler nature you're trying to preserve?"

"It does. And I want to find out why anyone would want to kill me. What the hell could I know or have that would interest them?"

"I think it's more like what they think you know or have," Leonard said.

"Another thing," John said. "Wouldn't it be best to tell the cops? Just for one simple reason."

"Which is?"

"They might actually catch him. I mean, come on, from what Leonard's told me about you two guys, about the only thing you can catch is a cold."

"Hey," Leonard said. "We stumble around long enough, we get what we want."

“Think about this,” John said. “Guy’s out there running around right now. You think he came all this way just to break down a door, kill Charlie, catch a plane back to Mexico?”

“Well, no,” I said.

“He could have thought you were Charlie,” Leonard said. “He somehow knew a Hap Collins was involved with Beatrice, and for whatever reason he killed her, he connects you to it, comes to kill you, gets poor Charlie, thinks his job is done, and goes home.”

“Bless Charlie,” John said. “Could be just that. But don’t you think at some point in the torture, Charlie would have been inclined to tell this big man who he was, and maybe where you were?”

“He’d done to me what he did to Charlie,” I said, “I’d have told him anything he wanted to know. I’d have sucked his goddamn dick and given him a shoeshine. I don’t see how Charlie could have kept from it.”

“Brett,” Leonard said.

“Shit,” I said.

“You stay here,” Leonard said to John.

“And why is that?”

“Because you’re the bitch in this relationship.”

We were on our way out the door when John said, “Piss on you, Leonard. You male chauvinist pig.”

“But you’re male too,” Leonard said. “So how can that be male chauvinistic? Oh, shit, they could be looking for me as well. I mean, it could be that way, right?”

“They know about me, they may know about you,” I said.

“That means they might come after me, and John’s here.”

“You are not leaving my sweet ass behind then,” John said.

Leonard rushed to his closet, took out his shotgun, plucked a few shells from an overhead shelf. We hustled over to Brett’s in John’s car, and before I got in I got my gun out of my pickup.

That morning, when I had left to go over to Charlie’s, it was my plan to drop in on him and take him to coffee. Take some coffee and doughnuts back to Brett. She had pulled a hard shift the night before and was sleeping late. I thought it would be a nice surprise. But my plans might actually have put Brett in the line of destruction.

When we pulled up in Brett's yard, the lawn chair was still wrapped in grass and the front door was intact.

Of course, our man could have come through the back door.

I got out with my revolver in my hand, Leonard behind me with the shotgun held against his leg. John kept close to Leonard. He was carrying a fistful of shotgun shells, just in case our enemies came in waves.

John said, "That lawn chair. That's one of ours."

"That's nice," Leonard said.

"Circa nineteen ninety-five. We don't make them like that anymore."

"It's a fuckin' antique," Leonard said. "Now shut up."

I used my key and went in.

Everything looked like it always did.

I hurried to the bedroom, my stomach sour with fear.

Brett was in bed with the covers under her chin. She was snoring in a very unladylike fashion. I sighed, glanced up at a whirling shadow. It was her panties hanging from the slowly rotating overhead fan. That was my signal to wake her. Waking her was always worthwhile.

I gently patted her and went out, closed the door, sat down on the living room couch. Leonard sat down beside me, the shotgun draped across his knees.

"I feel drained," I said.

"Understandable," John said. "I'll find a pot and boil some water. Uh … Brett does have tea, doesn't she?"

Leonard looked at me, said, "See?"

About twenty minutes later, Brett came out of her bedroom. We were sitting on the couch sipping tea. We turned to look at her. She was wearing a half T-shirt that covered the tops of her breasts. She wasn't wearing panties.

She looked at us. We looked at her.

“Well,” she said, “ain’t this a fine howdy-do? You on the couch, and me dressed like Huckleberry Hound. I hope you’ll excuse me.”

She turned, showing us her ass, and disappeared back into the bedroom. She came out a moment later with shorts on. As she came into the room, she said, “You know, it’s hard to act cool when you’ve just shown three men your beaver and found your underwear dangling from an overhead fan.”

“Sorry,” I said.

“If it helps any,” Leonard said, “me and John go for dicks.”

“And I’ve seen it before,” I said.

“Well now … Is there still some tea?”

“There is,” John said. “I’ll fix you up.”

“A gal shows off her canoe, even if it’s by accident, you’d hope someone thought it was worth riding in.”

“I didn’t say I wasn’t interested,” I said. “I’m very interested.”

“It looked very nice,” Leonard said. “I guess. I mean, I don’t really know what all of that’s about, you know.”

“You mean you’re still queer? Sight of me didn’t jerk you into a heterosexual frame of mind?”

“ ‘Fraid not,” Leonard said.

“But if anyone could,” John said, “I’m sure it would be you.”

“Thank you, John. I’ll cherish that. May I ask what I owe the joy of this gathering to? I’m kind of surprised you didn’t fix me breakfast, Hap. I figured a fuckin’ like I gave you last night ought to at least warrant toast and coffee. Good God, all three of you have the longest goddamn faces.”

“Actually, I went out for doughnuts, but I got de-toured.”

“Have I faded from your thoughts that quickly.”

“There’s been something come up. Charlie.”

“Is he in the bathroom? Now he’s a hetero. He would have respected my entrance. I can tell by the way he looks at me with my clothes on, he would have loved a view of the canyon. Last I heard, he wasn’t gettin’ any, so that might make me look even better.”

"If he were in the bathroom, he'd be horrified at what he missed," I said. "But he's not. And that's why we're glum. Hon, Charlie's dead."

"What?"

I told her the story. I told her the background.

"I'll be damned. I can't believe it. Charlie's dead."

"Yeah. It's hard to believe."

"We just saw him yesterday."

"I put you in danger, Brett. I didn't even know I did it. Somehow, sorry doesn't seem like enough to say. I don't know what would be enough."

"You didn't know this was going to happen. No way you could have. It doesn't matter. You didn't do it on purpose."

"On purpose or not, this monster might have shown up here. I don't like to think about that. Seems you and me get together there's always trouble."

"You and anybody get together it's trouble," Leonard said.

"Jesus, poor Charlie," Brett said. "He was such a nice guy."

"That's right," I said, "he was."

"And you didn't tell the cops about what happened in Mexico?" Brett asked.

"I didn't."

"That means you plan to settle it, doesn't it?"

"I plan to try."

"Which means, of course, that Leonard will try with you."

"I've dragged Leonard into enough shit."

"Oh, shut the fuck up," Leonard said.

"You're the one complains," I said.

"Yeah, I complain. But you know well as I do, they're doin' it to you, they're doin' it to me, brother."

"But they're not doing it to me," John said. "I don't like the idea of you doing this, Leonard. You said you were backing off doing things with Hap."

"I tried," Leonard said. "I can't help myself. It's like we're Siamese twins or something."

"I don't want you to do it," John said.

"I love you," Leonard said. "But Hap's family."

"What the hell am I?"

"Family. But Hap and I had a relationship first. Do I chunk that out now just because I love you? What's that say about me? About my feelings toward Hap?"

"I don't know, Leonard," John said. "What does it say?"

"It says I've got to take care of my brother. That's what it says."

"But he isn't your brother. If you haven't noticed, he's not as dark as you are."

"I don't tan well," I said.

"Look, John," Leonard said. "It hasn't got a damn thing to do with genetics. It's got to do with spirit."

"Spirit. That's rich."

"I'm closer to Hap than I am my own kin. He's done more for me than any relative. He's been there when I needed him. He's stood by me through thick and thin. I can't just throw that out."

"I appreciate it," I said. "But you know what? Things do have to change. You've talked about it more than once. We're not getting any younger. It's time we settled down. It's time you settled down right now. Maybe," and I looked at Brett, "when this is all over, I can do the same."

"I understand," Brett said. "You do what you got to do, Hap."

"I don't see how you can say that, Brett," John said.

"Hap's done for me what no one would. I wanted something from him that was dangerous, and he did it without question … I fear for him, John. But I stand by him. I want to help too."

John sighed loudly. He got up and went to the bathroom.

I said, "Leonard. I know you'll do what it takes, my friend. But John, you don't want to lose him. I've never seen you happier. And I'm a goddamn jinx."

"Yes you are," Leonard said. "Shit, man. What a fucked-up thing. Charlie, he was all right."

John came out of the bathroom. He went over and sat on the couch. He said, “Leonard. I love you. I don’t want you to do this. I’m afraid you’ll be hurt. But … I love you no matter what. You do this thing, I’ll be waiting when you get back. But I can’t do it with you. I’m not like Brett. I can’t help. I can’t break the law. I can’t do anything like that. It just isn’t in me.”

“I understand that,” Leonard said. “Never expected you to. I don’t like it either. But it’s got to happen.”

“No it doesn’t. You could still tell the police.”

“And we might,” I said. “I just want to look into it a little first. Find out what I can. It looks to be something I think the police can solve, or will solve, then I’ll tell them what I know.”

“Why wouldn’t they solve it?” John said. “I don’t get it.”

“First off, it’s personal,” I said. “I like to take care of my own problems. Especially when it involves some asshole trying to kill me. Second, Mexico didn’t solve their case. In the future, they may, or may not, figure out and punish whoever killed Beatrice. But I wouldn’t count on it. Mexico is known for its corruption. It’s become a lifestyle in Mexican government, especially the police force. How do I know whoever murdered Beatrice didn’t pay someone off? How do I know it wasn’t someone involved with the police to begin with? Hell, police officers tried to rob me and Leonard, and they cut Leonard. Hadn’t been for Beatrice’s old man, they would have killed us both.

“And if this monster came here to kill me, thinks he has, has gone home, and I tell our cops, can they get him out of Mexico? It might require a lot more than they can manage. Extradition can be a bitch.”

“Christ,” John said. “For the first time in my life I got a real relationship. I don’t want to lose that.”

“You won’t,” Leonard said. “I’m indestructible.”

“Yeah,” John said. “What about that knife wound?”

“I had an off day. Hey, even monkeys fall out of trees.”

“Leonard. Please don’t fall. Promise me.”

“I promise,” Leonard said. “Hap will be my support line.”

“Shit,” Brett said. “Let’s find the sonofabitch killed Charlie, cut his nuts off, and feed them to a German shepherd. Or better yet, one of those little bitty dogs without hair.”

23

TWO DAYS LATER we had Charlie's funeral. It was a simple one. No church or preacher was involved. He wouldn't have liked that. His body was cremated and services were held at a community center. It was packed. Friends. Relatives and cops. Mostly cops. Jake was among them. He said to me, "I got a feeling more and more that I don't know all I know about this thing. Get me?"

"I haven't a clue what you mean."

"Hap, don't get caught. Whatever you're doin', don't get caught. Whoever did this to Charlie, if you're after the sonofabitch, I hope you succeed. But you break a law and I know about it, you know what I got to do."

"I do. But I don't intend to break any laws. I haven't a clue what you're talking about."

"Yeah, right," Jake said.

One at a time, people got up and told things about Charlie. Stories. Incidents. Or just expressed their feelings. I was included. I said: "Charlie was a good friend. He died badly, but I know he died as bravely as is humanly possible. His killer will be found."

I didn't go as far as to say how he would be found. That was still a card to play, and only Leonard, Brett, and John had seen it.

Jim Bob Luke showed for the funeral. He got up and said a few words. Then Leonard.

Hanson was last, and the best. He had known Charlie the longest, had worked with him closely when they were both on the police department.

Hanson was in his motorized wheelchair. He rode it to a place beside the podium where everyone else had stood and talked. Charlie's porkpie hat was in his lap. Hanson's wife, Rachel, a striking black woman in a purple dress, took the microphone off the podium and gave it to him.

Hanson held the microphone for a while, as if he might not actually speak. Then he said, “Charlie Blank was the friend everyone wanted, and if he was your friend, you were proud of it. He made you proud of yourself. Figured a guy like Charlie liked you, you had to be all right. He was a simple guy. Loved his friends. Was a wonderful cop. He loved the smell of a woman’s hair. Told me that many times. He liked dogs and hated cats. In many ways, he saved my life. He made me know it was worth living after my accident. He’s helped me with my physical therapy, and he listened to me whine about how life wasn’t worth living, and he convinced me it was worth living. I thank him for that. Right now, even with what happened to Charlie, I’m very convinced it’s worth living again.

“He loved Wal-Mart. He was a nut for Wal-mart. And before Wal-Mart, Kmart. He was shattered when the Kmart folded. He was depressed for days, had a hard time shifting his loyalty to Wal-Mart, but when he did, he did it wholeheartedly.

“He liked porkpie hats. In fact, I have his here. I’m going to start wearing it. I always wanted to anyway. I thought Charlie looked cool in it. I was too embarrassed to let him know. Instead, I made fun of him. From now on, I’ll wear his hat. He liked Hawaiian shirts. The gaudier the better. He liked tennis shoes and Dr. Scholl’s shoes, which he bought at Wal-Mart, and he wore a pair of one or the other every day of his life. He did jogging, played basketball, he had on those tennis shoes or Dr. Scholl’s. He went to a wedding or a funeral, he had them on. Me, Hap Collins, Leonard Pine, and God bless her, Brett Sawyer, all wore black, tie-up Dr. Scholl’s today in his honor. We love you, Charlie. We’ll never forget you.”

Hanson put the porkpie on and Rachel wheeled him away.

We had a small get-together at John’s house. Me and Brett. Leonard and John, of course. Hanson and Jim Bob. John fixed hot tea for all of us.

Hanson said, “Well, what are we going to do about this?”

“You too?” I said.

“Been thinking about things,” Hanson said.

“I have plans,” I said. “Sort of.”

“Then that means Leonard has plans too,” Hanson said.

“That’s right,” Leonard said.

“They won’t be very smart plans,” Jim Bob said. “No offense, but from my time with you guys, I’d say you’re as dogged as pit bulls, but about as smart as two slices of bologna rubbing together on dry bread.”

“Thanks,” Leonard said. “Nothing like a good compliment. You’re lucky you got slack with me for saving Hap’s ass that time. Otherwise, a remark like that I’d have to see if you bounced.”

Jim Bob grinned. “What you’d find is that I not only bounce. I bounce back.”

“Ooooeeeeee,” Leonard said. “Now my nuts are suckin’ up. You are so scary.”

“What I’m sayin’ is it’s what I do,” Jim Bob said. “Detecting. And making things happen. What you and Hap do is fuck things up.”

“There’s a certain truth to that,” I said.

“Motherfucker did this, is about as mean as a rattlesnake with a stick up its ass,” Jim Bob said. “And he’s big enough to pull a building down on us. What you need is someone like me knows how to sniff this shit out. You want him found, I’m your man.”

“That’s true,” Hanson said. “Me and Charlie were going to pick Jim Bob’s brain to start our investigations business. He’s the best.”

I thought he probably was, and so did Leonard. But there was some kind of macho shit between them, and Leonard wasn’t eager to give Jim Bob credit for much. Not and like it. I think it had something to do with Jim Bob saving me that time. Leonard may have thought that was his job and he slacked on me. Then again, maybe he was just disappointed he didn’t have it to hold over my head.

“Hot tea, anyone?” John said.

“Christ, enough with the tea, already,” Leonard said. “I’m floatin’ in the stuff.”

“I’m nervous,” John said.

“Plan I got is this,” Jim Bob said. “You folks set tight. I’ll make a little trip to Mexico. Do some investigating. I have a friend or two down there. They're in the detecting business too. Mexican. Both of them. They know where all the bodies are buried. Maybe me and them can dig up the ones we need. In the meantime, might I suggest you folks stay close and stay ready. We don't know for sure this behemoth has gone home. He may be waiting for another chance. He may know he didn't get the right person. If we're lucky, he went back to Mexico thinking he did what he needed to do. Or he may have just gone back anyway and plans to come back and finish the job. We'll have to find out."

"Who says Mexico is his home?" Hanson said.

"Wouldn't it be?" Brett asked.

"Hanson's right," Jim Bob said. "Assume nothing. That's the first rule of good detecting. And always wear clean underwear in case you have a wreck. Mother told me that. I've tried to live by it."

"Have a bad enough wreck," Brett said, "you can bet even clean underwear will fill up."

Jim Bob wrinkled his brows. "You know, I hadn't even considered that."

24

WE STAYED HOME and Jim Bob went to Mexico. During that time, we played it careful. Leonard decided to pack up his shotgun, vanilla cookies, John's tea, and move John and Bob the armadillo back to his place for a while. It was out in the country and a little harder to find, and small, easier to protect. There was no certainty that he, or any of us, was in danger, of course, but it was a case of better safe than sorry.

Brett and I hunkered down at her place. I escorted her to work and picked her up, still wearing my chicken plant uniform, my chicken plant revolver on my hip.

Brett wore a little automatic hidden under her nurse uniform. It was in a holster fastened to her thigh. Certainly against hospital rules, but what they didn't know wouldn't hurt them.

When she changed at night it was a ritual. She'd lift the hem of her dress and show me the little revolver in its white holster, which matched her white nurse uniform and white hose. Then she slid the dress up high enough to show me her panties. Off came the dress, the revolver, the hose, the panties. Finally she was wearing nothing but a smile and a thin fringe of red pubic hair growing back into place.

Now and then, while wearing my chicken plant guard uniform, I'd insist I was the law and thought she ought to be strip-searched, and she'd let me. It was foolish and fun.

We made love a lot during the two weeks Jim Bob was gone. Deep down maybe we figured things could go wrong. Thought we'd try to make up for all the love-making we might miss if one or both of us got killed. Something silly like that.

Whatever, that part of the waiting wasn't so bad. And I realized that I didn't just love Brett, I was crazy in love with her. I had never met a woman who made me feel this way.

I thought my first wife, Trudy, was the only one that would ever give me those feelings, but Brett, she was the best yet. She made me truly realize just how childish and puppylike my love for Trudy had been.

At work Leonard and I found ourselves telling Charlie stories. Hadn't been for Charlie, there were a few times when I wouldn't have gone home at night, and now, in an odd way, it was my fault he was dead.

I began to gather up guilt. Had I been where I was supposed to be it would have been me. It was supposed to be me.

And then I'd feel something else.

Shame. Shame because I was glad I hadn't been home, that it hadn't been me. It was a mix of noxious feelings that didn't set well on the stomach.

I told Leonard how I felt. He said what he's said to me before. "Things don't happen for a reason, Hap. They just happen. It's got nothing to do with either you or Charlie deserving to die. The guy did this wanted you, you weren't there. That's good for you. Charlie was there. That's bad for Charlie. It's simplistic, but that's all there is to it. Some idiot might say things happen for the best. And for you that would be true. But what about Charlie? Was that for his best? Of course not. Neither of you deserved that, but he got it. No rhyme. No reason. Just the way it came together. Once you start realizing it's got nothing to do with deserving it, you'll deal with it better."

"Would you have felt guilty had it been you?"

Leonard was silent for a moment. "Yeah. Yeah I would have. But not like you, brother. I'd have brooded on it for a day, told myself just what I told you, and I'd have moved on. I might have a bump in the night from time to time thinking about it, some wiggle in the back of my brain. But I'd put it in its place, and day by day it would grow smaller, and then it would just be what happened. I'd still love and miss Charlie, but I'd know it wasn't my fault."

"Are you saying that just to make me feel better?"

"A little. But I also mean what I say. You can't carry everyone's problems, every bad thing that happens to someone you know around on your back like a boulder. That boulder is going to get heavier and heavier, and finally, you won’t be able to bear it. You’ll go down before your time. My advice is feel guilty only about the things that happen to me because of our association and jettison the rest.”

25

AFTER TWO WEEKS or so, in the middle of the night, on a weekend, mine and Brett's nights off, the phone rang. Brett was so deep in sleep she didn't hear it. I had become so accustomed to sleeping part of the day, I found it difficult to sleep at night on the weekends. Brett, on the other hand, would have shamed a hibernating bear.

I rolled out of bed and went around on Brett's side where the phone sat on a nightstand. I sat down on the bed and answered it, expecting it to be one of Brett's worthless children with their tit in the wringer, their dick in a crack.

It was Jim Bob.

"Qué pasa," he said.

"Where are you?"

"I'm at a phone booth in the center of town. I called John's place, but no answer. I called Hanson and he's coming in. We thought we'd gather up at John's place or Brett's. That okay?"

I thought about it a minute. I said, "Come over here. But don't knock the house down, Brett's asleep."

"Can you get in touch with Leonard?"

"I can. I'll have him meet us."

"Be there in a moment. And I got a little surprise for you."

"I didn't know you knew my size. Is it revealing?"

"Just in all the right places."

"Well, come on then."

I called Leonard's place and he answered. I could hear country music in the background.

"You having a hoedown?"

"Me and John was dancing. He dances like someone sawed off about half his foot.”

I told him what Jim Bob had said.

“We’re on our way.”

“Well, don’t let Bob drive.”

“He’s grounded. Sonofabitch rooted around one of the blocks holds up the porch, made it collapse. No movies, dates, or giving him the car for a week.”

Jim Bob arrived first. He knocked gently on the door and opened it. He said, “I really didn’t know your size, so I got you something else.”

“And what’s that?”

Jim Bob stepped aside and I saw Ferdinand standing there, wearing a simple white shirt and blue jeans. There was a scabbed scar on the right side of his face. He was leaning on a cane.

“Well, I’ll be goddamned. Come on in.”

Ferdinand came in, suddenly grabbed me and hugged me. He started to cry. “You must think me an awful man,” he said.

I peeled him off of me and guided him to the couch. “I don’t think anything,” I said. Which was a partial lie. I had my opinions about Ferdinand. Some of them good, some not so good.

“How did you find him?” I said.

“Let’s wait until the others are here. I’d rather not tell it twice.”

About fifteen minutes later Hanson arrived. He was wearing Charlie’s porkpie. I was surprised to see him using a walker.

“You’re out of your chair?” I said as I let him in.

“Your skills of observation are as sharp as ever,” Hanson said, his black face beaming. “Feeling is back in my legs. Been using this for about a week now. Doctor thinks I keep up the physical therapy, martial arts training, the feeling will come back completely.”

I sat him on the couch, introduced Ferdinand.

About thirty minutes later John and Leonard arrived. When Ferdinand saw Leonard, he got up and extended his hand. Leonard took it. Ferdinand began to weep.

"Just sit down," Leonard said.

"I'll make tea," John said.

"Of course you will," Leonard said.

I decided to slip back in the bedroom for a moment. When I got in there, Brett was stirring. I said, "Baby, if you don't want to repeat your Gypsy Rose Lee act, I'd advise you to dress before you come in the living room."

"What's going on?"

I told her.

"I'll be out in a moment."

John was pouring tea into cups and putting the cups on a tray when Brett came out. Her hair was beautifully tousled around her face. She was wearing a white T-shirt and white shorts. I introduced her to Ferdinand. She sat on the arm of the couch.

Jim Bob was sitting in a chair near the coffee table. He sipped his tea and set it on the table. He said, "I've got an interesting story for you people. I'll try and give you the Reader's Digest version.

"To sort of capsulize the theme, let me say, Hap, that you inadvertently stepped into a nest of vipers."

"Hell, I know that."

"No. You don't know. This thing has some twisties and some turnies."

"Twisties and turnies?" Leonard said. "Is that some kind of exotic underwear?"

"Sophisticated private eye talk," Jim Bob said. "Don't you fret none now, Leonard. It's over your head and it isn't your fault."

Jim Bob turned his chair backward and sat so that his arms lay on the back rest. He said, "I'm gonna nutshell for you what this is all about. Ferdinand filled me in on some of it, and me and him sort of guessed out the rest, but I figure it's pretty accurate.

"Beatrice's father borrowed money from someone known for loaning money and not being nice about it. High interest. Strongarm tactics. It was the only way he could get the money he needed to send Beatrice to the States to go to the university. Deal was, she'd graduate in four years, and then pay back what was borrowed with money from her new job, whatever it was. In the meantime, Ferdinand had to pay something back every week. And this amount didn't count toward the amount borrowed. It didn't even count as interest. The man who loaned the money, Juan Miguel, saw it as collateral on the major loan. Best I can describe it."

"If you don't mind me saying, seems like a pretty dumb kind of loan," Leonard said.

"Yes," Ferdinand said. "But I wanted for her what I could not give her. She was to pay it back."

"Let me finish this," Jim Bob said. "Beatrice goes to the University of Texas, and bails. That's the bottom line. She gave up on it and came back to Mexico without the debt paid. That meant Ferdinand had to pay every week and she had to help. In the long run, this being a lifetime deal until they could pay back the loan in full, this might not have been a bad way for Juan Miguel to go. Just have them keep paying until they're both in the grave. This might surpass the loan. And say somehow they make back the loan, pay it all off, well, okay. He gets his money back with interest, plus all the money they've been paying weekly to keep him from breaking something.

"Then there's a new wrinkle. Through old contacts at the university, Beatrice finds out that some Mayan facades—"

"What?" John asked.

"Mayan facades are painted stucco on the fronts of temples. These had been found by looters in the jungle, and they had contacted university scouts to let them know they had them available for a good price."

"Is this kind of thing legal?" Brett said.

"Nope. The scouts aren't sanctioned. They're just people who work for the university and occasionally field information of a dubious and illegal nature. Lot of things you see in museums came through university contacts that weren't on the up-and-up. It's a coup for the university as well as the museum. Though it's harder to pull that kind of thing off these days. Used to, there wasn't much to stop that kind of commerce. That leads us to the rest of the story, as old Paul Harvey is fond of saying.

"Well, the university offers a whole shitload of money for this thing, and the looters say yippie. We'll bring it as far as Playa del Carmen. You come get it. Secretly, of course.

"Here's the corker. The looters load this stuff on trucks and arrive at the pickup point, just outside Playa del Carmen, and the university people don't show. They've gotten cold feet. New attitudes are in place, and what was once smart archaeology is now considered looting. Not only by the obvious looters, but by the university and museum folks as well. That's always been the attitude, openly, but underneath, this kind of thing was okay as long as no one got their tail in too tight a crack.

"University decided it was putting the tail of its reputation in just such as crack, and they backed out. So guess what? The looters decided to hide the stuff away and sell it to another bidder. They decide to hire a boat. Ferdinand's boat. They moved the stucco facades by boat to an island Ferdinand knew. He occasionally took people there to fish, and the looters were paying pretty good money, and he thought he could put this money away and add to it later to pay off what he owed Juan Miguel.

"How am I doing, Ferdinand? Am I telling it right?"

Ferdinand nodded.

"So, Ferdinand, with the help of his daughter, transfers the facades to this little island, hides 'em away, then on the return trip the looters decide—or have already decided—they don't really want Ferdinand and Beatrice to go back with them. In fact, they don't want them to go back at all, and they don't plan on leaving them on the island to Robinson Crusoe it. They decide to use machetes and chop the old man up."

"Well, seeing that he's here, and having seen him in action," I said, "we know how that turned out."

"Exactly. There were two of them. He took the machete away from one of them and killed them both. Dumped them in the ocean. Is that right, Ferdinand?"

Ferdinand nodded.

"You are one bad dude," Leonard said.

"They did not expect one so old to be so willing," Ferdinand said. "And they did not know that I grew up training with the machete."

"Not something you'd expect," Brett said. "Machete training. I thought you just chopped with it."

"Whatever," Jim Bob said. "He and Beatrice survived. So now Ferdinand and Beatrice have an ace in the hole. Or so they think. Beatrice goes to Juan Miguel and tells him she knows the whereabouts of these facades. She believes that the University of Mexico will be interested in them, and that they will pay heavily. She offers to trade the facades to Miguel to sell to the university for the cancellation of her debt.

"Juan Miguel is a nut not only for money and meanness, but dig this—if you'll pardon the pun. He loves archaeology. He likes to think he's adding to the world's knowledge in this area. You know, loan shark a little, kill a little, and do a little archaeology. Or rather buy a little archaeology. He sees himself as a Renaissance man of sorts. So, he agrees to go with Beatrice. He contacts the Mexican university, and sure enough, they will pay for these facades. And considering they don't have to be sold out of the country, it's a legal deal.

"But in the meantime, Beatrice decides she's screwed the pooch. She should have offered to sell them herself, cut out the middleman. This way, she thought, she could pay off Miguel, and come out with enough money to take her and her father to the States.

"Now we have Juan Miguel having negotiated with the university through his contacts, and suddenly, when he's ready for the information to reveal the location of the facades, Beatrice isn't talking."

"I did not know she had done this thing," Ferdinand said. "I would not have let her. Sell them to Miguel for our debt, yes. But to double-cross him … no."

"Juan Miguel was," Jim Bob said, "to put it in casual terms, about ready to piss vinegar and turn it to wine. He was embarrassed. He's like a kind of mafia don in Mexico, and all the underworld knew he was brokerin' this deal, and now some woman, a former prostitute … No offense, Ferdinand …"

"It is the truth," Ferdinand said. "But when she goes to the university, she leaves this life behind. Until this man Billy … Please, continue, Señor Jim Bob.”

“Well, he doesn’t like it that she backs out on him and throws shit in his face. He is not a happy little criminal. He’s as embarrassed as a priest caught jacking off during a confession. He goes to Beatrice and says, Hey, we had a deal, and she lies and says, I have another deal in place, and I’ll have all the money I owe you, promise. You won’t get the facades to give to the University of Mexico, I’ll do that, but you will get your money in toto. Juan Miguel doesn’t like this, but he accepts. But, to make sure Beatrice understands he’s tired of dickin’ around, he has his man cut off the tip of her little finger.”

“She told me it was a fishing accident,” I said.

“She lied,” Ferdinand said. “I would have killed this man had I been there.”

“Maybe not this guy,” Jim Bob said. “Maybe not any of us this guy. But I’ll come back to him. So he cuts off Beatrice’s finger, tells her he’ll kill her and her father if she fucks this up.

“Beatrice isn’t through, however. She meets you and Leonard. And you get involved, and then she meets this Billy. Billy’s a blowhard and as full of shit as Beatrice. No offense, old man. But it seems your daughter had enough bullshit to fertilize about half the globe.”

I saw Ferdinand’s eyes glow, but only for a moment. He hung his head.

“She wants what she wants so bad she will deal with the devil,” Ferdinand said.

“And she did,” Jim Bob said. “And besides the devil, she dealt with Billy. Billy says he’ll pay her a lot more than three days of fishing are worth if she throws herself in and agrees to do whatever he wants her to do.

“As I said, before she went to the university Beatrice was a call girl in Mexico City. She’s not afraid of this deal. She’s seen some things, done some things. It turns out Billy, who is Billy Sullivan, is full of it and doesn’t really have any money. He’s a blowhard but Beatrice falls for it. He gave a little down payment, but the rest of it he didn’t have and wasn’t about to ask his father, who, though not rich, is fairly well off.”

"Know what," I said. "I never did call his old man. I forgot all about it."

"Doesn't matter," Jim Bob said. "He finally got in touch with him and his father came down with lawyers and money and got him out of jail and took him home. I traced him down when I got back from Mexico. And, guess what? He's dead. Someone went all the way to Indiana, which is where he's from, and cut him up. Same way as Charlie."

"Poor old Billy," I said.

"Fuck Billy," Leonard said. "I wouldn't have shit a hot meal in his hand if he was dying of hunger."

"Way I figure it," Jim Bob said, "Beatrice gave names or had addresses on her, something. Somehow she led them to you, Hap, or rather Charlie. I don't think they knew the difference. Then they went to Indiana and got Billy. For all I know, they got all your addresses from the police and Beatrice didn't give them shit. Enough money, information tends to change hands. And not just in Mexico."

"But why would he want us?" I said.

Jim Bob shrugged, said, "Juan Miguel wanted vengeance and he thought you and Billy were in on the scam. Maybe Beatrice, to prolong her life, told them that. How's that for a guess? I think it's that simple. Juan Miguel, he doesn't like taking a fuckin', and if he does take one, then he makes sure whoever gave it to him takes it up the ass as well. A sort of permanent fuckin'. 'Course, could be he thought you or Billy, or both of you, knew about the facades and maybe he thought he'd find that out. He'd still want them, I think."

"What about Leonard?" I asked.

"I don't know," Jim Bob said. "No one tried to kill him, so maybe she didn't give his name, died before she could. I don't know. No way of knowing."

"I gave my address," Leonard said. "Not where I was staying, with John. The ironic part is after Charlie was killed I moved John and me out to my house for a while, because I thought it was safer."

"By then it was," Jim Bob said. "The killers had gone home.

Maybe they decided they had the main two, and after torturing Charlie and Billy and getting nothing, they decided neither of you knew dick about the facades."

"That seems like a pretty good guess," I said.

"And Ferdinand?" Leonard said.

"He was going to kill Ferdinand too, but Juan Miguel made the mistake of not sending the Jolly Green Giant. They sent some everyday fucker, and guess what? They sent him to do it with a machete. It's kind of their trademark, death by machete.

"Guy comes to get Ferdinand on his boat. Ferdinand disarms him, beats him like a circus monkey, makes him tell why he's come. That's how Ferdinand finds out about Beatrice.

"Then, Ferdinand ties up his attacker, takes him out to sea, and dumps him in the ocean."

"Tied up?" John asked.

"Yes," Ferdinand said. "That way he cannot swim."

"Yeah," Leonard said, "tied up cramps a fella's breast stroke all right."

I thought, Damn. This is one mean old man.

"How the hell did you find all this out?" Brett asked.

"Hey, I'm a detective, lovely lady. And I had some help. Guy down there, a Mexican, runs a little private eye agency. I've worked with him I don't know how many times. I heard this name, Juan Miguel, I thought it rang a bell. My acquaintance down there, César, he had a partner who met a nasty end not long ago, and the whole thing's connected with Juan Miguel. That's where I had heard the name, year and a half ago. It didn't mean much to me then. Just something they had got themselves into.

"I didn't know the details, just that some gangster named Juan Miguel was responsible for César's partner's death. The partner I had met, but hadn't dealt with much. Not directly. I always dealt with César. Fact is, César helped me find Ferdinand."

"How did you find him?" Leonard asked.

"Me and César found him by finding the boy you told me about. José. The one helped him fish. He didn't know Ferdinand was in trouble, just that he was gone, and César simply asked him did Ferdinand have a place he went that few people knew about, and how about three hundred dollars if he told us. He was loyal to Ferdinand for about five minutes, then he was loyal to three hundred dollars. For him, that's like a thousand, at least.

"The boy told me about a little island. Said that was where Ferdinand sometimes went to fish for himself and to be alone. Said he had gone with him a couple times. No one else had asked José that. No one else had offered him three hundred dollars either. No one thought or knew to ask him the question. We told José he should say nothing else about it to anyone. César rented a boat and we went out there, found Ferdinand. And the facades. That's the island where they're stored."

"What about what really counts to us?" Hanson said. "Justice for Charlie."

"There's the rub," Jim Bob said. "We might could put together some pretty good information for the Mexican police. But in that little town of Playa del Carmen, Juan Miguel's pretty much the man. He's pretty much the man throughout Mexico when it comes to crime and payoffs in cocaine, money, and poontang."

"So," Leonard said, "might we assume you're saying that would be a worthless approach to taking care of Charlie's killer?"

"Right."

"I say we go to Mexico and get the sonofabitch," Hanson said. "Him and this giant. Or whoever gets in the way."

"First off, you're not going anywhere," Jim Bob said. "No offense, but in your state you'd just fuck up the mission."

"All right then," Hanson said. "What are you and the others going to do? And how can I help?"

"I like Hanson's idea," Leonard said. "We kill the sonofabitch."

"It's an idea," Jim Bob said, "but not an easy one to pull off."

"I been in on a designed killing once, and I didn't like it," I said. "I'm still dealing with it. I just don't like the idea of a guy pisses you off, you kill him."

"Pisses you off," Jim Bob said. "He killed Charlie, man. I'm more than pissed off."

"You want justice for your friend, Charlie," Ferdinand said. "I want justice for my daughter. We all have a price to pay. Vengeance is a price, but it must be paid.”

“Not me,” John said. “You know how I stand. I’m an observer. And not a happy one.”

“Killing him seems awful heavy to me,” I said.

“You’re fuckin’ me,” Leonard said. “What do you suggest, we humiliate him? Shame him? Bad dog. Smack him with a rolled-up newspaper? I think you ain’t got no peas for your pea shooter, Hap. Why don’t we just call him a bad name or knock his hat off?”

“Or write he sucks dicks on some bathroom wall,” Jim Bob said. “Hey, meant nothing by that, Leonard. John. Anyone else in here suck dicks?”

Brett raised her hand.

Jim Bob burst out laughing.

“Listen,” I said. “I was thinking we get some photos of these facades. We say to Juan Miguel we got these facades and we’ll sell them to you for such and such, and then we spring the police on him. You know, have them in waiting, so they got to arrest him when he shows up to buy them.”

“They’ll arrest us for setting up the scam,” Jim Bob said. “It implies we stole the facades in the first place, even if we didn’t. And if it did work, you keep forgetting, he’s got the Mexican law’s dicks in his pockets. It’s a stupid idea, Hap.”

“So we have to kill him?” I said.

No one said anything for a time. Finally Jim Bob said, “Before we start passing out the ammunition and a sack lunch, might be a good idea I tell you a little about this guy Juan Miguel, and his main henchman.”

“Henchman?” Leonard said. “Shit, I just love that term. I think I used to read that in the Fu Manchu books. Henchmen.”

“César helped me find out a lot of stuff on this dude. Juan Miguel is rich because he’s run more drugs than Johnson and Johnson. He started out a petty thief, worked himself up to a higher level, killed off the right guys in the Mexican mafia, and eventually, he’s head dick. Got him some class along the way. Money buys class, you know. And very expensive suits, in all shades. When he wears a suit. He's a practicing nudist much of the time."

"A nudist?" Brett said.

"Yep. A classy nudist. At least in his own eyes. In reality he's about as classy as a ball peen hammer to the back of the head. Which is something he's done. Used a ball peen on his enemies' skulls. But he's too cool for that now. He's got hired hands that do that."

"The henchmen," Leonard said.

"That's right."

"Is he hard to get to?" Hanson asked.

"He's got a little fortress of a house in the hills surrounding Playa del Carmen. Nice pad. You can drive a car right up to it, but there's guys with guns to greet you. One of the guys, according to César, is about six eight, weighs about three eighty-five, and only the bits between his fingers and toes is fatty."

"Sounds like hyperbole," John said.

"Could be," Jim Bob said. "They call him Hammerhead."

"An old family name," Leonard said. "Surely he's a junior."

"Point is," Jim Bob said, "what we got here isn't a cakewalk. This guy is dangerous. The people who protect him are dangerous. We can't drive up to his house, knock on his door, ask if he can come out to play and shoot him in the head."

"Any weaknesses?" I asked.

"Maybe at bridge," Jim Bob said, "not much else. Well, there is one thing. A mistress. A real stunner. She lives in a fine house with some pretty nice guards herself. Provided by Juan Miguel, of course. She likes to travel to Mexico City and shop in expensive shops. We followed her three times in one week to the airport. And we even got on the flight once. The guards were with her. She shopped Mexico City to death. Only thing she didn't do was buy the coats off the bears at the Mexico City zoo. She had the two plugs with her carrying all this shit. Clothes. Shoes. Whatever the crap is women buy, and I bet me and César sat outside those stores in a rented airport car most of the day. We didn't even eat lunch."

"She's the key," Leonard said.

“Yep,” Jim Bob said. “I suppose so.”

26

THAT NIGHT THE RAIN blew hard against the house, rattled the windows like teeth chattering in a cold face. Only it was warm, sticky warm, even in the house with the central air and a fan blowing at the foot of the bed.

Brett, who I thought was asleep, rolled over and laid her arm across my chest.

“You aren’t sleeping?”

“I know. And neither are you. Surely you don’t want sex again? I think I’m pooped out.”

“We didn’t have sex tonight.”

“I’m still pooped out … You sure we didn’t?”

“I’m sure. Man, is that rain gonna wash us away?”

“We’ll float on the bed. We’ll be okay.”

“Will there be room for all the animals, Noah?”

“We’re the only animals that matter.”

“Hap. Can we do this?”

“You don’t need to do anything. Me and Leonard, Jim Bob and Ferdinand, we can do it.”

“The plan sounds kind of lame to me.”

“He’s actually using part of my idea.”

“Like I said, the plan sounds lame.”

“Jim Bob said it was a better plan than he expected the bunch of us to come up with.”

“Finding an extra pecan in your pecan sundae is better than you expected, but it isn’t exactly a whole pie. Jim Bob’s so smart, why doesn’t he come up with a better plan.”

“You’re knocking the plan?”

“I’m just saying Jim Bob saying it’s a better plan than he expected doesn't make it the best plan devised."

"It's better than me or Leonard running the show."

"It's still not a plan that makes me feel confident."

"Would any plan make you feel confident?"

"Probably not."

"It's what we've got. Or what we've got without you. You don't need to go at all. You have a job to worry about."

"You're not doing anything without me. I got a little money put back. I can probably get off for a couple weeks. How long does it take to hunt down and kill a guy anyway?"

"Christ, don't say that, Brett. I still wake up with the other on my mind."

"Me too. I even wake up screaming about it sometimes. But I'd do it again. I'd do what we're about to do twice. Charlie was a good guy, Hap. He didn't deserve this."

"No, he didn't."

"You did a thing for me once that I can't imagine anyone else doing."

"Leonard did it too."

"You always say that, and he did, but he did it for you … Okay. I can't imagine anyone but you two doing it for me, and now here's my chance to pay you back."

"I don't want that. You're not paying me back. This has got nothing to do with you paying me back. It's got to do with me paying back that cocksucker in Mexico."

Brett got up, went to the bathroom, came back, and snuggled in with me again. I said, "Frankly, I hate to admit it, but I been thinking about walkin'."

"No you haven't."

"I haven't?"

"Oh, you might consider it. It's in your head. But you know what you'll do, and so do I."

"Am I that predictable?"

"Except that part where you bent one of my legs sideways and came at me from that weird angle. I didn't expect that. But, other than sex, yes, you're predictable."

"Hey, we're together long enough, I'll be predictable there too. Then you'll have to get rid of me."

"I don't think you're altogether joking."

"I haven't had the best luck with love, my dear."

"Hap. I don't care you're not young, you're not rich or overly handsome, or even well hung—"

"Hold it now, goddamn it, you're stepping across the line."

"I thought that would wake you up. I'm saying I don't care. I don't care about any of those things, but I care about you, and I can't just kiss you bye and send you to Mexico not knowing what's going to happen. And when it's over, when we come back here, I want to make this deal permanent. I'm not saying you have to marry me, though that would be nice, but I want us to be together. And that means being together when you go to Mexico. I don't want to be sitting here waiting on my man to do what a man's got to do like some cheap-ass Western movie."

"That's kind of what it boils down to, though, isn't it?"

"It boils down to you and me. From now on, I want it you and me. Except when I'm doing some serious business in the bathroom. I don't mind you come in I'm doing a number one, but a number two, no way. Unless maybe it's to hand me the toilet paper if I forgot to put it on the roll, but other than that, not a number two. You stay out then."

"You're fucking nuts, Brett."

"I know."

"Brett, I don't know I can go through with it. I think about it I clench up inside."

"Whatever you do. Whatever you decide. I want to be there with you. Except that bathroom part that I've already explained. And that goes if you're doing number two as well. I don't want to see that."

"Brett, thy middle name is class."

"I keep telling you that."

Next day they fired Brett when she wanted time off. She'd already used all her time off dealing with her worthless daughter.

I was with her at the nurses' station when the head nurse told her it was all over and that they'd been thinking about firing her for some time because of her mouth.

"My mouth," Brett said. "My fuckin' mouth. You old dried-up cunt. You'd be so lucky as to have my cunt for your mouth. Turn it sideways, and it'd go better with your mustache than the mouth you got, you fuckin' Wicked Witch of the West. I ought—"

I got her by the arm and pulled her out of there. On the way out she yelled back what they could do with their thermometers.

Later that day, Leonard and I went to our boss. It was tough. I knew Bond felt he owed me something, and I didn't want to put him in a position of feeling he had to let me have more juice than I deserved, but there was nothing else to do.

His office was in town, away from the chicken plant. There were, however, pictures of chickens on the wall, and charts with chickens. There was also a big wooden desk, a black leather chair, and a black and gray striped couch.

Bond actually hadn't been in the office, but I had called and he had called back and said he'd meet me there. He ended up meeting us out in the parking lot, riding up with us in the elevator.

"I don't come here much," he said. "I'm really too rich and too far removed from what's going on anymore to have opinions. I just like to collect checks and leave the work and the organization to people I've handpicked."

"It's a nice life if you can get it," Leonard said.

"Yes it is," Bond said.

Leonard and I sat on the couch, shuffled our feet for a moment. Finally I came out with it. Told Bond something had come up. That we had to go away for a while. But we'd come back. And we'd like our jobs back, if that was possible, and not to think we were trying to take advantage of him. To my ears, I sounded like a kid making up some bullshit excuse for not doing his homework.

Bond looked at us, said, "You do whatever you want. I won't even cut your pay."

"You don't owe me that," I said. "You sure don't owe Leonard that."

"Thanks," Leonard said.

"No," Bond said. "I do owe you that. Go with my blessing."

"I want you to know I'm not trying to take advantage of you," I said. "Something really did come up."

"I believe you. Go with my blessing. And the assurance your jobs are waiting."

"How is Sarah?"

"She's much better. She has been moved to a less critical wing of the hospital."

"I'm glad to hear it."

"She's talking now. Some of her old spirit is back. She speaks highly of you, Hap."

"That's kind of her," I said.

Bond was starting to look teary. We got up to leave. Bond said, "Hap. Leonard. I got an idea you two aren't just going on a hunting trip."

"Actually," Leonard said, "that's exactly what we're doing."

"Be safe."

We thanked him and left.

Jim Bob booked me, Brett, Leonard, Ferdinand, and himself on a flight to Cancun for the next afternoon. I took Brett to a nice store in Tyler and bought her an expensive outfit or two. Still, we packed light.

That night we slept hardly at all, got up early, muddled about. Hanson came by to wish us off. Told us to keep him posted. Early afternoon, we headed for Houston Intercontinental in Jim Bob's car, the Red Bitch.

"What about guns?" Leonard asked.

"César," Jim Bob said, switching lanes to the sound of a car horn blaring. "He'll provide what we need. He has his own grudge he'd like to take care of. He's been nursing it for years, and now he's ready. You brought some of that money you got, didn't you, Hap?"

"I did."

"I sold some hogs cheap, fired all my help, so now I got some extra bread too."

"I brought some," Brett said. "But I didn't have much. I plan to suck off Hap when we get home."

"That sounds enticing," I said.

"You know what I mean," Brett said.

"I didn't bring any money," Leonard said. "I don't even know what color a dollar bill is anymore."

Jim Bob changed lanes so close had the car behind us had another coat of paint, it would have been in the back seat of the Red Bitch.

"You are one scary driver," Brett said.

"I'm just getting you folks primed for the really scary stuff."

27

We arrived in Cancun, rented a car, headed off toward Playa del Carmen. As we neared the town, a slice of sunset the color of a fresh-sliced salmon fillet stained the horizon. As we watched, darkness corrupted it, then it all sank away as if into a tar pit.

It was a night full of clouds and no visible moon. Darkness dripped over the car like ink poured from a jar, but as we neared the city pinpricks of colored lights jumped into view. We cruised past a McDonald’s and a T-shirt shop and on into town.

We ended up staying at a nice hotel near the sea. Brett and I took a room, Jim Bob, Leonard, and Ferdinand took one together. Leonard ended up on a roll-away.

In our room we opened a window, pulled back the curtains, let the sea air in. There was a palm tree near our window. The limbs and leaves scraped the wall like a cat scratching. There were lights on poles along the edge of the beach and they made the sand and water and the pedestrian walk, Fifth Avenue, look like one of those paintings you do by numbers.

Seabirds were coasting low over the water, dropping birdshit like napalm, hoping for a late fish snack before hanging it up for the day.

People walked along Fifth Avenue, talking and laughing.

“Since this is gonna cost us anyway,” Brett said, “what say we order room service, enjoy that, then fuck like two rabbits in a lab experiment?”

“That’s my kind of night,” I said.

We ordered room service, but what we ended up doing was not fucking like rabbits in a lab experiment, but lying in one another’s arms watching a late movie, The Man With the Golden Arm, starring Frank Sinatra. It was in English. Something cabled in for the tourists, I guess.

Next morning we got up early, had room service, then went with Jim Bob in the rental to meet César. Leonard was walking a little funny. I thought maybe his bad hip was acting up.

“You all right?” I asked.

“It’s not my hip, if that’s what you’re thinking. It’s that damn roll-away. I fought that motherfucker all night. It finally threw me. I ended up sleeping with a blanket and a pillow on the floor. Now I know how those poor racked sonofabitches felt during the Inquisition.”

We piled into the car. As we drove near the beach, I saw Ferdinand look out at the sea. I said, “Where’s your boat?”

“I sold the boat,” he said. “Some rich American who wanted his own fishing boat.”

“I’m sorry.”

“I needed the money … I know what you must think of me, señor. All of you. But I did what I could do. I tried to help my daughter. I did not make her a whore. She chose that for herself. When I thought she could get the money needed to keep her from dying, I let her do what she had to do. It was never for me. You must understand I was only letting her do what I thought she must do. It is all nothing now. She is dead. I am dead.”

“Time heals things,” I said.

“No, señor. It only heals some things. An open wound heals. This, this does not heal. But I can put salve on it. I can help kill this man who had my daughter killed.”

“If it’s any consolation,” Leonard said. “Knowing now what you were up against, I understand why you did what you did.”

“It is something, señor. It is something.”

César’s place was very nice. Nothing like what I expected. It was nestled amongst palms and foliage, one long story made of wood and stone, not far from the beach. The garage contained a Jaguar and an older-looking dirt-brown Plymouth.

“Looking through people’s windows, prowling through their underwear drawers, seems to pay pretty good,” Leonard said.

Jim Bob looked at Leonard and smiled. Leonard may have forgotten that Jim Bob and César were in the same business, but I doubted it.

We walked up a little crunched seashell path, and before we could knock, the door opened and a little fat man in a red shirt opened the door. He looked to be in his late thirties or forties, had very little hair, and what hair he had was black and gooey with oil. He had a face that would have looked at home on the Buddha, providing the Buddha had one cauliflowered ear. He shook our hands and hugged Jim Bob and Brett.

“Would you come in,” he said. “It is so good to meet you, señores, and it is even better to see this delightful señorita. Or is it señora?”

“Señorita,” she said.

“Surely, you are but an angel visiting from heaven.”

“That goes without question,” Brett said.

Inside the house it was also very nice, with colorful Mexican rugs hung on the wall, fine furniture, and nearby a young Mexican lady with blond hair and black roots. She stood near a stone fireplace, almost at attention. She wore a white pants suit with a long, near-waist-length strand of black beads that had gotten slung sideways, so that against her white suit it looked as if she were a cracked porcelain doll. She was pretty, but the look on her face was like that of someone who had just discovered her asshole has been sewn shut.

“This is my wife,” César said. “Her name is Hermonie.”

“Is Hermonie a Spanish name?” Brett asked.

“I have no idea,” César said. “She is very shy … Ah, Jim Bob.”

He and Jim Bob embraced. “Didn’t we just do this?” Jim Bob said.

“What?” César said. “It is not as good the second time? Come, I have had a late breakfast prepared.” He spoke pleasantly to Hermonie in Spanish.

She led us out the back way, as if leading us to our execution. Leonard leaned toward me, said, “I don’t think these two are a love match.”

We ended up at a table under a canopy. The table was covered with fruit, fried meats, and eggs. There were tortillas and coffee.

There were also a few flies, but César brushed at these with his hand as if they were but part of the ambience.

"Please," César said. "Sit. Eat. Drink. Talk."

We sat. Jim Bob said, "Actually, César, we would like to get right to things. We're on a limited budget and we've got time restraints."

"Ah, you Americans. You do not understand time. Time is time. It has no movement. Revenge is revenge, now or later."

"Drive-through burgers, drive-through pharmacies, and drive-through revenge," Jim Bob said. "That's us."

César grinned. "Of course. Try the cantaloupe. All the fruit is fresh."

Hermonie went away, then showed up with a small pitcher of cream, sweeteners for the coffee, then she disappeared again.

"Will Hermonie be joining us?" Brett asked.

"Actually," César said, looking sadly, "she is shy, and she hates Americans. For that matter, she is not too fond of me. She married me because she thought I had money. And I do, but not the sort of money she is looking for. She wants big money for big cars and big things. I make money that allows the middle-sized things. She made a mistake.

"But that is all right. I tolerate her and she tolerates me. She is as lovely a woman as an ugly fat man like myself will get, and I am most likely as rich as she will find. And I love Americans. My good friend, Jim Bob, I love him."

"I'm a Texan," Jim Bob said.

"Texas was stolen from Mexico," César said. "It should not be part of the United States."

"Mexicans helped steal it," Jim Bob said.

"Would it be okay if you two didn't fight the Alamo all over again?" I said.

"Ah," César said. "I love this guy. He loves me."

"Well, before you and I mate, César," Jim Bob said, "maybe we should get right to it. We have a plan, and being no friend of Juan Miguel, we thought you might help us tweak this plan."

"I am certainly no friend of this man, Juan Miguel. I have been waiting until my time is right to do what I need to do. Waiting, and praying to God to help me have my revenge."

"He helps in those matters?" Brett asked.

"If he does not, then we will do it without him," César said.

Jim Bob briefly outlined our plan.

César said, "Oh, you got some big stones, my friends. Big stones. Pardon me, lady."

"Forget it," Brett said.

"Let me tell you. We can do this. We must plan more carefully, but we can do this. By myself, I could not get even with this man. But with your help. Yes. I can. We can all eat a fine dish of revenge.

"Let me tell you about Juan Miguel, amigos. Many years ago a rich lady, a Mexican lady, she hires me to follow after her daughter who she thinks is being naughty with a man in Mexico City. Did I say she was a rich lady?"

"You did," I said.

"She offered me very much to watch this girl. My partner, Toño, was to help me. We, how is it you say it … double-teamed her, you see. It is easier that way. One can rest while the other watches. After a day or two we determine that, yes, she is in fact being naughty. She is with another man. They are spending many hours together in his hotel room and they did not have cards or dice with them. They are certainly playing that other game we all like to play. Toño takes photographs of her and this man going in and out of the hotel. We think this is good enough to show the lady. Show her that her pretty daughter is in fact running with this man. And we find out who this man is. He is Juan Miguel's son, Carmelo.

"We report all of this to the lady, and she sends her daughter away to the U.S. to study in the university, away from this man. So what happens? The girl, she pines for Carmelo and she decides to climb to the top of the University of Texas tower and jump."

"Jesus," Brett said. "I wanted a man that bad, I'd just hop a plane."

"Who is to understand the thinking of the young?" César said. "And there is another thing. When her mother sends her away, this Carmelo, he finds a new woman. It is not true love to him. It is true lust.

"But that is not all. The mother. She is distraught. She hires us to show her where this Carmelo is. And we find him again for her, and he is in a beach house near Cozumel, and we go away. And this woman, she comes back there another time, and you know what she does. She shoots and kills this boy.

"Then, she is not happy yet. A week after the boy is dead, she sends word to Juan Miguel she knows how his boy died, and he agrees to see her, and she has the photographs we took of Carmelo and her daughter, and when she explains the connection, so he understands, you see, she tries to kill him with a knife she has concealed, but they take it away from her. And then he tortures her. He wants to know how she killed his boy, how she found him. She tells them about us. She tells them Toño took the photographs. She mentions me, but she tells him Toño took the photographs. She remembers Toño because he wanted her. He wanted her badly. He tried to lie with her in his bed. It didn't work, but I believe when it came time to call names, she called his because she knew him better. She said he took the photographs and that I worked for him.

"He cuts off her nose and sets her free. She does not go to the doctor. She goes home, she takes pills, and she is dead. She could not face having no daughter and no nose. Juan Miguel, he sends his men to see Toño. I do not know what happened to him. Not really. They come to see me and tell me they have killed Toño. They say I was Toño's boss. I was not the one who took the photos, but in case I should ever want to bother in their business, they would leave me a reminder. This big one. Hammerhead. Or Oso as I called him. He beat me. He cut off the tip of my finger."

César held his right hand up. The tip of the little finger was missing, same as Beatrice.

"And he gives me this ear. Here. He hit me so hard with a slap he did that. I do not hear as well in that ear anymore. They let me live. That was a mistake."

"Did you try the police?" Brett asked.

César shook his head. "No. I know this place too well. Many of the policemen, they are good. They would do the law. But Juan Miguel, he owns those at the top. They run things as they see them, and they see them with money.”

“We’re sorry about your friend,” Brett said.

“Sorry is not important. Toño worked for me. He was not a friend. I did not like him much. He was good at what he did, but he was no brother. What I am mad about is my little finger and my ear. Juan Miguel, he will pay. But, unlike the woman, I do not go off half-cocked. I have waited my time. And now, with this tragedy of the woman …”

César reached out and patted Ferdinand on the arm, “… and the tragedy of your friend, the time is correct. He shall now pay. Tell me more of your plan.”

“We thought we’d kidnap his mistress,” Jim Bob said, “but we need you for that. We need to corner her somewhere. As for the bodyguards, you got me, Hap, and Leonard to take care of them.”

“No offense, gentlemen,” César said, “but are you capable?”

“I’d bet my life on them,” Jim Bob said.

“Oh, you will,” César said.

28

IT WAS A TIGHT FIT in the rental, but thankfully, the trip was brief. César drove the car to a spot on the beach and parked us next to a high wide pile of large white stone slabs.

“There was to be a house here,” César said as we got out of the car. “But it fell through. These stones. They were cut to be part of the foundation. The man having it built, he must have lost money. Or lost his wife. Or maybe he builds it for his mistress and she leaves him. I cannot say. Something went wrong. Perhaps he is still the owner of this land. There, where the grass grows up to the beach, that was where he was to build. This was the beginning, these stones. And they were the end.”

The huge stones were cut in even rectangles four inches thick and maybe four feet long, and three feet across. It was obvious they had once been stacked neatly, but weather, or perhaps people climbing on them, had caused them to shift in places. Some of the stones had fallen and broken against others. At the peak of the pile was a colorful bird. I had never seen that kind of bird before. As I watched, it took to the sky. It looked like a bouquet of flowers exploding.

César had placed a telescope in the trunk, and now he got it and the stand out, climbed to the top of the slab pile with it, moving his little round body as surefooted as a mountain goat. He fastened the scope to its tripod, positioned it on a flat piece of rock, focused, looked through, called down, “Come see.”

I went up first, realizing that going up was not as easy for me as César had made it look. I felt slabs shift under my feet. I yelled down for the others to watch out, went carefully, finally found the top.

A moment later the others worked their way up. We clutched together at the top around the telescope.

“This is a good telescope,” César said. “I use it in my work.

After what happened to me and Toño, I began to find out more about this Juan Miguel. I come here … and to another spot higher up, among the trees there, and observe from time to time. Juan Miguel spends much time at home. He likes the middle of the day to eat his lunch and answer his phone. Come look for yourself.”

I looked. The sun was bright on the house and there was a blinding reflection off a great satellite dish that looked like a flying saucer that had landed on its edge. There were palms and shrubs and flowering plants to the left of the house that grew so thick they completely concealed anything that might be behind them.

It was a huge house, mostly glass and stone, surrounded by a fence of rock and mortar positioned at the peak and around a great rise of land covered in greenery and scrubby trees. The way the rise sloped toward us, you could see the close-clipped backyard and the swimming pool and patio. Their view from up there would be terrific. You would see the road below, the greater highway, and beyond that the sandy white beach and the deep blue sea.

There was a man sitting at a table under a patio roof, shirtless, shoeless, wearing a pair of khaki shorts. He was talking on the phone. He was middle-aged, brown, a little heavy.

Closer to the fence was the pool. Someone was swimming in the pool. I watched. It was a woman. She climbed out. She was tall and lean and dark with shoulder-length black hair. She looked middle-aged, and she looked to have worn well. I could tell that even from a distance. She was topless and proud of it. Walked with her back straight, shoulders back, her breasts forward like copper headlamps. The bikini she wore was a dark color and covered her in the front but did little to hide anything else.

“Damn,” I said.

“Ah, that would be his wife you are seeing,” César said. “Is she nude?”

“Damn near it.”

“She likes to go without the top. Sometimes she wears nothing at all. Juan Miguel. He often goes nude. They are very much into the nudity. They travel to nudist camps worldwide I am told. They think the life is healthy. And then there is Hammerhead. Do you see him?”

“Nope,” I said. “Damn. She’s a beauty … And he’s screwing around with another woman?”

“Alas, it happens. And she too is magnificent, this other woman. And younger.”

“They always are,” Brett said.

“If the guy takes off his pants,” Leonard said, “let me know. Then I’ll want a look.”

“I would like to see,” Ferdinand said.

“Look,” I said.

He looked through the telescope. “I want him to see my face before he dies. I want him to know why.”

“We all do,” Brett said. She stood with her arm around my waist.

“I’d just settle for him being dead,” I said. “A good rifle, and bam, he’s out of here.”

In fact, I knew it was a shot I could make if I had the right instrument. I had learned to shoot a rifle on my daddy’s knee, and though my close vision wasn’t what it used to be, I could still see far away and well.

“No,” César said. “I agree with Ferdinand. He must know.”

“After he knows, he’s got a long time not knowing,” I said. “What’s the difference? We got to do this thing, why not just do it?”

Because I will think of it forever,” César said. “And I will cherish it forever. The look on his face when I explain.”

“You have to have time to explain.”

César grinned at me.

“I don’t think you’re going to find this type of revenge all that satisfying,” I said.

“Oh, I will,” César said. “Are you losing your stomach for this?”

“I’m beginning to think I never had the stomach for it.”

Brett took hold of the telescope, said, “Let me take a look.”

She said, “Oh, my God. That must be Hammerhead. Jesus Christ. You put a sock and shoe on his dick, stroked it a couple times, he could use it as a third leg.”

I took over the scope.

“My Lord.”

The man was monstrous and naked. He had come into the yard carrying a barbell decked with weights. I saw now there were other weights in the yard, and there was a weight rack. Hammerhead was completely nude. Miguel’s wife had stretched out on a towel and was rubbing her long legs with lotion. She had put on sunglasses. Her head was turned in Hammerhead’s direction, head tilted slightly like a dog that had spotted a salami, and in way, she had.

Hammerhead’s body coiled and the weights rose, he uncoiled and they lowered. He repeated the process. Muscles crawled and knotted under his flesh like angry pigs struggling in a sack. He was the biggest man I had ever seen. Not the tallest, or the heaviest. Just the biggest. His shoulders were broad enough to maybe just hold up the sky. His chest was like the Hoover Dam. His arms were big enough to be used to beat the World Wrestling Federation to death all at the same time. His penis hung long and limp and seemed as big around as my wrist.

“He is one big motherfucker,” I said.

“Is he as big as Big Man Mountain?” Leonard asked, referring to a wrestler we had crossed paths with once.

“He could hide Big Man Mountain under his nut sack,” Jim Bob said, glancing through the scope. “I told you he was big, didn’t I, Hap?”

“Let me look at this,” Leonard said. He took a look. He said, “Good God, his goober and balls look like grapefruits hanging off a fence post. He got that thing up someone’s asshole they’d have to get it out with crowbars, maybe dynamite it free. He is one creepy motherfucker. Maybe a rifle shot for the both of them isn’t such a bad idea. Or in his case, maybe a couple land mines.”

“No,” César said. “I will not do it that way.”

“Nor will we,” Jim Bob said. “Now we need to get started.”

29

We had to wait a few days and watch the mistress. Actually, I didn't watch anything. César, Ferdinand, and Jim Bob did the watching. They took turns near the mistress's house, parking nearby and observing, sometimes from a distance with the scope.

Me, Brett, and Leonard got the cushy part of the deal, which probably meant Jim Bob was afraid me and Leonard would fuck things up.

Brett and I stayed at the hotel, in bed a lot. Leonard spent time in the swimming pool. Each day the three of us met for lunch, and in the afternoons, Ferdinand and Jim Bob, or Ferdinand and César, or some combination of the three would meet us back at the hotel for dinner while the other watched. Ferdinand was very uncomfortable when he was one of the two who joined us for dinner. He was not used to restaurants.

It was one of the few times in my life I had lived like I had money, and I was enjoying it.

I did have money. But it was seeping away daily, like a sand angel washed by the waves.

About four days after we arrived in Playa del Carmen, Jim Bob met us for dinner without Ferdinand or César. We were sitting at a poolside table, and Brett had ordered margaritas for herself and Leonard, and they were going at it when he walked up.

"Just you today?" I said.

"That's right. César and Ferdinand are on their way to Mexico City."

"The mistress went shopping?" I said.

"Looks that way. She went to the airport. César gave me a cell phone, left me sitting under a palm tree, followed her in the car, then called me back. They were at the airport. He said she was getting a ticket to Mexico City."

“How does he know?” Brett asked. “She might have been getting a ticket to Juárez.”

“He knows,” Jim Bob said. He smiled at her. “He’s a detective. Remember?”

“Ah,” Brett said.

“César and Ferdinand were about to get tickets to follow. Guess they did. He said for us to meet him in Mexico City at the Presidente Intercontinental Hotel. After I got all that, I walked a couple miles, hitched a ride, and here I am.”

“When do we leave?” Leonard asked.

“Not before dinner,” Jim Bob said. “I can assure you of that.”

The summer days were long, so it was still full light by the time we finished dinner and took a taxi to the airport in Cancun. We bought tickets, waited about an hour, and flew out. The plane was poorly air-conditioned, so it was a stuffy, hot flight.

Brett and I were sitting together with a spare seat between us. We were holding hands like teenagers, but it was too humid, and by mutual unspoken agreement, we let go. I opened my shirt collar, adjusted the air-conditioning vent, but no help there.

“I got sweat beads in my crack,” Brett said. “Both cracks.”

“Overshare,” I said.

There were no clouds and the sun was beginning to dip as we flew into Mexico City’s airspace. We circled for a while. Through the window I could see mountains and snow-capped volcanoes bathed in the red of the dying sun.

Finally we flew in closer to the city. A haze of pollution thick enough to wear overalls hung over everything. Mixed with the sunlight the air achieved the color of a dried wound. Buildings jumped up at us and the streets below were as confused as a ball of twine.

Soon we were landing, hustling our luggage, trying to move through a sweaty crowd of people toward the street and a taxi. Jim Bob spoke to a driver and got us a ride. The car was once blue, but was now spotted like a pinto horse with gray filler. The tires were so worn-looking the rubber seemed attached to them by no more than a prayer.

We packed our luggage in the trunk, which smelled as if fish had recently been stored there, and no sooner had we closed the doors of the taxi than the driver gave it gas and leaped us out in front of traffic like a sacrifice.

Horns blared. We cruised at top speed through lights that once they turned red were shaded by at least three or four cars before anyone actually took heed of their color. We bounced the curb a couple of times, as if our driver might get points for pedestrians, and he may actually have clipped the ass of a slow-moving woman carrying a shopping bag. It was hard to tell if she was knocked or she jumped. She just went leaping away, her long blue dress fluttering, one shoe flying, the bag swinging on her arm by its rope handle.

I turned to look out the back window to see if she got up, but we turned so fast everything behind us became a blur and we edged in on another taxi as if to initiate a duel.

I glanced out the left-hand window of the back seat, saw we were close enough for me to put gas in the other taxi's tank, but that wasn't close enough. Not for our man. He edged in tighter, so close that if the elderly lady in the back seat had rolled down her window, we could have French kissed.

The lady looked to be on the verge of a stroke, or at least a very heavy-duty bowel movement. She glanced at me, swallowed. I smiled as our taxi driver cut down on his horn hard enough and loud enough to alert any ship channel within a thousand miles, then we shot away from the car beside us as if we had just vaulted to warp speed, changed lanes tighter than a suppository in a fat man's ass, went weaving, honking, and being honked at all the way to the Presidente Intercontinental.

As our driver pulled into the driveway at the hotel and I stepped out on solid ground, I felt like a ripped-up teddy bear that had just had its legs sewn back on, but without all the stuffing.

Our driver lugged our luggage out of the trunk with the care of a murderer disposing of a body in a tar pit, and a fellow who looked as if he could bench-press the taxi came out, threw our bags on a rolling rack, and showed us he had all his teeth and every one of them yellow. Jim Bob paid the taxi driver, and we followed our toothy man with the rack to the front desk.

“I haven’t had that much fun since my last yeast infection,” Brett said.

“I just kept my eyes closed,” Leonard said.

Jim Bob talked in Spanish to a pretty woman at the desk with too much eye makeup. They smiled at each other a lot. Jim Bob borrowed the desk phone.

The phone conversation was short. Jim Bob talked to the lady at the desk again. She gave him some keys.

Jim Bob said, “César already has our rooms. You and me, Leonard, we’re roomies.”

“Oh boy,” Leonard said. “Up late spitting water and reading fashion magazines.”

“Hot damn,” Jim Bob said.

We rode the elevator up with the man with the luggage carriage, got our stuff loaded in our rooms, paid the guy off, then took a walk down the corridor where Jim Bob knocked on a door.

César opened up and let us in. “Qué pasa,” he said.

He was dressed in a navy blue shirt that fit him tight as a grapeskin. His pants were tight as well, and too short. He looked like someone who had tucked his belongings into his crotch and was trying to wade high water.

Ferdinand appeared, wearing what must have been one of César’s shirts; it was black as the grave and the collars were flared as if they were wings. He was silent as usual, sat at the table near the window, looking down at the streets and the hot sunshine. He was drinking a Mexican beer. Another was on the table, opened.

“Would you like drinks?” César asked. He opened up the little bar with his key. Brett and Leonard took a beer, I took a Diet Coke. We sat on one of the beds, César took a chair at the table. He said, “Our little mistress is quite the busy one already.”

“Aren’t we supposed to go out and spring on her or something?” Leonard said.

“In due time,” César said. “I have followed her before, remember. Jim Bob and I followed her. But I have watched her before that."

"Why?" Brett said.

"I have watched her because I have watched everything there is to know about this Juan Miguel. I am very patient, you see. But I must confess, this idea of kidnapping her, it had not occurred to me. It is a good idea for what you have in mind. I should have thought of it some time ago."

"We are masters of crime," I said.

"She is in this hotel," César said. "It is where she always stays. She will go to the Museum of Anthropology. She will shop, and she will come to the restaurant here to have her dinner. This is her schedule in the past."

"What if she changes it?" I said.

"It is possible, but I will chance that she does not."

"You're chancing our money, César," I said. "I only have so much. I can't run around all over Mexico."

"Trust me," César said. "Tell them, Jim Bob."

"Trust him," Jim Bob said.

"I feel better," Brett said.

"What's up with the Museum of Anthropology?" Leonard asked.

"That is for Juan Miguel, or so I believe," César said. "I think she is trying to sell certain pieces that Juan Miguel has to the museum. She goes there each time she comes here. Juan Miguel, as I'm sure my friend Jim Bob has explained to you, is known to have an extensive collection, known to traffic in antiquities. So it is possible."

"And maybe," Brett said, "the reason she's his mistress is she shares Juan Miguel's interests. Maybe she isn't just a poke piece, but someone who is smart, sophisticated, and loves anthropology and archaeology, and maybe his wife doesn't."

"And she's a poke piece," Jim Bob said.

"That too," Brett said. "But Hap and I are attracted to each other because we share interests."

"Like what?" Jim Bob said.

"Chickens. He protects them, and I deep-fry them."

“I was once asked to masturbate a rooster,” I said.

“I don’t even want to know about that,” Jim Bob said.

“I think that I would, señor,” said César.

Even Ferdinand looked interested.

I told them about being offered a job to garner rooster sperm. César laughed as if I had told him the best joke he had ever heard.

Brett said, “That’s my man.”

“Yeah,” I said. “Hard to believe I turned them down.”

“About this thing we’re doing?” Leonard asked. “You know, the thing that’s not as exciting as jerking a chicken’s nub, but this thing with the woman … She has her body-guards with her, of course?”

“Of course,” César said.

“Are they big?”

“Big enough, señor.”

“As in big and mean?”

“I would say so. Yes, señor, big and mean.”

“Shit.”

“Armed of course?” I asked.

“Unless those big bumps under their arms are breasts that have slid sideways, I believe so, señor.”

“Maybe we could talk them into just arm wrestling us for her?” Leonard said.

“Will you two just shut up,” Jim Bob said.

I looked at Leonard and grinned. He wrinkled his mouth into a near smile. Brett reached over, patted me on the leg. She either loved my humor or was kind enough to make me think so.

“The best time to grab the woman would be when they come up from dinner to their room,” César said. “They have a very nice room at the top of the hotel.”

“You know they’re in this room because they always are?” I asked.

“Yes. Juan Miguel pays for this, so he sees she has the best. Tomorrow, that will be the day when she does the serious shopping. It is too late today, and I am too tired. I say we have a good dinner, rest, and tomorrow, I will tail them. Is that how you say it, Jim Bob, tail them?"

"Yeah," Jim Bob said.

"I will tail them, and then when she has her dinner, you will be prepared when she comes up, and you will take care of the guards—"

"Hey, I don't want to kill these guys," I said. "That's not part of the deal. We want Juan Miguel and the walking haystack, but these other guys, I don't want to kill them."

"Then do not," César said. "But take care of them. Make your choice. Take the woman. Make her quiet."

"Then what?" Leonard said. "Do we knock her unconscious, beat her up in the hall?"

"Do not worry," César said. "I have brought the chloroform. You put it on a rag, give her a whiff, and she will fall to the ground. You can do it with the guards too, but they may not fall so fast. They are big and strong and most certainly willful. I leave that to you."

"You know," I said to Jim Bob, "I think your additions to my basic plan aren't all that better than the basic plan. My plan sucks, and this is better?"

"Believe me," Jim Bob said. "It's better. And there's more to it. Most of it will be passed on to you on a need-to-know basis."

"Boss," Leonard said. "Dat a good idea. We don't wants lots of stuffs in our haids might be confusin'."

"You got that right," Jim Bob said.

"I suppose Jim Bob has told you that you are all listed under false names?" César said.

"He failed to mention that," I said.

"I was going to," Jim Bob said. He told us our false names.

César said, "Meet here at four P.M. tomorrow, local time. If you have watches, make sure they are set correctly. Come to this room and wait until you get a phone call."

"From who?" I asked.

"From me. I will be watching her. Ferdinand will let you in so you can wait. I will call when they are near.”

“What about guns?” Leonard said.

“I will take care of that, my friend,” César said.

Jim Bob said, “I’m going to my room now, going to watch a little Mexican TV, then get a good night’s sleep. What about you, Leonard?”

“I got a key,” Leonard said. “I’ll come along shortly.”

“Suit yourself,” Jim Bob said, and left the room.

Leonard went with me and Brett to our room, had another drink. I said, “This thing is starting to involve more people than the U.S. Army. And it seems like there’s more people to hurt all the time. All I want to do is nab the woman, set her up as an insurance policy for us so we can do what we have to do.”

“It’ll be okay, Hap,” Leonard said. He stood up. “Good night, brother. Good night, Brett.”

30

NEXT MORNING AFTER BREAKFAST I couldn't bring myself to sit in the hotel room, because all I did then was brood on our plans. The old saw about revenge is a dish best served cold is bullshit. Revenge is only sweet in the heat of the moment.

Brett was willing, so we went walking. The streets were crowded and the air was blistering to the eyes. Within fifteen minutes the pollution had done a job on my throat. It felt as if a little man with a bad temper had moved into my mouth and sandpapered my tonsils.

We walked over to the Anthropology Museum and looked around. I loved it. Deep inside me I felt old longings. As a child I had often thought of teaching, perhaps archaeology or history. Here I was, in my forties, a night guard in a chicken plant. I didn't even have a college education, just a piece of one. There wasn't much point thinking about what might have been, but as we walked about and looked at things, I thought about it anyway.

"I wish we had time to go out and see the pyramids," Brett said. "The Temple of the Sun and the Moon aren't far from here. A day's excursion."

I looked at my watch. "How about lunch instead?"

"Lunch is good."

We left the museum and walked until we came to an interesting restaurant. It wasn't fancy, but it wasn't exactly a hole in the wall either. No one spoke English there, so we pointed at the menu a lot, not sure of what we were getting.

It turned out to be something the waiter called mole de quajalote, and it was good. It tasted like some kind of bird, maybe turkey, in a very sweet sauce. We also had a dish called cochinita pibil, which I could tell was made from pork.

When we finished with the meal, they brought out a sweet bread and a kind of pudding made of milk, fruit, sugar, and stuff I couldn’t identify. It was too sweet for me.

Feeling like funnel-fed geese, we decided to walk off the meal. Outside the air was rawer than before. It had a stench, like gasoline mixed with sewage, tortillas, and frying meat. The last two smells came from the large number of vendors who cooked you meals on the spot. Chances were, you ate the stuff in the square, you could get a case of the squirts that would make a mud slide seem tame.

We looked at huge and beautiful churches, took a short walking tour that was guided by a man that almost spoke English, though it was certainly better than my Spanish, and finally we ended up at the Mexico City zoo. It was a huge zoo, well tended, but as always, like circuses, it made me sad. Polar bears housed in southern regions do not consider themselves on a tropical vacation. They just look lost.

About three in the afternoon we caught a taxi, found out our first experience had not been a fluke. This taxi ride was just as scary, and by the time we arrived back at the hotel, the sweet sauce I had eaten was nestled in the back of my throat.

We went up to our room, brushed our teeth, looked at our watches. We were about fifteen minutes early. We checked to make sure both our watches said the same thing. They did. Finally, we said fuck it, walked over to César’s room, knocked on the door.

Ferdinand let us in. About five minutes later, Leonard showed up.

“You sightsee?” I said.

“Just the back of my eyelids,” Leonard said. “I slept in. Jim Bob snores like a goddamn bear. I didn’t sleep good last night. I’m sort of pissed off, actually. I don’t like it when I don’t sleep well.”

“Where’s Jim Bob?” Brett said.

“He was gone when I got up. I grabbed some lunch, read a Western Jim Bob had brought with him, went to the bathroom a lot, blew my nose, looked out the window, and here I am.”

“Quite a prosperous day,” I said.

There was a knock on the door. I looked through the peephole.

Jim Bob was shooting me the finger.

I opened the door, said, “What an adolescent.”

“I drop these pants, boy, you’ll think adolescent. Calling me a child is like calling—”

“Oh, just come in and shut up,” Brett said.

There were two suitcases setting on either side of Jim Bob. He picked them up, carried them into the room. He put them on the bed.

“What you got there?” Brett asked. “Sex toys?”

“You wish,” Jim Bob said. “César’s contacts. They’re bad boys.”

Inside one suitcase was something wrapped in a white towel. Jim Bob removed that, laid it carefully on the bed. It was a bottle of chloroform.

He removed a folded duffel bag from the suitcase and unfolded it. It was about six feet in length. Beneath it were a couple of blackjacks, a slapjack, and four nine-millimeter automatics. The other case contained ammo clips and several pieces that went together to make a rifle and a sawed-off double-barrel shotgun. The rifle had a scope and a silencer. There was ammunition for both guns.

“I still think shooting him from a distance is the way to go,” I said.

“He must know who it is that kills him,” Ferdinand said.

“Yep,” Jim Bob said. “It’s a grace note. Five seconds of knowing you’re about to die, for whatever reason, is a long goddamn time. Shooting him from a distance is just doing the motherfucker a favor.”

“All right,” I said. “Outline it.”

“For what we’re doing here,” Jim Bob said, “the guns are out. We take the blackjacks, or the slapjack, our hands, whatever. We use the chloroform. We get these two guys down quick, we nab the woman, put her out of commission, and we’re out of here.”

“How are we out of here?” Brett asked.

“We stick the woman in the duffel bag, we check out, we get in the black van out front that César will have waiting, we go to the airport, and he drives the woman back to his place. We meet there."

"Why don't we just put her in our pocket and walk out?" Leonard said. "A duffel bag? That's it? A fuckin' duffel bag?"

"It'll work," Jim Bob said. "Trust me."

"So we're supposed to meet them as they come up the elevator," I said. "What if someone rides up the elevator with them?"

"They won't," Jim Bob said. "César says they never ride up or down with anyone. They wait until they have it to themselves. Safety precautions."

"Don't these guys know what César looks like?" Brett said. "I mean, hell, they cut the tip of his finger off and slapped his ear silly."

"These men may or may not," Jim Bob said. "But they won't see him if he doesn't want to be seen. César's good. Almost as good as me."

"Why so much protection?" Brett said. "Is she made of gold?"

"She's protected because of people like us," Jim Bob said. "Juan Miguel protects his property, and to him, she's property."

"So the elevator opens on this floor," Leonard said. "What's to prevent someone else being in the hallway, seeing us go at these guys?"

"Nothing," Jim Bob said. "We deal with that if it happens."

Just before six the phone rang. Jim Bob answered, listened, hung up. He turned to us.

"Yippie ki 'eah."

I put the slapjack in my back pocket, Leonard took a blackjack, and Jim Bob brought only himself. Ferdinand said, "And me?"

"You're going to have to wait in the room," Jim Bob said. "When we knock, you be right by the door and let us in. Got me?"

Ferdinand nodded.

Brett opened the door for us and tagged along behind carrying a towel. She had poured it full of chloroform, and the stench of it was strong in the hall.

“This is so fucked,” she said.

“I’m about to swoon here,” Leonard said. “Brett, you think maybe you got enough of that crap on the towel?”

“Too much and you’ll kill her,” Jim Bob said. “Hit her with it quick, then get it off her face.”

No one was in the hallway. We stopped at the elevator. The numbers on the elevator light were racing toward our floor. Then the other elevator started moving up.

“Which elevator are they in?” I asked.

“I don’t know,” Jim Bob said.

“Oh, shit. That’s good.”

We tried to stand casual, just a wad of folks waiting to get on the elevator. The door opened. A short, stocky woman just shy of three thousand years old with sparse hair dyed shoe polish black and at least twenty-five whisker hairs to match, also dyed, stepped out of the elevator carrying a white poodle with a leash.

Brett leaned close to my ear, spoke softly. “Maybe we should sap her once for not getting rid of that mustache.”

“Twice,” I said. “She also has a poodle.”

The woman moved slowly, putting the dog down, leading it on its leash. She had just turned the corner away from the elevator, out of sight, when the other elevator’s light hit our floor and the door opened, and there was one of the most astoundingly beautiful women I have ever seen.

She was probably five seven, a little over a hundred pounds, well built, face like an angel, large black eyes and soft black hair that flowed to the middle of her back. She wore a short blue dress and matching high heels. Her legs were fashioned from a dream. She looked very elegant.

The guys on either side of her were well dressed, but not so elegant. They would have looked the same in thousand-dollar suits or tablecloths. They looked about as casual as meat gravy stains on a white shirt.

As they stepped out of the elevator, Jim Bob said something pleasant in Spanish, stepped aside. As they passed, the guard on the left eyed Jim Bob. Brett took hold of her skirt, pulled it up and scratched her leg, causing the skirt to ride almost to her hip.

The guy looked.

Jim Bob sapped him. It was a good lick. The guy stumbled, Jim Bob leaped on him, started beating him like a hamburger steak.

The other guy was on the move now, his hand going inside his coat. Leonard grabbed that hand with his left, poked the man in the eyes with his right. The big bastard grunted, his hand came out of his coat, he tried to reach for his face, but Leonard had that hand. Leonard twisted slightly, and the dude flipped, hit the floor hard, banging the side of his head. I kicked the poor bastard hard as I could. He didn't go out, but he didn't act as if he was in any hurry to get up.

Leonard bent down over him and went to work with the sap. It sounded like a carpenter driving a pesky nail. Even after I thought the guy was out, I heard the sap ring a half dozen more times.

Brett had wrestled the woman to the floor and was trying to push the chloroform-filled towel over her face, but no luck. The woman started to scream.

Jim Bob pulled Brett off the mistress, brought his palm down swift, but not too hard on the woman's forehead, just above the eyebrow at the left corner.

She went out.

I was standing, panting. The place stank of chloroform. I had moved away from the elevator wall, and now I could see down the hall. The woman with the poodle had stopped, listening to those screams.

Brett stepped into the hallway. "A bug. A spider. It frightened me."

The woman looked puzzled.

Jim Bob stepped into view, he spoke Spanish. The woman grinned, said something in Spanish. She and her dog went on down the hallway.

"What did you say?" Brett asked.

"Just what you did. I told her you saw a spider."

"What did she say?"

"What a sissy. Words to that effect."

“I’m not sure I like that.”

When the old woman was out of sight, Leonard removed the guns from the bodyguards, got one of the guys by the leg and started dragging him down the corridor toward Jim Bob’s room. Jim Bob got the other guard by the leg, and I picked up the woman. She was as small as a child.

I looked down at her. A small purple bruise was forming at the corner of her eye. She was so gorgeous I felt as if her beauty were sucking out my soul. I could see why Juan Miguel would leave his wife. It’s a hard thing to admit beauty alone can make you crazy, but a woman like this, good God, she could make you crazy.

“When we get her to the room,” Brett said, “maybe you could tuck her in, give her a bottle.”

I made a snorting sound. “I hope you’re not jealous of someone we just tried to chloroform and hit on the head.”

“I’m jealous of someone who looks like a magazine cover, that’s what I’m jealous of,” Brett said.

Jim Bob knocked, Ferdinand opened the door. Jim Bob and Leonard dragged the guards inside. I carried the woman and put her on the bed. She had begun to stir. She opened her eyes. Brett, smiling, leaned forward and pushed the chloroform-filled towel over her nose. The woman struggled briefly, went out.

Brett pulled the towel away.

“Tie up and gag these mooses,” Jim Bob said. “And quick before they wake up. Tie her up too, and pull her dress down. I don’t need to see that. I like it, but I don’t need to see it. I better not see it. Damn, those panties are sheer …”

“We get the picture,” Brett said.

31

WE BOUND THEM and gagged them with strips of sheets. We poured the chloroform down the sink, put the towel in the tub. The air was still fairly stout with it. We opened a window. We turned on the TV set, sat the bodyguards on the floor with their backs against the bed.

We found a Spanish game show. Jim Bob patted them on the head and we left out of there, the woman in the duffel bag, slung over Leonard’s shoulder.

We rode the elevator down. As Jim Bob and Brett stopped at the desk with our keys, prepared to check us out, Leonard and I walked outside to the curb. There was a black van there. César got out of it, nodded at us. He opened the side of the van. Leonard put the duffel bag on the seat, closed the door.

“We will see you in Playa del Carmen in a while,” César said. “We must drive the whole way. Where is Jim Bob?”

“Coming,” Leonard said.

Jim Bob and Brett came out. Jim Bob got in the van. Before he closed the door I looked at the duffel bag on the seat. “She’s moving,” I said.

Jim Bob reached inside his coat, pulled out the blackjack. With a motion a ballet dancer would have appreciated, he shifted in his seat and smacked the bag where the head was. The bag quit moving.

“Goddamn, Jim Bob,” I said. “It’s not her we want to hurt.”

“You want I should take her to a bullfight?” Jim Bob said. “A bump on her head is better than us in a Mexican jail. You should know.”

I closed the door, César drove them away.

We had a slightly better ride to the airport than from it. I was able to get out of the taxi without feeling faint. Our life had only been in danger maybe half a dozen times.

We caught our flight out without incident, arrived that night in Cancun, took our rental back to Playa del Carmen. We didn't have reservations, but we got our same hotel without trouble. Leonard got a room. Brett and I shared a room.

That night, when she finished brushing her teeth, Brett said, "Do you think that woman is beautiful?"

I was stepping out of the shower. "Ravishing," I said.

"She was very pretty."

"Ravishing."

"Don't overdo it if you want Mr. Happy to actually be happy tonight."

"But with that knot on her head from the blackjack, not so beautiful. And you know what? Jim Bob may have hit her again. Maybe a lot of times. She could be real ugly by now."

"That's better. And dry under your balls. I hate it when they're sticky on my ass."

"You say the most exciting things," I said.

"Do you know what they're planning to do?"

"About as much as you do. They'll drive her to César's, taking their time. Maybe stop along the way a couple of nights. Tomorrow, a couple of us go to see the man, tell him we have her, and then we lay the trap."

Brett had slipped out of her clothes, and I was enjoying watching her pull on a nightie with no underwear. No underwear was always a good sign.

32

THREE NIGHTS LATER, about three A.M., we got a call.

“Come over.” It was Jim Bob.

“On our way.”

I woke Brett up. Called Leonard’s room, fifteen minutes later we were in the rental, wheeling our way to César’s house.

César let us in. He was colorful as usual, a purple shirt with red and green parrots on it, white slacks and slip-on white shoes without socks.

Jim Bob looked his usual self, but for the moment, he was without his hat. I was surprised to discover he had hair.

Ferdinand was sitting quietly in a chair, hands rested in his lap. He looked calm, as if he were waiting to drop the lever on a guillotine. He smiled thinly at us, nodded his head.

Hermonie sat on one end of the couch, looking pretty and inscrutable in a pale yellow pants suit. When we came in, she didn’t speak, didn’t change her expression. There was nothing about her to acknowledge we had entered the room except a lifting of her eyes.

On the other end of the couch, her hands cuffed in front of her, a chain fastened to the center of the cuffs on her ankles, was the mistress. She looked like a goddess, except for a faint blue bruise above her right eye. I assumed, under that luxurious mane of black hair, would be at least one blackjack knot. She was smoldering. I half expected the couch to burst into flames.

On the coffee table in front of the mistress was a plate of food, untouched from the looks of it.

“More bastards!” she said. “You are all bastards!”

“Actually,” Brett said, “technically, I’m a bitch.”

“Bastards! All bastards!”

“Her English,” Jim Bob said, “is quite good, especially when it comes to cuss words. We took our time getting here, and we’ve had her here awhile, doing a bit of interrogation.”

“Juan Miguel will kill you,” she said. “He will have you skinned. He will nail your skins to walls and he will piss on them.”

“Do you want to be gagged?” Jim Bob said. “I’ll use my dirty underwear again.”

The mistress went silent, but the looks she gave Jim Bob were almost enough to skin him without Juan Miguel’s help.

“Her name is Ileana,” Jim Bob said.

“Fuck you, you pig,” Ileana said. “Fuck you. Fuck you.”

“Dirty underwear, dear,” Jim Bob said. “Ones with the Hershey stains in the seat.”

“Jesus,” Brett said. “You’re not even threatening to gag me and I’m scared.”

Ileana went silent again, but she wasn’t happy about it.

“What’s next?” I said.

“We have already contacted Juan Miguel,” Jim Bob said. “Told him we had his woman. He really wants her back,” Jim Bob said. “I don’t know he cares for her so much—”

“He loves me,” Ileana said. “He loves me much. He will hate you much.”

Jim Bob put a finger to his lips. “You be quiet now. As I was saying, I don’t know how much he cares for her, but he wants her back, talks like he’s lost a wallet or something and wants it back. He doesn’t talk like she’s a person.”

“Neither do you,” Brett said.

“No, I don’t, lady. It makes things easier not to. He wants her back, so I arranged a meeting. You and me, Hap. We’ll do it.”

“Will it be safe?” Brett said.

“Safe as we can make it,” Jim Bob said. “We got something Juan Miguel wants.”

Jim Bob stopped at a phone booth on the way into Playa del Carmen. He didn’t want to chance César’s home phone or cell phone number. If the number could be traced, Juan Miguel might have the contacts to trace it.

César had somehow gotten Juan Miguel's number, either through research or from Ileana. I hoped he had not done anything bad to her to get it.

Jim Bob called and talked while I stood outside the old rickety phone booth. As he talked, three young Mexican men wandered over in our direction.

I knew their intent. I had seen it many times. Thugs come in all colors and sizes, but they all walk just alike. I figured a phone booth that worked, located in a dark place, this time of night, was a great spot for them to pull off a mugging.

By the time Jim Bob finished talking and came out of the booth, they were about ten feet away. He reached in his coat and pulled out one of the nine millimeters, said something in Spanish while he waved it around.

The three thugs bolted away into the darkness.

"You have such a way with words," I said.

"Ain't that the goddamn truth," Jim Bob said.

"How'd it go?"

"They're expecting us."

"Jim Bob."

"Yeah."

"Ileana. You didn't really hurt her, did you?"

"I think that sap shot hurt pretty good."

"I mean beyond that."

"No … You planning on dating her?"

"I merely meant I don't want to see her hurt. I feel scummy. She's an innocent bystander."

"In a manner, but in another, she knows who Juan Miguel is. She knows what kinds of things he does. She profits from this, Hap. Don't get too fuckin' sentimental just because she's a looker. She got in bed with this mangy, flea-bitten dog, and she's got his fleas on her now. That's the long and the short of it."

We drove along the beach toward the great house that belonged to Juan Miguel. It was full of light up on the rise, stood there like a gem growing out of the ground.

We came around on its back side, stopped at a wide metal gate. There was a box you talked into, and Jim Bob did that. The gate opened. Jim Bob took the nine millimeter out from under his coat and pushed it under the car seat.

“They’re gonna search us anyway, take it away,” he said. “You got anything?”

“A wallet.”

“Put it under the seat. That’s what I’m doing.”

I did that. He said, “Anything else?”

“Nothing that isn’t attached.”

“Let’s hope they let us keep that stuff,” Jim Bob said.

We drove through the gate, down the drive, up to the house. Juan Miguel’s home was even more awesome close up, like something I thought the movies made up. Three stories high, lots of glass, the rest of it pink stone with a red tile roof and a front porch big enough to build a tennis court on. The porch was made of stone too, but snow white, as if it were bleached daily and polished. The house and porch gleamed fairy-tale-like in the soft glow of the night lights that poked out of the shrubs and palm trees, but the tall tinted windows deadened the light like cataracts.

Surrounded by low-cut shrubbery was a well-lit pool. It was to the right of the house, the color of a sapphire, the shape of a kidney. A diving board perched above it like an extended tongue. It was a big pool, and I knew from my telescopic eavesdropping it was smaller than the one at the rear of the house, which had through the looking glass appeared big enough and deep enough to provide Shamu the Killer Whale with a vacation home.

“Damn sure beats a double-wide, don’t it?” Jim Bob said.

“I once knew a fella fastened two double-wides together,” I said. “That was pretty nice.”

Jim Bob chuckled.

The door opened and two guys in tan suits came out on the stone porch. From where we sat, they looked like two fleas standing on canvas, about to go through their act. They were the two guys we had beat and tied up at the hotel in Mexico City.

As we got out of the car, Jim Bob said, “At least there are two people here who know us.”

“They are sweet,” I said, “but my guess is neither of them will be bringing pot luck lunches to Mensa’s next Christmas party.”

The air was stuffed with the smell of fresh-mowed grass and recently manicured shrubs. There was a touch of chlorine from the pool. If it had been daylight I’m sure a butterfly and bluebird would have lit on my shoulder.

The two came down the great steps carefully, as if they were afraid their pants might rip. It seemed to take them forever to cross the green, clipped lawn, make their way over to meet us. First thing they did was clobber the both of us. I took an uppercut in the belly and went down. I wanted to fight back, but didn’t. I took another clip to the side of the head, was yanked up and kicked in the ass. I made a note to remember that kick in the ass. Not to mention the fact I had a headache about the size of Alaska.

A moment later we were searched and four pesos I had in my front pocket were taken and Jim Bob lost a pocketknife out of the deal. We should have put those under the seat.

Next Jim Bob and I were hustled in front of them, toward the pool. Jim Bob had lost his hat in the beating, and it had been stepped on before he recovered it. As he walked along he was at work straightening it.

“They took it personal,” he said.

“Looks like.”

“I didn’t take the beating personal myself,” Jim Bob said. “But stepping on my hat was just mean, and I won’t forget it.”

“You’re like Leonard about his hats,” I said.

“I’ve never seen him in a hat.”

“They get stepped on.”

We went through a gap in the wall of shrubbery, between palm trees with lights on them, out to the side pool, which was bordered by copper-colored tile and on the far side there were plenty of bushes and trees and a fountain in the shape of an angel with wings spread wide. There was plenty of light on the sapphire pool and someone was in it, swimming. We were taken to a glass table, pushed down into white plastic chairs, spoken to in Spanish.

"They want us to stay," Jim Bob said.

"I figured that much. Goddamn, my gut hurts. That fucker has quite a punch."

"My guy hit like a sissy," Jim Bob said.

"You're lucky," I said. "He hit any harder than he did, you'd look like E.T. on that side of your face."

The person in the pool was obviously Juan Miguel. He swam a couple more laps just for show, then climbed out. He was butt-naked. One of the buffaloes gave him a long white towel and he went to drying himself.

He came over, flipping his dick and balls with the end of the towel. I didn't know if he were merely drying himself, or if it was some kind of greeting.

Up close I could see Juan Miguel was older than he had appeared through the telescope. He was in good shape, with a slightly protruding belly, but solid muscle tone. He had all his own hair and certainly dyed it. He was probably about five ten, one ninety and proud of himself.

"Qué pasa," Juan Miguel said, and he smiled so big the light bouncing off his teeth nearly put my eyes out.

"How's it hanging?" Jim Bob said.

Juan Miguel thought about that, then slowly he laughed. "How is it hanging. That is good. How is it hanging. As you can see, my man, it hangs quite well."

"Yeah. It almost looks like a real dick."

Juan Miguel said something in Spanish. One of the buffaloes stepped forward, slapped Jim Bob so hard he was knocked out of the chair and the chair went spinning. He lost his hat again. It rolled backward all the way to the shrubbery.

Juan Miguel looked at me. "Do you have a comment, sir?"

"I'm cool," I said.

Jim Bob got up, straightened his chair, recovered his hat, sat back down. "Where do you get these guys? A girls school?"

Juan Miguel made a movement with his mouth that wasn't quite a frown or a smile, but was certainly unpleasant. I thought Jim Bob was due for another slapping, or worse, but Juan Miguel took a breath, looked down at his package and continued drying it as if he were polishing a precious stone.

“Do you find nudity unpleasant?” Juan Miguel asked us.

“Yours, yes,” Jim Bob said. “But your woman, hey, I think she looks pretty good.”

Juan Miguel snapped something in Spanish, and this time both buffaloes jumped on Jim Bob. I wanted to help him, but I knew that wasn’t our game. Jim Bob took a short but rapid beating from their fists, then lay on his side and was kicked for a while.

I said, “You do that much longer, I can assure you, you’ll never see your mistress again, unless it’s in a ditch with a zucchini stuffed up her snatch.”

“Alto,” Juan Miguel said.

Jim Bob lay awhile longer this time, but finally he got up, brushed himself off, righted his chair, recovered his hat, which was the shape of a paper wad, and sat down. “The two of them together, working hard, are almost a man,” he said.

“You are crazy,” Juan Miguel said. “You want to die. And you will.”

Jim Bob spat blood on the stones. “Not unless you want that mistress to end up like my partner said. Only I’ll make sure she gets a zucchini in every hole. Maybe even a melon. No more beatings. No more bullshit. You listen to us. We don’t come back soon, call in, your girlfriend, she’s gonna end up in a bad way. You hear me, you cheap-ass Mexican Godfather wannabe. We’re just hired help, and it don’t mean a thing to us one way or another, except we want to come out of this alive and happy, and if things work out, you get your bitch back alive and happy, and we come out of it with some money. And let me tell you, I’m gonna talk to you, you get some drawers on, or wrap that towel around that limp piece of spaghetti, sit down and listen.”

“You are on my turf, you American turd. Nudity is healthy. I am sixty years old, and I know I do not look it. It is the nudity. The fresh air, the sun. I swim nude every night in this pool, and it has done wonders for me. Man was meant to have fresh air, sunlight, and exercise.”

“It’s dark,” I said.

“Yes, but there is the night air,” Juan Miguel said.

“We’re on your turf,” Jim Bob said, straightening his hat, “but we’ve got your muff. Let me tell you about nudity for health, Zorro. Tried it when I was twelve. Stripped off and played Tarzan. Climbed up in a tree and got a sunburn, damn near fried my pecker off, turned my ass the color of a Washington apple. I didn’t find it so healthy. You get a good sunburn on your general and it starts to peel, let me tell you, it’s highly uncomfortable.”

“You idiot,” Juan Miguel said.

“You gonna sit and deal, or you gonna bore me with your lifestyle choices?”

“You fool,” Juan Miguel said. “You think I am losing true love here? My wife, she is my true love. Ileana, she is a dalliance. A hobby. A pastime. She is one of many.”

I felt my stomach go sour. What if Ileana didn’t matter to him? What if he had women all over Mexico?

Then I thought: Like Ileana? Not likely. Who the hell was he fooling?

“I think we’re wasting time,” I said. “You want her, we best get to talking, and talking now.”

Juan Miguel studied us, as if to be certain we weren’t mirages, some stupid dream. He wrapped the towel around his waist, pulled out a chair and sat down. No sooner had he done that, as if on cue, out of the darkness near the pool, on the far side, something moved.

At first I thought one of the palm trees had come loose of its roots and was about to topple, but the base was much larger than the palms, and as it stepped into the light, I saw it was tall, but shorter than a tree. It looked like someone had stacked some brown tires in a pile, put sumo wrestler legs and arms on it, fastened a vague facsimile of a human head to the top, and tied an anaconda between its legs. It was, of course, our living Michelin Man, in the nude.

Juan Miguel saw our gaze had shifted from him to somewhere over his shoulder. He grinned. “Hammerhead, we call him.”

Hammerhead leaped into the pool with a splash that almost started a tidal wave. He swam across the pool with a couple of strokes, climbed out dripping on our side. He ambled toward us. Moby-Dick gone bipedal.

“What do you think?” Juan Miguel said, as proud as if he was showing us a pet, and I suppose he was. “Is he not something?”

Jim Bob, naturally endearing, said, “An ambulatory shit pile. But I wouldn’t want him to fall on me.”

As Hammerhead grew closer, he became even more frightening. Through the telescope I had not been able to see how strange his head was. The front of it protruded, then sunk toward the nose, which lay flat against his face like a splattered man who had jumped from a great height. He had more scars than a Gurkha division and there were little pale scars like road map lines against the darkness of his body. It was hard to tell his nationality. He was dark, but his features were almost blank. He had Asian eyes and a little mouth that held tiny white childlike teeth. When he moved, water trapped beneath the rolls of his flesh squished out. He came to stand next to Juan Miguel’s chair.

“You’re a cute couple,” Jim Bob said.

I thought, that’s it. Jim Bob’s gonna be dead so fast Juan Miguel will forget why we’re here. But nothing happened. He just stared at Jim Bob for a while. Then at me. He said, “You listen to me. You hurt Ileana, Hammerhead here, he will beat you to death.”

“He could probably do that with that sausage between his legs,” Jim Bob said. “Considering that peanut you carry, I’m surprised you keep this guy around. Seems like it would remind you of your shortcomings.”

Juan Miguel leaped to his feet, his fist crashed down on the table and the glass split and splattered into thousands of fragments that caught the light and ricocheted images of trees and shrubs at us.

When the glass fallout was over, Jim Bob, in a bored voice, said, “You broke your table.”

“Enough!” Juan Miguel said. “It is enough!”

“I guess he’s had enough,” Jim Bob said to me.

“Reckon so,” I said.

Juan Miguel was panting. “What is … How do you say it? The deal? What is it? Tell me now, or I have you killed.”

Juan Miguel’s hand was bleeding. He pressed it to the towel at his waist.

“The deal is this,” Jim Bob said. “We want half a million dollars for your little doll, and we want to tell you why we want the money.”

“I know why you want the money,” Juan Miguel said. “I know why anyone wants the money.”

“No,” I said. “No, you don’t. We want the money because of Beatrice and Charlie.”

“Who?”

“We want the money because you wanted to kill me and the old man. I even want it for Billy, and I didn’t even like that sonofabitch.”

“What is it that you are talking about?” Juan Miguel said, his words becoming more accented and purposeful. “What is the fuck you want?”

“That’s what the fuck,” Jim Bob said. “That’s the way you say it. No slight there, just thought you might like to know that for future reference.”

“You do have half a million?” I said. “We’d hate to think you don’t. ’Cause you don’t, we got to take less, well, you get her back, but without a little finger or a thumb. You know what I’m saying?”

“Let me tell you a little thing you have not thought of,” Juan Miguel said. “I get her back with any part missing, her hair cut, a scar on her thigh, I do not want her back. She must come back as she is supposed to be. She does not, she is of no use to me, understand?”

Definitely not true love, I thought. And, unlike us, he wasn’t bluffing.

“Very well,” I said. “She comes back pretty quick if you act pretty quick.”

“How dare you threaten me.”

I knew we were beginning to play it pretty close. Maybe Juan

Miguel was thinking now he could let Ileana go, shop for another. Then again, she was special. Unique. And she was his, and he liked to own things, and once owned, he didn't like giving them up.

I said, "Here are our demands. And we want you to know our reasons. So just listen. And tell Gorgo here to go play somewhere. He makes me nervous."

Juan Miguel spoke something in Spanish. Hammerhead's face stayed just the same. Not a flick of an eyelash. He went to the pool, dove in, began to swim.

"Because of his size, the way he looks," Juan Miguel said, "you might think he is a fool. He is not. He is very strong. And very loyal. He would do anything I ask. I want you to keep that in mind as you deal with me. You must prove to me that Ileana is alive. That she is okay. That she is unharmed merchandise."

"We can do that," Jim Bob said. "That's how we'll begin the down payment, with proof she's okay?"

"What kind of proof?"

"A phone call. She can speak to you to let you know she's all right. We come back here, you give us half the money."

"How much is this half?"

"This half is two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The other half, well, obviously we're talking half a million here. But you try to be smart. You try to get by not paying the money, I'll send her head home to you in a box. Comprende?"

Juan Miguel said, "Very well. But what has this to do with the people you named?"

"You're making me mad," I said.

"That bothers me so greatly," Juan Miguel said.

Jim Bob looked at his watch. "We're not back in half an hour, they kill the girl. So you had best listen and cut with the shit. Tell him, Hap."

I gave him a brief outline of the events I thought he needed to know, and when I was finished, Juan Miguel said: "That was a personal matter. She had it coming. She lied to me. She did not do as she said. That I cannot allow. I will not allow it with you. Do you understand?"

“What about Charlie, the man you killed because you thought it was me?”

“I thought you had helped her to try and con me. I did not like that. The same with this Billy. Mistakes. I can see that now. I was angry. I like to make a clean sweep, as you Americans say. I have her killed. She gives your name. They find this other man’s name on a card. I send Hammerhead to the States. He does the job. He comes home.”

“That’s it?”

“That is it, señor. Nothing mysterious. That is all.”

I wondered how a giant like Hammerhead had wandered around LaBorde without the cops hearing about him from some source. Juan Miguel must not have been kidding about him being smart.

I suppose I had wanted there to be more, some semi-valid reason for all the deaths, but there was none. It was as Jim Bob had figured. Juan Miguel cleaning up after himself, not wanting any messes left over from his dealings with Beatrice.

“So, this is your plan,” Juan Miguel said. “I could hold you, of course. I could make sure you do not leave.”

“We been over that,” Jim Bob said. “Fuck with us, the woman’s dead. For whatever reason, even if the reason belongs to someone else, you fuck up, she’s toast.”

“Toast?”

Jim Bob slapped the back of his hand into his palm. “Burned. Done. Wiped out.”

“Very well,” Juan Miguel said. “But do not make a mistake. Take care of Ileana. Very good care. And when I get her back. When you have your money. Please run. Run very far. For I will be at your back, my friends.”

“We’ll remember that,” Jim Bob said.

“There’s just one more thing,” I said.

“There always is,” Juan Miguel said.

“The archaeological items you wanted from Beatrice. They are real and they are available. They are for sale.”

“You must be out of your mind,” Juan Miguel said. “I would not buy them from you."

"Well, you see," I said, "they sort of go with the deal."

"Then we are not talking half a million of your dollars, are we?"

"I suppose not. I will reveal the location of the facades when I see the money."

"I no longer want them."

"That doesn't matter. You'll pay for them anyway. And then I won't give them to you. I'll donate them to the Anthropology Museum in Mexico City."

"How much?"

"That'll be another half million."

"A million American dollars. That is outrageous. No woman is worth that."

"Well, considering you can buy pussy for about two dollars in some places, I reckon you're right," Jim Bob said. "But if this woman is someone you like specifically, and can't be replaced easy—and let me tell you, she looks to me hard to replace under any circumstances—well, then, at least to you, she's worth a million dollars. It was me, and I was in your position, I'd buy her back. Oh boy, would I. And you want her, good buddy, you better let us leave in less than five minutes so we can stop and make a phone call along the way, say the deal's on so she doesn't get snuffed. And don't follow. I wouldn't like it."

"My men could work on you until I knew what I wanted to know," Juan Miguel said. "They are very good at that sort of thing."

"That's nice, but we made a pact with our group. We don't know anyone's real names. That way, you can torture us all you want, and we can't even tell you where each other lives, except the two of us. We know each other. But you got us. So how would that help? And it don't matter we did know, we told you where she is. By the time you get through doing what you got to do, it'll be way too late. I can hold out that long, I promise you."

Juan Miguel looked at his men, then he looked at us. I tried to remain cool and calm. I glanced at Jim Bob. He looked like he was waiting on a waiter to bring him a beer.

“Go,” Juan Miguel said. “Go. I will be waiting for her call. And she must answer me. It cannot be thought to be a recording. I must ask a question and she must answer so that I know she is alive and unharmed.”

“Fine,” Jim Bob said. “Remember, we’ll be listening. And I better not see your men, or your giant, anytime during the dealings. And when it comes time to trade, you’ll do it our way. Just you. And dress up, would you? And by the way, before we leave I want my pocketknife, and he wants his four pesos back.”

We went out to the car. Jim Bob drove us out of there. When we were away from the house, he checked the rearview.

“Well?” I asked.

“No one’s following.”

“Good,” I said, letting it out like a sigh.

Jim Bob held out his hand. It was shaking violently. He said, “Will you look at that?”

I held up my own shaking hand.

“Twins,” I said.

33

THAT NIGHT, in the hotel, Brett and I sat by our window in chairs pulled close together. I had wrapped some ice in a towel, and was holding it to the back of my head, trying to bring the swelling down on a knot one of Juan Miguel's Golems had given me.

We sat there with the shades wide, looked at the pedestrian walk and the sea beyond. The water looked oily and there were a number of dead fish washed up close to shore and they too were covered with something dark and slick.

The moon was a nasty slice of limburger, spotted by clouds that looked like soggy boles of field-spoiled cotton.

Jim Bob had dropped me off and driven out to César's.

"You really think Juan Miguel will come through with the money?" Brett asked.

"Truthfully, I don't know. And it doesn't matter. We don't want the money."

"But he might come through with it."

"You want the money, right?"

"Of course not. It's blood money. I don't want that. But what if he did come through with the money?"

"We meet him, he has the money, we kill him. We leave the money."

"It would be a shame to leave all that money. A quarter million first time, right? I mean, that's a lot of money to just leave lying around."

"Brett, I don't steal from the dead."

"I know. But listen. What if you took the money and gave it to Ferdinand? He could buy a new boat. He could go on with his life. If anyone deserves the money, it's him. His daughter was killed by that animal. Charlie, he doesn't have anyone he'd want to have the money. Certainly not his ex-wife."

"You got a point. It works out that way, okay. Ferdinand gets the money. Maybe César will have other ideas. I don't know. But it's okay with me."

"You're going to have him deliver half, right?"

"It's all he'll ever deliver," I said. "We're going to kill him, remember? Then let the girl go."

"You want to do this right, want to get him good, have him pay all the money, and on the last delivery kill him."

"You're cold, Brett."

"We're going to kill him anyway, right?"

"Right."

"He's a piece of shit, right?"

"Right."

"So we kill him, and we take him for a million. Ferdinand would never have to worry. And with that kind of money, neither would we."

I turned in my chair and looked at her.

"Brett, I'm not sure I believe my ears. Didn't you just say you didn't want the money?"

"It's a lot of money."

"It's not like we're finding it in a pig track. It's blood money."

"I was just thinking out loud," she said. "Jesus. Will you listen to me? Money does corrupt. I feel like Humphrey Bogart in Treasure of the Sierra Madre."

"Well, one thing you got going for you, you don't look like Bogart. And if it's any consolation, I've thought of the money too. You can't help but think about it. But we start getting greedy, even if we get greedy for someone else, we're gonna end up messing up."

"Don't you want the Anthropology Museum to have those facades?"

"Brett, we don't need money for them to have the facades. We just give them a tip-off on where they're hidden. They'll do the rest."

“Oh yeah, I forgot. But you know what?”

“What?”

“You could quit working at the chicken plant. You could do what you want. So could I.”

“For a while. Even if we took the money, it would be split between everyone, our share would be small for a lifetime. We could live on it for a while, but then what?”

“We invest it.”

“And maybe we lose it.”

“True. I don’t know anything about the stock market. We could live off of it while you figured out what you really wanted to do. Maybe you could go to college. You got some hours, right?”

“Right.”

“You could get a degree, maybe teach or something.”

It sounded good. But it sounded wrong. Still, I sat and considered.

Brett said, “When does Jim Bob let Ileana talk to Juan Miguel?”

“I don’t know. He’s playing it loose, making sure Juan Miguel is tense. He’s also giving him time to get the money together. Mostly though, it’s just Jim Bob playing a waiting game.”

“You think he knows what he’s doing?”

“Much as anyone knows. You should have seen him at Juan Miguel’s. He was as cool as an ice tray. He had Juan Miguel eating out of his hand. Juan Miguel tried to act like he was in charge, but I tell you, Jim Bob, he was running the show. We left, his hand was shaking bad as mine, but he didn’t show it, not with Juan Miguel.”

“Did you?”

“I don’t know. Jim Bob says I didn’t. I hope I didn’t.”

“You wouldn’t want to be outmachoed by Jim Bob, would you?”

“I wouldn’t,” I said, “but I got to tell you, that sonofabitch is more macho than my brother, Leonard. I’m surprised he doesn’t go around with a wheelbarrow in front of him so he can carry his balls.”

"Remember," Brett said, "Leonard's macho and queer as a duck in a tuxedo. He's starting one square lower on the tough guy scale. So, you got to sort of give him special points."

"I wouldn't let him hear you say that."

"Hap, we come out all right on this, you and me, we're gonna stay together. Right?"

"We're gonna get married," I said. "If you want to, of course."

"You're not joking?"

"I'm not. I had a ring I'd give it to you. But you didn't say if you'd marry me. We've talked about it, but we haven't really talked about it. We just keep saying someday. I'm saying we've about come to that day."

Brett slid her chair over close to me and put her arm around me.

"I want to. Bad. But you got to pretend on our wedding night that I'm a renewed virgin."

"That won't be easy," I said.

"Most women play that game."

"It still won't be easy."

"Well, considering I been to bed more than a hospitalful of invalids, I know that," Brett said. "But you got to try, just the same. You don't try, well, to put it in simple terms, you don't get any nookie."

"You drive a hard bargain," I said.

We were sitting there snuggling, when we saw Jim Bob and Leonard come along the pedestrian walk.

"Back from César's already," I said. "Things be happenin'."

I went to the door and opened it. Jim Bob and Leonard appeared in the hallway, and I ushered them in.

"How goes it?" I said.

"Good. You got a beer?" Jim Bob said.

He looked rough. He had taken a worse beating than I had. One eye was swollen and there was a bruise the color of smashed plum on his right cheek. The lip on that side was fat and dark.

His hat had crease lines all through it.

“There’s a beer in the cash bar. What about you, Leonard?”

“I want John.”

“He’s not in the cash bar,” I said.

I got the bar key and retrieved a beer for Jim Bob. He twisted off the cap, dropped down in the only cushioned chair, and pressed the cold bottle against the bruise on his cheek.

“Man,” he said, “I could cook an egg on this motherfucker.”

Brett and I sat on the edge of the bed. Leonard pulled one of the wooden chairs over and sat down, crossed his legs and played with the toe of his shoe.

“How’d it go?” Brett asked.

“Well, we hauled Ileana to a pay phone, twisted her arm, had her talk to Juan Miguel a bit,” Jim Bob said. “I talked to him then. I set a meeting up. He’s so mad he sounds as if he could eat the ass out of a bull and spit out a wallet.”

I said, “When?”

“Tonight.”

“That’s quick. I thought you’d let him sweat.”

“I don’t think we ought to fuck around.”

“And I don’t like waiting,” Leonard said. “It makes my feet break out in little hives.”

“Juan Miguel is supposed to meet us at the souvenir stands on this side of Tulum,” Jim Bob said. “He brings the money, we take the money. He thinks that’s it. He thinks he gives us the money, then we set up the next meeting, where we give him the girl and he gives us the rest of the money. I was him, that’s where I’d think about nailing us. He gets the girl, double-crosses us, kills us. That would be the plan if I were doing it. Maybe I was him I’d torture us to give back the first batch of money.”

“So, like us,” I said, “you’ve actually thought about the money?”

“You can’t help but think about the money,” Jim Bob said. “ ’Course, being smarter than the average criminal, the plan should be take the first batch of money and kill the woman—”

“We’re not doing that,” Brett said. “That’s not the deal.”

“Of course not,” Jim Bob said. “I’m saying if I were really a kidnapper.”

“You really are,” I said.

“You know what I mean. I was really out for the money, I’d take the half, let the girl go free, or kill her, and get away with what I got. Best thing to do would be to actually let her go. That way Juan Miguel doesn’t have a way to magnify the grudge.”

“Since there’s supposed to actually be some real money,” I said, “what do we do about that?”

“Yeah,” Brett said. “What about that?”

“I’ve been giving that some thought.”

“So have we,” I said.

“Crossed my mind too,” Leonard said.

“My belief is this,” Jim Bob said. “We take just enough to pay for our expenses, we give the rest to Ferdinand.”

“I thought maybe give it all to Ferdinand,” Leonard said, “but I got to admit, that sounds pretty fair.”

“We got the hotels, car rentals, and we owe César for the guns,” I said.

“Where are the guns?” Brett asked

“In the trunk of the rental,” Jim Bob said.

“What time does it happen?”

“We meet at midnight.”

“Why midnight?”

“Because where the tourist stand is there’s a crossroads.”

“Yeah. So?”

“I like the idea of it,” Jim Bob said. “It’s an artistic touch to the job. Devil takes a man’s soul at the crossroads, and this bastard’s gonna sell his soul there.”

“How will it work?” I asked.

Jim Bob looked at his watch. “It’s eight o’clock. We go over and pick up Ferdinand at César’s so he can have his chance to see it come down—”

“He wants to do the killing,” Leonard said. “Not see it.”

“He may have to settle for a back seat,” Jim Bob said. “Perhaps Juan Miguel doesn’t go down for good right off, we let Ferdinand deliver the coup de grâce. A bullet to the head. That kind of thing.”

“No torture,” I said. “I don’t care what Ferdinand wants. Juan Miguel knows why we took Ileana, and that’s as close as we’re going to get to explaining it. It meant nothing to him anyway.”

“At the moment of death, it may,” Jim Bob said. “Anyway, we load up Ferdinand. We go out to the drop sight early, before dark. This time of year it gets dark, say, nine-thirty, true dark a little later. There are some good places to hide, and you, Ferdinand, and Leonard can get somewhere you can’t be seen.”

“Won’t they get there early too?” Brett asked.

“They will,” Jim Bob said. “You can count on it. But we’ll be earlier yet. They see us, they see us. We deal with that when we get there. Thing on our side is Juan Miguel doesn’t know our real plan is to kill his sorry ass. If it goes well and he doesn’t get there early, doesn’t see you guys, I’ll appear to be there alone. When Juan Miguel delivers the money, you drop him, Hap.”

“Me?” I said.

“Leonard says you can shoot the nuts off a squirrel when all you can see is shape.”

“Thanks for volunteering me, Leonard.”

“You’re welcome, Hap. You’re the best shot, and that’s all there is to it.”

“But if I’m going to shoot him in hiding, what’s so wrong with my idea of picking him off from a distance? It’s because he wouldn’t have the money, isn’t it? It’s about the money, isn’t it?”

“It’s about him deserving it,” Jim Bob said. “Then there’s the money. I told you what I wanted to do with it. I don’t think that’s selfish. We get our expenses, Ferdinand gets the big cut, and Juan Miguel is dead. That okay with you, Hap?”

“I suppose.”

“They’ll search me for weapons, so I won’t carry. Leonard will be hidden with the shotgun in the bushes. When I clench my fist, you shoot, Hap, and I’ll jump. Leonard can open up then. I’ll stash the nine mil close by in the weeds so I can get to it, and play cleanup. We still got Ferdinand and César as insurance. Brett, there's not enough guns, so you're going to stay at César's with Ileana. Someone has to watch her."

"All right," Brett said.

"You can bet Juan Miguel will have his boys with him, so no fuckin' around. Be sure, be double-sure, to take out that Hammerhead motherfucker."

"What if Juan Miguel sends someone?" I said. "Doesn't show himself?"

"When I called, I told him he had to come with the money. Said we didn't trust any of his sidekicks. So he'll show. Like I said, he'll bring them with him, but he'll show. No matter how cool he plays it, he's got it bad for this Ileana. She's got his nose wide open, buddy, you can count on that."

"Now that we got it all talked out, how about we go do it," Leonard said.

34

WE DROVE UP in César's yard at about eight-thirty. When we got out of the car a cold feeling went over me. Something was out of kilter.

I said, "Something sucks."

"Yeah," Leonard said. "But what is it? It doesn't look any different."

Jim Bob stared at the house for a moment. "Yes it does. The blinds are closed. They haven't been closed before."

"Maybe they wanted them closed," Brett said.

"Yeah," Jim Bob said. "Crushed shells up by the porch are pitted. Like maybe there was a struggle there. See, there's shells on the porch. More than would have come off someone's shoes. It's like they were rolled in them, got dragged on the porch and the shells fell off their clothes. Screen door is unlocked and it's slightly open."

Jim Bob strolled to the rear of the car, opened the trunk. He popped one of the suitcases. He took two nine mils from the case and gave one to me, one to Leonard. He got the shotgun parts out of the other case and put it together. He gave us ammo clips, took a fistful of shells and stuffed them in his shirt pocket. He loaded two in the double-barrel.

"I'll just stroll around back," Jim Bob said. "You and Leonard take the front."

Jim Bob trotted off. I said, "Brett, you get behind the wheel. You see anyone come out of the door you don't want to see, you back out and go. Go away fast."

Brett nodded, climbed in behind the wheel, closed the door softly.

Me and Leonard moved toward the front door.

I thought: It could be they wanted the shades closed. Maybe César or Hermonie fell in the drive, brushed themselves off on the porch. Went in and didn't close the door well. In a hurry. It could be that.

I moved the door with my foot. It swung open with a sound that would have made a can of WD40 cry.

Easing inside, crouching, the gun held before me, I saw why things were quiet, and I felt my knees wobble. I kept the gun at ready, but I knew I wouldn't need it.

Leonard came in behind me about the time Jim Bob reached the back patio glass. I strolled over and let him in, using my shirttail to work the latch.

I went around what was on the floor, stepping carefully, eased to the bedroom, pushed the half-open door the rest of the way with my foot.

The room was empty, of course.

I checked out the bathroom, just in case Hammerhead might be using the commode, found nothing, went back to the living room.

I sat down on the brick ridge of the fireplace and looked at what was before me.

Hermonie was dressed in her white pants suit, seated on the couch, looking pretty much the way she always looked, except one side of her head poked out in a funny way. That was because a bullet entering the other side had come out on the side facing me, splintered the bone, lifted her hair. Where her hair was lifted it was slick, as if she had been hit with a tomato. Her right eye had moved a little too far to the right and was almost hidden. The left looked straight ahead. A splotch of blood like another shot from a tomato was splattered on the right shoulder of her outfit. There was red on the wall and the back of the couch.

César lay on the floor. He had been tied to a chair. In his final agonies, most likely, he had turned it over.

His fingers had been chopped off close to the knuckles, and I could see the skin on his hands had been filleted all the way to his elbows. He was shirtless and there were burns on his chest. His eyes were open, as if he had just discovered he had gotten exactly what he wanted for Christmas, but his mouth was wide and gummy and his tongue poked out of it, fat and gray as an old piece of liver. His pants had large globs of blood on the knees where they had dripped off the chair when it was upright. His shoes were gone. So were his toes. The skin on his feet had been peeled all the way to his calves, and his pants were cuffed high to allow it. There were little bits of crushed shells from the drive stuck to his clothes and on the floor around the chair.

Leonard leaned against the wall and let the nine mil hang by his side. Jim Bob bent over César, stood up, looked at Hermonie.

"You have some intuition," I said to Jim Bob. "You were right about there being a struggle in the yard."

"Intuition is really just the unconscious mind learning to talk to the conscious." He gestured toward Hermonie. "One for her and it's over with. César, not so easy. What's that tell you?"

"He didn't talk," I said. "So they gave him hell."

"Shit, he talked. I would have. I tell you what happened. Hermonie here, she called Juan Miguel and told where the girl was."

"But why?" I asked.

"Because she wanted what she thought Juan Miguel could give her," Leonard said.

"Yep," Jim Bob said. "Leonard, you aren't as dumb as you look."

"Thanks."

"I never really trusted her," Jim Bob said, "but I didn't think this. I didn't think she was this stupid. I just thought she was a shit and a bad pick for César. Goddamn, César didn't deserve this."

"Who the hell does?" Leonard said.

"You actually think she called Juan Miguel?" I said.

"They finished her easy," Jim Bob said. "No torture. They just popped her. That tells me she thought maybe she could make the big money. Maybe Ileana talked Hermonie into it. Said I'll see you get paid good. I'll get you in good with Juan Miguel you get me out of this."

"Who did she think she was dealing with?" I said.

“She had no idea,” Leonard said.

“No,” Jim Bob said, “she didn’t. She didn’t like us, and according to César, she didn’t like him much either. But I don’t think this is what she expected. Maybe she thought César would get his, but she figured she was doing Juan Miguel a favor, so she thought she was all right. Would make some big money out of the deal. Get a chance to end up with what she thought she deserved. Juan Miguel had other plans. He decided to thank her by not torturing her. He gave her what he thought she deserved.”

“So now Juan Miguel knows we were going to ambush him?” I said.

Jim Bob nodded. “I’m sure César said what he had to say.”

“And now,” Leonard said, “we don’t have our bargaining chip. And we aren’t going to get any money, and we aren’t going to surprise him … Ferdinand … where is he?”

“Out back,” Jim Bob said. “They took him out there and hacked him to pieces. I wish he’d had a machete. I wish he’d had his chance … Probably that goddamn giant did it.”

“What now?” I said, and was surprised at how hoarse my voice was.

Jim Bob took off his battered hat and ran a hand through his hair. “Well, three things occur to me. Let’s wipe our fingerprints up, and hope there aren’t too many old ones. They come up, we get hauled in, we were visiting César. He’s a friend of mine, so maybe we can swing it. I doubt anything’s missing. I don’t thing Juan Miguel would give a shit about anything César owned.

“Second thing is we get the hell out of here quickly. Third thing is César might have told him we were staying at the hotel. Since we got everything we own in the car, I say we check in somewhere else. We don’t go back.”

We wiped down what we knew we had touched, eased out of there, and with Brett at the wheel, we drove briskly away.

35

We moved to a smaller hotel. Jim Bob carried the suitcase with the shotgun in it to his and Leonard's room. Leonard kept the nine mil. I kept mine. I kept the suitcase with the rifle.

We were too stunned to eat. Too shocked to think. That was good. I had been thinking too much. I may not come up with class plans, but I could at least come up with something. I had been trying to be too damn smart. I had let Jim Bob the pro do what the pro knew how to do, and it hadn't been enough. The pro was good. He was grand. But sometimes the way you kill a bug is just step on it. You don't think about it too much. You don't go get bug spray or call the exterminator, or talk to the bug and tell it why it must die, or try to bargain money from it, you just step on it.

Brett watched a Mexican television show for a while, not understanding a word of it, then fell asleep. I sat and watched her sleep. I thought about poor Beatrice, how she looked after that animal Hammerhead had had at her. It had to be him. Hammerhead was the one. He was the one that had come for me and killed Charlie instead. That's what Juan Miguel said. I thought of César. He had done his best to help us. He had tried to be a friend. And Hermonie. How horrible it must have been for César to have been betrayed by her. More horrible than the torture.

And Ferdinand. If they had given him a machete like Jim Bob said, let him fight it out with Hammerhead, he would have died happy. And he might not have died. He had been a terror with a machete.

God. All that blood. The skin peeled back on César's hands and feet. I kept thinking about his eyes. His mouth. The way his pants cuffs were rolled up. Somehow that hit me the hardest. Just that simple little thing, the careful rolling up of the cuffs so they could peel the flesh higher.

I got up quietly, checked on Brett. She was snoring like a lumberjack. I got some of the hotel's stationery out of the desk drawer, a pen. I wrote.

> Brett, I love you.
>
> You wake up and read this note, you be cautious. I'm leaving the nine millimeter on the desk. You keep it, go stay with Leonard and Jim Bob. Trust me on this. Tell Leonard I love him. A man couldn't ask for a better brother. Don't tell him that unless I don't come back. No use giving him the big head. Tell him I love him, but that doesn't mean I forgive him for everything. He won't know what he needs forgiving for, but I like the idea of making him nervous.
>
> This isn't a suicide note. This isn't a so-long note. It's a just-in-case note. You read it, you remember that. It's just in case. I'm going to do what always sounds so hokey, but tonight sounds exactly right.
>
> I'm gonna do what a man's got to do, and I'm going to do it without dragging anyone else into it. If you figure what I'm doing, try and help me, you'll just fuck it up. But if I'm not back by tomorrow, then I didn't do it. It's best you just take a plane home and forget about all this. Leonard and Jim Bob will do whatever. And I have a pretty good idea what that will be. I want them to. But better yet, I want them to end up going home with you. I want Leonard to be with John and Jim Bob to be with his pigs. Leonard and John in a carnal sense, and for all I care, Jim Bob and his pigs in a carnal sense. Actually, I kind of like that idea.
>
> So go home and forget about all this.
>
> Except for me. Remember me awhile. Then forget me.
>
> I keep writing because I don't want to go.
>
> I've got to go. I keep waiting, keep messing around here, I'll be waking you up asking you to proofread > this. I go now, I may get back before you know I'm gone, then I can tear up this silly tripe and we can go home.

>
> Love, Hap.
>
> P.S. I don't come back tomorrow disregard what I said before. Have Jim Bob and Leonard kill that sonofabitch. But you go home.

The keys to the car were on the table where Brett had left them. It was easy for me to walk out with the suitcase containing the rifle, scope, and silencer. I drove along the highway, half expecting to see a dark car filled with Juan Miguel's two thugs and the impossibly large Hammerhead.

How would he fit in a car? Did they have to drive a convertible? Did they pull him behind them in a trailer?

I kept thinking about all kinds of stupid things. I felt as if I was coming undone, a piece at a time.

The moon laid greasy patches of light along the road and the road rose up and curved. I could see Juan Miguel's great house standing tall with its palms and its thick high wall, the moon above and behind it like a chunk of suspended lard.

Then the road dipped and I could only see the rise of land on which it was positioned. The road went that way awhile, then rose again. I took a cutoff that was all dirt and steered through tight trees that scraped the car, finally came to a widening in the road that was below Juan Miguel's wall.

I pulled over and got out with the suitcase.

I walked up the road apiece, where the brush and trees cleared, looked up. There was moonlight and man-made light spilling over the vine-covered wall. I could see it was no easy task to go up the side of that big hill, which was maybe two hundred feet high to the wall.

I took off my belt and ran it through the suitcase handle and fastened it, slipped the belt over my head and one shoulder, started to climb.

At first there was vines and brush to hold on to, then some rocks and little plants that sometimes jerked free of the dirt the moment I touched them.

When I was about halfway, I thought I was going to have to give up and start down. I lay tight against the hill, my face touching a cool rock, and gave that a lot of thought. I could get down from here now, give up this silly idea, go back to the hotel, throw away my note, shower, get in bed with Brett and make love to her, and tomorrow, no matter what Jim Bob or Leonard thought, I could take her home and live happily ever after.

I took a deep breath, started up again.

I had gone about twenty more feet when I decided I definitely couldn't make it and had to go back. The suitcase was killing me. Atlas and the world on his shoulders was nothing compared to that goddamn suitcase.

But by then I had gone too far. I was committed.

I continued climbing. It was slow, exhausting work. My fingers ached something horrible. I was losing feeling in them. I wasn't even sure if I was holding on to anything. I decided to look neither up nor down, but to concentrate on the moment, on what was in front of me.

I had no idea how long I had been climbing. Wasn't wearing my watch. Couldn't look at it if I had been. Too dark. Couldn't spare the handhold.

The moonlight shifted. Maybe two hours had passed. I needed to pee. My hands hurt and they were bleeding.

I kept at it. Inch by inch. And then I touched the rough rock wall and the vines that grew over it.

I clutched a fistful of vines and tugged. The wall didn't come loose. Neither did the vines.

I pulled and scuttled and pretty soon I was near the top.

I reached an arm over the wall, hauled up slowly, poked my face over the edge, looked down on Juan Miguel's property.

There was no one there. The pools were blue and shiny and the growth around their edges was thick and green.

I dropped over the wall, managed to get a shaft of a shrub nearly up my ass, fell, clattered against some tall elephant ears and lay still.

I got up slowly, hustled around on my hands and knees until I could see through a split in the shrubs.

Still no one.

I opened the suitcase and took out the rifle parts and, in the glow of the pool lights, I put it together, pushed in the clip, put on the silencer. I didn't bother with the scope. This close I didn't need a scope.

I pulled the suitcase back with me, found a place less obvious. It was a thick swathe of hedge next to a palm tree that afforded me about six feet between it and the wall, and was a good hiding place. It was a good position. I could see all of the side pool. Across the way, I could see the backyard pool.

He said he swam every night.

Would he swim tonight?

Was he off celebrating having Hermonie shot, having César's feet and hands skinned, Ferdinand chopped up like a fish at the market?

Maybe he was celebrating by staying over with his mistress.

The bitch. Jim Bob was right. She knew what Juan Miguel did. What he was like. She didn't care.

I took a pee in the bushes, picked some prickles out of my hands as best I could.

It was hot even for so late at night, so I sat with my back against the cool stone wall, watching through my split in the shrubbery.

There were lights on in the house. They looked orange instead of yellow. I watched the lights until I decided they were causing me to focus too hard. I began watching left and right, waiting, listening.

I must have dozed for a while. I came awake to the sound of the back door opening.

Some ambusher I was.

A woman came out. The wife. She was nude. She walked out to the back pool, leaped in, swam for a while.

This nude business was starting to seem common to me. Maybe I should strip off now. I could be the nude ambusher.

I kept waiting for Juan Miguel, but he didn't show.

She must have swum half an hour. She climbed out, snatched a towel off the back of a chair and slowly dried herself, running the towel the length of her legs, drying between her legs, her breasts, her hair. When she was finished, I felt like I should leave her money.

She went inside. The orange lights soon went out. The moon was starting to drop low in the sky.

I leaned against the wall and dozed.

I dreamed of trying to go back over the wall, of falling.

Then I dreamed I was eating a banana.

I hoped to God I was smart enough to never tell Leonard about that dream. He'd give me shit.

I awoke, hungry, in spite of my nocturnal banana. My stomach growled. Loud.

Trying to shift to get comfortable, I heard a car door. I peeked through my leafy peephole. Beyond the pool, about where Jim Bob and I had taken a beating from Juan Miguel's two assholes, was a long black car. Juan Miguel got out. So did Hammerhead and one of the assholes.

The other asshole drove the car to the other side of the house, to the garage. The remaining three walked up the drive and the big stone steps before I could say to myself, "Where the hell is my gun?"

They went inside.

Some shooter I was.

I waited awhile. They didn't come out. I stood up, stretched my legs behind some tall plants, took a leak again, went back to my spot, lay on my side with my back against the wall. I knew it was not a good idea, but I couldn't help myself. I was exhausted. I slept.

When I awoke I had a taste in my mouth like a well-used cat box. The greasy moon was gone and the sun was a ball of flaming lead burning away the clouds, heading up toward high noon.

I was sweaty and my face was dirty where I had slept with it pressed to the ground. I brushed myself off, moved my tongue around in my mouth trying to move the rotten taste about.

I peeked through the slit in the shrubs, saw nothing. He was probably sleeping in. Maybe getting a morning quickie with the wife, then brunch.

I wondered how that worked for the wife. She knew he had a mistress. Did she say, “Hey, did you and Ileana have a good hump last night? You did wash your pecker before we did it, didn’t you? What shall I get her for her birthday? Edible underwear?”

It was such a weird situation, and yet to them it was as normal as a nose on a face.

A pocked and diseased nose.

Maybe he wasn’t sleeping in. Maybe he had already left, and me, the lone assassin, had slept through it.

I wondered if Brett had seen my note.

Surely.

By the sun it was about ten o’clock I figured.

What was Brett thinking since I hadn’t come back?

Had she told Jim Bob and Leonard?

Would they do something foolish like rent a taxi and have it drop them off so they could go into the house, guns blazing, looking for me?

Nope. That was more my kind of plan.

More Leonard’s kind of plan. Jim Bob wouldn’t let that happen. He might come in guns blazing, but he wouldn’t arrive in a taxi. He’d be sneaky.

Hell, I had been sneaky, and in the end I had hidden in the bushes and taken a nap.

I was thinking about that, when suddenly I realized I was looking directly at Juan Miguel.

36

HE SEEMED to just appear, standing at the edge of the pool. He was in all his naked glory and quite fond of himself, stretching his arms, rolling his shoulders. He looked left and right, then checked his package, shook it, let it go.

I could see it in his eyes, in the relaxed way he stood and stretched, the slight smile on his face.

He was happy.

He was the king.

The king's package was fine, ready to be used at any time. The envy of all others, that package. Men feared and admired him, women wanted him.

The universe was his.

A strange feeling came over me. Of watching in slow motion, of moving in slow motion. I had had a similar feeling before. In fights. It's always that way. You may be moving fast, but to you it's slow, and everything around you is moving slow. But life is heightened. It's as if in that moment of violence you feel directly connected to the world around you, as if you are in tumultuous union with the universe.

This moment was stronger than ever before. I remember wiping my eyes, rubbing out the sleep. I had been sitting on my ass, but I rose up on my left knee, raised my right knee, put the rifle against my shoulder and looked down the sight. The sight was very fine, like a little blackhead in the center of Juan Miguel's face.

He was rolling his neck now. I watched him roll it. I wanted him to stop moving just for a moment. The way you're supposed to shoot someone is you aim at the biggest part of them, but I wanted Juan Miguel's head.

I was putting the little blackhead on his face, when I heard a noise and saw, coming around from the rear of the house, Hammerhead. He was naked except for a white beach towel wrapped between his legs and around his waist. It made him look as if he were wearing a huge diaper.

That's all right, I told myself. That's all right, Mama, that's all right with me.

I put the sight back on Juan Miguel as he lifted his arms and touched his hands in dive fashion, and as he lowered them to make his leap into the pool, his head lowered, I shot him right in the top of it.

There was a cough from the silencer, a flash of red juice, a flurry of hair, a whirl of skull like a hubcap fragment, and Juan Miguel dropped his arms and went into the water. There was a burst of dark blood, like ink from a Technicolor squid.

I shifted, floated the barrel, put the sight on Hammerhead.

He had just removed the towel from himself, probably preparing to swim with his boss. He held it in one hand like an oversized hanky he was passing to someone. His jaw hung low, his eyes were fastened on Juan Miguel's body floating under the water, dropping slowly to the bottom.

Hammerhead crouched, dropped the towel, turned his head, looked in the direction from which he thought the shot must have come. In that moment he saw me in the foliage. Our eyes snapped together like padlocks. I fired again.

It was a good shot, but not as good as it would have been had he not moved. It went through his throat, low and on the right side. He snapped a hand to the wound and let out a bellow. I put three in his chest as fast as I could pull the trigger.

Where he clutched his throat blood was running through his fingers. Three little holes appeared on his chest without much blood.

The pool was in front of him and he hit the water running, went down, not quite over his head, tried to trudge along the bottom. The water bounced him up and down. I took a bead on his eye and let it rip.

His head snapped back. When it righted itself, he continued forward. Much of the pool's surface was slick with his and Juan Miguel's blood and it kept widening as if its job was to paint the remaining blue red.

As Hammerhead climbed out of the pool, a real feeling of terror went over me. This bastard had three in the chest, one in the throat, and one through the eye, and he was still coming.

As he stepped out of the pool on my side, I aimed for his kneecap, popped him twice. The knee went away. He collapsed, tried to raise up on his elbows, but I shot him again, about where the neck meets the shoulder.

This time there was a big burst of blood, like a pipe full of pressured rusty water had broken.

Hammerhead's head snapped forward on the cement at the edge of the pool. He pulled himself forward another inch or so, then lay with only his foot jerking and one hand vibrating. The hand quit, then the foot.

I took a deep breath.

I looked about.

No wife.

No assholes. They were probably watching bowling on TV.

I took the wrench out of the suitcase and took the rifle apart. My hand was shaking so much it took me longer than it should have. I put the pieces in the suitcase.

I looked up.

Still no one. I tossed the suitcase over the fence. I climbed on a slanting palm near the fence, inched up it with the speed of a ground sloth with its leg in a sling.

I made it to the fence and looked down. It didn't look good. I didn't see the suitcase. I'd need that. It had fingerprints all over it.

I walked along the top of the rock wall until I found a place I felt I could descend, went over and started working my way down. Below I heard a car, looked. It went zooming by. I wondered if they had seen me.

It was easier and faster going down in the light than it was going up in the dark. I made the ground fairly easy, looked for the suitcase, didn't see it.

Worse, the car was gone. There was windshield glass on the ground, so I knew during the night, while I slept, someone had smashed the glass and hotwired the rental.

Typical.

I eventually located the suitcase. It was up the hill, hung up in some roots and bushes.

I took a deep breath, started up again. I got the suitcase, and as it still had my belt through the handle, I slung it over my neck and shoulder and climbed down.

I brushed myself off as best I could and started walking.

* * *

It took an hour or so for me to reach the main road. I had walked along about fifteen minutes when a large ancient truck with sideboards appeared. It pulled up beside me. In the seat were five men wearing straw hats. One of them stuck his head out the window and said something in Spanish. He was young-looking, with a split between his teeth. He had taken advantage of the split and had inserted a straw between it. It moved around in his mouth when he spoke.

I finally realized they were asking me if I wanted to ride.

“Sí,” I said.

I climbed in the back, over the sideboards, found I was company to three large black and white hogs. In one corner of the truck was a large pile of hog shit, and as we bounced along, so did it, creeping its way toward me.

They let me and my suitcase off in town and I walked to our hotel. I wondered if Brett, Leonard, and Jim Bob were still there.

I went straight to Jim Bob’s room and knocked. If it was someone else I’d just claim the wrong room and go away.

Jim Bob answered.

“You asshole,” he said. “You thoughtless asshole. We been worried fucking sick. Serve you right if you were dead.”

“Hi. Good to see you too.”

I went inside. Brett was there, she pushed past Leonard, who was trying to shake my hand, grabbed me, kissed me on the face.

“Wow,” she said. “What have you been rolling in, Rex?”

“Hog shit,” I said. “Really.”

“He has,” Jim Bob said. “If there’s one smell I know, it’s hog shit, and that’s hog shit.”

“You killed him, didn’t you?” Leonard said.

“He and that Hammerhead are two of the deadest motherfuckers you’ll ever see.”

“Good,” Jim Bob said. “Goddamn good.”

“Who says you have to have good plans to get the job done?” Leonard said.

“You know,” I said, “I sort of thought you guys would charge to my assistance. Note or no note. It was just for dramatic effect.”

“I slept late,” Brett said.

“We didn’t see it until a few minutes ago,” Jim Bob said.

“I was considering just how bad I wanted to kill you,” Leonard said, “then I thought maybe Juan Miguel and Hammerhead would do it for me, so I went back to sleep.”

“He did not,” Brett said. “He was having a shit fit. We were just about out the door, come to help.”

“Yeah,” Leonard said, “but I wasn’t going to dress up for it.”

“You’re a dumbass,” Jim Bob said.

“Yeah, and don’t ever do it again,” Leonard said. “It ain’t good for my heart. And besides, since when do you have enough brains to do anything without me?”

“It was lonely without you, brother,” I said.

Brett suddenly began crying. She said, “You asshole. You thoughtless asshole.”

“I’m sorry,” I said.

“Yes, you are,” she said. “Now, for goodness sake, shower, then let’s go home.”

While I showered Jim Bob rented us another car, disposed of the suitcases, and brought us food. We ate, checked out, rode to the airport.

We turned in the car there, Jim Bob talked to the other rental agency, explained our car had been stolen from the hotel, filled out the proper forms, and we sat around in hard plastic chairs waiting for our flight.

“Did they buy the theft story?” Leonard asked Jim Bob.

“I believe they did,” Jim Bob said. “When I want, I can charm the ass off someone.”

“It’s your way with the language,” Leonard said.

“You betcha.”

We kept watching, half expecting Juan Miguel’s two goons to show. Except Jim Bob.

He said, “With Big Daddy dead, those two haven’t the sense to get in out of the rain. They’re probably still trying to wake Juan Miguel and Hammerhead up.”

Our flight was late, so we sat a long time, but once on the plane I fell asleep immediately and by the time we were landing at Houston Intercontinental, I felt as if I had been on board for no more than a few minutes.

37

FOR ABOUT THREE MONTHS I still watched for Juan Miguel's goons. But Jim Bob was probably right. They were lost now, maybe working for the old lady. Or perhaps she blamed them and had used her considerable money to have them whacked. Perhaps they had gone to barber college and were now doing honest work in a border town, cutting hair, powdering the back of customers' necks.

I thought about César, Ferdinand, and Hermonie, left there in that house. We hadn't contacted anyone. How long would they go before they were found? A day? A week? A month?

I guess it didn't matter when you were dead.

It was odd, walking away from all that, going back to being a security guard at the chicken plant. But I hadn't fallen back completely into old habits. I had started part-time at the college, taking courses in history. I wasn't exactly sure why, but for the first time in years I felt like I was doing something that counted, even if I wasn't sure what it counted for.

Leonard got another job, security manager of a bakery. All he does now is sit in the office with his feet up, eat sweet cakes and cookies and make sure everyone else does the work. He's even gotten a little fat.

He and John are happy.

Jim Bob's back with his hogs.

Hanson is walking without a cane now. A little slow, but he's walking. He's still wearing Charlie's hat.

Me and Brett?

Well, we haven't gotten married, but we still talk about it. It doesn't seem quite as urgent as it did in that hotel room in Mexico, but the thought is still there.

The other night Brett and I were sitting out in her yard, which I had mowed and freed the lawn chair from, and I was sitting in that lawn chair, and she in another, just sitting there with the moon and the starlight above, a bug-thronged streetlight in view, when a blue Cadillac pulled up at the house, parked next to the streetlight, and killed the motor.

I had a momentary sinking feeling, thinking those dicks from Mexico had caught up with us, but then I saw Mr. Bond come out from behind the wheel and close his door. He went around and opened the other.

A fragile-looking woman with her hair in a ponytail and a bandage across her face got out of the car carefully, pulling crutches after her.

I stood up, but Mr. Bond held up his hand in a wait there signal.

I remained standing. Sarah Bond crutched over to me. Her face was a wreck of stitch tracks and little swellings, that white bulgy swathe across one eye. When she spoke she was missing teeth and her voice was a little airy.

“Thank you for saving my life,” she said. “I owe you everything.”

“You owe me nothing.”

“They say they can fix me good as new with ortho work and plastic surgery. Except for the eye.”

“That’s good,” I said. “That’s real good.”

“Mr. Collins, you will always be my guardian angel.”

She positioned her crutches, leaned toward me, puckered her lips. I lowered my cheek and she kissed it.

“She wanted to tell you that,” Mr. Bond said. “And I want to thank you again for sparing my daughter. God bless you, Hap Collins.”

When they were gone, Brett and I remained in the yard, sitting in our chairs. My cheeks were wet.

“You’re such a softie, Hap Collins,” Brett said. “And I love you so much for it.”

“Sometimes we do something right in spite of ourselves, don’t we?” I said.

“Sometimes,” Brett said.

BOOKS BY JOE R. LANSDALE

LEATHER MAIDEN

After a harrowing stint in the Iraq war, Cason Statler returns home to the small East Texas town of Camp Rapture, where he drinks too much, stalks his ex-wife, and takes a job at the local paper. There he uncovers notes on a cold-case murder. With nothing left to live for and his own brother connected to the victim, he makes it his mission to solve the crime. Soon he is drawn into a murderous web of blackmail and deceit. To make matters worse his deranged buddy Booger comes to town to lend a helping hand.

Crime Fiction/978-0-375-71923-3

LOST ECHOES

Since suffering from a mysterious childhood illness, Harry Wilkes has experienced horrific visions. Gruesome scenes emerge to replay themselves before his eyes. Triggered by simple sounds, these visions occur anywhere a tragic event has happened. Now in college, Harry feels haunted and turns to alcohol to dull his visionary senses. One night, he sees a fellow drunk easily best three muggers. In this man, Harry finds not only a friend that will help him kick the booze, but also a sensei who will teach him to master his unusual gift. Soon Harry's childhood crush, Kayla, comes and asks for help solving her father's murder. Unsure of how it will affect him, Harry finds the strength to confront the dark secrets of the past, only to unveil the horrors of the present.

Crime Fiction/978-0-307-27544-8

SUNSET AND SAWDUST

In the middle of a cyclone, beautiful, red-haired Sunset Jones shoots her husband, Pete, dead when he tries to beat and rape her. To Camp Rapture's general consternation, Sunset's mother-in-law arranges for her to take over from Pete as town constable.

As if that weren't hard enough to swallow in Depression-era East Texas, Sunset actually takes the job seriously, and her investigation into a brutal double murder pulls her into a maelstrom of greed, corruption, and unspeakable malice. It is a case that will require a well of inner strength she never knew she had. Spirited and electrifying, Sunset and Sawdust is a mystery and a tale like nothing you've read before.

Crime Fiction/978-0-375-71922-6

The Hap and Leonard Novels

SAVAGE SEASON

Hap Collins and Leonard Pine are best friends, yet they couldn't be more different. Hap is an East Texas white boy with a weakness for Texas women. Leonard is a gay black Vietnam vet. Together, they stir up more commotion than a firestorm. But that's just the way they like it. So when an ex-flame of Hap's returns promising a huge score, Hap lets Leonard in on the scam, and that's when things get interesting. Chockful of action and laughs, Savage Season is the masterpiece of dark suspense that introduced Hap and Leonard to the thriller scene. It hasn't been the same since.

Crime Fiction/978-0-307-45538-3

MUCHO MOJO

Leonard is still nursing the injuries he sustained in the duo's last wild undertaking when he learns that his Uncle Chester has passed. Hap is of course going to be there for his best friend, and when the two are cleaning up Uncle Chester's dilapidated house, they uncover a dark little secret beneath the house's rotting floorboards—a small skeleton buried in a trunk. Hap wants to call the police. Leonard, being a black man in East Texas, persuades him this is not a good idea, and together they set out to clear Chester's name on their own. The only things standing in their way are a houseful of felons, a vicious killer, and possibly themselves.

Crime Fiction/978-0-307-45539-0

THE TWO-BEAR MAMBO

In this rollicking, roller-coaster ride of a novel, Hap Collins and Leonard Pine take a break from their day jobs to search for Florida Grange, Leonard's drop-dead gorgeous lawyer and Hap's former lover, who has vanished in the Klan-infested East Texas town of Grovetown. Before she disappeared, Florida was digging up some dirt behind the mysterious jailhouse death of a legendary bluesman's son, who was in possession of some priceless merchandise. To Hap and Leonard, something don't smell right. With murder on their minds, Hap and Leonard set out to investigate as only they know how . . . chaotically.

Crime Fiction/978-0-307-45549-9

BAD CHILI

Hap Collins has just returned home from a gig working on an offshore oil rig. With a new perspective on life, Hap wants to change the way he's living, and shoot the straight and narrow. That is until the man who stole Leonard Pine's boyfriend turns up headless in a ditch and Leonard gets fingered for the murder. Hap vows to clear Leonard's name, but things only get more complicated when Leonard's ex shows up dead. To the police it is just a matter of gay-biker infighting, but to Hap and Leonard murder is always serious business, and these hit a little to close to home.

Crime Fiction/978-0-307-45550-5

RUMBLE TUMBLE

Even though a midlife crisis just hit Hap Collins like a runaway pickup truck, he's still got his job as a bouncer at a local club, he knows his best friend, Leonard Pine, will always be there for him, and of course he's got his main squeeze, ex–Sweet Potato Queen Brett Sawyer. Things go downhill, however, when Brett's daughter, Tillie, who has been walking on the wrong side of the law—doing drugs and turning tricks—suddenly stands in need of a rescue. It won't be easy— it never is—but nothing is going to stop Hap and Leonard as they hit the road destined for Hootie Hoot, Oklahoma, to shake things up. And with Hap and Leonard at the wheel, this promises to be a wild ride.

Crime Fiction/978-0-307-45551-2

CAPTAINS OUTRAGEOUS

When Hap Collins saves the life of his employer's daughter, he is rewarded with a Caribbean cruise, and he convinces his best friend Leonard Pine to come along. However, when the cruise sails on without them, stranding them in Playa del Carmen with nothing but their misfortune and Leonard's ridiculous new hat, the two quickly find themselves drawn into a vicious web of sordid violence. When they return to East Texas, they find that trouble has beaten them back, and when trouble's around it doesn't take long for Hap and Leonard to find it.

Crime Fiction/978-0-307-45552-9

VINTAGE CRIME/BLACK LIZARD

Available at your local bookstore, or visit www.randomhouse.com

NEW FROM
JOE R. LANSDALE

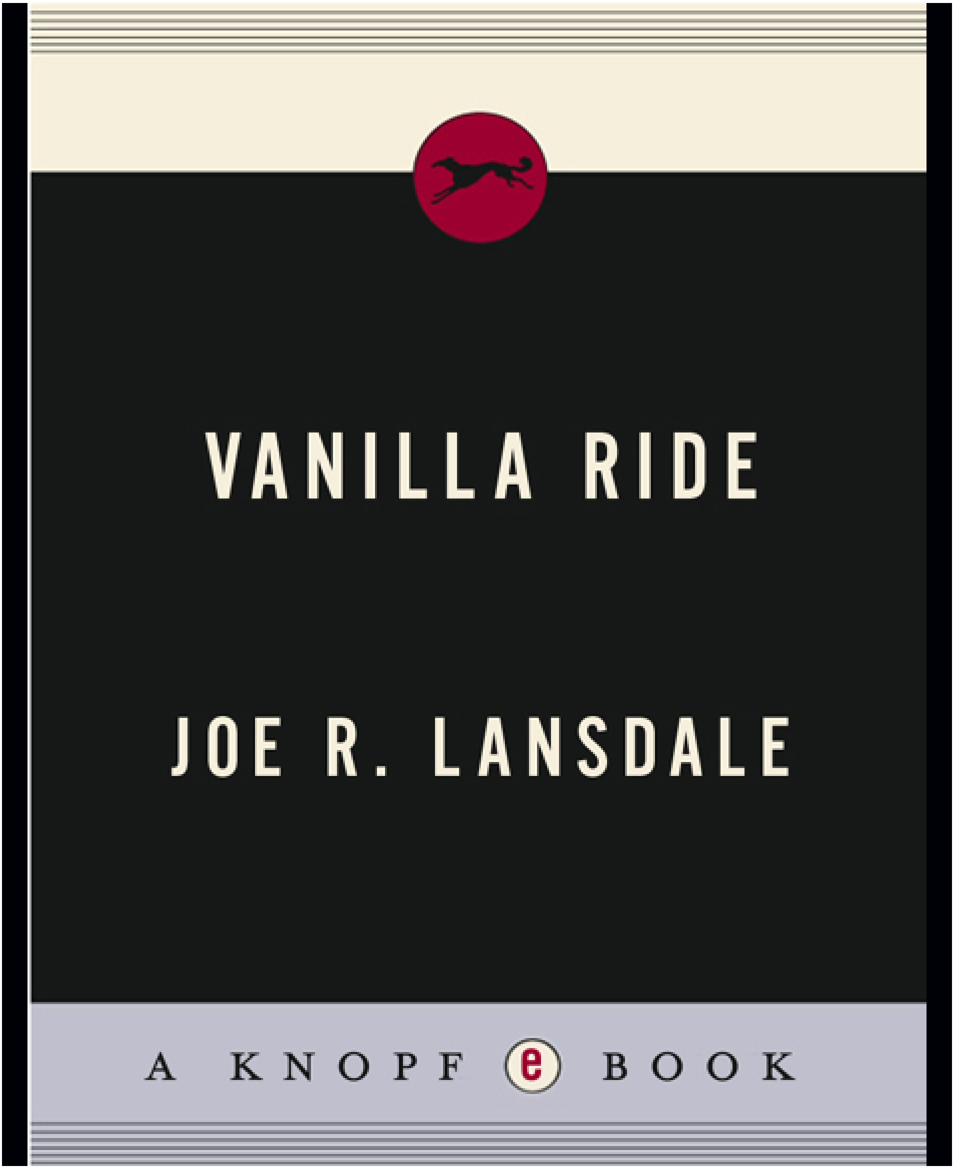
Vanilla Ride

The first Hap and Leonard novel in eight years.

Hap Collins and Leonard Pine—best friends, freelance vigilantes, complete opposites—return in this Texas-sized thriller to take on the Dixie Mafia, and to keep themselves out of jail.

Available in hardcover from Knopf
$23.95 • 256 pages • 978-0-307-27097-9

Please visit www.aaknopf.com



VANILLA RIDE

JOE R. LANSDALE

A KNOPF e BOOK

ALSO BY JOE R. LANSDALE

In the Hap and Leonard Series

Savage Season
Mucho Mojo
The Two-Bear Mambo
Bad Chili
Rumble Tumble
Captains Outrageous

Other Novels

Freezer Burn
A Fine Dark Line
The Bottoms
Sunset and Sawdust
Lost Echoes
Leather Maiden

VANILLA RIDE

JOE R. LANSDALE

ALFRED A. KNOPF NEW YORK 2009

For all you Hap and Leonard fans. Bless your little weird hearts.

The pistol is the devil’s red right hand.

—Steve Earle

Man turns everything into a weapon. Even his tongue.

—Hap Collins

1

I hadn't been shot at in a while, and no one had hit me in the head for a whole month or two. It was kind of a record, and I was starting to feel special.

Brett and I were upstairs in our little rented house, lying in bed, breathing hard, having just arrived at the finish line of a slow, sweet race that at times can seem like a competitive sport, but when played right, even when you're the last to arrive, can make you feel like a winner.

In that moment, life was good.

Brett sat up and fluffed her pillow behind her back and pushed her long bloodred hair to the side with one hand, shoved her chest forward in a way that made me feel mighty lucky, said, "I haven't had that much fun since I pistol-whipped a redheaded midget."

"You don't know how romantic that makes me feel," I said. "I think Little Hap just went looking for a place to hide."

"I thought he just came out of hiding," she said, and winked at me.

Thing was, she actually had pistol-whipped a midget. I was there. She was trying to find her daughter and save her life, but still, it was ugly, and I was a party to it. I will say this, however, in favor of the midget: he took his beating with stoic pride and refused to take it while wearing his cowboy hat, an expensive Stetson. He wanted it right on the skull and that's where he got it.

"You know, I think they prefer being called dwarf instead of midget, or little people," I said.

"No kidding. I don't know about the rest of them, but the one I worked over, I just call him Pistol-Whipped."

"Do you ever feel bad about it?"

“Nope.”

“He died, you know.”

“Not from the pistol whipping.”

This was also true. He ended up dead another way, but, man, that had been some pistol whipping. She had also set her ex-husband’s head on fire and put it out with a shovel, which is a far cry from a water hose. My sweet baby, at times, could make a man nervous.

She said, “Speaking of little guys,” and took hold of my crotch.

“Little guys?” I said. “That’s supposed to fire me up?”

“No. I’ll fire you up.”

She chuckled and slid over close and I took her in my arms and we snuggled. Things were looking operational when there was a knock on the door.

Typical.

I looked at the clock on the nightstand. Eleven p.m.

The knock came again, louder.

I got up and pulled on my robe and bunny slippers, and cursed. “Keep that thought. I’m going down to kill a late-night Bible salesman.”

“Will you bring me back his head, please?”

“On a platter.”

2

Downstairs, I went to the window, eased back the curtain and took a peek. Two big black guys, one supported on a stick, were standing on the steps. My best friend, Leonard Pine, and an ex-cop buddy, Marvin Hanson.

I opened the door.

“Sure isn’t good to see you,” I said to Leonard.

Leonard pushed on in. He was decked out in cowboy boots, jeans, a faded snap-pocket shirt that was a little stretched across his broad shoulders, and a shit-eating grin. “Now that’s no way to be,” he said.

“Your timing as usual is impeccable, brother,” I said.

“Thank you.”

“Leave your horse and hat at the corral?”

“The horse is wearing the hat,” Leonard said. “After the fun me and him had, I thought he deserved a little token of my appreciation. You can bet he’ll call tomorrow.”

“You’re funnier earlier in the day,” I said.

Marvin came in more slowly, using the cane.

“Like them foot rabbits,” he said, nodding at my shoes.

“Yeah, me and them are buds,” I said. “You’re getting around good.”

“You should have seen me before we went dancing. Those hip-hop steps have a way of making you weak.”

“We went for tacos,” Leonard said. “This guy, you can’t get him to do nothing fun. His idea of a good time is chewing gum with a fruity flavor.”

“Where’s the love of your life?” I asked Leonard.

“John?”

“No. Winston Churchill.”

“He’s mad at me.”

“Imagine that.”

“It’s nothing much. I think we called each other bitches and then I got mad enough to take a dump in the middle of the bed, and did.”

“Overshare,” I said.

“We both forget what started it, and we’re both holding out for an apology. I will, of course, cave, and then we’ll be back to normal. You got anything to eat?”

“I thought you ate tacos?”

“Two, maybe three hours ago.”

“I’m not feeling all that friendly right now,” I said. “Why would I want to feed you?”

“Interrupt something?” Leonard said, sliding into the kitchen to open the refrigerator.

“Yeah, me and Brett were just setting up the checkerboard. Marvin, why do you hang with this riffraff?”

Marvin found a soft chair and was sitting there, stretching out his leg, rubbing his knee. “I hang with him because I pity him.”

“So why let him bother me?”

“Leonard said you love late-night company.”

“He’s a lying sonofabitch.”

“Hey, boys,” Brett said.

I turned and saw her coming down the stairs. She had on a white shorty robe and her hair was bed fluffed and her legs were long enough to make a giraffe drown himself. Her eyes were half closed and she was beautiful.

Leonard came back into the living room, empty-handed.

Brett finished off the stairs, said, “Hi, Leonard.”

“Hi, Brett. You got anything to eat?”

“John lets you out to play this late?” she said.

“I’ll make it up to him tomorrow,” Leonard said. “I’ve got some moves, honey. If you like, I could show Hap some of my tricks, though it would be purely theoretical, of course.”

“Your biology sucks,” I said. “John. Brett. Different plumbing. Wouldn’t work.”

“Hi, Marvin,” she said.

Marvin smiled, gave her a little wave.

“I’m having milk and cookies,” she said. “Anyone else?”

“Me. Me,” Leonard said. “Are the cookies by any chance … vanilla?”

“They are,” Brett said. “Hap keeps them just for you, baby. There’s also your favorite. Dr Peppers. These are from the only plant where the original formula is used. We drove over there special to get them.”

“We were passing by the plant,” I said, “so I thought, why not.”

Leonard looked at me and batted his eyes. “You are the sweetest bastard ever squatted to crap over a pair of shoes.”

“Cookies aren’t just for you,” I said. “I like them too. And Dr Pepper.”

“He’s a liar,” Brett said. “He keeps them for you. He drinks that diet crap. Go sit down. Milk or Dr Pepper with your cookies?”

“Need you ask?” Leonard said.

“Marvin?” Brett said. “How about you?”

“Milk and cookies sounds fine.”

“Great,” she said. “Hap, get your ass in there and get the cookies. Some for me too. Chop-chop.”

I started toward the kitchen. As I passed her, she grabbed my arm. “Just kidding,” she said. “I’ll get them. I was just evaluating your training. You get an A. Later I’ll give you a treat, and it won’t be a dog biscuit.”

She leaned forward and kissed me on the lips.

As I started back into the living room area Leonard said, “Good dog. Next you’ll be off the newspapers and using the yard.”

“That’s my goal.”

I sat down on the couch, the far end from Leonard, who had kicked off his shoes and was stretching his legs out.

“I can’t see what Brett sees in you, Hap,” Leonard said.

“It’s the parts you don’t see,” I said.

“Nor do I want to.”

“I’m thinking, maybe,” I said, “you didn’t really come over here to interrupt my sex life and have milk and cookies.”

“I’m having Dr Pepper,” Leonard said. “Dr Pepper that you got special just for me.”

“Go to hell, Leonard.”

“You’re right, Hap,” Marvin said. “We didn’t come over to have milk and cookies. It’s a little more complicated than that.”

3

We finished up our milk and cookies, Leonard his Dr Pepper and cookies, then Brett went upstairs to bed. The treat she offered me would have to be held in abeyance. I considered the delay Leonard's fault, and gave him a black mark on my mental chalkboard. No star for you, asshole. Next time I'd get RC instead of Dr Pepper, see how that pulled his chain, maybe get some of those nasty coconut cookies he hated. I hated them too, but the punishment was worth consideration.

We went out in the yard to talk so Brett wouldn't be bothered by our big mouths. She had bought some metal lawn chairs and put them out there, and I kept expecting to come out some morning and find they'd been chair-napped, as our part of the neighborhood was getting bad. Used to, you could leave your wallet on the porch swing and no one would bother it. These days, you left a cheese grater out, someone would steal the holes.

It was a nice night and there weren't too many lights on our street, and the sky was clear so you could look up through the limbs of the elm tree at the edge of the yard and see stars. It was too cool for crickets and there wasn't any traffic on the road out front. The air smelled fresh and a little sweet, like a baby's breath, and in that moment I was glad we lived there in that house with that yard and that big elm, in what the old books about the South used to call genteel poverty.

After seating ourselves in the lawn chairs, I crossed my legs and dangled a bunny shoe.

Leonard said, "Man, you could have at least put on pants. That robe is a little too peekaboo."

"My motto," I said, "is if you've got it, flaunt it."

"What you're flauntin' is enough to make a man turn a gun on himself," Leonard said.

Marvin said, “I got a job proposition to discuss.”

“You’re gonna love this, Hap,” Leonard said.

I looked at Marvin. “Am I?”

“I don’t think you’re going to throw a parade, but here it is,” Marvin said. “My daughter’s daughter, her boyfriend, he’s been beating on her.”

This fit in with the theme Brett and I had been discussing. Maybe I should just send her over there with a shovel. If there was a dwarf, I could send her with a pistol.

I said, “Boyfriend? Your granddaughter? What is she, like twelve?”

“Eighteen.”

“Get out,” I said.

“They grow fast,” he said.

“And she’s a cutie,” Leonard said. “You should see her. A dirty old hetero man like you, you’d love her.”

“You’ve seen her?”

“Photograph,” Leonard said.

I turned to Marvin. “So what exactly is the deal?”

“Well, he whipped up on her and I went over and caught him pulling into his place and he got out and I beat him a little bit with my cane. It wore me out and it didn’t do my cane any good and I scuffed up a good pair of shoes. I had to get a new cane and have the shoes shined. That ain’t a quarter no more. White boys are doing it now, by the way. They like at least five dollars.”

“Inflation,” Leonard said.

“How old is the boyfriend?” I asked.

“Twenty-five or so,” Marvin said. “I don’t know exactly. Old enough to be a better person than he is. Old enough for me to kill him and drop his body in a hole somewhere.”

“So you beat him with your cane, and now you want… what?” I said. “Sounds like to me you took care of the problem, gave him an attitude adjustment. Did you leave the old cane up his ass and you want us to fetch it?”

“Deal is,” Marvin said, “he didn’t like it much, that beating, and he has friends he can go to. And my leg, it’s just getting good, but it’s not that good. I can whip one ass easy enough, but multiple asses, not so sure. And I’m only up for one ass at a time, maybe once a week during certain hours after lunch and well before sunset when the stars are aligned just right… I was lucky I caught him alone, without his posse.”

“Call me foolish,” I said, “but since you used to be a cop, did it occur to you that you might want to call the law and maybe have them go over there and do the domestic violence thing?”

“Therein lays the Shakespearean rub,” Marvin said.

“That sounds like something I’d like on my middle leg,” Leonard said.

“You see, my granddaughter, Julia, we call her Gadget, this guy she’s with, he’s kind of a drug dealer.”

“Kind of?” I asked.

“Okay,” Marvin said. “Absolutely he is. And if the law gets involved, well, she could get involved.”

“I’m not loving this at all, Leonard.”

“I was being facetious.”

I turned to Marvin. Fearing I already knew the answer, I asked, “Why would she get involved if the law got involved?”

“Because she is selling grass out of their trailer, and they, as I said, are drug dealers. As for the law, they are in the drug dealer’s pocket, in there with the lint and the pocket change. So it could really turn out bad.”

“I probably should know this already,” I said, “but what about Gadget’s father? Maybe he can do something.”

Marvin shook his head. “No reason you should know. I don’t make a point of talking about him much. He ran off when she was a fetus, and now her mother is at her wits’ end.”

“So what you need from us is…?” I asked.

“I need someone to do some serious ass whipping, and bring her home. If you can get by without the ass whipping and just bring her home, that’ll do. But I’d like to think there will be an ass whipping. Not meaning her ass, of course.”

“What if she doesn’t want to come home?”

“I think she will. I think she would have the other day, but at the last minute she didn’t. I’m not up to snuff. I burned myself out and didn’t have any energy left, so I had to let her go. There wasn’t anything I could do. I bluffed my way out to the car and got out of there. But you two, you can do it. You can bring her home.”

I studied on this a moment, looked at Leonard. He gave me a small nod. I said, “We’ll do it, but she doesn’t want to come home, I don’t know what to tell you. That’s the case, we bring her back, she’ll just run off again.”

“I understand that,” Marvin said. “But I saw something in her eyes before she got pulled away. She wanted to come home. I’m not sure she knows it outright, but I could tell.”

“I don’t trust things you see in people’s eyes,” I said. “You might be seeing your own reflection.”

“Me neither,” Leonard said, “but I’d sure like to whip that guy’s ass. We could make it a weekly tradition.”

“You mentioned that he has a posse,” I said.

“He does. My catching him alone … I understand that’s rare.”

“How many?”

“From my sources, I hear four, sometimes less, sometimes more. But generally, four. They stay in a trailer out in the woods. That’s where I caught him. I wasn’t using my head. Had they been there with him, my picture would probably be on a milk carton, people out beating the bushes, digging up anything looked like a grave. I don’t think they’re all that rough-and-tumble, but I don’t want you to think they can’t be dangerous they catch you just right.”

“Who are your sources, far as the size of his posse goes?”

“Formerly bad people gone straight. Or so they say. They may still be bad people. But I trust them on their head count.”

“Four is a lot,” I said.

“Hey,” Marvin said, “you two against a trailer full of scum, that’s not fair to the scum.”

“Don’t blow me, Marvin,” I said.

“I wouldn’t think of it. But you show up in that robe and bunny slippers, you’re bound to have them licked. They’ll laugh themselves to death.”

“You’re kind of nasty for a man wanting a favor,” I said.

Marvin grinned at me, then his face let loose of the smile and his eyes narrowed. “Look. I need your help. I’m asking … Hell, I’m begging a little, just not so that you can tell, all right?”

“This guy, what’s his name?”

“Oddly enough, I don’t know. I know where he lives. He has one of those sixties-style Afros, maybe not as big as the really big ones, but you know, out there, Jimi Hendrix like. But I can put you right at his trailer.”

I looked at Leonard. He gave me a nod.

I said, “We’ll scope it out. See what we can do.”

4

The place where Gadget was selling grass and her boyfriend was selling meaner drugs when he wasn't using Gadget for a racquetball was not in LaBorde but just outside a nearby town called No Enterprise, where the law was two fat guys in a used cop car with so-so tires. They took the town's cop checks, but they didn't do much for it, except maybe catch a speeder now and then, maybe talk some gal into a blow job to get a pass on a ticket. The real money was in crooked enterprise. Or so Marvin told us. And Marvin isn't often wrong about stuff like that. He was a cop for years. First in Houston, then in LaBorde. He said he knew about those guys and told us about them, and I took his word to be as true as the turning of the earth.

We drove over to No Enterprise in my pickup. The truck is one of those Dodges with a backseat and four doors and a short bed. I had recently traded for it and it ran good.

It was raining and it was a cool day, especially for early fall. Just the night before we had been sitting in my yard in shirtsleeves, and now it was cool enough to wish for excess hair on your chest. As for women, I don't know exactly what they'd wish for. Probably a nice coat and a pair of shoes. I know Brett liked coats and shoes, especially shoes. She had enough in the closet to shoe a couple of monster-size centipedes, as long as they liked their footwear to come from Payless, Wal-Mart or Target. Equating women with shoes might be an old sexist cliché, but it didn't change the fact Brett had a lot of shoes.

What Leonard and I had were some windbreakers. Mine was blue. Leonard's was beige. We made a point of making sure we weren't wearing the same colors. It's hard to be convincing as tough guys when you're wearing matching outfits.

We had the address from Marvin, and of course the thing to do was not to just drive right up on the place, as that would be foolish and dangerous, but, since the two of us together sometimes can only manage the IQ level of a ground squirrel, that's exactly what we were going to do. We tried to come up with some nifty sophisticated plan on the way over, but we kept getting distracted and singing along with the CD player. We had to listen to Leonard's music. If I didn't want to, he pouted. He can pout big-time. Since we were in my truck and it was my CD player, I should have chosen some of the music. I wanted to play Amy Winehouse. He didn't.

Anyway, we drove over there singing to Kasey Lansdale's Back of My Smile CD, some Hank Williams, and a bit of Ernest Tubb. All good stuff. Then we listened to Patsy Cline. Neither of us had the balls to sing along with Patsy. That just isn't done. By the time we were five miles outside of No Enterprise it occurred to us that we had yet to concoct some kind of strategy, so we stopped off in town at Big Burger, a local place that served food and was also a filling station with an open garage. Inside the garage was a lube rack and a lonely-looking guy in blue khakis sitting on an old-fashioned Coke crate turned on edge. He was reading without fear of insult a sex book titled in bold letters Poontang Palace. The book was probably older than the reader, and considering the size of the town he probably read more books than he lubed transmissions.

Inside, they took our order and a lanky guy in an apron brought it to the little table where we sat, placed the hamburger plates on the plastic checkered tablecloth, and went away. They made a good hamburger and some French fries that tasted as if they had been put out on the drainboard and pissed on the night before and left to dry. We both bought potato chips as a replacement and pondered how a place could make such good hamburgers and such shitty fries. What kind of cook could fry a burger and couldn't dip some French fries in a deep fryer without screwing them up?

At that moment it seemed like a question equal to "why are we here?" We came closer to solving the French fry enigma than coming up with any kind of plan to deal with our problem concerning Gadget and her keepers.

"We're just going to rough him up, aren't we?" I said.

"He hit Gadget."

"We don't really know Gadget."

"She's Marvin's granddaughter, isn't she?"

"She is."

"All I need to know, Hap, ole buddy."

"So, we punch him in the head a little and we take Gadget with us."

"We can punch him lots of places. He's got friends, we got to punch them too."

"Okay, so we punch him and anyone else gets in our way, and we punch them all kinds of places, and then we take Gadget."

"Always been the plan, far as I'm concerned."

"And if she doesn't want to go?" I asked.

"We could take her."

"That wouldn't be smart, and it wouldn't be any good. You know that. We told Marvin that."

"You told him," Leonard said, sipped his coffee and looked out the window at cars going by on the highway.

"But you know it's true," I said.

"Yeah, I know it. But I don't like bastards like this guy and I don't like what he's done to the granddaughter…. Ever notice how many cars are red these days? That used to be bad luck, a red car."

"No. I haven't noticed. We don't know this guy has done anything. She might be making him do it."

"Making him do it? Sayin', 'How's about hittin' me upside the head'? That what she's doin'?"

"I don't mean she deserves it. I mean it may be some kind of sexual ritual. He punches her in the eye, then she sucks his dick. Then she punches him in the eye, and he goes for the taco. Then they start all over again."

"That what you think?"

"No."

"Just like to hear yourself talk, don't you, Hap?"

"Pretty much," I said.

"So we're back to roughing his ass up and seeing she wants to go with us."

"Yeah, that's pretty much it," I said. "That is the plan. I mean, why do something smart and safe and well coordinated, when we can just drive up on them and start throwing knuckles."

"Sometimes it works."

"Sometimes it does. And sometimes we get our asses kicked around."

"I know," Leonard said. "I've seen it happen. But that ain't often, is it?"

"Once is too goddamn often."

"Point taken. Chocolate pie?"

5

We finished off our lunch with chocolate pie and more coffee, considered having another slice and another cup but talked ourselves out of it, reminded by the fact that we had a job to do, a promise to keep, and we didn't want to do it toting too much weight in our bellies.

Outside I took a peek in the garage. The reader was still sitting on the upturned Coke crate, engrossed in his book. I sort of hoped no one would want a tire changed or a manifold replaced. I'd hate to think such intense concentration might be broken. A car backfired out on the highway. The dedicated reader didn't move. He didn't bat an eye. I guess he was at the good part, where someone was about to put the arrow in the target.

Leonard came over and stood by me, said, "Come on, doofus. I been standing out by the truck waiting. Let's roll."

* * *

Following Marvin's directions over to the place, we listened to some more music and sang along some more, this time with Willie Nelson. I thought I did a pretty good "Blue Eyes Crying in the Rain." Leonard didn't think so. We sang "In the Jailhouse Now," which I thought might be a form of prophecy, considering what we were about to do.

Where we were going was kind of a peckerwood suburb, which was pretty much a clutch of fall-defoliated trees, some evergreen pines, a listing mobile home, and a dog hunched to drop a load in what passed for a yard. The dog was medium-sized, dirty yellow, and looked like the last meal he'd eaten was what he was dropping. He was working so hard at dropping those turds, his eyes were damn near crossed, had the kind of concentration that made you consider he might be close to figuring out the problems of string theory. He didn't look owned. Had the look of a freelance dog. Maybe there was something to be said for that.

The yard wasn't much. The rain had stopped and windblown leaves had bunched up all over the place. There were some cars parked there, and there were some people standing next to the cars. Eight guys, to be exact. They looked pretty young. There was a fellow standing in the doorway of the trailer in Scooby Doo shorts scratching his nuts like a squirrel sorting acorns. He was young too. I didn't see anyone I thought was Gadget, unless she had been disguised as the stray yellow dog or was in that fellow's shorts hiding next to his nut sack.

We parked and Leonard got my .38 snub-nosed revolver out of the glove box and stuck it in his pants and pulled his shirt and windbreaker over it. I have a gun permit, as does Leonard, but that gun wasn't on it. It wasn't even registered. It was for nefarious deeds.

I said, "Don't use that."

"Hey, better to have and not need than not have and need."

"What about me?"

"You didn't want me to use it, but now you want to carry it? I don't think so."

"It's my gun."

"Tough shit. Use your suave and debonair fucking charm."

We got out and started walking toward the trailer. The people in the yard rapidly divided into two camps: the scared and the nervous. Some of them got in their cars and drove away quickly. They would be the buyers. The rest started inside the trailer. They would be the drug-selling posse. The guy in the shorts let them pass, then took his position again, hand in his drawers. He looked at us like he thought he was tough enough to chew the edge off a Buck knife. I didn't think he looked as tough as he thought. However, sometimes looks can be deceiving.

There was what passed for music coming out of the trailer. Rap, I guess, but it sounded like someone beating an active washing machine with a log chain.

I said to Leonard as we walked up, "Take it easy, play it cool."

"Cool is my middle name," Leonard said.

“No,” I said. “No, it isn’t.”

We were close to the front door when the man holding his balls, a black guy with pale skin and a longish Afro that made him look like a time traveler from the late sixties, early seventies, said, “Man, you two are fuckin’ my game. You didn’t come here for what we sell, I can tell.”

“Ain’t this where they’re having the revival?” Leonard said. “I been wanting Jesus in my heart, or up my ass or somethin’. Way you’re digging, is he in them Scooby shorts with you?”

“You a funny nigger,” the black man said. “You don’t know shit. Scooby is cool. What the fuck you want?”

The idea that our bad guy guarding the door was worried about our dissing Scooby amused me a bit. We had stopped about four feet from the door. The trailer was up on concrete blocks, so the guy in the doorway was standing above us. He was still playing pocket pool. By this point, my nuts would have been chafed and my hand would have been tired enough I would have had to call in re inforcements. His legs had bruises on them. I figured that would be from Marvin’s cane. Behind him, in the slight darkness, I could see movement, and the sound of the music was loud enough and bad enough that the idea of kicking someone’s ass was beginning to appeal, if for no other reason than their lack of taste.

“I don’t like being called a nigger even when a nigger calls me that,” Leonard said.

“That some kind of joke too?”

“You see me laughin’?” Leonard said.

Another man, a lanky but muscled white guy with a close-shaved scalp, appeared at the Afro guy’s shoulder, looked out, said, “You want I should take care of them?”

“I ask you shit?” the Afro man said. “You hear me ask some shit from you? Go on in there and sit your white ass down. Pet the fuckin’ dog or pat my old lady’s ass, but don’t be gettin’ in my game unless I call on you.”

“Have it your fuckin’ way,” the white guy said, and disappeared back inside the trailer.

“I’m pettin’ your gal’s ass,” the white guy called from somewhere inside.

“That was like just a fuckin’ thing to say. Don’t you do it, asshole,” the Afro guy said, glancing inside the trailer. Then he looked back at us.

I said, “Could you ask him to turn down the music? I think I saw a bird fall out of a tree.”

He ignored me. “You cops?”

“We look like cops?” Leonard said.

“He does,” he said, pointing a finger at me.

“He’s white,” Leonard said. “All white guys look like cops.”

“I resent that,” I said.

“We ain’t cops,” Leonard said. “Now, get your hand off your bulbs, we maybe can do a little business. But you and me. No matter what the business. We ain’t shakin’ hands.”

The Afro guy didn’t pull his hand out of his shorts. His eyes narrowed. “All right, you buyin’ somethin’ or not?”

Leonard said, “You’re right. I fess up. We don’t want to buy anything. To be precise, we’re here to take somethin’. It’s Gadget we want.”

“Gadget?”

“Yep,” I said.

“You guys are nuts. Ain’t nobody around but you two, and there’s four of us and a badass dog, and you’re tellin’ me you’re takin’ my woman?”

“If you had two dogs,” Leonard said, “now that would be different.”

“There’s a dog?” I said.

The guy in the doorway shifted his nuts to the other side of his shorts and looked exasperated. “Gadget ain’t goin’ nowhere, man. She’s my hole.”

“Damn, that’s a romantic reference,” I said. “You say you got a dog in there?”

“She ain’t goin’,” the man said.

“Only if she wants to go,” I said. “And maybe even if she doesn’t want to. We’re kind of up in the air on that part… What kind of dog is it?”

“Ah,” he said, “I get it. You two from that old nigger. Her granddaddy That fuckin’ cripple.”

“Whipped your ass with a cane, didn’t he?” Leonard said. “That was some lively old cripple, wouldn’t you say? Your legs look like a fuckin’ zebra with them bruises.”

“He caught me off guard.”

“He hit you with that stick like he was dustin’ a rug, Tanedrue,” the white guy said from somewhere inside.

“You shut the fuck up,” Tanedrue said.

He turned back to us.

Leonard laughed a little. “Tanedrue? That’s your name? Your mama made that name up, didn’t she?”

“It’s African.”

“Naw it ain’t,” Leonard said. “If that don’t scream ignorant backwoods nigger, I don’t know what does. That was my name, I’d stick a sharp stick up my ass and impale myself.”

“That’s it,” Tanedrue said, and reached back into the trailer with his right hand. For a slight moment he was distracted, which of course was what we were waiting for.

Leonard moved quickly, caught Tanedrue by the feet, jerked them up and out. Tanedrue’s head smacked on the bottom of the trailer doorway and then Leonard dragged him down the metal stairs so that his head bounced on each and every one of them. I saw a bit of blood fly out from Tanedrue’s skull, then he went limp and tumbled off the stairs, his hand still in his shorts. No doubt about it, he was one tenacious ball handler.

We kept moving, straight into the trailer.

6

The white guy with the shaved head was the first one at the door. Leonard hit him between the eyes with a swinging elbow so hard I'm sure a distant relative in bad health in the old country crossed his eyes and died. The blow made the goon spin around and away from us. He went down on one knee and held his head, just to make sure it was still attached. While he was on his knees, his legs slightly spread, Leonard kicked him in the balls like he was making a soccer goal.

I was in right behind Leonard. As I entered, the music smacked me like a fist and the stink of the place draped over me like a blanket. Then a dog jumped at me from the shadows. It was a big, dark, growling dog and it was part of the stench. It went for my throat. I moved to the side slightly and caught the dog by the collar with one hand as its teeth snapped in the air, and saliva from the snap popped across my forehead. With the other hand, I caught its hind leg and picked it up high as I could manage. It was a heavy dog. I saw a window out of the corner of my eye, just over a stained kitchen sink. I tossed the dog at it, hard as I could. The window cracked and the dog went through it in a shower of black and tan fur and a tinkling of glass, its body doing a kind of horseshoe maneuver from the impact. The dog let out a whelp and a yip and then I heard nothing but the sound of its body striking the earth outside. There was blood and fur on the jagged glass. I suspected fleas had pulled parachute cords.

I heard Leonard say, "Come to papa," and when I turned my head, I caught sight of Leonard holding a big bushy-headed white guy by the back of the neck, slamming his head into the wall so hard a mirror fell off and shattered.

As I turned, a thin black guy came down the hall at a rush, clubbed me in the ribs with a right hook that nearly caused me to piss myself. I tried to kick him, but there wasn't any room. In a reflex action he shoved out with both hands, hit me in the chest and knocked me down on top of the guy Leonard had kicked in the balls. The ball-kicked dude was resting politely on the floor whimpering like a little girl who had lost her dolly, hands between his legs.

“You hurt my dog,” said the guy who shoved me.

I rolled up and he kicked at me and I scooped my hand under his leg and grabbed his face with my other hand and used my closest leg to sweep his standing leg out from under him. He hit his head on a counter, his teeth snapped together on his tongue, and he went down, blood foaming out of his mouth. I smelled something that made me think he’d bent a biscuit in his skivvies.

I heard a shriek from the back, looked down the hall. A young, long-legged woman was running at me. She was a dark-skinned girl with a lot of processed hair, maybe some extensions, and for all I knew a recent manicure and a toe ring. She jumped on me with her legs spread and straddled me, her ankles locked around my back; she had hold of my hair with one hand and was clawing my face with the other, still shrieking.

I hit her with a right cross between the eyes and she let go, though her legs stayed hooked. She fell back on her head, then her legs came undone and they sort of melted toward the floor with the rest of her.

Leonard was still working on the big hairy guy, had him by the mane and was smashing his head into the wall, cracking the paneling. All I could tell for sure was the guy now had a very flat nose and his lips looked like fat fishing worms that were coming apart. One of his teeth was embedded in the paneling and there was blood on the wall. One more slam and a big crucifix fell and bounced on the couch and then bounced on top of the ball-kicked guy and then onto the floor.

The ball-kicked guy had gotten some juice back. Maybe the crucifix revived him. He tried to get up, made it to his hands and knees. Leonard, without letting go of the guy whose head he was bouncing, kneed the other dude in the face, knocking him back down. He winced, did a kind of push-up, tried to come up. I got him from behind, right in the snickerdoodles again. He farted and went down and didn’t get up, either knocked out, dead, or hoping to God we thought he was. Right then he was probably wishing he had been thrown out the window with the dog. I was too. That was quite a fart.

I took a breath and put a hand on my side, then my face. I was bleeding from where the girl had scratched me.

I did a quick reconnoiter. It looked as if the trailer occupants were all pretty much Nap City. Leonard whirled the guy whose nose he had flattened around and hit him with a hard strike to the neck with the side of his hand. The guy went down. Not that he really needed that neck strike. He was going to fall anyway. Leonard kicked him once just to keep himself flexible.

I picked up the CD player on a shelf over the couch and slammed it against the wall. The CD flew out of it and I stepped on it. It felt good to have the air filled with emptiness.

That's when the now awake Tanedrue came wobbling through the door, his hand no longer in his shorts. He reached for what he had been reaching for before, something just inside the door on top of the refrigerator. A little automatic. He got hold of it. As he brought it around, Leonard pulled my .38 and shot Tanedrue in the right thigh, just below the shorts. Tanedrue dropped the automatic, grabbed his leg, let out a yell that made my asshole pinch tight, then went down shrieking, holding his thigh, blood squirting everywhere.

"Goddamn, Leonard!"

Leonard gave me an exasperated look. "I started to let him shoot you, but I thought Brett would be mad."

"Goddamn, Leonard."

The guy who had bitten his tongue was closest at hand, so I grabbed his shirt by the front and pulled hard. It ripped off of his unconscious body, and I stuck it in Tanedrue's wound. Tanedrue cussed me and struck out at me, so I hit him in the head a couple of times. "Lay down, you stupid fuck, before you bleed to death."

"You shot me!" he said.

"Technically, he shot you," I said, jerking my head at Leonard.

Leonard tossed my .38 on the couch, grabbed Tanedrue by the Afro and lifted him off the ground a little, slid behind him, and slipped his forearm around his neck, pushing in tight on the arteries there. He slid his choking hand into the bend of his other elbow and locked the other hand behind Tanedrue's head, compressed while he expanded his chest.

Tanedrue passed out quicker than an asthmatic octogenarian fucking a sheep in a stuffy hayloft.

"Now fix him," Leonard said, letting Tanedrue drop.

"I don't know he can be fixed."

"It ain't through an artery. I'm a better shot than that."

"No, you're not."

"Yeah. Okay, I was lucky."

Leonard was right. Tanedrue was hit through the meaty part of the thigh and he was losing blood from the hole in his leg, but the main artery had been missed. I tore some more of the shirt off the guy on the floor and wrapped Tanedrue's leg as best I could, put my ear to his chest to make sure he was breathing. Leonard had used a blood choke, but sometimes they don't come back.

"I guess that's Gadget passed out over there," I said.

"She wasn't as glad to see us as I had hoped," Leonard said. "I saw you hit her. You hit her hard. If she was wearing a Tampax, I bet you knocked it out of her ass."

"She rearranged my looks a little," I said, touching the scratches on my face.

"You look like an old-fashioned German duelist."

I picked up Tanedrue's automatic and went to the back of the trailer, just in case someone was hiding back there with a shotgun and a machete. There was no one else left. On a chest of drawers in front of a mirror there were some bags of white powder that I didn't mistake for self-rising flour. There were some boxes of baby laxative there too, for cutting the stuff. On the floor were empty cheese cracker boxes, lots of wrappers for sweets and empty soft drink cans and bottles and a near-empty jar of peanut butter with the lid off. There was a box of half-eaten Cracker Jack. That would be the property of the health nut of the bunch. What remained of the peanut butter had turned dark as dried dog shit. And there was plenty of that to go around too. Dog shit in the corner, on the floor by the bed, at the edge of the dresser. There was a footprint in that pile. Not mine. This footprint was bare. There were some other piles that someone had thoughtfully covered with paper towels. Whoever did that was probably considered prissy. A fat roach crawled out of the peanut butter jar and scuttled under the bed.

Taped to the mirror on the dresser were birthday cards, an old Christmas card. They said “To Tanedrue” and were signed “Mom.” I felt a little sick looking at those, had to wonder how his mom felt about how her boy had turned out. For that matter, if my mother was alive, how would she have felt about me, hitting people and throwing dogs out windows? It wasn’t a line of thought I wanted to linger on.

When I looked up, I noticed the walls of the trailer were moving. I had seen it before in white trash housing and poor black folk shacks. Cockroaches. They were so thick in the walls they made the paneling flex like it was breathing. Yuck.

I went back to where Leonard was slapping Tanedrue briskly on the cheeks to either bring him awake or give his cheeks a touch of color.

“Wake up, nigger,” Leonard said.

“They got some real bad stuff back there,” I said. “And perhaps, as a nod to political correctness, I should note, for your own good, that you’re using the N word.”

“I’ve been busy with words and slapping in here,” Leonard said. “I’ve done run out on the cocksucker word, and I wore out motherfucker, and sonofabitch seems so lame, so I’m going for the gold … Ah, Sleeping Beauty awakes.”

7

Tanedrue woke up. We were squatting down beside him. Leonard said, “Every time I think of Gadget’s grandpa beating your ass with a cane, I get a kind of warm feeling all over. In fact, my dick gets hard.”

Tanedrue said, “I’m bleeding to death.”

“You ain’t bleeding to death, dumb ass,” Leonard said. “Not yet, anyway. It got the fat part of your leg, went all the way through. Bleeding has mostly stopped because Hap, who is like goddamn Florence Nightingale with a pecker, stuck your buddy’s shirt in the bullet hole and stopped the bleeding. Course, you might want to worry about blood poisoning from the dye in the shirt, that would be my concern. Oh yeah, and the bullet.”

“You could have shot my balls off.”

“You’d have to have some first,” I said.

Tanedrue was sitting on the floor with his legs stuck out, his back against the refrigerator, looking around. “You fucked everybody up, you done killed them.”

“No,” Leonard said, “nobody’s dead. The fucked-up part is right, probably a concussion here and there, so I’d wake them up pretty quick. Word is on concussions… you shouldn’t sleep. Do that, sometimes you don’t wake up, and what a shame that would be. Think of the loss to art, science, and literature. Oh, and the big guy there, with all the hair. He may not have a real profile anymore, so photo shots of him might be best from the front, him wearing a bag over his head, standing somewhat at a distance.”

“They could die,” Tanedrue said. “You might have hurt them real bad. And me, I don’t feel so good either.”

“Boy, that’s a shame,” Leonard said. “Considering you were going to shoot us, you fuckin’ asshole! Pour some monkey blood on it and shut up. Now listen here: Leave Gadget alone. Stay away from her. And if you have a day where you think maybe we've forgotten about you and you decide to bother her again, that's the day we kneecap you, asshole, and then I'm gonna put your ass in an ant bed after I stuff it full of Gummi Bears, and then I'm gonna set your head on fire, and then I'm gonna get mad. Savvy?"

"Gummi Bears?" I said.

Tanedrue was almost crying, but he was still defiant. "You don't know what you're up against, nigger."

About that time the guy whose shirt I had torn off woke and tried to sit up. I said, "Lay back down, ball sweat."

He lay down and closed his eyes and stretched his arms out at his sides with the palms down and was quiet as a dead mouse.

"Now," Leonard said, standing, "we'll be taking Gadget with us, and before I go, I want to leave you with one more piece of wisdom."

Leonard kicked Tanedrue in the head, hard, knocking his noggin back against the refrigerator. Without knowing it was going to come out of my mouth, I said, "Ouch."

"You get my drift, dick cheese?" Leonard said.

Tanedrue nodded, blood dripping from his mouth, his hand held to the side of his head.

"Say it," Leonard said.

"I got you," Tanedrue said.

"That's good. And you know, this place … you ought to get some nice curtains, a little better lighting, one of those de-stinkers that plug into the 'lectric socket, a friendlier goddamn dog. This joint is fuckin' depressin'."

"You ought to see the dog shit in the back room," I said. "It's not a pretty sight."

"Clean that up too," Leonard said. "Goddamn dog don't want to see that, wonder he hasn't committed dog-acide. Better yet, set fire to this whole place and start over."

"Your little white powder in the back," I said. "I'm gonna have to get rid of it."

I put Tanedrue's automatic in my waistband without blowing my dick off, went back to the bedroom. I could hear Tanedrue calling out, “Don’t do it, man. There’s people gonna be mad and they’re so bad they make you two look like weenies. I ain’t jerkin’ you. Come on, man. We can work some kind of deal.”

I heard Leonard give Tanedrue a whack and then the guy went silent.

I got the bags one at a time and took them to the bathroom and used my pocketknife to cut them open and flush the contents down the toilet, which was a nasty little number with a dark ring inside the bowl that wasn’t some kind of design.

I could hear Tanedrue groan every time he heard the toilet flush. I kept at it until I was finished. I took a leak and washed my hands and came back and stood over him. Leonard was squatting beside him.

I said, “All down the crapper. Thousands of dollars’ worth of blow.”

“You’re gonna wish you hadn’t done that,” Tanedrue said. “Them guys we work for, they ain’t got no sense of humor.”

“That may be,” Leonard said. “But a fashion tip. Them Scooby shorts, on a grown man, they aren’t that cool. Trust me.” Leonard sniffed at the air, looked at the guy on the floor without a shirt, wrinkled up his nose. “And maybe you ought to wipe that fucker’s ass.”

◆

I looked down at Gadget. She was lying on her back, breathing deeply. She was wearing a tank top that barely kept her unfettered breasts in check and a pair of shorts that were cut so high and were so tight, if she yawned the damn things would have sucked up her ass. She was not bad to look at, though her eyes had dark circles like a raccoon’s around them. I had only hit her once, so I figured Tanedrue or one of his brethren had done the bulk of the knocking. My shot had given her a knot in the center of her forehead about the size of a turnip, so I too could be proud.

I got the .38, leaned over, and picked her up and threw her over my shoulder. She was very light, maybe a hundred and ten pounds. That’s great, Hap, you just punched out a little girl about half your weight.

I carried Gadget out to the truck and we looked around for their dog, just in case he was vengeful. But he was either on the other side of the trailer in a heap or had run off to join the circus. I hoped the latter. I liked dogs. I put Gadget in the backseat and Leonard got in the front and I drove us out of there. As we went, I saw the other dog, the yellow one, sitting beside the road. He turned his head to watch as we drove by.

Leonard turned to me, said, “Now, see. That worked out fine.”

“I hate you,” I said.

8

Leonard leaned back and looked over the seat at Gadget. He said, “She looks like some kind of angel got caught up in a fan.”

“I hit her,” I said.

“And boy did she have it coming.”

“I feel like a bully.”

“You had to do it.”

“I still don’t like it.”

“Had she been wearing a nose ring, would you have felt better?”

“Just a bit,” I said. “I really hate those things. Seriously tattooed arms would have helped too.”

Leonard grinned and shook his head. “You worry too much about things that are done, my brother. She’s taken beatings for no reason and you punched her because you wanted to keep your eyes in your head and get her away from those boneheads. Give yourself some slack.”

“Hitting women is not on my list of gentlemanly activities.”

“Well, whipping people’s asses and throwing their dog out the window might not be on the list either.”

“Yeah … well… At least I didn’t shoot anyone.”

“That’s right, point that out, put it all on me. But unlike you, I don’t feel guilty… Listen, man. You did what you had to do. And now we got to do something else. The .38 and dickhead’s automatic.”

◆

We drove down some back trails and stopped by a little run of water that was just off the road and flowed out into the woods.

The road was pretty messy and I figured if it rained harder it would be difficult to get down it, and even more difficult to get back out.

Climbing out of the truck, Leonard got some gloves from the toolbox fastened to the bed and wiped the .38 clean and threw it into the woods, into the shallow water there. He took the automatic and did the same.

We got back in the truck and I got back on the main road. “They find that stuff,” Leonard said, “it don’t mean a thing. We didn’t own the automatic. And your .38 was as cold as the cunt between a dead nun’s legs … Hey, Gadget. She’s coming to.”

Gadget sat up in the back and I watched her in the rearview mirror. She had a hand to her head. Right where I had hit her. “You hit me,” she said.

“Right between the eyes,” I said.

“He feels bad about it,” Leonard said.

“That don’t mean a damn thing to me. My head hurts.”

“He did it with love,” Leonard said.

“Who the fuck are you?” Then it struck her. “Ah, I know … My grandpa’s friends. Hank and Larry.”

“Hap and Leonard,” Leonard said. “I’m Leonard, and he’s Hap. You can remember the names because he’s a white guy and I’m a black guy.”

“I can see that… I know who you are.”

“Yeah, but can you remember which of us is which,” Leonard said. “Black guy, Leonard. White guy, Hap.”

“Why did you do it?” she said.

“Your grandpa asked us to,” I said. “And he’s a friend, and we remember when you were a baby and everyone thought you were going to grow up to be worth something.”

“That don’t mean nothin’,” she said. “I don’t even remember you guys.”

“In truth, you may not mean all that much to us,” Leonard said, “but Marvin, he means a lot. Come on, gal. What the hell you doin’? We know you got raised better than that.”

“You don’t know nothin’.”

“We know that,” I said. “We know you weren’t raised to bang drug dealers in a trailer with roaches in the walls and dog shit and a near empty jar of cheap peanut butter on the floor.”

“Don’t forget the cocaine,” Leonard said.

“That too,” I said.

“And a criminal dog,” Leonard said. “That pup y’all got, he has done gone over to the dark side.”

Gadget took a deep breath, narrowed her eyes. “I remember Grandpa said you two thought you were funny.”

9

As we arrived in No Enterprise it started to rain heavy and the sky took on a hazy green look like nature had vomited into the heavens. The wind hit the truck hard enough to move it. Looking at the town through wet swaths made by the wipers, it was even more depressing, a weak hope thrown together with brick and glass. Someone thought the railroad would come through there many years ago, and it didn't. What was left now was nothing more than a hope and a dream.

The rain was running deep in the streets and in the gutters. My gas gauge pinged. We drove back to the place where we had eaten and parked under the overhang where the fuel pumps were. Leonard got out and began putting gas in the truck. The rain pounded on the overhang. The water splashed all around us. It was pretty dark for the time of day. I glanced at Leonard standing by the pump working the gas nozzle. He gave me a weak salute. I shot him the finger. He shot me the finger back. I never said we were mature.

I looked back at Gadget.

"How'd you get that name, Gadget?" I said. "I used to know, but I forgot."

She was slow with the answer. "I liked fixing things when I was a girl. I had a knack … Look, Grandpa shouldn't have asked you to do this. This isn't good for me or anyone. Other day, when he hit Tanedrue with the cane—"

"Hold up," I said. "How many times did he hit him? I just got to know."

"A lot. He did it quick. I thought Tanedrue was going to shoot him. I begged him not to."

"Your boyfriend sounds like aces. Goddamn, I bet you're proud."

“You got to take me back, Leonard—”

“I’m Hap.”

“Whatever. Or let me out here, and I can call someone.”

“We’re someone.”

“I mean someone Tanedrue knows. I can’t call him. Cell phones don’t work out there, and that’s all they got. Cell phones. They like it that way. Hell, I don’t even have a phone. Just let me have yours, so I can call someone in town they know, and then you can go on. I see them, I can tell them something, whatever you want, make it some kind of misunderstanding, and I can say you apologized—”

“Not likely,” I said.

“You don’t want to get into this any deeper and drag me down too. You do, and hell will be coming.”

“Too late,” I said. “Did you really like it out there, Gadget?”

Again, hesitation. “I don’t know.”

“That means no,” I said.

“I loved Tanedrue.”

“Loved?”

“Love. I love him.”

“You want to go back because you’re using. That’s it, isn’t it?”

“No.”

“I think it is.”

“I said it isn’t.”

“It isn’t Tanedrue you want, it’s the monkey.”

“I just like it. I’m not hooked.”

“That’s what they all say.”

She held her stomach.

I said, “You hungry?”

“I don’t know.”

“Let’s start with the idea that you are.”

“Sometimes, I try to eat, I throw up.”

“That’s the drugs, or …”

“I’m not pregnant. I been careful about that.”

“So, you do have some common sense. Damn, girl. You don’t have to do this, live like trash.”

“You a social worker?”

“No. Unlike social workers, I really care.”

She took a long time to respond again. That was okay. I was getting used to it.

“Tanedrue, he said he was gonna quit dealing, soon as he got us a nest egg.”

“A rotten egg.”

“He meant it. He loves me.”

“You are young, aren’t you?”

“You don’t know everything.”

“I don’t know anything. Older I get, less I think I know. But I know this, and I’m going to be crude to make my point. What Tanedrue has is a dumb bitch he can screw and lie to and feed drugs to, and when he’s through with you, when you get so fucked up you can’t tell the difference between a fat mouse and a full-grown elephant, he’ll get rid of you, kid. You won’t be fresh meat to him no more. You won’t be pretty, and you won’t be nothing but a whining whore with a habit. Maybe just some dumb dead bitch in a ditch somewhere.”

“I ain’t no whore.”

“You will be. That’s how it’ll work. He’ll turn you out, baby. So he can make a few more bucks off his horse before it dies. He’ll tell you how you’re doin’ it for the two of you, and it don’t mean nothin’, not really—”

“Shut up! You don’t know everything.”

“You said that already, and I even agreed with you.”

Leonard opened the door, said, “Give me some gas money.”

“You pay”

“I haven’t got any money.”

I gave him some money, hesitated, said, “Let’s get some coffee. Gadget here, she might could eat something.”

“I’m not hungry,” she said.

“Then watch us drink coffee,” I said. “And if you run off, we’ll just chase you down. We don’t care how it looks or what anyone thinks. We are wild and crazy guys.”

“What if Tanedrue and the rest of them come and find you?” she said.

“That would be bad for them,” Leonard said. “Didn’t you just hear Hap say we were wild and crazy?”

10

I parked us near the garage between some yellow lines and under the overhang. The rain plunked on the aluminum above us like buckshot. The guy who had been reading Poontang Palace was still inside the garage, but now he was digging around in a toolbox, probably trying to find a big enough hammer to beat some sort of automotive problem into submission.

Inside the joint we got the same table as before and the guy who waited on us before came over, said, “You must like it here, back in the same day, and now with a friend.”

“We don’t like the fries, just want to go on record with that,” Leonard said. “But the hamburgers do the alligator rock. And she’s not a friend.”

“What?” the waiter said.

“He likes the hamburgers,” I said. “He doesn’t like the fries. The girl is not a friend. She’s a friend of a friend.”

The waiter didn’t look at me. He studied Leonard for a moment. Leonard smiled. There was always something about that smile. It was less like a smile and more like a snake trying to grin up a frog right before it struck and ate it.

The waiter looked away from Leonard, looked at me. “What happened to your face?”

I reached up and touched the scratches on my cheeks. “Briars.”

“You ought to see his ass,” Leonard said. “That’s where the real work was done.”

“That right?” the waiter said. “Sorry I asked. Here’s menus.”

When the waiter went away, I said, “What you going to have, Gadget?”

“I’m not hungry.”

“That crummy way you feel, that’s because you’re so hungry your belly thinks your throat's cut. Have some soup. They got soup here. I don't know how it is, but stay away from the French fries. Soup, any kind of soup, if it's fresh, it's pretty hard to mess up."

She didn't order anything, but when the waiter came back I ordered a cup of coffee and a bowl of chicken soup and Leonard ordered another hamburger, minus the fries, potato chips instead.

When the waiter was gone, I looked at Leonard, said, "You just ate couple hours ago. Maybe less. You want another hamburger?"

"Whipping the pure-dee-dog-doodie out of people makes me hungry. Don't it you?"

"A little."

The food came and I drank the coffee and pushed the soup over close to Gadget. I said, "I don't want the soup after all. Why don't you give it a taste? It smells pretty good."

She shook her head. "I know what you're doing."

I nodded. "Suit yourself."

Leonard dug into his hamburger. "Oh, Jesus, this is so good it makes you want to hold down a wild hog and fuck it in the ass."

"That passes for manners at his house," I said to Gadget.

"I've heard worse."

I noticed she had picked up the spoon and was starting to stir the soup. I pushed the crackers over close to her. She opened one of the cracker packages and bit a corner off the cracker. She crumbled the rest in her soup. I turned at an angle so I wasn't watching her. I got up and went over and ordered some pie and a glass of milk. When my pie and milk came, Leonard had to have the same, and now Gadget, finished with her soup, wanted some pie and milk too.

By this time she was starting to look better. I had a feeling it had been a long time since she'd eaten anything besides cheese crackers, potato chips, peanut butter and Cracker Jack. My guess was she was the neatnik who put the paper towels over the dog piles.

I paid the bill because Leonard didn't have any money, or said he didn't, and we drove out of there. The rain had died out and everything, even the crummy little town, looked better than before, spit-cleaned by nature. We hadn’t gone a mile before we looked back and saw Gadget had gone to sleep in the backseat, her belly full, and maybe, for a moment, satiated.

Of course, there was that hairy old cocaine monkey, and when she woke up, it was sure to chatter and show its ass.

I tried to tell myself we had done all we could do. What Marvin had asked. But somehow I didn’t feel satisfied that we could say “job well done.” I kept thinking about what Tanedrue had said, about what Gadget had said. About how we didn’t know what we had done and that hell was coming.

11

When we got back to LaBorde, Gadget was still sleeping. We drove through the wet town on out into the country where Marvin Hanson stayed. He lived there with his daughter and his wife. They had once been a very close family then Marvin's pecker had gotten excited about a young woman; the same young woman I had liked. She was dead now, and Marvin had gone back to his family and I had gotten over my feelings of wanting to skin him and nail his hide to the side of a barn and throw knives at it. Got over it long ago. Me and him and Leonard had gone through a lot, and we were bonded, as they like to say.

Marvin and his wife, Rachel, had gotten back together, and they were doing all right. But during that time, their daughter, JoAnna, had gone through some stuff, and then she had a daughter of her own, Julie, aka Gadget, by the guy who had run off. I didn't know that until Marvin told me. I knew I had never met him, but then again, much as Leonard and I liked Marvin, his family didn't hang with us, didn't even send us a Christmas card. They could have had three more kids, and close as the three of us were, we might not have known.

Now they all lived in a small two-bedroom house out in the country, trying to pull everything together and live happily ever after.

The house was off a rain-slick red clay road, and we started down it just as Gadget awakened and sat up in the backseat.

"If you hadn't had such a bad day," I said, "I'd have made you wear your seat belt, and I should have anyway."

"You're not my daddy," she said.

"No," Leonard said, "and from what I've heard, your daddy, whoever he is, isn't claiming you either. You weren't nothin' to him but a hump and a squirt."

Gadget crossed her arms and sat back in her seat and looked mad. I gave Leonard a look that could have paralyzed a chicken at twenty paces. If it bothered him, struck a nerve anywhere inside that hard black hide, I didn't notice it.

We drove up to Marvin's house and I got out and opened the back door of the truck. Gadget got out with her arms still crossed and walked briskly toward the house. I tried very hard not to notice that from the rear in those very short shorts she had what might be a championship butt. If not, it was certainly a top contender.

Marvin came out on the porch with his cane, and Gadget walked by him like he wasn't there, went inside and slammed the door. Marvin looked back at her through the screen. I could see his shoulders slouch. JoAnna, Gadget's mother, came out on the porch. She looked at us and tried to smile, then went back inside. I heard her call out for her daughter.

We hadn't moved away from the truck. We leaned against it and waited. Marvin came out and nodded at me. "Thanks." He looked at Leonard. "Thanks."

"We didn't have anything else to do," Leonard said. "Me and him, we usually save this day for a little Bible study, but all the dirty parts we've read so much they don't do anything for us anymore."

Marvin ignored Leonard, as was often his custom, looked at me, said, "You got her back, but other than that, how did it go?"

"Let me see," I said. "We went to the trailer, and the guy you beat with the cane was playing with his balls, which he kept in a somewhat overly snug pair of Scooby Doo boxer shorts. Leonard jerked him out of the trailer and bounced his head, and then we went inside and some guy got kicked in the balls a few times. A guy got his face flattened on a wall. The guy who was playing with his balls pulled a gun and Leonard shot him and I stuffed the bullet hole with a shirt."

"Bullet hole?" Marvin said.

"Yeah," Leonard said. "I shot the guy you beat with a cane."

"You shot him?"

"In the fat part of the thigh."

“He was shooting to kill,” I said. “But he missed and only wounded him.”

“He was going to shoot us,” Leonard said.

Marvin shook his head. “Damn, I’d have gone myself, guys. You know that, hadn’t been for this bum leg.”

“You think we don’t know that?” Leonard said.

“You could catch some shit for shooting someone, even if it wasn’t life-threatening,” Marvin said.

“Yeah, maybe,” Leonard said. “Hap, he threw a dog out the window.”

“It was trying to bite me … We got rid of the guns and Leonard lectured them on fixing the place up a bit. Gave out a fashion tip … Oh, and there was dog crap all over the place. Oh yeah, I broke their CD player and stomped the shit out of a really bad rap CD.”

“That’s an oxymoron,” Marvin said.

“They had drugs,” Leonard said.

“And not just a little,” I said. “Not some baggie of grass. Gadget… she’s got some juice in her moose, man. She’s hooked on the snort. She’s not just smokin’ weed.”

“No,” Marvin said.

“I’d recommend some kind of clinic, and quick,” I said. “You give her any slack, she’ll be back out there snorting some of what I flushed down the toilet. She thinks she’s in love with numb nuts, Tanedrue, but down deep I think she knows he’s what nature wipes its ass on. Just isn’t ready to face it. Not yet. Way I figure, Tanedrue has got her hooked on drugs so he can use her until he doesn’t want to use her. Hell, man, I don’t need to tell you that. You know how it works. Sorry we got to lay it on you like this.”

“Yeah,” Marvin said.

“It ain’t good news,” Leonard said, “but it’s the news.”

“I think we’re home free, far as those yo-yos are concerned,” I said. “All done.”

Marvin thought for a moment, then said, “Cops over there are dirty as a wino’s drawers. Drug dealers own them, so don’t be so sure they won’t try and screw you over, bring in some artillery, a mechanic to go with it, and it'll be my fault. I shouldn't have asked you."

"No one else to ask," Leonard said. "No one else would be so stupid."

"You have a point," Marvin said.

"My take is the dirty cops might not like we fucked with their guys," I said, "but I can't see them doing anything about it. They don't really know who we are. Gadget didn't tell them, 'cause she didn't even get our names right. They know we're connected to you, though. That I'm sure of."

"I sort of let slip how much I enjoyed you beating Tanedrue's ass with the walking stick," Leonard said. "But then again, I wasn't really trying to hide. We didn't do no sneakin'. I did want to mention, however, that Gadget said you said we thought we were funny, as if it weren't confirmed."

Marvin ignored that.

"It was pretty much our usual plan," I said. "We just went in there and beat the hell out of 'em, tossed a dog out a window, shot one of 'em in the leg, and messed up the paneling. It got a little wilder than we thought. I know that's a synopsis of a synopsis I already gave you, but that part about us not being really funny, that really hurt, man, and I didn't want to revisit that territory."

"I see scratches," Marvin said, nodding at my face.

"He tried to fuck a cat," Leonard said, "and the cat didn't like it."

"Those look like some pretty good claws," Marvin said. "Like maybe Gadget did it."

"Now I remember why you were a good policeman," I said. "I had to hit her. I'm not proud of it."

"You did what you had to do, I'm sure," he said.

"We got to go," I said. "Gadget, she's got to have some serious detox, buddy."

"That costs serious money," Marvin said.

"Maybe so," I said, "but unless you're going to lock her in a room and feed her soup through a straw while she's tied down to a bed wearing a strait jacket, you got to find a way, man.”

“I know,” he said. “And I will. But I am worried about you guys. When I asked for help I was thinking about Gadget, and not much else. I should have known better. I did know better. All I could think about was her, and the only people I knew to ask were you. I knew it could have consequences for you, for all of us. But I had to get her out of there. Listen, I know two, three guys we could get for protection. There’s Jim Bob, and maybe that friend of yours, Veil.”

“I hope Veil doesn’t hear you address us as friends,” Leonard said. “He might shoot us all. As for Jim Bob, no need to stir him up.”

“And there’s another guy that owes me. He could help.”

We shook our heads.

“You fellas sure?”

“We been over this,” Leonard said. “We don’t need anyone, and you don’t owe us a thing. Besides, those guys today, they don’t want to mess with me and Hap again because we are two badass motherfuckers. Didn’t I tell you Hap threw a dog out a window?”

◆

As I drove us away, I said, “Two badass motherfuckers?”

“Sound convincing?”

“It sounds like you have been watching too much Shaft or Superfly.”

“Marvin has enough to worry about. We knew what we were getting into when we took the job.”

I nodded. “Absolutely.”

We chatted a bit about how we actually thought things would be okay. About how they were small-time goobers and they wouldn’t mess with Marvin either, ’cause there was no mileage in that.

By the time we got back to LaBorde, we had almost convinced ourselves that we were in fact badass motherfuckers. Had we felt any tougher, we’d have stopped by the side of the road to shit in plain sight and wipe our asses on dried grass with sticker burs in it.

12

By the next day things seemed to have gone back to normal. You know, the basics: killing another perfectly good day and knowing you weren't going to get it back.

Brett was working at her nurse job, and I at a typically shabby day job at a construction site. Actually, it was a crummy two-day job picking up lumber and nails and all the stuff the major workers dropped. When I was hired, my boss, a black guy, told me, "You're just one of the niggers, or wetbacks. Used to be they did what you're doin'. I did what you're doin'. Now you got to do it. That's the job, take it or leave it. You're late, I hire a beaner at half your price."

I took it. I got paid by the day, and that was good. I still had a little money from another job I'd done that had to do with the sort of stuff Leonard and I excelled at. Intellectual work, like kicking someone's ass up under their ears and convincing ourselves it was for the greater good. It was rough on the knuckles, bad on the shoes, and tough on the conscience, or at least it was on mine.

Anyway, in the money department, Brett and I weren't rich, but we had most everything paid off and weren't hurting. And, as always, another job would pop up. Also, Marvin was starting a private investigations company and Leonard and I had been promised work from him once he got that up and running. I couldn't wait to peep in windows and take pictures of the wrong couples coming out of cheap motels.

I got off work and went home and showered the sweat off and read a little from a book by an author who didn't use quotation marks and was scared to death his work might be entertaining. I gave up on the book and put it in the to-be-swapped pile for the used bookstore, went upstairs, and watched TV

There was some good History Channel stuff, and some Discovery Channel stuff on, but I watched a show about some dumb blondes who had access to a lot of money and didn't do much of anything all day but plan ways to spend that money. I couldn't take my eyes off the program. I told myself down deep they couldn't be as dumb as they seemed and that there was something spiritual about them. I think their most spiritual aspect was their lack of clothing. Their benefactor was an eighty-year-old gray guy who walked around in a house robe and took Viagra so he could bang all three and sleep in the bed with them all at the same time. He was my hero.

When I heard the front door slam, I switched the channel. Brett was home. I found a history program about Genghis Khan. I had seen the program before and had enjoyed it. Seen it twice even, but by this go-round I knew Genghis was dead and he wasn't coming back.

Brett came upstairs. She looked cute in her nurse's uniform. Her flame-red hair had slipped out from under her cap and was hanging over one eye. She took off the cap and sighed and threw the cap on a chair. She came over and turned her back to me. I sat up on the bed and unzipped her dress. She wiggled out of it.

"I want to order pizza," she said, "and then fuck like a couple of greased weasels."

"My lucky day."

"And don't you forget it."

She sat on the edge of the bed and picked up the phone and called the pizza place. I unsnapped her bra and played with her breasts while she called.

When she hung up, I said, "Bet we could do it before the pizza delivery gets here."

"He's ten minutes away," she said. "What fun is there in that?"

"About ten minutes' worth."

"You are correct, sir," she said. She rolled onto the bed and I took her in my arms and we kissed. "Will you wear the bunny slippers, baby?"

"Oh, hell yes," I said.

But I didn't. The rest of it just happened naturally.

13

We ate the pizza downstairs and Brett read the newspaper and I read part of a Western novel and thought it was pretty good, even if the author did talk about starting his herd with two steers; that didn't exactly endear me to his Western lore or his grasp of basic biology, but the story was all right. Then there was a knock at the door. I went to the curtain and pulled it back and looked out. The glass was fogged over from the cold outside. I had to wipe it a bit, and then I could see Leonard standing by the door, looking toward the curtain. When he saw me he lifted a hand.

I let him in, and felt the air blow past. It had really turned chilly.

"Winter's here," Leonard said. "My nuts have frozen up to the size of raisins."

"Now, don't brag," I said.

Brett got up from her chair and came over and hugged Leonard, said, "We still got some pizza, baby, you want it."

"No thanks," Leonard said. "Well… how much pizza?"

"Couple of pieces?" Brett said.

"I can do that. And then I could maybe have some of those cookies Hap got for me and some of the Dr Pepper he got me special too."

"I like that stuff myself," I said.

Leonard winked at me. "You are so cute," he said.

I sat at the kitchen table with Leonard while he ate and Brett went back in the living room to finish reading the paper. When Leonard finished eating the pizza and was ready to start on the cookies, I put a pot of decaf on, said, "Okay, what's going on?"

"What?" Leonard said.

"Why are you here?"

"Because you're my bestest goddamn buddy in the whole damn world. My brother. My doppelganger. My—"

"Yeah, but why are you here?"

"I always come over."

"And you're always welcome. But where's John? Why haven't you mentioned him? You know better than to jack with me, Leonard. I know you better than anyone in the world. Better than you know you."

"Yeah?"

"Yeah."

Leonard pushed a vanilla cookie around on his plate. "John and I aren't doing so good."

"Could it have anything to do with you crappin' in the bed?"

"I was mad."

"You? Oh, say thee not such foul lies about your own sweet self."

"I said some things."

"Another surprise."

"I've sort of been staying somewhere else."

"Where?"

"Motels. I get off the security job, I been picking a different one each night. Quite the thrilling experience. One of them, it has one of those old-time beds where you put a quarter in a machine and the bed vibrates. … Course, it doesn't work. But the mechanism is still there, and you can't imagine how the nostalgia comforts me. Hey, and there's this one cheap motel, the sheets, they got shit stains on them. I stayed there twice, two different rooms, shit stains on blue sheets. I guess it saves on laundry soap, leavin' them like that."

I got up and poured us some coffee and got some sweetener and cream. We fixed our coffee. I stirred mine longer than was necessary. I said, "Have you tried to talk to John?"

"I have."

"And what's the sticking point?"

"He doesn't like me."

"Bullshit. What's going on?"

"The queer stuff."

"You're both queer, Leonard."

"Really? Well, that puts some things in perspective."

"So, John feels guilty about being gay?"

"John's brother hates him because he's gay. He tells him he doesn't have to be gay. He's telling him God doesn't want him gay."

"Even if God made him that way?" I said. "Provided there was a God."

"If there was one, and he made someone gay wouldn't God his own goddamn self be responsible?" Leonard said.

"In my book, yes. But in the Christians' book, that rascal can do no wrong. Someone survives a hurricane, it was God's mercy. Someone drowns, it was God's will. I don't like him. He's a bully."

We touched fists. It's a manly bonding thing.

"Or maybe," Leonard said, "God is gay and it's the rest of you people who are messed up and going to hell. You ever think about that? Maybe there's another Bible out there that tells us to stone you guys and not to lie with women because it's strange. It is, you know."

"Brett and I like it."

Leonard sipped some coffee. "You see, John is starting to feel he's not supposed to be gay, and unlike us, on some level he believes that God stuff. He thinks he's violated God's law, so he's going to church counseling to get straight."

"Oh, for heaven's sake."

"That's what he thinks. For heaven's sake."

"It's a figure of speech."

"I've tried to tell him that even if there is a God, the New Testament is the one to go by, and it's not tough on us queers. It's just the old mean version of God that gives us a hard time. Motherfucker in the Old Testament won't even let us have a pork chop."

"God must have finally got laid between the Old and the New Testament," I said. "'Cause between those two books, he sure mellowed out."

"Who'd he lay, male or female?"

"Either … Look, Leonard, I'm sorry about John."

"Not half as sorry as I am. I've called him, I wrote him a letter. I even did an e-mail from one of the hotels on my laptop."

"You got a laptop?"

"John bought it for me. At home I even got a printer and some paper to print out on."

"You are so cosmopolitan."

"Tell me about it. But the thing is, he's going to take these classes so he can tell his brain and his dick that he's been confused and he likes women. I can't think of anything yuckier than learning to like that old pink snapper.… No disrespect to you and Brett."

"I get your point. You want me to talk to him?"

"I don't know. I thought about that, thought about asking you. But it won't matter. He thinks he's on the road to hell and wang and butt hole are no longer on the smorgasbord."

"Leonard, thy middle name is romance. You and Tanedrue, you should get together, write a book on courting. Look here, you're not staying in any motel. You'll park your happy ass on the couch tonight."

"Thanks, Hap."

"I'm just afraid you keep trying to hook up those motel Internet connections to your laptop you'll put your eye out. So I want you here, safe and sound."

"Thanks, brother. Can I have the last cookie?"

"No."

We sat there and looked at the cookie. I said, "You haven't given up on John yet, have you?"

"No. But I got a rule. If you're ashamed of being gay, I'm ashamed of you. I say, Queer up. I take into account John's getting some shit and was raised in such a way as to not think he's on the right path, but I was raised that way myself. I got over it by the time there was hair on my balls. Actually, John shaves them for me, but you know what I mean."

"Too much information, partner. Besides, I think a man ought to have hair on his balls."

"Now that John won't be doing that for me anymore, are you interested in doing the shaving?" Leonard said, and smiled.

"I'd just cut them off, problem solved. Actually, several problems solved. Your relationships would be less strenuous and that pesky hair problem would be over with. You could just hang out with Bob and be happy."

Leonard sighed. "And if things aren't bad enough, Bob died."

"Oh, man. Sorry."

Bob was Leonard's pet armadillo. They had been close. Well, Leonard had been close to Bob. It was hard to tell how Bob felt. But he did hang around and would sniff Leonard's hand and eat out of it. He lived in Leonard's closet a lot of the time. Went outside to do his business, like a dog. Had a bowl with his name on it.

"It was like his little clock ran down," Leonard said. "I buried him out back near a little wallow he had made. You know how he liked to dig."

"He was an armadillo, Leonard. It's what they do."

"I know. But he was kind of cool. I liked him.… Hell, Hap, I don't know. Short time back, life was good, felt like I was fartin' perfume and crappin' chocolate candy. Now things suck the big ole donkey dick. John, the way he's actin', and now my 'dilla goin' down. It sucks the oxygen right out of you."

I couldn't tell if Leonard was more upset about John or Bob. I studied his face, decided it was a draw.

"Sorry, man," I said. "Really."

"Thanks. It don't help worth a damn, but I'm glad you said it," and his voice wavered a little. "Actually, I'm thinking of trying to write a soap opera, call it Lives of the Homos."

"Leonard?"

"Yeah."

"You can have the last cookie."

14

Leonard stayed with us about three days. After work we played chess, talked nasty, read books and discussed them; we talked about which was cooler, Marvel Comics or DC. Leonard thought Marvel. I thought DC. Brett liked Archie Comics. That immediately excluded her from the discussion and a bit of respect was lost. We listened to music. We rented movies and played Monopoly. Brett proved to be adamant about having the silver dog as her token, and she won a lot. I saw her steal some money from my pile once, but let it go. I called her on it when we went to bed and she made it up to me and the authorities were not called, though Archie Comics was not entirely forgiven.

It was fun having Leonard around for a while, and we hated to see him go, but he finally rented a little apartment on the other side of town, said he was calling John daily, that they were talking and he was guardedly optimistic, hoping things would resolve quickly because the hair on his balls had grown back.

I came home from work one day, sweaty and dirty and feeling like something the dogs had dragged under the porch and gnawed on, and there was a police car parked out front of the house at the curb. There was a big black guy with a cop's uniform and a cowboy hat about the size of a life raft sitting in one of my lawn chairs smoking a cigar big as an erect horse dong. When I parked in the driveway and got out, the stench of that damn cigar wafted over to me and damn near curled the hair on my eyebrows.

I went over, said, "Let me guess. No Enterprise Police Department."

"Ah, hell, man, you ain't that smart," he said, turning his head as if he wanted to pin me with just one eye. "You read that off the side of my car."

"You're right." I sat down in a lawn chair and looked at him. I said, “So, you took a wrong turn or what?”

“No. I’m in the right place. They said you were a smart-ass, both of you were, and I figure you’re the white guy.”

“That’s observant.”

“Yep. I had a whole month of cop college and I read a book on fingerprinting once. I took a couple of courses in identification too.”

“Wow!”

He grinned at me around his cigar. He had strong creases around his mouth when he grinned and his eyes were slightly bloodshot. One ear floated out from the side of his head as if signaling for a turn. He didn’t strike me as over fifty. He had a hard body with a bit of a gut and arms that could twist a full-grown pig like wet wash. I remembered that Marvin had told me he was one of two fat guys. Boy, was he full of it. This John Law was big enough and mean enough looking to use an elephant’s ass to store his shoes and make the elephant like it.

“You already talk to my buddy?” I asked.

“No. Thought I’d talk to you. Hear you’re more reasonable and you don’t have lace on your panties.”

“You’re right. I am. And that lace remark, not smart. Leonard heard you talk bad about him like that, he might stick you in your hat and piss in it after you.”

“Doubt that.”

“A man with confidence,” I said. “I like that. I know a lot of confident men Leonard has handed their teeth.”

“Yeah, I hear you two think you’re tough guys. Be that as it may, what I know about you and him and me, I’d say I’m doing some better than either of you.”

“Probably. Less graft in the jobs we have.”

For the first time he didn’t look amused. “All right, let’s get formal. My name is Budd Conners. I’m half the law out of No Enterprise.”

“Do the two of you count as one lawman?”

He thumped ash from his cigar on the ground. “Let me tell you why I’m here.”

"Let me guess. I stuck my dick in your territory."

"Something like that. You can wise off all you want, but I'm here to do you a favor."

"I could use some yard work done."

He leaned forward. "Listen, asshole. Listen good, and tell your partner what I'm going to tell you."

"Should I take notes?"

"You can take notes, or you can just let it whistle through your ears. This way, I came to you and told you and I'm giving you a chance. Those guys you fucked over, shot one in the leg, took that girl from, flushed their dope down the shitter, they didn't like it."

"Well, I hope not."

"They're mad at you, and the more connected guys who work the dope through them, guess what? They're pissed too."

"Get in line. Me and Leonard piss a lot of people off."

"I can believe that. I can believe you two are not going to listen and you're going to wind up with your body parts in separate trash bags in different parts of the county."

"This isn't the first time we've been threatened."

"I don't doubt that, peckerwood. But this has put a little pressure on me. The organization that runs those turds you slapped around, they got folks that run them, and they are bad folks. The Dixie Mafia."

"Do they have Dixie flags and still whine over the South being unionized into the rest of the country? Do they talk about cotton a lot? Get weepy about the Old South? I don't know about you, but nothing—absolutely nothing—touches me less or bores me more than those assholes. I was you, a black man, I'd throw my rag in with someone else."

"It's bigger than any of that. Some of them, they come out of the Aryan Nations, out of the prisons. But they aren't so down on the brothers anymore. They just don't want them to fuck their sisters. They feel they can do business with them, anyone else for that matter. These guys, they don't care about any war but their own little money war. They're all about commerce and respect, ass-wipe."

“Watch your language. I’m sensitive, and I just might go sensitive all over you.”

He leaned back in the chair and grinned. “I’m twice your size.”

“And I’m twice your mean.”

“So you say. Do you want to hear me out or not?”

I looked at my watch. “Might as well. It’s still a couple hours till dinner.”

“They aren’t getting their dope back, so maybe they’ll think to make some kind of example out of you. That would be their way. The low guys on the turd totem pole can’t take care of you, then they’ll bring in the middle guys. That don’t work, then the middle guys will bring in the top guys, and those guys will hire someone that’ll be meaner than a bucket of rattlesnakes. They won’t dirty their hands. They’ll bring in real talent. But they probably won’t have to go that far. Enough guys with no real talent is still a lot of fuckin’ guys.”

“So how do they know it’s us done all this? Could be two other guys of equal handsomeness and anger management issues.”

“You’ve already admitted it was you.”

“I was just playing.”

“Sure. Tanedrue figured you were friends of Marvin Hanson, the grandfather, and all he had to do was ask around. You weren’t that hard to figure. You could maybe pay back the money they lost.”

“Oh yeah, that’s gonna happen. If it cost a dollar to fart I’d have to sweat instead. Don’t be an idiot. We aren’t paying anybody anything, and mostly because we don’t want to. And, by the way, how do you, a fine law-abiding police officer, know all this? Could it be because you’re in cahoots with them? My God, say it ain’t so. Aren’t policemen here to protect us? If that isn’t true, my world has been turned upside down.”

“You know what I make in salary?”

“I could care less.”

“Not a lot. Drugs are all over. You think I stop some drug traffic I stop drugs? That I stop people from wanting to use them?”

“No. But it is your job.”

“Look, I’m gonna tell you something, ’cause it’s just you and me in your crappy yard. Drugs go on. Money is being made. It’s like pussy. Someone is always gonna sell it and someone is always gonna buy it, and sometimes, that pussy, it’s got a disease and it kills people. You takes your chances. No one makes you buy it, use it. So what if me and my partner, who is a nice fat white guy named Reggie who is like a brother to me and will hate your guts if I hate your guts… what if we get a little piece of the action? They’re gonna buy from someone. So who the hell does it hurt if they’re getting what they want?”

“The people who are paying you not to take a piece of the action. And you might toss in the ones it kills or the ones get addicted. Until it’s legalized and they got that stuff in a vending machine, your job is to not make money off of it.”

Conners took a big suck on his cigar, blew the smoke toward me. I was so manly I didn’t wave it away, just squinted my eyes, trying to look like Clint Eastwood. I probably looked like a guy with smoke in his eyes.

“I’ve heard some things about you and your boy,” Conners said, “and you sound a little self-righteous, considering what I’ve heard you’ve done.”

“Don’t believe everything you’ve heard, lawman. And let me give you another line, right out of Billy Jack. Ever see that movie?”

“No.”

“There’s a line where he says: ‘When policemen break the law there is no law.’ After that he beats the crap out of some guys, but that’s not the point. It’s corny and it’s movie crap, but it’s right. I don’t owe you a fucking thing. You come to warn me and you think I’m supposed to thank you for it, but mostly you want me to stay out of your business, because you are the scum at the bottom of this big old pond and what you’re afraid of is that me and Leonard are going to ripple the surface so much that the big frog on the big lily pad is going to hop on your head. You aren’t doing me any kind of favor. Now get out of my yard before I take that cigar out of your mouth and shove it up your ass.”

He stood up so fast he knocked over the lawn chair. “I ought to kick you into next week.”

I stood up carefully. “Start kicking. You’re out of your jurisdiction.”

He stood there with his fists clenched. A vein vibrated in his neck like the string on a stand-up bass. Provided the string was really big.

I didn’t want any part of him, but I didn’t want him to know it. I managed not to piss myself, tried to look like I was thinking about something pleasant, like a politician waiting for a free blow job.

He took a deep breath. “All right. I tried. You warn that fart, Hanson, warn him that he’s in this too. I was him, I’d take that split-tail you two rescued, pack all of you in a bus and head for the high country, or just some goddamn rabbit hole. Change your names. Change your sex. ’Cause they’re comin’, smart-mouth. And when they do, you ain’t gonna like it. It might be the little fucks first, but they ain’t nothin’. You might take care of them. But then it’s the others, and I tell you again, you ain’t gonna like it.”

“Neither are they,” I said.

Conners tossed his cigar on the lawn, gave me a last look that told me there was nothing he’d like better than to reach up my asshole and jerk me inside out. “When it comes down,” he said, “remember your old Uncle Conners tried to tell you how it was going to go.”

“That’ll certainly cheer me,” I said. “But I wouldn’t count me and Leonard out just yet, Uncle Tom … Oh, sorry, that was Conners, wasn’t it?”

“You don’t know a thing. Ain’t no Uncle Toms no more, just a fella trying to do business.”

“One way of looking at it, I suppose.”

“It’ll be a clean sweep,” he said. “Not just you and Leonard, but those around you. You have a woman, don’t you? That’s what I’ve heard. And Hanson, his family. I don’t want to see that, something happening. Truly, I don’t.”

“Here’s a feather for your cap. I ever think you have anything to do with screwing around with me and mine, some morning you just might find yourself dead.”

“You threatening a law officer?”

“I don’t consider you much of an officer. Besides, you couldn’t arrest a fly here. You’re nothing but one of a two-man operation in a little town that has its presidential elections in a filling station. You two are so small-time you probably share a dick. So don’t come in here and act like the FBI. You are nothing to me. And yeah, that is a goddamn threat, with bells and whistles on it.”

“Have it your way, pal. But next time you see me comin’, man, you better run.”

Conners went out to his car and drove away.

15

"He came here to the house?" Brett said.

I nodded.

We were sitting at the kitchen table, she still in her nurse uniform, me still in my sweaty, filthy work clothes. She was sitting out from the table, had her legs crossed, and the nurse dress was hiked up pretty far. I liked that, and she knew it. I liked the little hat she was wearing too. I'd have liked her without the hat. I'd have liked her without the dress. She could lose those nurse shoes too. I don't have a fetish for stuff like that, but I do have a fetish for her.

I was laying out what had happened with Conners, and I was drinking a cup of coffee. I had fixed some for both of us, and Brett was stirring creamer into hers. She even made me horny doing that. I know. I'm a bad dog.

"He threatened you here in our yard?" she said.

"He threatened that other people were going to do something to me that probably wouldn't pass for a manicure and a haircut. And maybe those same people would do something similar to those around me. He also said next time I saw him I better run."

"And he's a policeman?"

"A big goddamn policeman. One of the two of No Enterprise's finest on-the-take assholes. Actually, don't tell Leonard, but between me and you, he was kind of scary."

"It's okay, pumpkin," she said and patted my hand. "If we're going to be killed, it might as well be together."

"Sorry, hon."

"Don't be. You're my man and you do things others wish they could. I like you just the way you are. Most of the time. Though I do wish you could remember to change the toilet paper, and on top of the hamper is not where your underwear belong. They go inside, dear.”

“But you have to lift the lid on the hamper.”

“I know. It is a bother.”

I gave her a look that I hoped made me look like a big-eyed puppy instead of a startled marmoset. It didn’t have the effect I hoped for—deep sympathy and a desire to pat my head. She drank more of her coffee.

I said, “I’m a middle-aged man with a crummy job that’s over as of today and you may be a little less thrilled with me if this turns bad.”

“It’s been bad before. And besides, you’re cute and well hung.”

Now that was the response I wanted. I said, “That’s the first I’ve heard of that.”

“Considering the circumstances, it seemed like a kind thing to say.”

“Oh.”

“Now don’t get pissy. Remember what Bessie Smith sang. It’s not the meat, it’s the motion.”

“Okay. I can live with that. Brett… this policeman, I got to tell you, he had a loud voice and a big hat and an ugly cigar and his face was all wrinkled and he had a funny ear and he talked kind of loud and I don’t think he’s very nice. He uses bad words.”

Brett smiled, looked me in the eyes. “Do you think this is really serious, baby? I mean, really?”

“Yeah. I do.”

“What do you think will happen?”

“No way to know for sure, but my guess is the little guys, the ones me and Leonard gave a bad time, might think they got to get back at us to save face, so they can point to us and tell their bosses they got those nasty boys who destroyed the dope and made them lose all that money and insulted a perfectly nice pair of Scooby Doo shorts.

“Course, we can flip that and say maybe the guys in the middle don’t believe the guys at the bottom. Not all of it anyway. The head dudes might just decide to take it out on the bottom-feeders because they might think they're lying, that they took the dope, made up a story, and are settling other scores with us. All the middle guys know is they didn't get a piece of the profit. And the guys at the top, what they know is they didn't get their slice of it. So instead of them solving the problem, they could want the two layers in the cake below them to solve the problem. Most likely, the top layer gets involved, they'll bring in someone special and skilled. That's the way it usually works. But I wouldn't bet on any one scenario. We might be dealing with all of them."

"So what do we do?" Brett asked.

"First, I'll have Leonard move back in."

"That means more cookies and Dr Peppers and probably a box of shotgun shells."

"Absolutely," I said. "You have some time off coming, don't you?"

She nodded. "Two weeks. Three if I really need it."

"You pack your highly attractive ass up and you and Marvin and his family head for the hills. Go someplace where no one knows you. Stay there until I tell you to come back."

Brett reached out and took my hand. "I don't really have family anymore. My daughter isn't exactly one to keep in touch. You know, the whoring business is so time-consuming, and her plans for college didn't work out, she said."

"Oh yeah," I said. "Something about having to get up early."

"That's right. I love her, but she's grown and made her own way, and I'm here if she needs me. But she doesn't have a family bond, and maybe that's my fault, but it's the way it is. Except for you and Leonard, I'm about tapped out in the family department. I don't want to leave you. I can use a gun, and I'm not afraid."

"Yeah, but I am. Even if I wasn't, I'd want you to go. Someone has to keep telling Marvin he has to stay with his family. He's a great guy, but frankly, he's not at his best right now. Bum leg and all."

"You actually think Marvin will run? That doesn't sound like him to me. Does it to you?"

I waved it aside with my hand. "When I explain things to him he'll be happy to stay out of it," I said.

16

“Absolutely not,” Marvin said.

I had Leonard and Brett with me and we had gone over to explain how things were. We were sitting in his living room and Rachel was there, and so were Gadget and JoAnna. The three women looked so much alike it was amazing. All dark and beautiful and soft, T-shirt-and jean-clad. Well, actually, Gadget didn’t look so soft. She scratched at her arms constantly and her eyes darted. The dope was calling collect and she wanted to answer. She was still attractive, just itchy and a little hard-looking around the mouth and eyes.

“I got you two in this trouble,” Marvin said. “I’m not about to bail on you.”

“You’re not bailing,” Leonard said. “You’re running like a spotted-ass ape.”

“Oh,” I said, turning in my chair to look at Leonard. “That helps. He’ll feel better now. You are like one of those, what do they call them … diplomats.”

“Figure of speech,” Leonard said.

“So far,” Brett said to me, “your powers of persuasion are not quite up to the standard you presumed.”

“Hap should know me better than that,” Marvin said.

“I’ll tell you what I know,” I said. “And let’s cut the crap. You did get Leonard and me into this. You didn’t tell us the whole gig, about how connected these guys were.”

“I didn’t know. Completely. I mean, I had an idea. But I didn’t know.”

“Exactly,” I said. “You didn’t stop to consider. Me and my brother just thought this was a trailer trash episode. We whipped some ass, threw a dog out of a window, shot a guy, took Gadget and brought her home. We went, we saw, we conquered, we came back. And now our asses are in the soup. We want you and yours, and Brett, out of here. And, no offense to Gadget, but you don't tell her where you're going till you get there. And you have the only cell phone between you. Not that I don't trust mother and daughter," I said, smiling at them. "But one cell phone can be controlled more easily, and you don't want a lot of people calling you anyway. Any little thing might leak out and you might then involve someone else. And I don't trust you, Gadget. The monkey on your back howls the loudest at midnight, when everyone else is sleeping. You might decide to decamp."

"Just let me go back to Tanedrue," Gadget said. "He's not going to bother me."

"Except when he's making a field goal with your head," Leonard said. "There's that, and, oh yeah, about a ton of drugs you can suck up your nose."

"You don't know how it is," Gadget said. "I'm … I'm in pain. And Hap hit me too."

"Yes," Leonard said, "but it was swift and beautiful and full of the power of love."

"Ha!" Gadget said. "He still hit me."

"You had it coming," Marvin said. "Never thought I'd say such a thing, but you did."

Gadget's lip went pouty. She said, "You still don't know how it is."

"I don't know how it is," I said. "But I've seen it before."

"Just let me go back," she said.

"Don't be ridiculous," Leonard said. "These guys suck rat bag. And you're on your way to being just like them."

"At this point," I said, "I'm not even sure Tanedrue might not blame you for their situation. There's no future there for you, Gadget."

"There's no future for me anywhere," Gadget said. "Just let them do what they want."

"That's the drug willies talking," I said.

"We're going to get her help," JoAnna said, and she reached out and touched Gadget's shoulder.

Gadget shook her head. "No use, Mama. I'm lost."

"No, you're not, honey," Rachel said, and I saw the fire in her eyes. She had it, always did. I knew what Marvin saw in her first time I met her, and right now I was seeing it again.

"Don't talk that way, baby," JoAnna said. "You're not the first one to make a mistake. I've made a few."

"Yeah, but I made more than a few in less time," Gadget said.

That floated for a moment, then I said, "This business boils down to this: Marvin, you and your family need to pack up some things and hit the road."

"You act like these guys are fucking CIA," Marvin said. "They're a bunch of goobers."

"It's not the original goobers I'm worried about," I said. "It's all them other goobers."

"With me and Hap here, the rest of you gone," Leonard said, "it makes for a smaller target. And we're not an easy target."

"I can vouch for that," Marvin said. "I thought you two would be dead years ago."

"Gee, thanks," Leonard said.

"Actually, that was a kind of a compliment," Brett said.

"Oh," Leonard said. "My bad."

"But this is my mess," Marvin said.

I nodded, said, "Now I'm really going to pour on the juice. You're a cripple and you'll just get in our way. We need you to whip someone's ass with your cane again, we'll call you up. But we're past that. Maybe way past. Way I see it, Tanedrue may just let us out of the picture. He's got nothing to gain. He's not getting his drugs back, and I bet he can figure pretty quick we don't have that kind of money to pay back what it was worth. So he could let us go."

"That's what I think," Marvin said. "That's what I always thought."

"On the other hand," I said, "he lets us go, then he can't even tell his bosses that he avenged the loss, and I think he's the kind of guy that thinks he's some kind of player, wants to look good in front of his posse. Last time he tried that, he got his ass kicked. So he could feel vengeful. Power, control, being in charge, that's all very important to these little sucks, and it's even more important to the middlemen and the men at the top. The other thing"—and I looked at Gadget when I said this—"they may come for Gadget. Not because Tanedrue loves her—"

"He does, you know," Gadget said. "He does."

"Sure he does," Leonard said. "That's why he beats on your ass."

"I get out of line," Gadget said.

"Honey," Brett said, "that is pure-dee ole bullshit. Unless you're trying to kill him and he's fighting back, you aren't out of line enough to warrant any kind of physical beating. You think we're in fucking Afghanistan. Pardon my French."

Gadget put her head on the table. JoAnna put her hand on Gadget's back and looked hard at Brett. Brett looked back equally hard. JoAnna averted her gaze. I could sympathize. When Brett put "that look" on you, you didn't want to mess with her. In her eyes you could see the next world war.

"What Hap was saying," Leonard said, "guy like this, he might come and try and get Gadget. He might even come to kill her."

Gadget lifted her head. "He wouldn't. He loves me."

"There's no way to argue with that," I said. "She believes it and you can't talk her out of it. Not until the drugs are out of her system. And even then, not easily."

"You don't know nothin'," Gadget said, jumping up from the table, running to the back of the house, disappearing into a bedroom, slamming the door.

JoAnna looked at me, said, "No use being hard on her. It doesn't help."

"She shouldn't get off scot-free," Marvin said. "Problem with this world is we've lost the idea of shame and guilt. We need a little of that. No one thinks they ever do bad anymore. They just do different."

"I'm sorry we've disrupted things this morning," I said to Rachel. "I didn't mean to scare you or your family, but this is how it is."

"I'm not so scared," Rachel said. "I once fought a serial killer with a hammer. JoAnna was with me. We aren't shrinking violets."

Marvin nodded. "She did. When I was on the job in Houston."

I had heard the story before, but I didn't let on. Every now and then Marvin brought it up and told it over. About the Houston Hacker. It had been his biggest case as a big-city cop.

"My granddaughter, my family," Rachel said. "I got to do what's right for them. I'll tell you honestly, I don't like you two, never have. And Brett, I just don't like you on sight. You act like you're better than everyone else."

"Well, duh."

"And you're a smart-ass."

"That's all right," Brett said, looking prim and beautiful. "I'm not selling happiness, and when I go to bed at night I have my witty repartee to keep me company. And Hap. And since we're expressing ourselves, you aren't exactly at the top of my love list either."

They locked eyes for a moment, then Rachel looked at me and Leonard. "But I'll say this about you two—you're straight with things. You know how to do what you do. I don't even want to know what it is you do, even if I have a pretty good idea. So me and JoAnna and Gadget, and yes, you, Marvin, we're leaving here tomorrow."

Brett raised her hand. "Don't forget me."

Rachel looked at Brett with those hard eyes of hers. Brett looked back. Neither broke gaze. "And yes," Rachel said. "You too, Brett. We can hate each other politely."

"I ought to stay," Marvin said.

Rachel stuck her finger in Marvin's face. "I've been through a lot of shit with you, baby, and I've held it together. I been through you mess-in' with another woman. I've been through your cop days in the city and in LaBorde. I've dealt with your accident, your leg, and all manner of hell. I've set by your bedside watching them feed you through a tube, and I've fed you like a baby when you didn't have the strength to lift a finger. You are going, or we're going without you, and don't look for us to come back if you don’t go.”

Marvin nodded. “All right,” he said. “I’m going. We’ll pack some things tonight, go to the bank tomorrow morning for some money, then we’re gone.”

17

Way we figured it, Leonard was going to keep working his security job, which had switched from days to nights. Brett was going to put in for her two weeks the next day, and since my job had played out, I wasn't going to look for anything right away. Truth is, if it wasn't for the money I'd just hang out and not work. I should be ashamed, but I'm not. I'm so lazy Leonard has to call me and remind me to work out, threaten me a little. I actually like the workouts soon as I start them, but it's easy for me to get sidetracked and want to read a book or see a movie or eat a sandwich, or do the bump with Brett.

I drove Brett to the hospital the next morning, very early while it was still dark, and they let her have the two weeks. She said it was an emergency, that she might be back early, before the two weeks were up, but right now her daughter was sick and she had to go check on her.

They grumbled a bit, but they allowed her the time. Brett was a hell of a nurse.

Brett had her suitcase in the pickup, ready to go. I started driving us through town, on my way to drop her off at Marvin's place. It was a very still morning, no traffic except for a beige Cadillac that was going our way. The moon was still up, a silver scimitar in the sky, and we had the heater on low because it was chilly out, though not exactly cold.

Brett was armed, had the little .38 automatic she sometimes wore strapped to the inside of her thigh. That was when she had on a dress. Today she had on jeans and a T-shirt and she had an ankle holster. I was armed too, with the gun that was registered to me and the one I had the conceal/carry papers on. A nine-mil automatic in a clip holster snapped to the back of my belt under my open windbreaker. I had a twelve-gauge pump shotgun in the backseat under a blanket, and of course, a pocketknife for whittling and a clear throat in case I had to resort to vulgar language.

We didn't go around armed normally, so for us the guns weren't fashion accessories. I hated the damn things, but, alas, I ran with a rough crowd from time to time, and of consequence, so did Brett. Way things had been going lately, I thought it best we be prepared.

She sat close to me that morning, like a teenager on a date. She kissed me on the cheek, and when she did, I felt wetness. She had tears.

I turned and looked at her, said, "Come on, baby. It'll be okay."

"I'm not scared," she said, as I turned to look back at the road, check the mirror to make sure the Cadillac behind us wasn't about to run up our asses. "I just don't want to leave you to it by yourself."

"I have Leonard."

"I know. And I'm glad. But that's not what I meant."

"I know what you meant."

"I could stay, Hap."

"I need you with them. Rachel might need an ass whippin', and you're just the gal to do it."

"She's okay," Brett said. "She's just protecting her family, but you know what?"

"What?"

"There's a part of me that would like to throw down with her, just to see how it would come out."

"I know how it would come out. You'd lose a bit of that beautiful red hair and she'd be in the hospital."

"You're just saying that to make a girl feel sexy."

I laughed.

The Cadillac passed us. I gave it a glance. Four guys were in it. No one from Tanedrue's trailer was inside the car. Not even the dog. The car went on ahead, got about three car lengths in front of us. The driver was, as so many drivers are, on the cell phone. Who the hell do you call at this time of the morning? I thought

We crossed Gibbon Street, and as we did, a shiny black crew cab pickup with a big sunroof and tires about the size of a small planet came burning out and swung in behind us. I glanced in my rearview mirror. I recognized the truck's driver. Tanedrue. Beside him I could see the ball-kicked guy and in the backseat the guy who was mad about me tossing his dog, and beside him some red-faced guy I had never seen before. Between them was Gadget.

"It's them," I said. "And Gadget's with them."

Brett turned to look. "That bitch."

"I'm going to try and outrace them," I said. "Call Leonard."

As Brett popped open her cell phone, I hit the gas and started around the Cadillac. The Caddy weaved in front of me.

"Get off the phone, asshole," I yelled at the Cadillac just like the driver could hear me.

I heard Brett say, "Leonard, we got trouble. We're on Main, just crossed Gibbon, about three blocks from our street. Yeah."

Brett clapped the phone shut. "He's on his way."

"This goddamn Cadillac," I said, and weaved the other direction. It weaved with me. I glanced in the rearview mirror. The red-faced guy in the truck had a cell phone to his ear. I glanced at the Caddy. The driver was still on the phone.

"They're in cahoots," I said.

Brett was looking back, she said, "Oh hell."

I looked in the rearview. Red Face was lifting up through the sunroof with a shotgun. It looked as big as a howitzer to me.

I tried to get around the Caddy. No luck. They had us between a patch of houses and trees, no side streets.

I turned quick, bumped over a curb, went through a lawn, bashed a couple of lawn gnomes and a pink flamingo, which might be considered a public service, then bounced through a driveway and clipped the tail of a parked car just enough to knock it out of our way. I weaved between an oak and an elm and took out a yard swing, a birdbath, and a Vote-for-Some-Republican sign. I gave myself an extra two points for that.

The Caddy and the truck ran along beside us on the street. Red Face's shotgun banged and a back side window went out on my truck. Brett let out a yip like a surprised dog.

“You hit?” I asked.

“Just my pride.”

I saw an alley between two houses up the way, took a sharp right, and saw it was a screwup immediately. There was a wooden fence at the end of it. I yelled to Brett to hang on and put my foot to the floor. The pickup jumped and I hit the fence and lumber went out in all directions and we roared on through and down a little hill. There was a clump of trees in front of us and a low area I knew was a creek, so I hung a hard left and took out another wooden fence and went through a backyard and made a cocker spaniel jump for cover. I took out a matching fence, whipped hard left through a side yard in time to see our pursuers whisk by on the street, make several car lengths ahead of us.

I started back in the direction we had come, saw people in the yards now, out rubbernecking. I don’t know what possessed me, but I waved at a couple of them. In the rearview I saw the truck had turned and so had the Caddy. They were coming down on my ass pretty snappy-damn-quick. I had my foot all the way to the floor when I tried to make a turn, and that’s when I lost it. My truck skidded, fishtailed, then got itself together and looked like it was going to be all right. Another shot banged behind us, and this time the back glass of the pickup shattered. I caught some sting in the back of my neck. Brett yelled, “Goddamn it,” and flipped over the seat and got the twelve-gauge and brought it up and started pumping. She poked it out the busted window in the back, got off three rounds faster than a buck rabbit can fuck, and their truck spun to the right, went into a yard, right into a house with a sound like a cannon going off. Steam rose up from their hood.

I checked the rearview, saw the Caddy was still behind us. I turned my head and saw the truck rammed up in the house, bricks in the yard. Red Face and Tanedrue were out of the truck, guns in hand. Red Face was moving quickly. Tanedrue was limping toward us, due to his gunshot, but he looked lively enough and dangerous enough to me.

I said, “Put your seat belt back on, baby.”

Brett climbed over the seat like a monkey, snapped the belt around her waist, clutched the shotgun like a life raft.

I hit the brakes. The truck spun almost completely around. I gave it some gas and turned the wheel and we were heading right at the Caddy. I got the nine out from the small of my back and sent my driver's window down with a touch of a button, stuck out my arm and fired left-handed. I starred the glass of the Caddy and it whipped to our right and passed us and swerved and hit the back end of my truck and made us spin like a Tilt-A-Whirl. Then we were rolling over and over. Next thing I knew, we were upside down, hanging by our seat belts. A curious weenie dog was looking in my open window, possibly hoping for blood.

I unsnapped my seat belt and fell in a heap, found my nine on the roof of the truck, reached for it. I could hear Brett cussing like a longshoreman. "Goddamn it, sonsofagoddamndogshittin'bitches."

And then she was loose from her belt. She got hold of the shotgun as I crawled out ahead of her, my head hazy, my vision blurred. The damn weenie dog bit me. I slapped at him with the back of my hand, got on my feet and leaned back against the upside-down truck. The yard and the sky kept jumping around. The dog grabbed my pants leg and tugged and growled and I had to kick him loose.

Brett came out on her hands and knees, dragging the shotgun after her.

"Goddamn it," she said. "Motherfuckin'cocksuckin'dicklickin'ball-suckin'sonsagoddamnshitsuckin'monkeylickin'sonsabitches."

Even I was a little embarrassed.

18

My head cleared enough to see the Caddy had veered off and hit a tree. The ass end of the car was sticking out in the street leaking gasoline and some other fluids; tree bark floated in the liquid. I started walking that way limping. After a few steps I was walking straight, but my stomach was twisted and sour and my balls had tried to shrink up and hide and had almost succeeded.

I could see that air bags had popped and the driver wasn't moving. Same for the passenger in the front. The back door opened and a guy fell out with a gun in his hand. He crawled on the ground a bit, then stood up. I shot him in the head and he fell down in the pool of gas and a swirl of blood. The sunlight caught the blood and gas and the color they made was not something I could identify. When the shot went off the weenie dog took to his dog paws and tore a path around the back end of my overturned truck, across a lawn and out of view, went away from there so fast he damn near left a vapor trail.

There was another guy moving in the back passenger seat of the Caddy. He opened the door and stepped out. I shot and missed. I grabbed at Brett, who was standing out in the street with the shotgun, her legs spread wide, cussing—"Shiteatin'assholelickin'"—and pulled her around to the side of the truck as a blast peppered the opposite side of it and a shot whistled by my ear like a rocket-propelled bee. Just as we got around to the other side, I heard a sound like someone scalding a cat to my right, glanced that way, saw a dark Chevy flash down the street like something out of Buck Rogers.

It was Leonard.

I peeked around the end of the truck and the guy at the Caddy had moved to the front of it so he could see us. He steadied his gun hand on the hood and fired, and the shot took out my upturned back tire. I opened up on him with three shots, but none of them hit him. I heard the shotgun pump beside me, and then I heard a blast and heard Brett say, “Fuck you.”

I fired a shot at the Caddy and broke and ran for it just as the guy raised up for another shot. I fired and he ducked down behind the car. I jumped, planted a foot on the hood, nearly lost my balance, came down on top of him with both feet, knocking his gun flying and losing mine in the process.

We came together like a couple of wild sheep, actually butted heads and knocked each other down. Across the street, moving out of the yard, taking position behind trees, I saw Tanedrue and his posse trying to cross over to us. I saw Gadget lying facedown in the yard beside the pickup, her hands over her head, crying loudly.

I bit the guy I was fighting so hard I took part of his nose away. He let out a bellow and I leaped forward and poked a finger in one of his eyes. As he staggered back, I kicked and caught the inside of his kneecap and it made a pleasant sound like a drover cracking a whip. He fell with one hand on his face, the other clutching at his knee. I picked up my gun and walked over to him and shot him in the head.

I started crossing the street. I had lost my brains. I was crazy. I saw Leonard. He was walking up the street, on my right. Tanedrue was firing at him, and so were the other three, and I knew Leonard was as good as dead.

But he wasn’t. I heard his Colt .45 revolver bark and I saw the top of the ball-kicked guy’s head tear off and sail across the curb and roll down a ways and spin like a furry hubcap. I shot at Tanedrue and missed and hit the house behind him. He yelled and started firing at me with an automatic pistol, fast as he could. The bullets plucked at my hair and the sleeve of my shirt, and I shot him dead center of his chest. His right leg jumped back behind him and he crumpled back with an expression on his face like he’d just found a kidney stone in his oatmeal. He went to one knee, dropped his gun, said, “Don’t shoot.”

I walked right up to him and shot him in the face; he’d dug in his shorts for the last time. Another bullet whizzed by me. I should have been dead ten times over. But now I was emboldened by luck and success, and that’s the kind of thinking that gets you killed. Leonard, still wearing his security guard uniform, walked up beside me. The two remaining gunmen, including Red Face, fled back to their truck and were trying to get inside of it, maybe start it up and drive out.

My adrenaline rush fell off, and I let out with a deep breath. I felt light-headed. My knees were shaking. I heard Brett behind me.

“Yeahbuddythat’srightyoubunchofpussyassmotherfuckersaren’tso hotnowareyoupigsuckin’goatfuckin’ …”

The truck’s engine was going now, but the truck didn’t move. It was hung up good. Gadget didn’t move. She was still facedown with her hands over her head, crying. The two came out of the truck firing. I felt something tear at my neck. I fired and missed. Brett cut down with the shotgun. I caught a glimpse of what looked like a splash of red paint and then I saw Brett’s shot had torn Red Face almost in half. Leonard walked toward the other guy firing. It took a few shots bouncing off the truck and the brick house, but with bullets whizzing around his head, Leonard finally hit the shooter.

The guy flipped backwards, turned completely over like he was doing a tumbling act. He was lying on his stomach. He raised his head. There was a sound coming from him like a busted manifold.

“Dirtyfuckin’ratshiteatin’dickcheesesuckin’,” Brett said, deep into her French.

“What she said,” Leonard said and fired, hitting the man on the ground in the mouth, making it the size of a manhole cover, knocking his head so hard on the neck it snapped sideways and teeth tumbled out on the grass.

“Hey,” Leonard said, looking over at me, his eyes bright, his mouth in a kind of rictus grin. “How’s it hanging?”

I didn’t have an answer. I got weak and went to one knee. I turned away from the carnage we had just made. I saw the ball-kicked guy’s skull down by the curb. The weenie dog appeared, grabbed it, headed off between a couple of houses, running like he had just caught a touchdown pass.

* * *

Leonard and I walked over to the Caddy and looked in at the guys in the front seat, ones pushed back by the air bags. One of them was moving.

“Should I shoot him?” Brett asked. “I want to shoot him. Other one’s alive, I’ll shoot him too.”

“No,” I said, pushing the shotgun down. “We’re done.”

I could hear sirens wailing, coming closer and closer.

“Glad you could make it,” I said to Leonard.

“Me too,” he said. “Your neck’s bleeding.”

I put a hand to my neck. I had been grazed. I couldn’t believe it. That was the worse I had got, except for a stray shotgun pellet and some broken glass.

Brett handed me the shotgun. “Wait right here. I’m fixin’ to slap the shit out of Gadget.”

I didn’t stop her. She went across the street, jerked Gadget to her feet, and slapped her so hard it knocked her down again. “Get up, bitch,” I heard Brett say.

Gadget didn’t move.

Brett kicked her in the ribs. “Get up, bitch, or I’ll stomp your head in.”

Gadget reluctantly got up, and Brett slapped her down again.

People were starting to poke their heads out of their houses, move out into their yards. Four police cars and a medical unit arrived. We dumped our guns on the Caddy’s hood, walked out into the street slowly with our hands up.

Brett didn’t move. She stood in the yard looking down at Gadget, who was crying louder than before.

“Get up, bitch,” I heard Brett say, “and I’ll give you something to cry about.”

19

They separated us and put me in a poorly lit cell with a burly tattooed guy with greasy hair and a lot of muscles and a way of looking at me that made me feel like a pork chop with a butt hole. At least he had all his teeth and no pustules on his face. We would at worst make healthy if not overly attractive children.

He was sitting on his bunk and I was sitting on mine. My hands were shaking a little bit; they still tingled from all the shooting and I could smell cordite on my clothes, and there was another smell inside my head, a cloud of death and doom.

The cell's walls were as pink as a baboon's ass and we were both wearing pink jumpsuits to match. It was a new jail philosophy. Tough guys didn't want to go back to jail because they'd have to wear pink and sit in pink jail cells. Some thought it was an idea that worked. I didn't believe it. Some redneck decides to shoot his wife over the fact she burned his squirrel potpie, I could hardly believe he'd be considering before the deed: Well, damn. I better hold up on this killing. I stick a broom handle up Bessie's nose, set her on fire and shoot her eye out, I'll have to wear pink and sit in a pink room, and them's girl colors. What if the fellas see me?

I wondered how the fella across from me felt about wearing pink. Maybe he didn't like it, but it certainly hadn't been enough to keep him out of jail, and from the looks of him, he'd been here before, maybe had a pillow with his name stitched on it.

Fuck rehabilitation. Go for the pink to embarrass them.

My partner put an Elvis smile on his face, eyed me for a while, said, "You don't get much pussy in jail."

"That's a natural fact," I said.

"It ain't available."

"You, my man, are like an oracle. You see things the rest of us don't. You are Nostradamus in pink. You are a ripe cherry blossom in an orchard of dullards."

He eyed me for a moment, trying to figure out if what I said was an insult or a compliment. Then he picked up where he'd left off. "Not real pussy."

I was already tired of this guy.

"Sometimes, you got to make your own nookie," he said.

"You got you a theme, don't you, buddy?"

"You hear what I'm sayin'?"

"Are you suggestin' that I'm pretty in pink?"

"Poontang is where you find it, boy."

I saw where this was going, and it was where I'd figured all along. I jumped off my bunk and was across our little gap before he could open his mouth again. I hit him as hard as I could, right across the cheek; it was like I dropped a fucking anvil on him. He fell backwards on his bunk, but his ass was hanging off and the weight of it pulled him onto the floor. He lay beside the bunk twitching like a Pentecostal having a Jesus rigor. There wasn't any blood, but he was going to have a bruise and a headache and his pink jumpsuit was going to have floor nasty on it.

I backed to my bunk and sat down and watched until he quit twitching. Then I turned my attention to how many years I would be behind bars before they put me to death by lethal injection for the shoot-out we had just been in. Maybe they could put me and Brett and Leonard in a room together. We could hold hands from our cots while they put the needles in our arms. I looked at the guy on the floor, the man without pussy.

I sat there and thought on things and tried to figure how I had come to this. Mama always told me to stay away from guns, and though I could use one and I was a good shot, I had never been comfortable with them. Though I agreed that guns didn't kill people, people killed people, guns sure made it a lot easier and far more successful than hunting down victims with a pointed stick.

If I hadn't been armed today, I'd have been deep napping inside my truck amidst broken glass and a bloody car seat with a hole in my head, Brett dead beside me, a yard gnome and a Vote

Republican sign still standing. So there had to be something good said for guns, and maybe we could even throw in a few kind words for erratic driving, but if we had all been carrying those pointed sticks it might have been less of a massacre. When you really think about it, humans are a scary branch of evolution, especially the male division. Man can turn anything into a weapon, even his tongue.

Perhaps living in Texas was my problem.

Maybe if I had been born in Connecticut.

Nah. They talked funny and it was cold up there.

I thought about Gadget and Tanedrue and the trailer, and how me and Leonard had whipped those guys' asses. I thought about those birthday and Christmas cards on Tanedrue's mirror; his mother had meant something to him, and he to her, and now she'd have him to grieve over. I thought about the shooting, the way I had acted and felt, about how something had clicked inside of me and turned me hot as the core of the sun, about how the bloodlust had taken me over and wrapped me up tight until I exploded. I thought about how Leonard was, and Brett. I had seen something close to joy on their faces. I figured mine had probably looked the same. Maybe we all deserved execution just because we could do what we did and not blink an eye. It wasn't just self-defense. When it all came down and I felt that click inside of me, I had been scared but exhilarated too, and in the moments of the happening I had felt born to kill. Now I just felt small and sick to my stomach and a little weird. Like it had all happened to someone else and I had watched it from a distant rooftop.

My life had been too full of quick punches, blood, and gun smoke. I wanted to go with Brett to some island and live off coconuts and screw until it killed us. I wanted to never throw a punch again. Never see a gun again, not even from a distance, not even a picture in a magazine. I wanted to never be mad again. I wanted to not have to worry about my code of honor. I wanted it not to matter. I even wanted to get away from Leonard.

I was tired of the whole dirty, bloody thing that was my life. I was beginning to consider heavily that old saying about being careful when you fight monsters so that you do not become one. In that moment, I was feeling pretty monstrous. It was as if I had been born under a violent star.

I wondered what Leonard was thinking about.

He was probably in his cell sleeping on his bunk, dreaming of vanilla cookies and Dr Pepper. Happy in pink. He was alive and had helped keep me and Brett alive. For him, that was enough, and for me it should have been.

The guy on the floor stirred and started to sit up. I thought: Fuck it. In for the snout, in for the tail. I stood up and kicked him in the head as hard as I could under the jaw. He went down again and didn't get up. This time he bled. I sat down on my bunk and watched the blood run out of his mouth.

Hap Collins, you are one walking, talking contradiction. I also decided I didn't deserve execution after all. I probably just needed a spanking. Maybe someone could call me some names and send me home without my supper. I felt myself tremble as if something cold had crawled up my spine.

I watched some shadows advance down the hall. I heard some prisoners yelling and talking. Somewhere someone was watching a television. There was no television in my cell. Not even a deck of cards. Just the man without nookie, lying unconscious on the jailhouse floor.

After a while a big shadow came down the hall. It fell into the cell, and pretty soon there was a guy following it. He was one of the cops who had arrested us. He was a big guy with a belly that was teasing the buttons on his shirt. He was bareheaded and he didn't have much hair. He stood at the door to my cell, looking through the bars. He stared down at my pal on the floor, said, "What happened to him?"

"Faintin' spell," I said. "Saw a mouse."

"A mouse, huh?"

"It was a big mouse."

20

They brought the three of us, wearing handcuffs, into an interrogation room that smelled strongly of Pine-Sol and too much mop soap and more than a sprinkle of urine. The floor was a little slick. A roach lay legs up in the corner.

There was a mirror on the wall, long and narrow, and I figured it was one of those see-through jobs where they could watch into the room from the other side. They couldn't fool me. I had seen TV and movies. The mirror was smeared in places with fingerprints and nose prints, and some stains that were probably not worth knowing about. There was a single fat bulb hanging down from a frayed, dust-covered wire and the dust was so thick and dark it looked like fungus. I half expected the wire to snap and spray the room with sparks and set the place on fire. I saw a video camera in the top corner of the room on metal struts. Boogers were smeared on the wall, and some of them were big enough to use as bricks in construction. I had the uncomfortable feeling that one of the larger ones was looking at me.

They put us on one side of a long table with initials and fuck-you messages carved into it. I looked up. The camera was pointing right at us. I gave it a smile.

They had already talked to us separately, right before tossing us into our individual cells. Now they had us as a trio, the three of us sitting there in all our jail-suited glory, pink roses in a light green booger-dotted room. They brought us there and went away, and we sat alone for a moment, and then the door opened and two men came in. They were not in uniform.

I knew one of them. His name was Drake and he was a detective and we got along all right. We had had reason to meet before. I hadn't shot anyone that time, and he knew Marvin, so he had been nice to me. I got off easy. I hit a man at a Dairy Queen because he hit his wife when she dropped his DQ Dude on the way to their table. I thought this was a bit excessive, even though Dudes are good and inexpensive if you go with the basket, French fries, and a drink. The wife got mad at me and I was the one that went to jail. As the old saying goes, no good deed goes unpunished.

Drake was whip-lean, black as straight coffee, with a soft-looking face and a boxer's flat nose. His shirt was lime-colored. It matched the paint on the walls. He didn't have on a tie. His top button was unbuttoned and his shirttail was pulled out. If he was trying to look any more casual he'd have come in his underwear carrying a teddy bear and a pacifier.

Drake knew Leonard too. Who didn't? Brett he also knew of. I could understand that. A lot of men knew of her and wished they knew more of her.

I had no idea where Gadget was, or the two who had been in the front seat of the Caddy. I wondered if my cell mate was still napping. I wondered if the weenie dog was somewhere hidden, nibbling on his prize.

Drake had another cop with him. A pink-skinned, redheaded guy with freckles and fat lips. Kelso was his name. He was leaning in the corner of the room acting like he couldn't believe what the human condition had come to.

Drake sat on one side of the table and we sat on the other. Brett in the middle. The chairs were shorter on our side of the table. It's an old trick the cops use to make you feel less significant than the interrogator. We didn't give a damn, though. We were tough enough to tear doughnuts in half.

Kelso kept his corner, turning his head to take us in with those disappointed eyes. Drake lit a cigarette and asked if we wanted cigarettes or coffee.

"Have you got those little flavored creamers?" Leonard asked.

"No," Drake said.

"Any cookies?"

"Nothing like that," Drake said. "Some coffee. Standard shitty creamer with some sugar packs. Or Sweet'N Low. But maybe we can bring in some caviar and nice crackers."

"Could you?" Leonard said. "That would be damn nice."

Drake made a point of ignoring Leonard. He looked at me and Brett. We asked for coffee. Drake nodded, turned to Kelso, said, “Is the camera on?”

He knew we knew how it worked, so he wasn’t trying to be cagey.

“Nope,” Kelso said.

“Good,” Drake said. “Leonard, you can go fuck yourself.”

“From your lips to God’s ear,” Leonard said.

“Go on, man,” Drake said to Kelso. “Get the coffee.”

Kelso left. I guess it was his day to be fetch bitch.

Drake looked us over. “So, you people have had quite a day. Enough dead to put a dent in the population. If only you could have set fire to downtown and shot a busload of orphans, it would have been perfect.”

“Hap ran over a yard gnome,” Brett said. “That damn sure ought to count for something.”

“Yep,” Leonard said. “It was a big day, and frankly, I can’t speak for everyone, but I’m a little tuckered, and this pink outfit makes me feel like I’m in my jammies. But, just to let you know, I really feel humiliated. This suit, it’s got to be the right cure for evil. Wearing this, no one would ever stray again from the straight and narrow. You wouldn’t even catch me jackin’ off in the men’s room if I thought I’d have to wear this fucker again.”

“That’s a relief,” Drake said.

“Thought you’d want to know,” Leonard said.

Drake tapped his fingers on the desk, said, “You’re going to call it self-defense?”

“Our lawyer will,” I said. Of course, we didn’t have a lawyer yet, but I wanted to sound like a big-time experienced criminal.

I turned to Leonard, said, “I met a guy in my cell who wanted to fuck me. I knocked him out. Was that anti-gay?”

“Did you write any anti-gay graffiti on him or the wall?”

I shook my head.

“I think it’ll be all right,” he said.

“No talking amongst yourselves,” Drake said. “You know you did a bad thing, you three?"

"Yep," Leonard said.

"What about those guys in the Caddy?" Brett asked.

"They'll live," Drake said.

"Gadget?" I asked.

"She's under arrest."

Kelso came back in, but he didn't have our coffee. He leaned over and whispered in Drake's ear.

"What?" Drake said.

Kelso nodded.

"Goddamn it," Drake said.

Drake got up and went out. Leonard said, "What about that coffee?"

"Fuck the coffee," Kelso said.

"That's some kind of goddamn way for a public servant to talk," Leonard said. "And you with the camera running."

I kicked Leonard gently under the table.

"I saw that," Kelso said. "And that's good policy. You should shut the hell up. And the camera is still off, dick cheese. That way, I wanted to kick your ass it wouldn't get recorded."

Leonard just smiled. Even with handcuffs on, Leonard would be a load and he knew it, and I could tell Kelso knew it too.

Kelso glared at me, said, "The jailer said you hit your cell mate."

"He didn't buy the mouse story?"

"Drake said you two think you're funny."

"There's that insult again," Leonard said. "It could take the edge off our comic timing."

"I think you're funny," Brett said, reached her handcuffs over and patted Leonard's hand.

"Thank you, dear," Leonard said.

"Laugh it up," Kelso said. "We'll see what the jury says."

We were the sort that when we were nervous we couldn't help but run our mouths to show we weren't nervous. It's not a good habit, but it’s ours. That comment shut us up, though. We sat there in silence, brooding in our pink jumpsuits, until the door opened and Drake came in and looked at us and sighed. He stood there for a long moment, just studying us, like we were a species formerly thought extinct. I thought any moment the rubber hose would appear, maybe a blowtorch and some pliers and a couple of angry German shepherds. He turned to Kelso. “Take their handcuffs off.”

21

After our handcuffs were off, Drake and Kelso went out, leaving us alone. We sat and waited, looking in the mirror that most likely had someone on the other side. At first I counted smears on the glass, boogers on the wall, anything to keep me busy. But that grew boring.

We turned and looked at one another, as if one of us might offer some sort of solution. No great answers unfolded. The nature of the universe was still safe. Stephen Hawking still had the inside track.

We sat there for a long time, then finally began to talk. Brett said, “What’s the point of this?”

“They want whoever is on the other side of the glass to take a good look at us,” Leonard said.

“Why?” Brett asked.

I patted her knee. “Because you are so pretty.”

“Oh. Well, of course,” she said, “duh, there is that.”

“I got a joke,” I said.

“Not now,” Leonard said.

“It’s pretty good.”

“Not now,” Brett said, and I knew that was the end of that.

“I don’t know about you two,” I said, “but I miss Kelso already. He had such sweet, if electrified, eyes.”

“You’d think they’d wipe these boogers down,” Brett said. “I don’t know who they think that intimidates. It’s just nasty.”

“I hear that,” Leonard said.

“And that piss smell,” she said. “It could hold your coat.”

“It could wear it,” Leonard said.

The door opened and Drake came in, and there was a guy with him that had a head like a concrete block. His haircut had something to do with that, gold as an Aryan dream, waxed up in front, flared out on the sides. He had a big hooked nose and thin lips and seemed to have more teeth than a human ought to, something a crocodile might envy, only straighter. His eyes were big and dark brown, like two unwiped butt holes. He reminded me of a villain out of those old Dick Tracy comics.

Drake went over and leaned against the wall, got a whiff of the piss, moved to another corner. The guy with the square head leaned back against the mirror. He said, "There's nobody on the other side."

"You say," Leonard said.

Drake said, "No. He's right."

"Damn, glad we got your word on that," Leonard said. "That makes it all right, then."

"I locked the door leads into the investigation room," Drake said.

"You got the only key?" I asked.

"No."

"Ah," I said. "No one else would of course use their key and go in there and look at us. … But frankly, we don't care. Ask what you want. It was self-defense."

"I know," Drake said.

That sort of stunned us, but lawmen are tricky.

The door opened and two guys came in. One of them was the guy who had been in Tanedrue's trailer, the one who wasn't with the batch we shot up today, the guy whose profile was gone, whose nose was splinted now and taped over good with tape so thick he looked like the Mummy. His forehead looked as if someone had broken in his ball bat on it. A shock of thick hair poked up from the top of the bandages like a rooster's comb. He went over and leaned against the wall and looked at Leonard. It wasn't a look of adoration.

I thought, What the hell?

The other guy was a short fat guy in a black suit with a black tie and some black shoes that needed a shine. He looked like an undertaker in a pet cemetery. He blew some breath out between his fat lips, went over and leaned on the wall next to our friend with the tape and the bruises.

The room was starting to get tight. If one more person came in we'd all be wearing the same suit of clothes, and I was sure I needed to change my underwear.

Brett looked at the two leaning on the mirror, said, "There's boogers on the wall and there's something on the mirror I don't think will pass for mayonnaise. Just a word to the wise."

They stopped leaning.

Leonard glared at the taped-up man, said, "What the hell is the Phantom of the Opera doing here?"

Drake said, "We'll come to that. But first, we got a little deal for you guys."

"A deal?" I said. "Think we're going to rat each other out? There's people saw what happened. We didn't go looking to be shot at. I might run over that yard gnome again I got the chance, but getting shot at like that, trust me, I'd rather pass. And you said it yourself, self-defense."

"You're going to get the charges dropped, or rather they're going to definitely turn into self-defense," Drake said. "No court. No problem."

"No shirt. No shoes. No problem," Leonard said. "What kind of bull is this? There's always court. What's the catch?"

Drake didn't say anything. He crossed his arms.

I said, "There is a catch, isn't there?"

"That's one way of putting it," Square Head said. "It's more like we got your dick in the zipper and we're pulling it up tight. In your case, ma'am, I guess it's your tit we got caught up."

"Then you better have a lot of zipper," Brett said, "'cause I'm serious in the tit department."

No one opposed this opinion.

"Agent Tenson here," Drake said, nodding at the Dick Tracy villain, "he's with the FBI, and he and his buddy here, Captain Bandage—"

"Man, that's some funny shit," Captain Bandage, aka the Mummy aka the Phantom, said.

“They want to talk to you,” Drake said. “Me, I’m just a lowly fucking public servant who’s always got the raw ass from these fed guys sticking their dicks in it, and I hate them.”

“Come on,” Tenson said. “There’s no need to turn this ugly. You and me, I’m sure we got things in common, Drake.”

“Yeah,” Drake said. “These guys, that’s what we got in common. May have been self-defense, but it didn’t just come out of nowhere, these folks wanting to kill them. There has to be a backstory. I don’t like lettin’ them off. They shot a lot of people. They ought to at least have a paddling, a night in jail, noses in the corner. This isn’t right, man.”

“What I want to know,” Leonard said, “is why is the fucking Mummy in on this?”

The Mummy’s voice sounded snotty, which isn’t unusual when your snout is packed with cotton. “It’s Milhouse. I was working undercover. Thanks a lot, asshole, you fucked up a real sting operation just to take some whore home.”

“Her granddaddy doesn’t see her that way,” Leonard said.

“Yeah, but me, I’ve had surgery, and I got to have some more. Thanks.”

“You’re welcome,” Leonard said, and the Mummy came off the wall and Drake stepped over and put a hand against the Mummy’s chest.

“After what he done to you,” Drake said, “I wouldn’t push it. I think he can do it again. And we took the handcuffs off.”

“Yeah,” Leonard said, still sitting, holding his hands up. “They took the handcuffs off.”

“We ought to all just beat him down,” the Mummy, aka the Phantom of the Opera, aka Captain Bandage, said.

“We ought to,” Drake said, “but we won’t.”

“You were undercover,” Leonard said. “Might have been nice had you warned us Tanedrue and his mutts were going to take a run at us.”

“I didn’t know,” Milhouse said. “Had no idea. I told them I had some family concerns, got out. My figuring was some higher-ups were gonna come down on them, and I didn’t want to be there when it happened.”

The fat guy said, “Way it was gonna work was we was gonna let Tanedrue and his dopes take care of you guys, then we were gonna come down on them, spread their asses all over Kingdom Come. Guys like them are too stupid to deal dope, and let me tell you from experience, that’s putting them in a real stupid place. We got guys working for us that are damn near retards and they do better. One guy in Dallas hasn’t got any legs and goes around in the streets on a wheeled board selling dope and peddling ass for us, and he does a better job than those fucks.”

“And who are you?” I asked. “My first guess is since you got people selling dope and ass for you, you’re not a cop, though these days, hard to say. And though you could be a priest on vacation, I’m doubtful.”

“I’m the guy that wanted you two killed,” the fat man said.

Leonard shifted in his chair. Drake said, “I got a gun, Leonard.”

“I don’t like people want to kill me or Hap,” Leonard said. “Fact is, it seriously chaps my ass. I don’t like you bringing him, whoever he is, in here to lord over us like he’s somethin’. What the hell is going on here? Tell us or arrest us or shoot us or do some goddamn thing or another. I’m fed up.”

“Hold it a minute,” I said. “Didn’t someone say something about a deal? I mean, there’s some kind of deal, I want to hear it.”

“Oh yeah,” Drake said. “These guys got deals out the ass.”

22

A day after they let us go, after they offered us the deal, Marvin gave us a short-lived holiday. He owned a boat and he took me and Leonard and Brett out to a lake near LaBorde to go fishing. It was a nice lake with a big dam. Marvin had some kind of membership there, and you could only get in with a key to a gate that had a sign on it that said BEWARE OF ALLIGATORS. It was an open boat and had plenty of seats and a lot of room, a place to lay your rods and clamp them down. There was a container in the floor of the boat and we had some cold drinks in there, but it was too cold to want them. We also had a couple thermoses of coffee, some bologna-and-mayonnaise sandwiches, some bags of potato chips that were more inviting.

Marvin steered the boat out to the middle of the calm water, making it less calm as we went. Small, dark birds were in the willow trees across the way and the grass near the trees was tall and still green even in the brisk beginnings of winter; it grew out from beneath the trees, ran across the bank and into the lake like a green tattoo. Once we got settled and the wake of the boat had subsided, the water around us looked like a huge sheet of tin. There was the faint smell of dead fish in the air and there were a number of old logs floating on the lake's surface. After a while one of the logs swam away.

It was an alligator, probably sneaking up on a frog. It had fooled me. I cast my line away from that direction, but watched the alligator, the way it split the water and gave the lake a darker color wherever it swam.

"I certainly got you guys in a mess," Marvin said.

"You did," Brett said, frowning at the little green rubber lizard she had on the end of her line for bait.

"I know, and I regret it. Thanks for having them cut Gadget loose, Hap."

“I didn’t have them do anything special,” I said. “I just told them they wanted a deal from us she had to be cut loose.”

“It’s the only way they would have let her go,” he said.

“No problem,” I said. “How’s she doing?”

“She’s in rehab, out in Arizona. Rachel and JoAnna are with her. I convinced them, after what you two did, I couldn’t go. Had to be here to help you. But Gadget, I guess she’s doing all right. Rachel said she’s still in a kind of shock. She feels guilty going back to Tanedrue, didn’t know they would come after you and take her with them, didn’t know it was going to be like that. She doesn’t love that dead fuck anymore, sees him for what he is and what he was doing to her. Now, after all that garbage she finally sees. She’s as naive as a fresh-born baby sometimes. Said to tell you, Brett, she deserved every slap you gave her, and then some.”

“Hell, I know that,” Brett said, and cast her line. She looked cute today, in a heavy coat with a tan cap with earflaps and big cream-colored puffy boots full of warm stuffing. Her long hair was tied back in a ponytail, and it was bloodred against her back because of the way the sun was falling on it.

“The FBI sort of got us over a barrel,” I said. “That had something to do with us telling them yes, trying to better our situation. We’re not all that noble, Marvin.”

“Speak for yourself,” Leonard said. “I am one noble sonofabitch, and way special. If I weren’t so tired I’d walk on water and kick that alligator’s ass.”

“You’d have got off anyway,” Marvin said. “There would have been a trial, and a lot of time taken up, but in the end, they’d have let you three off and fined you for the shotgun. I don’t know, might have been some jail time. Witnesses, though, they were on your side. There was one fellow upset about some yard gnomes, another about some pink flamingos, but other than that it came out all right.”

“Death to gnomes and flamingos,” I said.

“Bottom line,” Marvin said, “is I know why you did it, and you can downplay it all you want, but I know why you did it, and I won’t ever forget. Already owed you guys, now I really owe you.”

“We owed you some too,” Leonard said. “For something or another, though I kind of forget what. But after this we'll be even. We can start running tabs on each other again."

❧

We fished all day in the cold, dry weather on the flat gray lake beneath the pearl-colored sky, eating the sandwiches and chips, drinking the coffee and talking a little, but not too much. I cast my line without purpose, and with no real hope of catching anything. I was fishing a wish and nothing more. I reeled my line in time after time, watching it cut the water like the thin edge of a knife. I cast and recast until the sun was falling down behind us and the sky that had been clear and pearl-colored at my back turned red as a whore's lipstick, then was stained with purple like the insides of a plum stretched out. I reeled in my line and turned to take a good look at the sky. I thought it might be the last time I saw a sky like that, or went fishing. Might be the last day and night I saw Brett, because in the morning I was sending her away. It had been a battle, but I had convinced her. She was going out to Arizona too, to join Gadget and Rachel and JoAnna. Secretly, I think events had unnerved her. Not that she was fearful of what might happen to her—well, no more than someone should be reasonably fearful—but because she had enjoyed it all too much; there was something inside of her that had snapped. It was the same thing that had allowed her to set her ex-husband on fire and beat him with a shovel, and pistol-whip a midget. It hadn't frightened her before, but now it had. She had seen its full face and it was gruesome. This time people had died. I didn't question that they needed to die, but they had, and by our hands, in an explosion of blood and urine and feces, a whiff of gun smoke on the air.

I knew how she felt. Problem was, that thing inside of me had clicked loose so many times it was starting to feel normal, like the necessary lancing of a wound. I had looked into the abyss so much it was no longer just looking back at me, it had its arms around me and was puckering to kiss.

I wanted to just let it all go, do the jail time, forget about the FBI deal. But then I thought some more about that jail time, and since I had already done prison some years back and I could remember it as if it were yesterday I didn't want any more of that.

I cast my line toward the setting sun and the stained sky, and when I started reeling it in a fish hit. I reeled it until it was close enough for me to reach out and take hold of the line just above the fish. It was a moderate-sized perch. I loosened the hook from its mouth and gently tossed it back in the water.

We started ashore then, my fish having been the only one caught. Marvin hadn't driven the boat far toward shore before the night overtook us, collapsed over the water and made it dark as the River Styx. When we got to the boat ramp there was no more light except a thin ray of rising moonlight that was slowly being bagged by some fast-moving clouds. The wind picked up and really turned cold. The weather had changed in a flash. Welcome to East Texas.

We used flashlights and got out at the front of the boat without stepping in the water and fastened the crank line to Marvin's trailer, then used the automatic crank and put it in place. We drove away, along with a rumble of thunder, and soon after, out on the highway, there were thin streaks of lightning, like bright varicose veins cutting across the black sky. We drove to Marvin's place and put the boat in the carport and closed it up, then he drove us home in his big Ford truck, and he and Leonard spent the night at our place.

*

We put Leonard on the couch and we got a blow-up bed for Marvin, some extra pillows for them from the closet. We weren't supposed to have guns, but Marvin had brought a shotgun for himself and one for Leonard and he gave me and Brett handguns. We talked for a long time in the dark, sitting in the living room, then finally Brett and I went up to bed, placing the handguns on the nightstand.

Brett and I were fiery that night and at first I feared they would hear us downstairs, then after a while I didn't care at all. When we finished, we hugged for a while, then she said, "You're sure Jim Bob's coming?"

"Oh yeah, he said so, so he'll be here. Marvin arranged it. I just wish we could have found Veil. But you know how he is. Locating him is like trying to find a virgin in a whorehouse."

"Jim Bob, he's good."

"Real good," I said. "After Leonard, he's who I would want at my back. Veil, I'd kind of like him there too."

"He's like that character the Shadow."

"He is. Kind of gives me the creeps, but he's a good one to have on your side. Wish we could have found him."

"What about this guy Marvin knows that's comin'? Tonto?"

"Marvin says he's good, so I reckon he is. He's one more, and that's good."

"Yeah," she said, "that's good."

"Marvin said Tonto owes him a big favor. He won't say what the favor is, but he says he'll pay him back."

"Not everyone pays favors back," she said.

"Marvin said Tonto does, so I got to believe him."

We were hugging close and I could feel Brett's warm tears on my cheek. I said, "It'll be all right, baby."

"I feel bad leaving you."

"I don't feel bad you're going," I said. "It's the right thing to do."

"All right, then," she said. "There's nothing else to say, is there?"

I shook my head. "Nothing else."

She pulled her big T-shirt that said SHEN CHAUN, MARTIAL SCIENCE over her head, kissed me, and rolled over and went to sleep with my hand on her hip. She could do that a lot of the time, just go down into dreamland no matter what was on her mind. Wasn't that easy for me, not when I had plans for the next day, especially the kind of plans we had to set in motion.

The rain outside picked up. I sat up and put my pillow behind my head, against the wall, listened to the rain grow savage. Thunder shook the upstairs windows with a sound like dice being rattled in a cup. Lightning was jumping around outside. The rain made a sound like a giant snake hissing, and the roof was taking some serious shots from drops that were hitting like artillery fire.

Brett didn’t stir. She was snoring.

I looked at her for a while, taking in everything I could about her, and then I thought about what it was we had agreed to do, me and Leonard. When it was all done, it wouldn’t surprise me if what was left of my soul wouldn’t fill a thimble.

23

In that booger-lined room with the greasy mirror, the deal they offered us sounded easy but with all things that sound easy there is often something at the bottom of it all that makes it stink. It's always something that begins with "All you got to do," or "This won't take much of your time." That should be enough of a cue to make you throw your hands over your head and run the other way. But not us; no one ever said we learned from our mistakes, not me and Leonard. Besides, we sort of had our asses in a crack over this killing a whole bunch of people deal, and our options were thin.

The fat guy in the black suit was from the Dixie Mafia, whatever that was exactly. His name was Hirem Burnett and he was turning state's evidence. In a nutshell he was one of the middle boys in the organization. You had your water carriers like Tanedrue and his buddies, then you had Hirem, and above his fat ass were Satan's Angels.

That's what Hirem called them, Satan's Angels. They sounded like a motorcycle gang, and thing was, there was a connection to some biker gangs in Houston. Some of the guys at the top had been bikers, then prisoners in one or several of our fine institutions, mostly for drug deals and violent acts. Bunch of guys tattooing themselves in cells and doing shank hits in the rec yard, running some dirty work from prison via messengers, a few of them getting out and turning into businessmen, their tattoos hidden under long-sleeve shirts, their formerly greasy hair trimmed and spruced up; sometimes they went as far as to wear a suit and tie and not scratch their nuts in public.

Lot of them were still Aryan Nations guys at heart, worrying that a strain of black blood would make soiled whites want to throw spears and run with watermelons, piss on the Dixie flag, maybe vote Democrat and wish for socialized medicine. Still, as

Conners said, they were businessmen and green was their true color, and as time had gone on, they had lost some of their interest in racial purity but none of their interest in crisp folding money

It was Hirem who told Tanedrue and his posse to hit us. And to bring in a whole bucketload of irony, now me and Leonard were going to have to do him a favor, and all because of Gadget. I rewound the bitch slapping Brett had given her in my head and enjoyed all the details I could remember. I might even have gussied up my memory some. I even quit feeling bad about punching her.

Hirem's son, one Tim Burnett, had bucked Daddy's ideas and had gone to college to be an environmental engineer. He didn't want to grow up to sell dope and run pussy. He ran off with a black girl and about three hundred thousand dollars' worth of drug money in a duffel bag. The guys at the top wanted the money back and they wanted the son to pay. The girl had to go down and not get up. They couldn't let word get around a colored gal had taken up with one of their mid-management fellows' sons and helped swipe a chunk of their money. Just wouldn't do.

She had to be whacked and they had to get all the money back, and the son, well, he had to take it and like it. That way Hirem wouldn't find him in a damp cardboard box inside his garage next to the garbage can. Those were Hirem's words, said it was the exact threat he had gotten from one Cletus Jimson, the upper-level man with a plan.

Hirem knew everyone in the business. He had been there when it was run by old fat guys in Hawaiian shirts wearing needle-nose Italian shoes. Back then, families were left alone. You didn't bother them no matter what a member might do, not unless their family was part of the business. Cops were also left out of the mix. Killing a cop was considered bad form. Business was between those in the group and no one else.

These days they were a lot more freewheeling. They'd kill anyone or do anything to maintain business. That included Hirem's son and girlfriend, and now that he had come forward to help the cops, it included Hirem himself.

The bad guys were also unhappy that a good chunk of their potential earnings had been flushed down the crapper by me, and Leonard had helped me do it. Couple of goons from a nearby town coming in and slapping their lower-level errand boys around, that didn't look good. That's why there had been a hit on us.

In that booger-dotted room Hirem said, "Wasn't nothing personal, you two. It was business."

"What about her?" I said, nodding at Brett. "What did she do to you?"

"Not a thing. And in the old days, she wouldn't have been part of it. But these ain't the old days, and I'm not in command. New guys at the top, they're younger and meaner and more demanding, and they keep me on a tight leash. Most likely, ten years ago this would have just been a business loss and we'd have taken care of Tanedrue and his morons and that would have been the end of it. But that's not the way they play these days."

"Just for the record," the Mummy said, "I wasn't really one of their morons."

"Informer, double agent, whatever you are or were," Hirem said. "In the old days, we figured you were a cop, we might have let you go. And a thing like this, my son getting jungle fever, wanting to ride a porch monkey, taking off with a bag of money, it would have been handled differently. I could have paid it back, made him apologize, sent the shine girl packin', maybe she would have caught a bullet, but no one else. Not like that anymore."

"Shine?" Leonard said. "That word is still in the vocabulary?"

"It's right next to colored," I said. "Just south of porch monkey."

"Oh," Leonard said.

Bottom line was, Hirem was under the gun, literally, and instead of following through with what the Dixie Mafia wanted him to do, he decided he'd had enough and it was time to pull the train out of the station. He had come to the FBI to tell them about the hit on us, that he had been behind it. Came to tell them lots of things, some of those things not yet spoken, and the reason for that was he had to have a deal before he let out all the juice he knew.

But the thing was, he needed some patsies to find his son and the money. Some muscle. And since we had our asses in a crack, self-defense or not, and considering the cops figured they could probably find two more just like us to do Hirem's work if we refused, we got picked and we accepted.

So the FBI, represented by the Mummy and the Dick Tracy villain, they said to us, and I paraphrase: You scratch our back, and we'll scratch yours. You help Hirem get his son back in one piece, save that girl, and get us the money, since it isn't exactly earned legal and it could be used by the United States government to continue the war on crime, we will wipe your slate clean. They could do that, they said. No trial, nothing. We would be helping the FBI, 'cause when Hirem got his son back, he was going to sing like a goddamn canary and we would be the recipients of all kinds of goodwill.

Course, on the record, we weren't working for anyone. If the Dixie Mafia punched our tickets, the FBI wouldn't know anything about it. If we said at any point we were working for the FBI, they would deny it. They could always find replacements for us in the wings, other fuckups they could take advantage of. They said just that.

"Yeah," Leonard told them, "but you aren't gonna find any bigger fuckups than us."

No one argued.

We could leave the offer, of course, take our chances at trial, but Flat Top said, "Might not go so good you don't help."

"Isn't that blackmail?" I said.

He said, "Uh-huh."

I looked at Drake. He looked toward the wall.

And so that was how Leonard and I had come to unofficially work for the FBI so they wouldn't have to get their hands dirty. They said if we wanted to, we could get help, but the help was in the same water we were. No one would know them and no one would protect them. It was us and our friends and whatever moxie we might have against the world, and that was it. Oh, and we did get their best wishes, and if we couldn't get the duffel bag back, they'd let that go.

24

About four a.m. I heard a car pull in the drive. I had a good idea who it was, but I wasn't taking any chances. In my pajamas and rabbit slippers, a gun in my hand, I left the bedroom. Brett was still snoring. I went downstairs with the rabbit ears flapping and found Leonard and Marvin in their shorts and T-shirts holding their shotguns.

After a few moments there was a knock on the door, and a voice said, "Ya'll about to shoot, don't. It's me, Jim Bob. I'd like to keep my good-lookin' ass intact."

Leonard opened the door. "Hell, man, knowing it's you is what gives me reason to shoot."

Jim Bob, tall and broad-shouldered, thin but not skinny, came into the house and Leonard shut the door. Jim Bob took off his gray Stetson. The hatband was a thick strip of cloth in a cheetah-skin pattern, and in the band were toothpicks and little feathers. The hat was stained in a lot of spots. Without the hat, Jim Bob looked a little off; it was like seeing a rooster remove his head. He was red-faced and his hair was short, wheat-textured and orange-colored. He had a scar on his face I didn't remember from the time before. He had on a light green snap-pocket Western shirt, blue jeans, and a pair of brown boots that looked as if most of the world had worn them for a while and then given them back. He looked at me, studied my bunny slippers. "You look like an idiot."

"Don't be jealous. I can hop real far."

Jim Bob grinned, said, "Ain't there no coffee?"

"There will be." It was Brett, at the top of the stairs. She had pulled on some men's boxer shorts under her T-shirt and she had on some flip-flops. "You loudmouthed guys don't know how to let a girl get her beauty sleep."

“Well, now,” Jim Bob said, looking up as Brett came down, her red hair tousled around her shoulders, her braless breasts bouncing pleasantly, “it’s good to see there’s still women know how to make coffee.”

“I didn’t say I was making it,” she said when she got to the bottom of the stairs. “I said there will be coffee. Right, Hap?”

“I’m on it,” I said.

“You look lovely,” Jim Bob said, flashing a grin at Brett that had probably charmed trailer-trash women from LaBorde to Memphis out of their panties and their Beanie Baby collections.

“And you are still full of shit,” Brett said.

“Yes, ma’am, I am. And you are still so lovely my back teeth hurt.”

“Just your teeth ache?” Brett said. “If that’s the case, I’m losing my touch.”

“Well,” Jim Bob said, “I was trying to be polite.”

There was the sound of another car outside, so I put down the coffee makings and went to the living room window for a look.

I peeled back the curtain and had to wipe the frosted pane clear with my arm to get a view. The rain had slacked and there was only a bit of the garage light to see by, but it was all I needed. A big black van was pulled up behind Jim Bob’s classic red Cadillac, the one he calls the Red Bitch, and when the driver got out, came around the back of Jim Bob’s ride, started for the house, it was as if the great shadow of Armageddon had fallen across the cold winter earth. He was at least six foot seven, with shoulders wide enough to make football players slash their wrists with envy. He had legs like trees and arms like smaller trees, a face that appeared to have been knocked into shape from granite and then beat on with a sledgehammer. His muscles moved under his clothes, like animals trying to escape a sack. He had long black hair tied back in a ponytail and he wore a black denim shirt, black leather jacket, black jeans, and black round-toed boots. He walked swiftly, like he was anxiously leaving a prayer meeting and was on his way to a whorehouse with a wallet full of money and a pack of rubbers.

“I hope this is Tonto,” I said. “Otherwise, I’m heading out the back door at a run."

"That must be him," Marvin said, "'cause that's the usual response. Keep in mind he's a little shy."

When we opened the door, I said, "Hello," and Tonto nodded, stood where he was for a moment, wiped his feet in a slow, methodical manner, like a trained horse trying to count for its master.

When he came in, he ducked a little to go through the door and stood in the center of the room, saw Brett, held that view for a while, then looked over at Marvin.

"You needed me?" he said to Marvin, and it was as if this big man's voice was on vacation and he had borrowed a voice from a child, soft and musical, almost feminine.

"Yeah," Marvin said.

"I pay my debts."

"I know," Marvin said.

"I never thought you'd ask."

"Never planned to."

"Then it's important."

"That's right," Marvin said. "It's important. To me."

"Tell you what," I said. "Let's have some coffee and talk about things. I don't think it's been completely explained."

"I came because Marvin asked," Tonto said. "I don't know anything. There's nothing been explained to me."

"And me," Jim Bob said. "I'm here 'cause my plastic fuck doll ran out of air. Wasn't nothing else to do."

"My guess," Brett said, "is the doll pinpricked herself and committed suicide."

"Now, honey," Jim Bob said, "that's just an ugly thing to say."

25

We pulled some kitchen chairs up and got some folding chairs out of the closet and congregated at the kitchen table with coffee and Leonard's cookies, which from the look on his face I could tell he didn't appreciate. Through the kitchen window I could see the rain had cleared and the almost pink sky with the bone-white clouds above it looked like some kind of strawberry brew topped by foam.

"Curious? We got to kill somebody?" Tonto said. "Not that I mind, but I like to know. Well, sometimes I mind. I got scruples, they're just flexible."

I thought, man, how did I arrive at this place, with a man with flexible scruples? It was bad enough I was suspicious of my own.

He took off his jacket and he had a twin pearl-handled .45 in a shoulder holster under each armpit. He was wearing a crucifix on a chain, and he pulled it out from under his shirt and let it lie on the front of the cloth in line with the buttons. Nothing says I love Jesus like a crucifix and twin .45s. He was sitting in one of the folding chairs and I feared at any moment it would wrap around his big ass and drop him to the floor.

"That's something we want to avoid," I said. "But one never knows. We're not dealing with priests here."

"So," Jim Bob said, "instead of an ass fucking from one of God's finest, we're talking about bullets."

"That would be yes," Leonard said.

I explained, mostly for Tonto, about the kids who had run off, about Hirem, how we were patsies, and how we could expect zip help from anyone outside of our little group. I told him we had no real idea where the kids were, but that we were supposed to talk to the FBI and Hirem one more time, and then the only time we were to see them or talk to them again was when the mission was over, provided we survived. All nonsurvivors could pretty much count on being buried beside the road in a shallow grave with nothing to mark their passing except a wild-flower or the droppings of the random dog or armadillo.

“And what do we get out of this?” Jim Bob said.

“Well,” I said, “me and Leonard get to not go to jail, or maybe just avoid some long, inconvenient court time. You get the pleasure of our company.”

“Doesn’t sound like much of a deal,” Jim Bob said.

“It’s not,” I said.

“Well,” Jim Bob said, “considering that we get nothing out of this, and I’m doing this just because I know you guys and sort of like you better than guys I don’t, count me in.”

I looked at Tonto.

He nodded, said in his almost sweet little voice, “I owe Marvin one.” He glanced at Marvin. “And after this, we’re through. Right?”

“Right,” Marvin said. “We’re even.”

“Everyone in?” I said, and held my hand out over the table.

“So we’re supposed to put our hand on top of yours?” Jim Bob said. “All for one, and one for all?”

“Yep,” I said.

“Too silly,” he said.

Leonard put his hand on top of mine. “I’m in.”

Brett put her hand on top of his. “Actually, I’m not going to be here, but hey, in spirit, okay?”

Marvin got up carefully from his chair with his cane and edged over and put his hand on top. “I will do what I can, all things considered. Hell, I got all of you into this, so I got to show solidarity, right?”

“Damn right,” Leonard said.

“Oh, hell,” Jim Bob said, and put his hand on top. “I always was a sucker for that musketeer jive.”

Tonto grinned. He even had big teeth. “Hell, why not.”

He put his hand on top of Jim Bob’s.

“Maybe we could have some kind of saying,” Leonard said. “You know, something that’s just for us. A slogan. A motto.”

“No,” Tonto said, removing his hand. “Maybe we won’t have that.”

“Yeah, that idea sucks,” Jim Bob said, pulling his hand back.

“Even I don’t like that,” Brett said, and picked up her coffee cup.

“Got to vote no,” Marvin said.

“Yeah, I’m out on that one too,” I said.

Leonard looked hurt. “Spoilsports.”

26

After finishing up the coffee and cookies, we had a real breakfast of eggs and toast and bacon, and Brett did the cooking; then I left with her and drove to the bus depot. It was one of the hardest things I had ever done, and I knew then—well, I had known before, but I knew all over again, down deep and tight to the bone, that I loved this woman dearly and that she was a part of me, like a heart or a liver. I had loved my first wife and she had been a shit and I had loved her anyway. Then she betrayed me, got herself killed, and nearly got me and my buddy Leonard killed. I still loved her for a year after that. But not the way I loved Brett. It's only right that when you find the one you care about that you keep that part that's you and not give it all away, but by the same token I'm old-fashioned in that I feel when you do find the right person you are part of a whole, and when the other leaves, a bit of you is no longer there. And when they leave and you think you might never see them again, it's like more than a part of you is gone. It's like being ripped in half and your half has been cast to the wind.

She was dressed in jeans and sneakers and had on a big sweater and a sweater cap that her hair stuck out from under like a flaming waterfall. The bus depot had very few people in it, and we sat down on a bench. A bus depot is one of the loneliest places in the world, and it doesn't help when the bench you're perched on is near the restrooms and they stink of recent trips, and when people walk out, the tile, dampened by urine and bad flushes, makes a sound like someone pulling duct tape off a hairy dog's ass.

We sat for a while, the sun rising higher and eating away at what was left of the darkness, and then we heard a bus come and they called it over the speaker. It was Brett's ride. I walked her out. There were others getting on, and we stepped back and let them. She had a small bag with her. It had a few clothes and her toiletries in it, a book and some magazines. She set it down by her feet like a trained pet.

“Well,” she said, “don’t get yourself killed.”

“I won’t.”

“Promise? For me?”

“Hell, I promise for me and you.”

“Cross your heart?”

“Big-time,” I said, and crossed my heart.

“Make sure Leonard doesn’t get killed either.”

“You got it.”

“I guess you can kind of watch out for Jim Bob and Tonto.”

“All right.”

“It’s hard to know about Tonto, isn’t it?”

“So far,” I said.

“He’ll always be hard to know. I can promise you that. You all have screws missing, all of you, but he’s like an empty parts house. It’s not just the screws that are gone, but all manner of stuff.”

“I think you’re right,” I said.

“Marvin, he’ll be all right at home, won’t he?”

“Sure. Wherever he ends up, he’ll be okay.”

I wasn’t sure of that, and she knew I wasn’t sure, but it was a little game we were playing. I saw a tear in her eye and I took hold of her and we held each other, and finally we kissed, and she took up her bag and gave me a smile and started to get on the bus. I patted her butt. She said, “Why, thank you.”

I laughed and she got on the bus.

I stood there until I saw her take her seat, and then I still couldn’t go, so I stood there until she turned to smile at me. She looked as if she was about to bust out crying, which was exactly how I felt. I watched until the bus started to move and she lifted a hand, and I waved back. Then with a turn of the corner and a fart of exhaust, the bus and Brett were gone, on their way out to Arizona.

* * *

It was solid daylight when I drove over to the cop shop and went inside and asked for Drake. I was lucky. He was in. The dispatcher picked up a line and Drake appeared and gave me a not-so-friendly drag of the hand, indicating I should follow him.

We went along the hall and passed the booger-lined room with the greasy mirror, turned into another room with a long table and some chairs and a counter with a pot of coffee brewing and a couple boxes of doughnuts holding court next to them.

Drake went over and picked up the pot of coffee and poured some into a Styrofoam cup, asked if I wanted any. I looked at the coffee. It was thick and very dark, like sewer sludge.

“No thanks,” I said.

Drake got a couple of doughnuts out of one of the boxes and put them on a napkin. He didn’t ask me if I wanted a doughnut. He went over to the table and set the doughnut-laden napkin on the table and set the coffee beside it, then put his ass in a chair and crossed his legs. I sat across from him.

“You know,” he said, “I’m the unluckiest man in the world. I wasn’t supposed to be working this shift. I wasn’t working it, I wouldn’t have you.”

“I don’t know,” I said. “I thought you and me, there was a kind of spark, you know.”

“No spark,” he said. “What do you want?”

“I don’t know,” I said. “These FBI guys, this all on the up-and-up?”

“What do you mean?”

“I mean, they gonna keep their part of the bargain if we help them out?”

“I assume the ‘we’ you refer to is you and Leonard, ’cause it sure isn’t me and it definitely isn’t the department. We got nothing to do with this.”

“Yeah, that’s what I mean.”

“I have no idea what they’ll do,” he said, sipping coffee, pausing to bite into a doughnut. “The FBI, they do their thing and we do ours. Unfortunately, sometimes the things clash.”

"Just like sex."

"No. There's no fun in it. Not even a little bit. All I can say is Hirem knows all manner of stuff the FBI would love to know, and it's stuff worth them knowing, but I got no love for them FBI boys. They come in here like we're dog mess on the bottom of their shoes, like they're the goddamn ghosts of J. Edgar Hoover hisself."

"If they were the ghosts of Hoover," I said, "they'd be wearing dresses."

"What?"

"He was supposed to be a transvestite. You know, transvestites put on dresses. I think he was gay too."

"I hadn't heard that."

"Oh yeah. Big-time."

"Huh? I'll be damned."

"Sorry. Didn't mean to interrupt."

"You're sure about that dresses thing?"

"That's the story. I'm not sure about anything."

"I'll be damned. Hadn't heard that."

I let him contemplate. He said, "You know, considering how Hoover was, the way these guys act, that's kind of funny."

"Yep. But about the FBI guys …"

Drake shrugged. "What I can tell you is, if they're wanting you to do something like this, it's more than an ask. It's a kind of push, and it might be a lot nastier than you think. It might be worse than a trial and a jury. But if you've come to me to know more about them, more about what they want, you're in the wrong place. I understand you defended yourself, you and Leonard and Brett. But I can't feel good about citizens doing what you done and all you get is a slap on the wrist. I don't buy you were just driving around armed to the teeth and they came out of nowhere and decided to kill you."

"It was still self-defense."

"I guess it was, but some of them were shot in the back of the head."

"They were shooting at me, and I didn't want them to get up again," I said. "Shooting them in the back of the head was a way to assure that."

"I still don't like it, and I don't like the idea of Hirem getting a light sentence by getting you guys to do something I'm pretty sure is against the law but is done in the name of the law. I know that's the game, but it's a game that stinks and I don't have to like it."

I sat there for a moment and said nothing.

"I don't know what you thought I could tell you," Drake said.

"I have no idea," I said. "I guess I was looking for some reassurance."

Drake shook his head. "Can't offer you any. You might call your mother, you want that."

"She's dead," I said.

"There you go, shit out of luck. All I know is these guys want to help Hirem's son out and get some money back, and I got no idea what you'll have to do to make that happen. I don't know what they're asking, and I don't want to know. I'm just a simple cop, one level above working parking tickets and jaywalkers. I come in here and do my job and see some nasty stuff I'd rather not see, then I got to go home to the family and act like it don't bother me and that I didn't bring it home with me. Like there's nothing more I'd like to do than have a picnic or go to a movie. But all the time I'm thinking about murders and dope deals and some penny-ante shit too, and I can't ever let it go. Not really. I'm making love to the wife, I remember having to deal with some rape, or a rape and murder, and that doesn't exactly make me hard as the Rock of Gibraltar, and then I got to fake an orgasm and act like things are cool. 'Cause I tell her what's on my mind, that's worse. We aren't exactly Houston here, but we got our crime and it's a lot more consistent than you think, and there's plenty for me to handle without having to think about you and the FBI. So, again, for you, I got nothing. Not even a doughnut, so quit eyeing them. About all I can give you, and I do it reluctantly, is my most sincere heartfelt go fuck yourself. I got absolutely no sympathy for you or Leonard. You're always into something, and I'm sick of it. Around here, they call you the Disaster Twins, and the way I look at it, you keep coming up with crap on your shoes it's because you keep steppin' where you ought to not be steppin'. I don't care if down deep in your hearts you have good intentions and you're after the same bad guys I'm after. It is not your job, and I don't give a damn if you and Leonard are fucking Francis of Assisi in your souls, I am goddamn sick of all of it."

I sat for a moment not saying anything. Drake gnawed at a doughnut like he was biting my throat out.

"Well," I said, "I'm glad we had this time together, and thanks for nothing." I got up and went out.

27

Tonto's black van was nicer inside than it looked on the outside and it was very large and souped up under the hood and had big wide tires with tread deep enough to lose a quarter in. I wasn't one of those guys who could talk about cars or fix them up or identify everything on the road. I had always been practical about cars. I wanted them to start and drive me around, get me where I was going and start up when I left. It was considered a Southern failing not to know this kind of thing, the insides of cars, all their clicks and sparks and little growls. All the men I knew who were car buffs, and that was most, looked at me as if not knowing about cars was the equal to not knowing about sunrise and sunset. So when Tonto told me about his van and what it had under the hood and what it could do, I forgot it faster than I forgot the combination to my old high school locker. But I remember this: Tonto claimed his van could run a Corvette down and bitch-slap it, which seemed a little much to me, but it did hum down the road with a sound like a hive of bees. The scenery tossed past us in a blur and we zipped past cars like they were nailed down. I had to admit it was some machine. In that van I felt like one of the Scooby Doo gang. I was probably Scooby himself. A big dumb dog without a dick.

The van had three rows of really comfortable seats and a place in the back to put some luggage and gear, and under the floor carpets and beneath sliding floorboards were secret compartments where we put our weapons, except for the ones we were carrying, which in my and Leonard's case was nothing more than a pocketknife (me) and a pack of gum (Leonard) and we both had combs. Mine was green, Leonard's was black. Tonto still had his good-buddy .45s under his armpits, and Jim Bob had a snub-nosed .38 holstered at the small of his back and a clasp knife clipped inside his front pocket and a nut sack packed tight with testosterone.

Marvin had stayed at my house with a shotgun and a cup of coffee. His job was to watch the home front, keep close to the phone in case we needed something he could provide. We gave him directions to where we were going to meet up with the FBI and Hirem, and from there our plan was to keep him informed as we went, because we didn't know what our plan really was, not yet. With Marvin at the house, we always had a home base. It was a good idea, I thought, and a way to keep him a part of things since he couldn't do much else with that bum leg.

The day was clear and cold and the sky had turned a bright polished blue and the sun was a yellow blaze hanging at the ten o'clock position. I was sitting in the passenger seat, Tonto drove, behind me was Jim Bob, and next to him was Leonard. Tonto had a CD cranked up, and we listened to Jerry Lee Lewis's greatest hits as he tooled us along, nodding his head to the music like a bobblehead doll.

When the CD played out, and before he could put in another, I said to Tonto, "That your real name?"

He didn't turn to look at me, said, "Nope."

"Guess you don't want to talk about it."

"Nope."

"Hokeydoke."

I leaned back in the seat and Jim Bob said, "Hap, I had a woman like the one you got, I'd just go to court and take the jail time. You could get your ass killed, and what for?"

"I could ask you a similar question. You could get your ass killed and your hog farm would go to hell," I said.

"Sold all the hogs, and they wouldn't hold a candle to Brett."

"Okay, we agree on that. Brett is better than hogs, and you could get yourself killed easy as any of us."

"Yeah, you're right about that, though I always assume I'm going to come out on top and it's the other guy who'll wind up with the stick in his ass. But you know, lately I'm starting to think maybe it could go the other way. It's a new kind of feeling and I'm not too fond of it. I never feel like I really belong anywhere. I think a lot about a line in a Frank O'Hara poem that goes 'I'm always tying up and then deciding to depart.' Story of my life."

“You read poetry?” Leonard said.

“Just when I’m tired of masturbating,” Jim Bob said. “My reading poetry shock you?”

“That you can read shocks me,” Leonard said.

“So, if you can read and have a way to while away the hours, why are you doing this?” I asked.

“We got a kind of connection,” Jim Bob said. “We’re part of a rare kind of club.”

“That right?”

“Yeah,” Jim Bob said. “It’s made up of guys who think the world ought to work smooth and people ought to treat each other right, and when they don’t we go out there and try and fix things and every time we do, we change us into them, and yet we keep hoping and we keep trying and maybe one day we’ll realize we’ll never get it right and we’ll just give in. I don’t know. I sound like a tired philosopher.”

“You sound like I feel,” Tonto said.

“I think you’re reading your books backwards,” Leonard said.

“Again, why are you doing it then?” I asked.

“There aren’t many of us left, Hap, and I’m trying to keep you from becoming totally one of us by taking in the slack I don’t want you to handle. It’s not my job and it shouldn’t matter, but Leonard here, he can’t do it alone. You aren’t a delicate flower, my man, but there’s still something of the hopeful in you and I’d hate to see all of that get sucked out. Probably too late for the rest of us.”

“You don’t know me,” Tonto said.

“Oh, yes I do,” Jim Bob said.

Tonto didn’t argue back. Jim Bob said, “Hap, you ought to be a social worker, not a tough guy. You’re tough enough, but your heart isn’t in it. Soiled as you are, underneath the dirt there’s pretty good linen.”

“I keep telling him that,” Leonard said. “That he’s soiled, I mean. I don’t know about the linen part.”

“And you,” Jim Bob said to Leonard. “Shouldn’t you be home too? Ain’t you got you a boyfriend? You’re a little farther gone on the scale, but at least you've got some sense of normalcy going on, got a relationship going."

Leonard sighed. "Actually, it's on the fence."

"That's a shame."

"Why do you really do it?" I said to Jim Bob. "I think you're dodging the question."

"Man, this is like getting in touch with our feelings, isn't it?" Jim Bob said. "I told you why."

"It isn't about me, and you know it," I said. "I see you only now and then. What about the rest of the time? Why do you damn near get yourself killed on a regular basis? Private gun for hire, that kind of thing. Let's expand that question beyond you, my good man. What the fuck is wrong with all of us? And it's got to be more than just wanting to set the world right."

"Too many cowboy movies," Leonard said.

"All right," Jim Bob said. "Here it is. I do it because if I don't I've got nothing but myself, and though I dearly love myself, I'm a little tired of being me right now. Sometimes I feel like I'm laughing in the dark all by my goddamn self, because I am, and what I got to show for it is a paid-off house with no one in it, not even a dog, because I'm gone too much and when I'm gone I can't see a whole lot of reason to race back. I had a woman like you got, Hap, I'd hold on to her until the crack of goddamn doom. Can you understand that?"

"I wish life was that simple," I said.

"I'd just like to come home and have John there," Leonard said. The words sprang from his mouth like an escaped prisoner.

"You've talked to him?" Jim Bob said, pushing his hat back on his head.

"I've tried."

"Leonard's idea of talking," I said, "is telling people how it is. Not the same thing as a true discussion. The signal of his love for John was that he climbed up in the bed and shit in it."

"Yuck," Jim Bob said. "I wouldn't like that."

"Yeah, he took it hard," Leonard said. "I'm just not a talker about some things, you know. Not like you share-your-feelings guys.”

“So you go straight to shitting in the bed?” Jim Bob said.

“It’s a statement,” Leonard said. “And I’ll have you know, at the bottom of it all I’m a sensitive motherfucker.”

Tonto, who had been listening quietly, watching the road, said, “Hey, Leonard, were you saying you’re queer?”

“The queerest,” Leonard said. “You got a problem with that?”

“Where’s the dick go?”

“Anywhere I can put it.”

“Oh,” Tonto said. “No problem. Just curious. Hap, you’re pussy-whipped.”

“I know.”

“That’s all right,” Tonto said, his voice growing higher than before. “I wish I was pussy-whipped. What about you, Jim Bob?”

“Well, currently, I don’t have a pussy in this fight.”

“You know,” Tonto said, “I think we are bonding like some righteous cocksuckers, don’t you?”

“I assume,” said Leonard, “that you are speaking symbolically because to the best of my knowledge I am the only cocksucker present.”

“Righteous sonsabitches then,” Tonto said.

28

We bonded righteous sonsabitches stopped at a McDonald’s on the other side of Tyler about two hours later. We went in and got some drinks and Tonto got a couple of burgers and then he gave me the keys to the van.

“Something happens to us,” I said, “you may be a long time with Ronald McDonald.”

“This one still has a playground,” Jim Bob said, as he and Tonto took a seat in one of the plastic booths.

“Well, in that case,” I said, “you boys play pretty.”

*

I drove Leonard and myself over to our meeting place with the FBI. They didn’t know about Jim Bob and Tonto, which was all right. We had agreed to do what they wanted, try to find those kids and get the money back so Hirem would tell all he knew about the Dixie Mafia organization, but we hadn’t said how we were going to do what we had agreed to do and we hadn’t said with whom.

The FBI guys gave us directions to a house at Lake Tyler where they said they were keeping Hirem secluded like a rare animal on the endangered species list. Before we went out there we drove to a place nearby and stopped and used a screwdriver Tonto had given us to take off the plates and put on some others that I think he had had made special. It was a precaution. We didn’t want them to know where we got the van or who it belonged to, so if they ran the plates, they’d come up belonging to someone Tonto made up.

Finished with the plates, we got in and drove. It had turned windy and the blue had gone out of the sky because gray clouds had come in, hiding the sun. The lake house wasn’t on the good side of the lake where there were fine homes and the grass was always freshly mown and there were nice boats docked up close to shore. It was down a precarious red clay road with ruts deeper than the ass crack of time, and the road just kept winding around the evergreens and barren oaks until it died out near the lake. Then you had to park and get out and walk across a messy clay clearing toward a cabin nestled near some pines and beneath a couple of massive cyprus trees from which moss draped like feather boas. The wind whipped the boas and it whipped at us.

It wasn't much of a cabin. Pretty small and made of logs. The logs had been treated poorly and they were starting to rot, and the cabin leaned downhill toward the lake, which was visible like a blue patch through the boughs of the trees and the mossy boas. The porch was caved in near the steps and there was a window missing and a slab of Sheetrock had been nailed over it from the inside and the Sheetrock was obviously damp and all it would take to knock it loose was a strong cough or foul language.

When we were close up on the cabin I stopped and hollered out, "Hello, the house."

Some time passed and then the door cracked and I heard Tenson's voice call out, "Come on up, but you got guns, you need to lose them."

We had already left them in the van, under the floorboards, so we walked straight to the cabin, wiped the caked clay off our shoes on a stone near the steps, and went inside. Soon as we did I saw Hirem sitting in a rickety chair at a card table, and then I saw Tenson standing in the corner with his gun drawn, dangling by his side. Hirem had lost the suit. He had on casual clothes and a light jacket. Tenson was wearing a dark shirt and jeans and sneakers.

The Mummy was still well wrapped and he stood in a spot on the other side of the room without his gun drawn. There was a humming sound in the room, and it came from small rectangular plug-in heaters on either side of the place. The coils in the heaters glowed red and there was just enough heat to make you glad you were inside instead of out.

The Mummy came over and told us to turn around and put our hands on the wall and spread our legs. We did. Leonard turned his head and looked at the Mummy, said, “You are so butch.”

“Fuck you,” the Mummy said.

“See,” Leonard said. “Told you.”

The Mummy patted us down and took away our combs and my pocketknife and Leonard’s gum.

Tenson said, “All right, relax.”

“We want our combs and I want my pocketknife back,” I said.

“Don’t forget the gum,” Leonard said.

The Mummy gave them back. There were only three chairs. Hirem was in one and the Mummy and Tenson occupied the other two. That left us leaning our backs against the wall. Tenson never put his gun up. He sat with it on his knee.

Leonard looked at the Mummy, said, “How long you got to wear that getup?”

“Too long,” the Mummy said. “I wasn’t even one of them, you dumb ass.”

“How was I to know?” Leonard said. “Wrong place, wrong time, both of us.”

The Mummy didn’t look appeased, or so I thought. Actually, you couldn’t tell much about how he looked. You mostly got what you got from him in the way he moved his eyes or his busted mouth, the way he shrugged his shoulders.

“Hirem here,” Tenson said, waving the gun like a pointer, “he’s got something to tell you, maybe will lead to his boy, but he’s not telling us. He tells you, you take the lead and go after the boy and his poke and bring the money back. FBI gets the drug money, Hirem gets his kid back, the girl doesn’t get shot, and Hirem tells us what he knows and we make all kinds of arrests and you guys go free, no trial, and everyone’s happy, or mostly. You following this scenario?”

“A few dance numbers might liven it up,” I said, “but for the most part, we’re following.”

“Now,” Tenson said, “here’s what we do. You two go outside with Hirem, and we’re gonna stand on the porch so we can see you, and you’re going to walk out a ways and Hirem is going to tell you something he won’t tell us, and that’s okay. That’s how he wants it and we can live with that. We'll get our results. You hear what I'm saying?"

We nodded, Hirem pulled a heavy coat over his lighter one, and we went outside, across the porch and down a little trail that led into the woods. The wind was picking up and it was carrying a lot more cold with it now, and it hit us like ice picks. I tugged the collar up on my coat and put my hands in my pockets as I walked.

After we were out a ways, Hirem said, "I got to see you guys are wearing a wire or not."

"You saw him pat us down," I said.

"Wearing a wire for them," he said. "They could pat you down all they liked and not find it."

"All right," I said and we stopped walking and I held up my arms. Hirem patted me down, then did the same to Leonard.

"Good," he said. "Now, let's walk a bit more."

29

As we started to walk, Tenson yelled from the porch, “Don’t go too far. We start to worry you aren’t so we can see you, Hirem. And you don’t want us worried, do you?”

Hirem didn’t answer, but he turned to us, said, “They know I’m not going anywhere. I want my boy back and I’ll do what I got to do until that’s done. They just like to harass me. Hell, I came to them, wasn’t like they brought me in. They been trying to nail my ass for years. I finally had to hold the nail for them.”

“You got some idea how to find your son,” I said, “but you’re telling us, not the FBI?”

“That’s right,” Hirem said. “I don’t trust those guys. I don’t trust the law. I don’t trust my mother-in-law all that much, and she’s dead some ten years now.”

“But you trust us?” Leonard said. “Didn’t you send those bozos to kill us?”

“It was business, but I can tell about you guys, and I can trust you.”

“Say you can?” I said.

“I think I can. You’re like the old guys in the organization, you got a sense of honor.”

I didn’t believe the organization, as Hirem referred to it, ever had a sense of honor, but I listened.

“Bottom line is I like you better than them,” he said. “Let’s put it that way and call it close enough. What I think is I’m gonna get a better shot with you than them.”

“You’re the one gonna sing to them,” Leonard said. “You’re gonna tell them everything, so why not tell them this?”

“Get my kid back safe, I’ll tell them whatever they want to know. After that, it don’t matter for me. I should’ve been a barber. My daddy was a barber and he offered me into the business, but I didn't take it."

"There's still time to hone up your skills," I said. "But you do, you'll be giving prison haircuts."

"Listen now," Hirem said. "I'm gonna tell you guys some things I need you to know, so you got some idea who might get in your way."

"Sort of figured this might not just be a bring the kid home kind of thing," Leonard said. "It never is."

"What I know some others can figure out," Hirem said, "and the people I worked for, they can figure better sometimes than the FBI. These feds may have our phones tapped, and they may have all kinds of law on their side, but these guys I work for, they been around awhile now, and they got people more expendable than the feds got. You hear me?"

"We're all ears," I said.

"First and foremost, get my boy back."

"And the girl?" I said.

"She ain't nothing to me," Hirem said. "But it makes Tim feel all right to have her around, I can get over her being coated in chocolate."

"So that's what this is," Leonard said, holding out his hands, looking astonished. "I just thought I was dirty, and it's been chocolate all the while."

"Not now, Leonard," I said.

"Ain't got nothing against your people," Hirem said, looking at Leonard. "Just never figured I'd have a boy fuckin' one of them."

"Now that makes me really feel tight with you," Leonard said.

"I'm not used to all the changes in things," Hirem said.

"Civil rights happened … let me see," Leonard said, "about mid-sixties, right? And the Civil War, it was over some one hundred years before that. Good to see you're catching up."

"My boy never did cotton to what I do, the way I think. And maybe that's good. I'm not so sure about things I was sure about just a few months ago."

"Death threats and prison terms can change a man's perspective," I said. "We know."

Hirem nodded. "Thing is, I don't really know where my boy is, but I have a maybe. He was a little kid, we were close. His mother was dead and it was just me and some hired help. We had a place we went to, rented a cabin by the lake and fished. He mentioned it from time to time, though we quit going there some years ago. It had good memories for him, back when he thought I was just a businessman and his daddy. We went there and fished and talked, and from the way he talked, I knew then he wasn't like me, that there was something different about him. I'd had any sense I'd have gotten out of the business and gone into the barbering."

"Shoulda, coulda, woulda," Leonard said. "Ain't nothing in that story matter to me except where you think he is. I want to get this done and go home."

"You'll keep him from being hurt?" Hirem said. "He's only nineteen."

"That's the plan," I said. "We'll do everything in our power to make sure he is protected. We'll protect the girl too."

"She's your choice," Hirem said. "Something happens to him, you got to make sure whoever did it gets theirs."

"That's not our business," I said. "Not part of our agreement."

"All right," Hirem said. "Just protect him if you find him. Place we used to go, place I think he may have went because I noticed a couple of his rods and reels were gone—I don't think he understands the deep doo-doo he's in. Him and that girl, they don't got a clue. They've run off with dirty money and they took some fishing poles with them."

"I'm sure they don't know what they're into," I said. "I'm beginning to suspect that neither do we. Where's the place, Hirem?"

"Lake O' the Pines. There's a series of cabins up there, fella named Bill Jordan rents them, or used to. They're on the east side of the lake. Ain't much. And there's no guarantee my boy's there, but he might be. He's not there, maybe I can think of something else. But right now that's all I got."

"That's it?" Leonard said. "Man, you got a con on these feds, don't you?"

"Not if he's there," Hirem said. "He is, it's no con."

"Guess that'll have to do," I said.

"Let me give you a word to the wise," Hirem said. "The organization has done had me try and hit you guys, and you're harder to kill than anyone would have thought. But they got other people. They may send some of the regular toughs one more time, some tougher and smarter than Tanedrue. Couple of those boys with Tanedrue, they were real professionals, and you handed them their asses, so they'll be more careful next time. They might just pass GO and jump to the big time."

"Big time?" Leonard said.

Hirem nodded. "That's right. They got people don't work for them directly. Freelancers. Hitters. And they're a whole 'nuther ball game, fellas. These people they hire, one or two in particular, bad sonsabitches. There's no one quite like them. They're like those, whatchacallits, the Jap guys in black."

"Ninjas," I said.

"I know, sounds like some kind of movie, but they're for real. I know their work, but I don't know them, and I don't know anyone that's ever seen them. They get a call through some kind of contact, the job gets done, and they get paid. So keep your eyes peeled and your ears open."

"I got a question," I said. "Conners, the cop. He have anything to do with the hit?"

"Conners helped put it together," Hirem said. "He didn't like the way you talked to him, Hap. He thought he'd go over there and show his big ass and that would be enough. You'd start some kind of payment plan on the dope you flushed. Or go to work for them, something like that. When you didn't, well, he came to me. And I've told you how it is these days with the upper management. They ain't much on compromise or negotiation. It's all about respect. They learned that in prison. You don't get respect there, you either wind up with a shank in your gut or a dick in your ass. They come out of prison, they're still the same. And you two, you disrespected them big-time by beating up their hired help. But Conners—he has to get permission, but he's the contact for the hits. He knows all the hitters, and the management likes it that way. Something comes to him direct instead of them, that's all right with them. It's more distance from the deed, and as long as things get done, they're happy. And now you've killed off some of their help. It's not that they care about them, it's that they don't like that disrespect part, the loss of that dope money, and they can't have you two dropping their soldiers like cigarette butts."

That must have reminded him, because he reached inside his coat pocket and found a pack of cigarettes and put one in his mouth. He patted around on his pockets for a moment, said, "Goddamn it, they took away my lighter. You guys got anything?"

We shook our heads.

I said, "Your kid. What was he driving?"

"He took my Escalade. It's black."

"Anything else?" Leonard said.

"Guess not," Hirem said.

Hirem put the cigarette pack back in his pocket but kept the cigarette in his mouth. He wagged it in his lips when he said, "I just got one thing for you. A bit of fatherly advice from a fella tried to have you killed. You guys are pretty confident guys. You think you got the world by the tail, even if you're just day laborers with an attitude. And you may be tough as you think you are, hard to kill. Like a cockroach you can't step on right, keeps running out from under your shoe. But remember, now and again even cockroaches get crunched."

30

After we walked Hirem up to the cabin, the Mummy came out with us. He walked us to our van. I kept expecting a scarab beetle to come out from under his bandages. He said, “It would be a lot easier you just told us what he had to say right now.”

“It would be for you,” I said.

“For you too. Your job would be done. We’d go get the boy and the girl and the money, and everyone would be happy.”

“We kind of gave our word,” I said.

“To him?”

“That’s who we were talking to,” Leonard said.

“You’re yankin’ me?”

“I don’t think so,” Leonard said.

“You gave your word to a guy tried to kill you, and you won’t tell the FBI what he said?”

“That’s pretty much it,” Leonard said. “Hey, remember back at the cop shop? He said it wasn’t personal, so why should we be mad?”

The Mummy shook his head. “I don’t get you guys. We’re doing you the favor. We could call this whole thing off right now, have you locked up. Might even take Hirem out back and see what he thinks about having his ass kicked until he talks.”

“He won’t talk and you know it,” I said. “Otherwise, you’d have already done it. And you do that, find the kid, you won’t get all the other information you want to get out of him. All the inner clock workings of the Dixie Mafia.”

The Mummy looked at us. His eyes peeking out of the mask were dark and narrow, his lips had turned beet red from the cold. It made him look pretty damn creepy. “You go get that boy and girl and that goddamn money and you go get it quick.”

“Gee,” Leonard said, “can we stop for dinner, take a pee?”

“You do what you got to do,” the Mummy said. “But you make it quick as you can. Today would be good.”

“It might take a few days,” I said. “I don’t know exactly. Things may not fall in line just the way we like it.”

“I can tell you this,” the Mummy said. “We’re tired of hanging out in this shit hole. We want to go home, be warm, not have to hang around with Hirem. You hear me?”

“If you’ll reinforce your words with sign language,” Leonard said, “we might get a clear message.”

The Mummy shot Leonard the finger.

“There,” Leonard said. “I understand that. See, I get you now.”

“Make it quick,” the Mummy said and walked back toward the cabin.

◆

In the van, driving away, I said, “From one cockroach to another, I don’t think the Mummy likes you very much.”

“I think it’s because I beat his ass.”

“Think?” I said.

“Uh-huh. You know, odd how the Mummy and his buddy think we ought to believe them just because they’re from the government.”

“It’s like religion,” I said. “You accept it on faith.”

“Well, that’s stupid.”

“I said it was like religion, didn’t I?”

“Oh yeah, so you did. What you think about that Conners guy?”

“I think he doesn’t get out of this business unscathed,” I said.

Leonard nodded. “I was thinking pretty much the same thing, and I’ve put him on the list.”

“Okay, but put a couple of stars by his name,” I said.

31

Hadn’t gone far before we stopped and switched the license plates, hid the ones we had used under the floorboards again, then drove back to McDonald’s. When we came in, the table where Jim Bob and Tonto were sitting was piled high with food bags and drink cups.

“So,” Jim Bob said, “you’re back and hopefully without bullet holes or the clap.”

“Yep,” I said.

We ordered some food for ourselves, then slid into the booth and told them what we had been told.

Tonto said, “That’s pretty thin, that the kid went fishing some spot where he went when he was little. That’s damn thin.”

“He took fishing rods,” I said.

“That makes it absolute,” Tonto said. “Why didn’t you say that in the first place? You know, he could be jackin’ with the old man, ’cause he thought Dad would come after him because of the girl, and of course the money, and maybe he’s just wanting the old man to show him how much he cares.”

“He’s nineteen,” I said, “and I don’t think he’s that smart. Anyone who would steal that much money from a bunch of cutthroats and know they’re cutthroats can’t be all that bright.”

“Naive, anyway,” Leonard said.

“My goodness,” Jim Bob said. “Was that a positive comment on a member of the human race? What in the world have you been drinking, Leonard?”

“Yeah, you’re right,” Leonard said. “That was oddly optimistic. I’m giving up Dr Pep … I’m giving up Diet Coke as of this moment.”

“You don’t drink Diet Coke,” I said.

“See how it’s working?” Leonard said.

I said, “Thing is, it’s what we got, and the way I figure it, Hirem knows his son, or at least thinks he does. Most sons in one way or another want to please their fathers, or at least capture some good moment in time they had with them.”

“Speaking from experience?” Jim Bob said.

“Yeah,” I said. “I am.”

“I don’t have those feelings,” Tonto said. “If I went somewhere and was waiting on my father to find me, waiting on him to care or even miss me, I’d have been waiting one long goddamn time.”

“You’re the one said that might be what he’s doing,” Jim Bob said. “So maybe you know more about this kind of thing than you think.”

“Maybe,” Tonto said. “Guess I’m not all that big on parents of any stripe.”

“It’s not always that way,” Jim Bob said. “There are even parents who like their kids. Mine liked me, in spite of myself.”

“Way I look at it, between the pussy and the asshole is no-man’ s-land,” Tonto said. “You either come out a baby or a turd, and I think I came out of the wrong hole. Nobody much cared I was around.”

“Who lives in No Man’s Land?” Leonard said.

“I’m uncertain,” Tonto said. “It wasn’t a very good example.”

“All right,” I said, “all turds aside, here it is again. It’s what we got, and that’s why we check it out. They’re there, we bring them home if we have to tie them up and toss them in the back of the van. Or at least the boy, and more importantly, the money. I think they get the money back, lots of feelings are gonna be less hurt.”

“I been thinking about that,” Tonto said, sipping a soft drink through a straw, then pausing as if he were seeing something far away. “What say we find the money and split it and go home?”

“That wouldn’t help mine and Leonard’s situation any.”

“No,” Tonto said, “it wouldn’t. But it would help our billfolds big-time. Split four ways, that’s not so bad. And there’s also this: the boy and the girl, they could end up dead. They end up that way and no one knows me and Jim Bob was in with you, we can just say, hey, the bad guys, they got there first and all the money was gone. They must have got it back."

"That still wouldn't help us," I said, "and I wouldn't do that. You don't know me, Tonto, but I wouldn't do that. Neither would Leonard."

"Absolutely not," Leonard said.

"I know that," Tonto said. "Hell, I know that, but it's something I could do, and I had to try it out, see how it fit."

"It doesn't fit," I said.

"I wouldn't do that either," Jim Bob said. "Maybe we aren't exactly on the same team after all, and we are not self-righteous cocksuckers together."

"That was changed to sonsabitches," Leonard said. "Remember, we established that."

"In fact we did," Jim Bob said.

"I'm not as pure as you guys," Tonto said. "I'm here because I owe Marvin Hanson a favor."

"Doing it that way wouldn't be much of a favor," I said.

"No," Tonto said, "it wouldn't. Forget I brought it up."

32

Doing something like we were doing can make a man paranoid. I thought I saw the same car two or three times that day, and wondered if it had followed us out of LaBorde, wondered if it had followed us to the McDonald's, and then followed Leonard and me on out to the cabin in the woods and back again. I thought about that a lot, then decided I was starting to see things. The car was an old brown Ford, and I had seen a lot of them that day, and when I finally started noticing the drivers, I realized they were all different, and the Fords were all over the place, and that was a popular color that year for that make and model.

When I told the boys about it, Tonto said, "I been followed by the best, and I always knew they were there. I been watchin' too, and I've seen some brown Fords. I've also seen some green Chevys and all manner of cars, but I haven't seen anyone I thought was following us."

"You ever been wrong about being followed?" I asked.

"Not yet," Tonto said.

"Could there be a first time?"

"Unlikely," he said.

"I ain't someone easily followed either," Jim Bob said, "but then again, I haven't been paying any attention."

"Then you can be easily followed," I said.

"Not when I don't want to be. Being followed wasn't something I expected or was looking out for. I was too busy daydreaming about what I'm gonna be when I grow up, and I was countin' on your guys. If we're being followed, then you sonofabitches have let me down."

"Whatever it is you're gonna be when you grow up," Leonard said, "I hope it pays better than this."

“Me too,” Jim Bob said.

◆

When we neared Lake O’ the Pines, I convinced the others we ought to pull in somewhere for the night and get some rest and make sure we weren’t being followed, make sure it was just my paranoia, and that tomorrow we could check out the cabins by the lake.

Just outside Lake O’ the Pines the woods grew thicker and we could see dark water between the trees and on the water were spots that looked like blue oil slicks and the sun made parts of it shine like a mirror. In the woods were lots of vines and moss, and they were twisted up thick as Brer Rabbit’s briar patch, and in some spots the water had run out of the woods and onto the road and we had to splash our tires through it. We found some old-fashioned cabins not far from a dark patch of deep woods and a big worn-out peeling sign with a fat preacher on it holding a Bible and pointing his finger in the air. The sign said: JESUS IS COMING. I thought he ought to hurry some, because it had already been over two thousand years.

The place we came to is called a motel these days, but once upon a time they were called tourist courts, and the original ones, of which this was a survivor, were small and simple and close together. This one was a row of brown-red buildings that were starting to strip paint and shed shingles.

Leonard and I rented a room from a guy that seemed surprised to see us, or most anyone for that matter. He was a bald little guy seated on a tall stool behind a counter, and there was a little brown and white dog sitting on the floor by the stool. The bald guy looked us in the eye and the dog looked up at us, its mouth wadded up, as if it was angry or missing teeth.

Tonto and Jim Bob rented a room too, all of it paid for with Marvin’s money. He had given us a thousand dollars, and anything over that Leonard and I had vowed to pay, which meant we were trying to keep it cheap and keep it real.

The tourist court was cheap and the rooms were small. There were two narrow beds with worn bedcovers and a desk with a mirror and two chairs and a little TV on a wall mount. It didn’t have a remote so you had to change channels by hand and all it got was three stations and some static. There was dust on the windowsills and the tub in the bathroom had a creaky-looking shower; there was a rim around the drain in the tub that was either rust or dried blood from when the last depressed occupant had slashed their wrists. Home Sweet Home.

The room Tonto and Jim Bob got was next door to us and it was the same as ours, except they had a microwave that didn't work and the inside of it housed the remains of an exploded burrito. We visited with them briefly and left.

In our room I peeled back the dusty curtains and looked out the window to see if I saw a brown Ford, but I didn't see one. I watched the old cracked highway from the window for a while. A lot of cars went by. Some were Fords, but none of them were brown.

"Hap," Leonard called from the bathroom, "will you come hold my dick while I pee?"

"Go to hell, Leonard."

"Will you wipe my ass? I'm tired."

"Fuck off."

"I'm gonna shower. Will you come wash my back?"

"Die," I said.

I kept looking out the window all the while the shower was running, and I kept getting the same non-results. I gave it up and sat on the bed and got the paperback Western novel out of my bag and put one of my guns next to me and read for a while. When Leonard finished his shower, I took one. There was no soap and no shampoo and the water was almost hot.

* * *

We dressed and joined up with our pals next door, and with directions from the bald guy behind the tourist court counter, we drove a few miles to a small town and a little cafe that was doing brisk business. The waitress was slightly overweight but cute. She walked like she had just had horseshoes removed. She gave us a booth with a table that was still sticky from having just been wiped. We sat with our hands in our laps while it dried, waiting on the menus she forgot to give us.

When the menus came we studied them and got coffee first. I said, “Way I figure it, instead of a whole pack of us going to look at the cabins where Hirem said his son was, me and Leonard will go, and call you when we need you.”

“You need us,” Tonto said, “you won’t have time to call.”

“If you’re right,” I said, “and no one’s following us, we’ll be fine because we’re not up against anything but two kids and some fishing rods and about three hundred thousand dollars, minus pay for some gas and a meal or two.”

“I could be wrong, though,” Tonto said. “Been having a feeling things aren’t right.”

“What’s it based on?” Jim Bob said.

“My gut,” Tonto said.

“I don’t believe in that sort of thing,” Jim Bob said. “I believe you feel that way, it’s because you’ve noticed something, something that hasn’t registered consciously but it’s there. Something has struck you. Seen something, thought someone didn’t look right. It may have been on some deeper level, but you know something because there’s something to know—or you’re just fucking paranoid.”

“That’s a lot of somethings,” Tonto said.

“Doing this kind of work can make you paranoid,” I said.

“I believe in premonitions,” Tonto said, “and I believe in my gut. My gut’s telling me this isn’t going to be a cakewalk, and that it’s going to turn ugly, and that we’re already into it and we don’t know it yet.”

“My brown Ford,” I said.

“Haven’t seen any brown Ford,” Tonto said. “I tell you simple, it’s my gut telling me things.”

“Right now,” Leonard said, “my gut is telling me I’m going to order some fried chicken and some mashed potatoes with gravy, and maybe afterward, a slice of some kind of pie. And then, if I’m feeling really rowdy, I might wipe my hands on my pants.”

“You are such a tough guy,” I said.

“And don’t you forget it.”

33

On the way back to the tourist courts, Tonto stopped and got a six-pack of beer and Jim Bob bought some Jack Daniel's. Leonard bought a bottle of malt liquor, to keep up stereotypes, he said, and I bought a six-pack of Diet Coke and a peanut pattie, also to keep up stereotypes. I almost got an RC to go with it. That would have been even more perfect. Maybe a couple of MoonPies too.

In Tonto and Jim Bob's room, we all drank our poison and talked. After three beers, Tonto began to talk. It just sort of flowed out of him like sweet maple sap in the springtime.

"You know, I grew up in Louisiana, not really all that far from here," he said.

"No shit?" Jim Bob said.

"No shit," Tonto said. "My dad, he worked offshore on an oil rig, and one time there was a big storm. They say it was so big the waves climbed up high enough to look like the walls of the world. That's what the survivors said. See, they were supposed to have a helicopter fly them out, 'cause they got word of the storm, but the helicopter got delayed, and then when it finally got out to the rig, the storm was swirling up the sea and swallowing up that big rig like it was made of pipe cleaners and a whore's best wishes. My dad, he went down with all that steel. They never found his body, so I guess it's still down there, or is all ate up from the fishes and such. I think about him nonetheless, and here's the thing. I didn't even like him.

"When he wasn't beating me he was calling me stupid, and this went along with what they called me at school, and that's where they started calling me Tonto, on account of I look like I'm an Indian."

"You're not?" Leonard said.

"Nope. Greek. Full-blood. But they called me that so much I started going by it. Got so it didn't hurt if it was my name. See what I'm saying? You can't call me a thing and make it bad if that's the name I got. So, in time, that's what everyone knew me by, and soon enough my real name was forgotten. I even almost forgot. My dad was dead, that left me with my stepmom and some nuns at school, and I want to tell you now, I got the Lord beat into me and he's in my skin and in my blood and down in my bones. I love the Lord and I disobey him every day. My stepmother, she was lonely like, and I was a pretty big boy, and pretty soon she's greasing my weasel, and my little brother finds out, and then it gets around to the nuns at school, because my brother, Jimmy, he's jealous, 'cause my stepmom, Trish, she's a looker, and he's wanting to get him some of that too. She was that kind of woman, went around the house half naked. She was askin' for it, and I gave her what she was askin', and at the time it seemed like pretty good stuff. Now, all these years later, I feel dirty about the whole thing, but you see, it was like I was fucking what my father fucked, and I was showing him, even if the old bastard was turning round and round at the bottom of the sea. Showing him I could take his piece of tail and be as good or better than him. That fucking asshole beat me with a big leather belt that he kept hung on a nail by the door. He hit us, me and my little brother, with it so much that when it was laid across the nail it hung flat. It was damn near worn out from slapping ass.

"When I got into Trish I told myself I was a man from then on and wasn't nobody going to use a belt on me. No one was going to lay a hand on me. And then one morning I got up and she was gone and I never saw her again. I took to doing push-ups, by the hours. I got so I could do hundreds, and I got stronger and I grew bigger, able to bend a tire iron over my thigh. You don't believe that, I can show you."

"I'll take you at your word," Jim Bob said.

"Not me," Leonard said. "I want to see it."

"Later," Tonto said, and took a deep drink of beer and crushed the can. "One day my brother, Jimmy, he run off because the nuns were rapping his knuckles and a whole bunch of people at school were calling him names, and like I said, it was known at school about me and Trish, and I was getting called stuff too. Guess Jimmy couldn't take it no more. I never did see Jimmy again, at least I don't know for a fact if I did, though one time in the Houston airport I saw a fellow I thought was Jimmy. He was with a woman and a baby. I studied him for a long time, and he looked over at me a time or two, and I got this feeling he knew me and that it was Jimmy. But I just walked on by and never knew for sure, and didn't want to. Not really. I had gotten used to him being gone and not having a brother. I liked it that way.

"But after Jimmy run off, the meanness that was divided on me and Jimmy all turned on me. Even the nuns got worse. I think maybe they thought they could beat the evil out of me, and one of the worst was a younger nun who I always thought was looking me up, trying to think if she could figure some way to get her a little of what I was toting between the legs. It could have just been my thinking, 'cause I always did want to fuck a nun. Anyway, I don't know that for a fact, but it could have been true, and she maybe thought about it so much and got so much a feeling of being a sinner that she took it out on me with that ruler. One day I took it away from her and broke it and threatened to stick it up her ass and break it off again. I was a pretty big boy then, even if I was young, and it scared her. I got sent home for a few days, but when I went back she never did hit me with that ruler no more. But it didn't change the way the kids talked, especially this one fella, Danny Sonier. He wouldn't let it go, and he went around saying I was fucking my mother. Well, she wasn't my mother. She was my stepmother, and I don't even think she and Daddy were married. I think she was just some whore he brought home from Shreveport.

"Anyway, one day this Sonier boy followed me home with a couple of his buddies, and as they got closer to my house, walking behind me, calling me names, saying things, I finally got fed up and stopped in the middle of the road, grabbed up some rocks and threw them. They bolted. But when I got to the house, which wasn't much of a house, by the way, I was going up on the porch and turned around and there was Danny Sonier, standing in the yard. His buddies were gone. It was just him.

"He was calling me names and acting all tough, and I came off that porch like a rocket. We went together hard at it, fists flying, and all I remember was everything turned red, and when it wasn't red anymore, I was looking down at Danny and his head was like a big squash that had dried out and been broken open, only it was leaking blood, and I had a big stone in my hand. I had pulled it out of the ground and beat him like a snake, and I didn't even remember it. He was dead. I dragged his body off out to the swamp, where I knew there were alligators, and I dropped him in. I sat there on the bank the rest of the day and the body floated. It didn't sink like I thought it would. It floated. And it was just about night when a big old gator came up and grabbed the body by its mashed head and took it down. Happened so sudden it made me jump to my feet. And when I did, I heard a scuttling, and behind me was two more gators. I made a run for it, but they went straight into the water. I saw this when I got to a tree and went up in it. Those gators went in the water where the other gator had taken Danny down and there was all kind of rolling around in the water, a flashing of gator tails, a glimpse of big teeth, and it went on like that for some time. And then just when I was fixin' to come down from that tree, I see that an old bull gator had crawled up under it, this old cypress, and he was just waiting there, his head lifted, and his mouth open, like he was expectin' me to drop into it.

"Well, I stayed up there in the tree, and fell asleep between two limbs. When I woke up and looked down the next mornin', the gator was gone. I climbed down and went home. When I was able to go back to school, I did, but with Jimmy gone they sent out some social workers and discovered the stepmom was gone too, and I got put in foster care for a while, but I didn't get along with nobody, so ended up in an orphanage until I run off at sixteen.

"Course, before that, Danny was missed and he was looked for, and his buddies said he followed me home. I told the nuns and the cops I had thrown rocks at them, and they had run off, and that was the last I had seen of Danny. They didn't believe me, but that was my story and I stuck the fuck to it. In time they gave up on me, and that's when I went to those foster homes, and then the orphanage, and then I run off. They brought me back twice, but finally I was old enough to get emancipated, and that's what I did. Then, one night, in Houston, in a bar, I was sitting on a stool, minding my own business, which was drinking a beer and chattin' up a good-looking brunette with a set of titties you could use as a water float, when in comes this fellow all pissed off. I had just put my hand on her thigh, and she was wearing a dress so short, when she moved, her skimpy underpants looked like something crawling. This fellow, he had a knife and he meant to use it, and did. He cut my arm with a slash, and then I took it away from him, and in the commotion the girl ran off and the guy ended up with the blade in his throat, and when it was over, I looked up and the bar was empty except for the bartender and four guys in Hawaiian shirts, and one of them, a big guy with a nose that spread over his face like it was some kind of animal, says to me: 'That was pretty nifty, Injun. You want a job?'

"And so they cleaned up the place and threw away that dead guy like he was trash, and when the cops came I was gone and no one left there remembered a thing, 'cause they all worked for the big man who had spoken to me and this made their memories bad. Well, there was the bartender. But he said he hadn't seen a thing either, and all them other people had run off, including the good-looking brunette with the good tits and the crawling undies. I found out all this from the flat-nosed guy, 'cause I made a deal to meet him somewhere and go to work for him, and the work was to my liking. I killed people for money."

Tonto paused and opened a can of beer and drank a big sip. "And I been at it ever since, except for a time when I was an investment banker."

"That's a joke, right?" I said.

"Big-time," he said.

"You don't mind my asking," I said, "how come you owe Marvin a favor? Why are you here?"

"Simple thing," he said. "I ended up with this gal who was better for me than I was for her, and she didn't have any idea the job I had. She thought I was an insurance salesman. We had this boy. Good-lookin' kid, and I loved him, and I thought I might go straight. Planned on it. Just couldn't quite get out of the business. Like a drunk looking for the next drink, you know. Wantin' to quit, but getting too much out of it.

"So when my boy, Kevin, was twelve a guy talked him into a car and did things to him, and my boy, he didn't live. They found his body beside the road, and my wife, she cut her wrists, and if there was any chance of me being the Christian I thought I'd grow up to be, be anything like the nuns said I ought to be, that was it, it was over. I was already fucked, but this was the big fuck. I believe, and I'm loyal to the faith in my heart, but in my hands and in my mind and in my deeds I'm not. But the guy did it, he got caught and he was tried, and they couldn't prove it. And when he got loose he got drunk and admitted he did it, and the guy he told at a bar, he told the papers, and then it was all over the place, and this guy, he said, 'Yeah, I did it, but there's no second bite at the apple.'

"Even child molesters usually have enough sense to know what they do shouldn't be admitted to, but not this guy. He was proud, and it was his philosophy, the whole man/boy love bit. This guy lived for little pink boy butt holes. So I wait a few months, and I go over to his house and I kick in the back door and I find him in bed with a bunch of lit candles and some child pornography, and he's naked and probably pulling his rope, but he won't never pull it again, 'cause I get hold of him and twisted his neck so far around ain't nobody could sneak up on him from behind, provided he hadn't died from it.

"So, Marvin Hanson, he's a cop in Houston, and he figures it's me right away. He didn't have nothing on me, but he knew who I was and what I did, and he had a pretty good idea I'd do just what I done. So they found some fingerprints there, and though I had been careful, I was so mad, when I got hold of that fucker's head and twisted it, the gloves I was wearing ripped, and I left a fingerprint on his neck. Can you believe that? On his fuckin' neck?

"Lieutenant Hanson, he came to me at my house, and he has the evidence with him, and he says something like, 'I don't cotton to what you're doin', Tonto, and if this was some other thing, some other murder, I'd crawl so far up your ass every time you took a shit my life would play before your eyes instead of yours.' And he took a match and he lit the evidence and he tossed it in the kitchen sink and leaned his back against it and looked at me. He said, 'Got nothing for child molesters. Especially proud ones.' And he started out, and I said, 'Look here, man. You ever need anything, anything I can do, all you got to do is call and it's done.' And he said, 'Not likely' But the other day, I got the call. And here I am. I owe him. Got to tell you, it was a joy to twist that cocksucker's head in my hands and hear his neck snap like a goddamn chicken bone. I liked the way he looked at me and the way he tried to yell when I twisted his goozle. Liked the way the light went out of his eyes. I've seen a fish on the dock do that. You catch him and he flops and he flops, and then slowly the eyes slick over. Only with this chicken fucker, it was quick. Real quick. I just wish he had been there to feel that rolled magazine I shoved up his ass. I couldn't help myself. And I didn't grease him none. Had he been alive, the paper cuts alone would have made him bleed out. Or so I like to think. Anyway, that's who I am, and I ought not to have told any of that. Haven't ever told anybody about it, and didn't intend to ever, and it's probably a mistake. But there it is, on my sixth beer and having sucked down four or five shots of Jack Daniel's, and I'm with guys I like, and because there ain't many guys I like, I've talked my ass off, and that's the whole thing downloaded like a fuckin' movie off the Internet."

We all sat silently for a while.

Jim Bob said, "So, Tonto, you've had a fairly uneventful life, have you not?"

Tonto slowly grinned.

34

I was in my bed and Leonard was coming out of the bathroom buttoning up his pajama top. It was an ugly set of pajamas. White cloth with anchors on it; matching shirt and pants. No footsies.

"So," I said, "where did the pajamas come from?"

"John."

"Were they a gag gift?"

"No."

"He think you're a sailor?"

"No. He thought they were cute."

"Trust me," I said. "They aren't cute."

"I have a little red teddy I could wear, you prefer."

"Most definitely not… you don't, do you?"

"Now what do you think?"

"I don't know what to think about much of anything anymore. I was actually thinking about Brett. And I was thinking about that story Tonto told us."

"You believe it?"

"I do."

"Me too. Do you think he can bend a tire iron?"

"I do."

"Yeah, me too."

"He scares you a little, doesn't he, Leonard?"

"Me? Hell no."

"He scares me."

"Really?"

"Yep."

“Well, all right. He scares me a little. I think he made me pee-pee some in my pants.”

“Is that fear or sexuality?”

“I do kind of find him attractive,” Leonard said, “but, alas, he’s not my type. He’s heterosexual. That always puts a damper on things. And another thing—he’s a killer.”

“So are we.”

“Not for money. Not for any reason that isn’t self-defense or the defense of someone else.”

“So we’re noble?”

“Nope,” Leonard said. “We’re two guys trying to be like heroes, and the problem is, we’re just two guys. Though I, of course, am highly attractive and hung like an elephant and have nifty pajamas and smooth black skin.”

“I have bunny shoes.”

“Yep, but you didn’t bring them.”

“There is that.... How about John? How’s things? Have you called home since we been on the road?”

“I have. He told me to eat shit.”

“Not good.”

“Nope. Not good. These days he doesn’t find me that attractive, which is something I can’t quite wrap my mind around. I look in the mirror, I’m pretty satisfied.”

“So what did he say?”

“He said don’t call anymore, he has things to work out.”

“That stinks.”

“He thinks Jesus is pulling his ear, trying to get him over there on the good side with the straights. Thinks suddenly he’s gonna lose interest in the rod and go to the hole punch.”

“Maybe it’s the devil pulling his ear.”

“Whatever it is, I don’t like it. We had a good thing going.”

“Sucks.”

“He used to suck, and I liked it. Now he doesn’t suck. I don’t like being without him, Hap. I don’t like someone’s mythology getting in the way of my romance.”

"I know."

"It's like you being without Brett."

"I know that too. And I miss her."

"We should really give up on the adventures and stay home."

"Yep. But we didn't really have a choice here."

"We could have gone to trial. I think we'd have been no-billed. It was self-defense."

"But it was nasty self-defense."

"This is Texas," Leonard said.

"There is that. Let's go to sleep."

"Hap?"

"Yep."

"Will you tell me a story?"

"All right. There were four bears."

"Four?"

"This is my story. There were four bears. Two of them were not as smart as the other two because they were really at heart nicer bears, and they kept getting themselves into rotten situations, and eventually two of the bears, the ones that weren't so smart but were nicer, they got themselves killed."

"Those two dead bears? That us?"

"Yep," I said.

"I don't like that story."

"Me either. You want to hear a joke?"

"Hell no. Not one of your jokes. Go to sleep."

"Spoilsport. … There was this dog—"

"I said I didn't want to hear it."

"—and he came limping into this Western town—"

"You've told this one."

"And he held up his injured foot, said, 'I'm here to get the man who shot my paw' … get it?"

"I get it. You tell this to me at least once a month."

"You see, paw and pa, like the old Westerns. Guy comes into town—”

“Hap. I get it. It stinks. It stunk the first time and it stinks this time.”

“Brett laughed.”

“I don’t believe that. You’re lying. You made that up. I’ll call her.”

“There’s no need to call her.”

“Aha.”

“Well. She smiled.”

“She was embarrassed.”

“Maybe.”

“Good night, Hap.”

“Good night, Leonard.”

35

Lake O' the Pines is a big lake, man-made, like all the lakes in Texas except Caddo Lake. It was made a long time ago and on this cold morning the water was looking blue as a Patsy Cline song. I thought that by midday, we didn't get any cloud cover, the cold could burn off a little and it might be a fairly warm day. But if the clouds came in, it could turn damn cold damn quick because a wind was starting up, and as we drove by the lake, I could see through the trees along the bank that the water was rippling the way coffee will ripple when you blow on it to cool it.

We drove around, trying to follow the directions Hirem gave us, but there were a lot of little cabins. Finally, about lunchtime we came out from around the lake and stopped at a gas station and mini-mart and got some gas. There was a couple there with a break-down cage that you could put up easy and dismantle easy and haul away, and in the cage was a bear. It was a pretty good-sized bear. They had a deal where you could get your picture taken with the bear, Cindy. Of course, Leonard had to do it and I had to do it with him. When we went inside the cage and were introduced to Cindy, she was sitting on a stool like a human being, as if on break. I half expected her to be smoking a cigarette. She saw us, got up, waddled over, and stretched out her arms and put them over our shoulders. She had done this before and it was a livin'. The muscles in her arms felt like steel cables.

Jim Bob and Tonto, being smarter, didn't have their picture taken. They stood outside the cage and looked at us as if they soon expected to see us eaten. When the photo was taken, Cindy moved her arms and went back and sat on her stool. It was a double cage, two rooms if you will, and part of it had photographs of Cindy the Bear swimming in her pond on her owner's property. They told us all about it. The bear was a Russian bear.

"Is she a vodka-drinking commie?" Leonard asked.

"The Soviet Union is no more," said the lady owner. She was a blond woman with a nice build and the attitude of someone who had never met a sense of humor. Her old man was skinny and he grinned. I don't know if he thought what Leonard said was funny. I think he just grinned a lot.

We got our photograph of us with the bear, which they put between two pieces of cardboard, and then we went inside the station. As we did, Jim Bob said, "You guys are pretty weird, you know."

The station had a little stove and grill, and there was a glass cover where you could see what they had cooked. There was some fried chicken on greasy white paper and hot links and there was a place where you could get some slices of bread and put mustard and relish on it if you wanted, make a sandwich with the links. There were also a few sides, like some suspicious-looking baked potatoes and a Crock-Pot of red beans in a congealed soup that looked as if you might need a pickax to crack the surface.

We got a little of this and a little of that, picking potato chips and some candy bars and sodas to go with the chicken and links, and went to the back of the place, where there were a few tables, and had our lunch. There was enough grease in the chicken to lube up a whorehouse on a sailor's Saturday night, but it tasted really good and so did the links. We ate not only because we were hungry but because we were bored. Where I was sitting I could look out the big window at the pumps, and I could see the van parked up front near the door. And I could also see something else. A brown Ford. It slowed out on the highway, and as it did, I stuck an elbow in Leonard and he turned to look.

"Brown Ford," I said.

"Yep," he said.

Jim Bob and Tonto looked too. The Ford pulled up at a pump and a guy about the size of Tonto, and then Tonto again, got out. It wasn't just that he was tall. He was no taller than Tonto, but he was wide as a truck and had a chest big enough to store a winter's worth of corn in it. His legs were bigger around than my waist and his head looked like someone had anchored a medicine ball to his neck. He had blond hair and a little goatee and the kind of tan that comes from solar lamps. I figured he had fallen off Jack's beanstalk and was learning to make his way in our world.

There was another guy in the front of the Ford, and two in the back, and they just sat. After a while, when the gas was done, the others got out and they all came in.

We watched them carefully. The big guy who had been driving and who put in the gas looked back at us and nodded. Just a regular guy, bigger than most regular guys, seeing some other regular guys, acknowledging us. We nodded back.

We kind of huddled over our food and whispered.

"They might not be anything," Leonard said.

"Maybe not," I said.

"Lots of brown Fords," Jim Bob said.

"Yep," I said.

"Bullshit," Tonto said. "They're somebody. They got guns. I can see the bulges under their shirts."

"Maybe those are cell phone cases," Jim Bob said.

Tonto looked at Jim Bob. They both smiled.

"But," Jim Bob said, "probably not."

"If they've been following us without me seeing them," Tonto said, "they're good. And Hap, you're good. You spotted them and I didn't."

"They want us to know they're following now," Jim Bob said. "They want us to know they're tired of playing."

"I didn't know we were playing," Tonto said, "but now that I do, I'm ready to get out the toys. Ah, here they come."

They came back and sat at the table next to us. My side of the bench was closer to the big guy, and on the other side of our table was Tonto, and he shifted a little so that one of his hands was under the table and the other was lying on top of it next to a gnawed chicken leg.

They were all big guys. Only the driver, the guy on my side, was as big as Tonto, but the others were easily bigger than the rest of us. I got to thinking we weren't nearly as nifty as we thought. These guys had been on us for a while, and though I had gotten glimpses of them, they were good, damn good, at least as far as sneaking went. Thing I was wondering was when exactly did they get on us, and were they FBI guys or guys from the Dixie Mafia. I was voting pretty heavily on the latter.

The big guy had some chicken and was about to eat it. I said, “That chicken isn’t nearly as nasty as it looks.”

The big guy paused with the chicken close to his mouth. “Yeah. That’s good to hear. I was worried.”

“The links, they’re not bad either. You guys, you don’t look like fishermen.”

“Neither do you,” said the big guy.

“We’re just riding around,” I said.

“That’s a coincidence,” the big guy said. “So are we.” He bit into the chicken and chewed, then looked at me and nodded. “You’re right. That’s pretty damn good.”

He paused and wiped his hands on some paper towels that were on a roller in the center of the table. He shifted on the bench and turned toward me, said, “We’re more the hunter type.”

“Now that,” Jim Bob said, “is one big goddamn fucking coincidence. So are we.”

“Really?” said the big guy.

“Oh, yeah,” Jim Bob said. “Big fucking time.”

“What do you hunt?”

“Skunks mostly,” Jim Bob said.

“Oh,” the big guy said. “I don’t believe there’s a season for that.”

“What makes it thrilling,” Jim Bob said. “Ain’t nothing better than sneaking up on a skunk, or a weasel, and blowing them right out from over their ass.”

“I can see that,” said the big man, and he pushed the paper plate with the chicken on it away from him. “It sure was good to chat with you boys. You know, the weather looks as if it’s going to turn bad.”

“Yeah?” Leonard said.

“Oh yeah, big-time. I think I heard it on the radio. Thing is, I wanted to share that because you don’t want to get caught up in a big old storm that might blow you away. That would suck."

"Yeah, and it would mess up our hair," I said.

He gave me a smile thin as the edge of a razor blade. "You got any information for us? You might know where we can find a good place to stop for the day, and get some things we need, and then maybe the storm won't come."

"And what kind of place is that?" I said.

"Someplace with a couple of dumb kids with lots of money who aren't any of your business."

"Shit," I said, "you know what another big coincidence is?"

"What's that?" the big guy said.

"We're in the same business," I said.

"Are we?" he said.

"Sounds like it. We too are looking for two sweet kids with lots of money that could be a port in the storm, and we think of them as our business, all the way."

"Huh," he said. "Well, we wouldn't want to cross up, would we?"

"It could happen, though, couldn't it?" Jim Bob said. "I mean, us both looking for two sweet kids and some money and a nice place to ride out the storm."

"Storm like the one that's coming," the big guy said, "it could blow your little port flat out of existence."

"We've ridden a lot of storms," Jim Bob said.

"Hell," Leonard said, "we're like storm chasers. We're like the storm chasers."

"I think you're a bunch of amateurs," the big guy said. "I think a good wind comes along, might just blow you completely out of the ball game."

"You know," Jim Bob said, "you were going pretty good there with the storm analogies, and then you got to go and screw it up with the ball game thing. That doesn't scan."

The big guy looked at Tonto, said, "What about the Indian? He talk?"

"Just smoke signals," Jim Bob said. "And you know what, none of your buddies are talking, so I don't think that's fair to ask."

"My buddies aren't my buddies, and they say what I tell them to say and when I say it," the big guy said. "And before I go, just so we stay with the storm analogy, you best not go out without your slickers and your hip boots, and maybe an umbrella."

"We got umbrellas out the ass," Jim Bob said.

Big Guy studied us for a moment, said to his boys, "Wrap this shit up, and let's go."

The big guy and his bunch wrapped their chicken and links, put them back in the sacks, and carried them out.

I watched them through the glass as they walked toward the Ford. I said, "Just so I'm certain, when he said slickers, boots, and umbrellas, he was talking about guns, right?"

"Yep," Leonard said. "That was my take."

"And they're the storm?"

"Bingo."

Tonto, who had just taken a bite of a link wrapped in bread, said, "This would be a lot better with hot sauce, some of that fancy mustard that's got a tang."

36

Full as ticks, we drove to another store near the lake where they sold fishing supplies and rented boats, and parked in front of it and sat in the van. Out front was a rack with T-shirts on it with Lake O’ the Pines logos. The wind moved them about.

The place was doing pretty brisk business for the time of the year. There were cars parked to the left and the right of us and people got out and went in and came out carrying fishing supplies, coolers, snacks, and items like caps and bait. One of the people who parked and got out was a blond woman in jogging pants with a tight top and a baseball cap with her long hair tied up in a ponytail hanging over the stretch band at the back of her cap. The jogging pants were tight and I worried a little about her circulation and watched her out of biological interest until she went into the store. I didn’t see her face, but she had the kind of body, hair, and walk that assured you she looked good and knew it.

Over the top of the joint the sky was losing its blue and turning the color of polished silver and there were starting to be dark puffs of clouds. The lake could be seen on either side of the building and the water was growing choppy; little white waves like nightcaps rose up and fell down. Jim Bob opened up the flooring and got out some handguns. I took a .38 automatic with a clip holster and put it on under my coat. I preferred revolvers—more dependable—but, alas, the times were a-changin’ and nearly everyone these days carried an automatic for more firepower. Leonard took a nine with clip holster and Jim Bob clipped on a .38 automatic similar to mine under his coat. Tonto had never stopped being armed. He still had his twin .45s.

“What makes me nervous,” I said, “is the fact we weren’t armed back there, unless you count a chicken leg and a link sausage.”

“I was,” Tonto said.

“Yeah, but what about the rest of us?” I said.

“You had my best wishes,” Tonto said.

Leonard said, “Here’s my question. They’re so goddamn sneaky, how come they decided to come to us like that?”

“Way we were wandering around,” Jim Bob said, “my figure is they thought we knew they were following us. They didn’t know we didn’t know what the hell we were doing, so they thought we were giving them a hard time, being clever. And I think they thought they’d be all scary and we’d tell them what they wanted to know, then they’d run us off and they’d find the boy and the girl and all that money.”

“They obviously didn’t know me and Hap had our picture taken with a bear,” Leonard said. “They ain’t so tough. You see me give that bear a bad look, Hap?”

“No.”

“I haven’t been followed like that in a long time,” Tonto said. “Thought I was being careful, and I’m pretty damn careful, and still, they were following. That takes some chops. I mean, I haven’t never been followed before where I didn’t know.”

“You said it couldn’t happen,” I said.

“I was wrong,” Tonto said. “Those guys are good.”

“The big guy,” Jim Bob said, “he knows what he’s doing, all right.”

“You think they’ll take a run at us?” I said.

“I think they still hope we’ll lead them to something,” Jim Bob said.

“How did they get onto us so quick?” Leonard said.

“Someone somewhere told them something,” Tonto said. “You got to wonder who and when, but the thing that matters is, time comes they’ll stop fucking around and come for us. They’ll maybe think they can make us talk by pulling out fingernails or cutting off eyelids or some such thing, sticking a stick up our dicks.”

“That eyelid part,” I said. “I want to be up front and go on record right now. I’ll talk like you haven’t never heard anyone talk before if that’s done to me. I’ll be like a whole flock of canaries. They won’t have enough paper to write down what I got to say. And they start threatening my dick, I'll start making stuff up to go along with it."

◆

We had tried to do it the easy way, which was drive over to the side of the lake where Hirem said the cabins were, but the easy way turned out hard, so we were going to cut to the chase and ask directions. We waited until the traffic at the store played out, then I went inside and found the owner behind a counter that contained whoopee cushions, fake dog shit, and all manner of redneck yuks. An older woman with gray hair and a face only a blind, prideless mother could love was behind the counter arranging a stack of little Texas flags on sticks in a large decorative coffee cup.

She said, "What can I do you for, honey?"

I gave her my winning smile, though I couldn't remember the last time it had won me anything. "Me and some buddies, we were supposed to meet a friend here on the lake, but we're kind of confused."

"Lake's out back of here. How confusing is that?"

I grinned like that was the best I had heard since my joke about the dog with the shot-up paw. Come to think of it, Leonard was right. That joke sucked.

"This buddy of ours said he was gonna meet us at a cabin on the east side of the lake—"

She pointed. "That's east."

"Yes, ma'am, we been over there. But the problem is, we can't find where we're supposed to meet him. He said a fellow named Bill Jordan had some cabins—"

"Bill Jordan. That old fart is in the ground, some three years now. He don't own them anymore."

"Oh, well, that puts a damper on things."

"A crippled fella with a funny haircut owns them now, but he don't rent out much. Got a pension."

"I see. Well, I'm pretty sure my friend is meeting us there. That's what he said anyway. He hasn't been here in a while, so he probably rented from the other fella."

"It's kind of hard to get to actually," she said. "Road is near washed out and it winds up in the pines. Good hunting up there, though. I know a fellow killed a wild hog there big enough to tussle with an elephant."

"That a fact?"

"Of course not. Ain't no hogs big as elephants. But it was big."

"I see. So, you go around on the east side, but where do you turn? We were all over that place, and we couldn't find what we were looking for."

She got a piece of paper and a pencil and drew me a map, explaining as she did. Pushing it across the counter, she said, "Now, you got to watch all the ruts and potholes, and it's narrow and there's limbs all grown up around it. I was up there last year taking the crippled fella with a funny haircut some supplies. He calls up and I deliver. For a little extra fee, of course."

"Of course."

"Anyway, it's like the goddamn Amazon up there."

"Well, thanks."

I started to go out. She said, "You know, you wanted to, there's an easier way. It'll take a little longer, but it's still easier, and you'd have to get going before the storm comes up, 'cause one is coming."

"So we were told."

"You could rent one of my boats, take it straight across the lake, and you could just dock at the place."

"How long would that take?"

"About an hour, maybe two if you get some tough wind and you ain't no hand with a boat. You go now, you got to rent the boat for overnight. Or you can rent if for a few days if you'd rather be over there awhile."

"How much is the boat?" I asked.

37

In the van I explained about the map and the boat. I said, “Me and Leonard can take the boat across, and you guys can follow the map. Thing is, I think you don’t want to go over there right away, because you do, they might follow.”

“They won’t fool me again,” Tonto said.

“Just in case they do, however,” I said, “we could go across by boat, which they may not expect, see if we can find Hirem’s boy, the girl, and the money. It might even be a sneakier way to come up on them if they’re there. We can maybe call you when we get there and you can come around.”

“Checked my phone a little while ago,” Jim Bob said. “No signal out here.”

“All right,” I said. “Go do something that will give us two hours before you arrive, and we’ll take the boat across. We get there early we’ll hold our own until you show up. I think we can handle two kids and a pile of money.”

“But if that big fellow and his pals show up before we do,” Jim Bob said, “you might have your hands full.”

“They been full before,” Leonard said.

❧

We spent some of our money on fishing poles and a bucket of minnows for show, a can of gas, bought a couple of sandwiches and a bag of vanilla wafers and a six-pack of Dr Pepper. The owner of the store, who told us her name was Annie, took us down to the boat and gave us instructions, and we set out.

It was really choppy and the boat rode high and dropped low. It was making my stomach queasy. The motor churned the water behind us and I pointed the bow due east, like Annie had suggested. There was a big stump in the middle of the lake she had directed us to, and when we got to that, she said we ought to start following a line of orange buoys and then those would go away and we had to hold due east until we saw a strip of land. She said it would be a lot farther away than we thought it was. Thing then was, when we got closer, we'd see a rise of pine trees and a dock out front of them, and there was a little trail that led up from the dock to the cabins.

For the moment, that stump in the distance was my bearing.

When we were out a ways, we overturned the minnow bucket into the lake and let all our guys go. Leonard said, "Swim, little fishes. Go, make your way in this big wet world. Make us proud."

* * *

The stump showed up and then the orange buoys. We followed those until they played out, but we couldn't see a strip of land. Not yet. It was a big lake. All we could see was water, and the sky had darkened and it had started to rain, and we didn't so much as have an umbrella.

The rain grew thick, and then I got nervous because the boat was holding water. Leonard took the minnow bucket and started bailing. I kept hold of the motor throttle and thought maybe I might regain some religion, because the water was jumping now and the rain had gotten so wild I could hardly see my hand in front of my face, let alone a distant strip of land sporting pine trees.

I decided keeping my hand on the throttle and using my wits would probably do me better than religion, and I kept at it. The rain kept at it too. We bounced up and down, and at one point the boat listed to port and water splashed in heavily, and Leonard was really working that bucket.

"That damn rain is cold," he said.

"What, you think I haven't noticed?"

We went on like that for a while, and I feared we had gone off point and were traveling in the wrong direction, maybe even boating in circles. But then the rain slacked and I saw a strip of land and some pines rising up. I glanced at my watch, putting it close to my face. We had been at it for an hour and a half.

The wind was really whistling now and the boat was struggling. Leonard was bailing like a maniac.

“Almost there,” I said.

The engine sputtered and died. We were out of gas.

“Now,” Leonard said, “if a goddamn whale will swallow us, it will be a perfect day.”

38

The gas can was under one of the seats, and I pulled it out and went about trying to pour some of it in the outboard tank. Way the water made the boat hump up and down it was hard work, and some of the gas went into the lake.

I finally finished with the can, but by that time we had drifted a considerable distance. I didn't care. It didn't matter to me right then if we got to where we were going or if we just made land, any land, and because of that, when I saw a glimpse of shoreline, I took the boat in that direction. I hoped we wouldn't bring the boat up against a stump, 'cause at the speed we were going if we hit one, we'd be flung into the cold deep churning water, and that wouldn't be good. Still, I couldn't seem to slow the throttle down. The rain was slamming us and it was cold and I wanted off the lake.

Something went wrong, and we went into the water, the grateful minnows we had released would save us. Like Aquaman, we would call to them and they would come and lift us out of the water on their shiny backs and carry us ashore.

But I wasn't counting on it.

Most likely, we'd drown like rats.

* * *

I saw it just before we hit it. I thought it was a log, but it was an alligator, and when we struck it the boat jumped and I went out of it as if shot from a catapult. I caught a glimpse of Leonard, still clinging to the handle of the minnow bucket, go up and over and make a nice little flip into the water and disappear under the waves.

I swam and my arm hit the gator and I screamed like a little girl. The rest of the gator sailed on past me and I could smell a rotten odor, realized the big bastard was dead, and had been awhile. He might have died up in the reeds along the bank and the storm had stirred him loose. He sailed past and the waves rolled over him and took him under and then I went under. When I came up the minnow bucket was floating past me. I grabbed at it like it was a life raft.

Holding on to it, I kicked toward shore, but shore had moved away. Or so it seemed. The water had carried me out farther and quicker than I could imagine. The lake was so cold I could hardly get a breath. I looked around for Leonard and didn't see him. I looked around for the boat, didn't see it either. Annie was going to be pissed.

I kicked toward what looked like shore and hoped a live alligator didn't find me, hoped in this weather they would be somewhere cozy. Then again, I wasn't sure if alligators liked it cozy. Maybe they liked the rain.

I called out for Leonard, but the wind took my voice and carried it away and all I got out of my yelling was a hoarse throat.

And then my feet were touching ground. Not well, but they were touching. I pushed on toward some reeds, and after what seemed like enough time for the Big Bang to have happened and all the species on the planet to have developed and moved on out to the stars, I made it to some waving grass and reeds and stumbled into that, went down a few times, came up with a mouthful of muddy water. As I tromped through, barely able to stand, hardly able to see, I came across a long four-foot-wide fragment of our boat. On his back in the water, hanging on to the fragment, was a big black guy.

"Leonard," I said.

He let go of the board and sat up in the water and said, "Well, Ahab, that boat trip was sure a good idea."

I checked for my .38. I still had it.

Leonard checked for his automatic. Still there. Well, at least we had that going for us. We were in a position to add to the worst nature of man and the final downfall of the world. By God, we had our guns.

Leonard stood up slowly and looked around. The minnow bucket had floated up into the tall grass and was hung there. He focused on it, said, “I guess the cookies and the Dr Pepper didn’t make it.”

“Missing in action,” I said.

“Now that’s a blow,” Leonard said.

◆

Slogging along the shoreline through the rain, we saw a boathouse and made our way over there. It was wide open and we went inside. There was a boat floating in a stall and there was fishing tackle in the boat, and on one wall were some croaker sacks for hunting and some nasty-looking towels that were probably used to wipe the boat down after fishing. There were four rain slickers on nails. A fairly large dead fish floated belly-up near the boat and the waves washed at it until it went under the flooring, out of sight.

We used the towels to dry off and to dry our weapons, hoping they’d still shoot. The towels made us dry enough, but they left us smelling like fish. We sat on the edge of the boathouse dock with the heavy damp towels over our shoulders and looked out at the boat that was docked there. There were paddles in the bottom of the boat and no motor. The boat was bouncing up and down and we could see the lake from where we sat, and the rain was furious. Everything was gray. It was as if the sky and the lake had joined together.

I pulled my cell phone out of my pants pocket, shook the water out of it. It was still working, but there wasn’t any signal, like Jim Bob had said. I put it away.

“I saw a dead alligator,” I said.

“Yeah, well, I think I saw him too,” Leonard said.

“Was he big and dark?”

“Yep.”

“That was him, all right.”

“Say he was dead?”

“Very.”

“Thank goodness for small favors.”

◆

We waited for the downpour to slack off, but it didn't. Freezing, we toweled off again and took a couple of slickers off the wall and put them on and went to where we had come in and stood in the open doorway and looked out at the rain.

"I don't want to," Leonard said.

"Me neither," I said.

"But, alas …" Leonard said, and we went out into the rain.

39

I had no idea where we had ended up, but my guess was near where we wanted to be. But that didn't change the fact that near was not the same as being there, and every tree looked pretty much like the other, and I didn't see any trails. We wandered around in the rain, damp inside our slickers but better off now with the hoods pulled up and the cold rain not coming right down on us.

Ending up again where the boat had come apart, or at least where part of it had been in the tall grass with Leonard, we again saw the foam minnow bucket caught up in the grass, and floating in the water where it hadn't been before, pushed up in the shallows, was our six-pack of Dr Pepper.

Leonard waded out in the water and got the six-pack, carried it by its plastic holder onto the shore. He set it down on the ground and pulled one of the Dr Peppers off one of the plastic rings, pulled the tab, and nearly drank the whole thing with one big gulp.

He peeled off another and handed it to me, and then got another for himself. We both drank. When he was finished he dropped the can on the ground with the other one and said, "I'm tough enough today to litter."

Even under the circumstances, anal as I am about such things, I wanted to find a trash can but figured it might be best in this situation to be able to draw the .38 more than be an environmentalist and tote an empty can around. Reluctantly, we left the three remaining Dr Peppers there and wandered around like a couple of geese.

I saw a narrow trail and pointed it out, and Leonard said, "Who the hell knows? Let's try it."

The trail went up a steep hill, through some pines. The pines were close together and the soil there was sandy and had turned the color of milk-and-flour gravy. The rain ran down the hill and into ruts that tires had made, and the whole thing was just wide enough for a car. After we had walked halfway up the hill, the trees got thick enough to cut the rain a bit, and finally we broke out at the top of a hill into a clearing, and there was a line of little cabins that made our tourist court digs look like the Taj Mahal. There was one cabin that wasn't in a row, and it was a little off to the side. I presumed that would belong to the owner, the fellow Annie had called The Crippled Fellow With A Funny Haircut.

There was a car in front of one of the cabins. It was the only car present. It was a black Escalade.

"Dat dere, Brer Bear," Leonard said, "be duh goddamn car we be lookin' for, and in dat dere cabin—"

"Leonard. That's enough."

"Okay. I figure they're inside, with the money. Or what's left of it."

"So what do we do?"

"Well, I don't see any brown Fords, and I don't see our guys yet, so my suggestion is we waltz ourselves over to yon cabin and knock on the door and stick guns in their faces."

"That'll work," I said. "And if it doesn't, we'll improvise."

❧

Observing the cabin briefly, we decided Leonard would go around front and I'd go around back. I ducked under a low window and looked toward the big cabin to see if anyone was watching me from there. If they were, they were very clever. I wondered too if anyone was in any of the other cabins. I thought not. No cars. But they could be gone for a bowl of chili. Perhaps they were all over at Annie's, chatting and laughing it up about some plastic dog shit and a whoopee cushion.

Around back, I pulled the .38 and pressed up against the door, pushing my ear tight. I listened. The rain was so loud I couldn't hear myself think. I pushed against the door to see how sturdy it was, decided it wasn't that sturdy.

I heard the front door budge, and I knew Leonard was in. I hit the back door with my shoulder and was in, stumbling. There really wasn't anywhere to go. The back door led through a little kitchen and right into the bedroom/living room, where our two lovebirds were sacked out in a bedraggled bed. The boy reached for an automatic lying at the bedside, but Leonard was already there and he grabbed it and pulled it back. He now had a gun in either hand.

The boy sat up in bed, and when he did the sheet fell back from the young lady. She was wearing a thin white bra. It was cold in the room, and the tips of her breasts punched at it like ice picks. Leonard said, "Don't panic, kid. We don't want to hurt you."

"We'll give the money back," the boy, Tim, said. "We don't want it."

"You wanted it when you took it," I said.

"I didn't think it would matter then," the boy said.

"So why does it matter now?" I said, pushing back the hood on the rain slicker.

"I guess I knew better, but we been thinking it over. We want to give it back. Just let us go and take the money."

"Looks like to me," Leonard said, "you been doing more than thinking."

"Please don't hurt us," Tim said.

"We don't want to hurt you," Leonard said, closing the front door he had knocked open, cutting back the cold wind. "We're on a mission from your dad … sort of. We're also working for the law and for ourselves."

"You're not… with the organization?" Tim asked.

"Organization?" I said. "You mean the Dixie Mafia?"

Tim nodded.

"Nope. We are freelancers."

The girl, who had not spoken, said, "You want the money for yourselves?"

"That would be nice," I said, "but no. That isn't the deal."

I studied her closely. She was worth running off with. Her hair was cut short, almost man style, but she was a fine-looking girl with a long, sleek neck and deep eyes you'd like to fall into, especially if you were a young man, and from what I could see of her body she wasn't going to make anyone turn their eyes away in disgust.

We lowered our guns. Leonard pushed back his rain hood and sat on the windowsill. I went and shut the back door to the kitchen, came back and found a chair. I said, "You two just stay there for a minute. What we're gonna do is we're gonna wait for some friends of ours, and then we're going to load you, along with the money—where is it, by the way?"

"Under the bed," Tim said.

"Under the bed?" Leonard said. "That's as sneaky as you get? You put it under the bed? They put it under the bed, Hap."

"You're not very good criminals," I said. "But you're lucky we're the ones found you, and we found you for your dad, and we're taking you and the money back and things are maybe going to be okay, except for the part where your dad squeals about his business and you all have to go into witness protection. Maybe your dad does some prison. Up in the air right now."

"Oh hell," Tim said.

"Yep," I said. "Oh hell."

I looked at Leonard. He was turned slightly so he could see out the window. Rivulets of rain ran down the window and it was clouded over. Leonard used the palm of his hand to wipe the inside a bit, and then he said, "It just keeps on coming." He looked at me, said, "Brown Ford."

40

“Drop your cock and grab your socks,” I said, looking at Tim. “In fact, forget the socks. Nab some drawers pronto, ’cause it’s about to get interesting in here.”

“Oh hell,” Tim said, threw back the covers, and scrambled out naked, grabbing some pants off the floor. The girl, whose name I had yet to know, came out of the bed on the other side, pulling on jeans.

Leonard said, “You know what’s really swell, both the goddamn doors are already broken in.”

I went over to the window and looked out. The big guy we had met over chicken and links was wearing a raincoat with a hood and he was standing by the Escalade, looking it over like a prospective buyer. He had an automatic with a silencer in his right hand. The other three guys were out of the car now and one of them had a double-barrel shotgun and the other two had handguns. I felt my asshole pucker, and in that instant every good meal, hot fuck, blue sky I had ever experienced jumped through my head.

I didn’t know how they had found us—hit or miss, or maybe they had talked to Annie, bought some whoopee cushions and a box of fake dog shit in exchange for information about what it was some guys might be asking her about.

It didn’t really matter now.

Big Guy looked up at the house, and Leonard and I moved away from the window.

“There’s nothing left but for you two to get under the bed with the money,” I said. “And hope things go better than I think they will.”

They did as I suggested. When Leonard and I were dead, it would be easy pickings for Big Guy and his posse. Pop these two and take the dough, stop off for photos with the bear and a couple of hot links, then home.

“Hey, hey, hey,” Leonard said. “The cavalry has arrived. Sort of.”

I looked.

Tonto’s van had pulled up and he and Jim Bob were out of the car. They weren’t wearing rain gear. Tonto had his coat pushed back and the .45 holsters were empty; the guns were in his hands. Jim Bob was carrying a pump twelve-gauge with a shortened barrel. They were walking toward the Ford and the four guys as if they were meeting for tea.

Big Guy said something, and then two of his guys, one with the shotgun, the other with a pistol, went back toward where they had parked the Ford. Big Guy eased toward us slowly, and one of the other guys started around the cabin, toward the back.

“Who you want?” I said.

“The big motherfucker,” Leonard said.

“Good.”

I hurried into the kitchen and stepped up on the counter that was near the door and pointed my weapon, waited. There was a slight sound at the back door, and then it was pushed back gently. I saw a hand with an automatic poke in, and then I heard a shot from the front of the cabin, Leonard’s or Big Guy’s weapon. I didn’t know for sure. And then the guy at the kitchen door, perhaps smelling blood in the water, charged in and I shot him above the ear and he fell back against the wall and his head stayed propped against it while the rest of him spread out in that relaxed manner only the dead have. There was blood on the wall.

I jumped down and charged into the other room. Big Guy had Leonard by the neck and was lifting him off the floor with both hands. Leonard’s gun was on the floor between Big Guy’s legs, and Big Guy’s weapon was thrown up against the wall. I wasn’t sure how things had got that way, who had fired and who was hit, but before I could blow Big Guy’s brains out, I heard a shotgun blast outside, and then another, and then Leonard went sailing across the room, slammed onto the bed hard enough for the slats to break and the girl to scream from under there, and then Leonard was up and the kids were crawling out from under the bed, cowering in the corner.

I lifted up my .38 and shot Big Guy directly in the chest. He stepped across the room quickly and grabbed my gun hand, and slapped the hell out of me with the back of his other hand. I did a nice backwards roll, and when I got it together, Big Guy was firing at me with my .38.

Leonard leaped like a panther and hit Big Guy above the knees with the side of his body, trying to clip him. Didn't work. He bounced off.

I got the gun from the dead guy in the kitchen, a nine-mil, and went back to help Leonard. Leonard was grabbed again, and Big Guy was slinging him around like wet laundry. I couldn't get a good aim.

All of this was going on at the same time there was a lot of racket outside. Gunfire, cursing, screams.

Finally Big Guy tired enough, that Leonard, still hanging high while this guy choked him, was able to slap his hands over Big Guy's ears. Big Guy dropped him. I tried to shoot Big Guy as he came rushing toward me, but the gun jammed.

Typical.

He grabbed me around the waist and pushed me backwards and slammed me into the wall so that the back of my neck hit a bookshelf and the shelf came loose and fell and the one above it fell too, hitting me on top of the head dead center. At least the owner wasn't a reader; no books fell on my head.

Next thing I knew I was pitched against the far wall next to the open front door. I got up and saw Leonard throw a right hook into Big Guy's body and jerk back his hand with a sour look on his face.

I knew then why my bullet hadn't hurt Big Guy. He was wearing a bulletproof vest.

The kids, both barefoot and Tim bare-chested, yanked a duffel bag out from under the ruins of the bed. They headed out the door before I could get off my ass, and when I did, the cabin felt as if it was moving.

I started to go after them, but when I looked back, Leonard was being slammed by a punch that might have killed a steer. My head was mostly back together, so I rushed Big Guy and threw a hard round kick into his thigh. It was a perfect kick, hitting right on the nerve in the outer thigh, and I had used it before, dropping the leg right out from under strong men, but if it bothered Big Guy his expression didn't show it. He came rushing at me, and without really knowing I was going to do it, I started backpedaling and went right out the front door.

A gun barked to my left and I saw one of Big Guy's team on the ground and Jim Bob walking over. I got a glimpse of Tonto, but I didn't see the other bad guy. The two kids and their duffel bag had disappeared.

Big Guy came charging out into the open, practically foaming at the mouth.

I'm a little ashamed to say I turned and bolted. I thought I was running like a goddamn deer on steroids, but Big Guy was tight on my ass as a dingleberry, and the next thing I knew he had me and we're tumbling down the trail, rolling like a couple of doodlebugs. When we came to the bottom of the hill, I got hold of his ear with my teeth and bit it as hard as I could, taking off a chunk big enough for a small sandwich.

He jerked his head up and came to his knees and let out a bellow. I tried to make a quick exit, stage right, spitting out the chunk of ear as I went, but he got hold of my rain slicker with one hand and hit me so hard with the other I thought I had accidentally stepped onto train tracks and been hit by a locomotive.

He was about to hit me again when I heard a grunt, and Leonard, doing a Superman, flew down the hill and hit Big Guy. The two of them went tumbling down some more, covered in mud, and ended up near the water's edge. Big Guy came up on top and he was giving Leonard a pounding.

I ran down there and kicked Big Guy in the head. It was a pretty good shot, and it did more damage than the kick to the thigh. He was knocked over and into the water. He tried to get up and I kicked him again, but because I had to step out into the water to do it, it wasn't as good a kick, and it only knocked him back. And then Leonard got hold of the minnow bucket and slammed it over Big Guy's head. It was a tight fit. Leonard chopped Big Guy across the throat, twice in rapid succession. Big Guy stood up. Leonard slipped behind him with one smooth motion and tried to choke him with his forearm. The guy's neck was like a tree, and Leonard might as well have been squeezing one. The guy shook like a dog and Leonard went into the water, scrambled up and out of it and onto the shore to meet me. We both stood there looking at the monster with the minnow bucket on his head. Big Guy clawed at the bucket, started pulling it loose. Leonard said, "Run like a motherfucker."

And we did. We ran. We were like little children being chased by the Big Bad Wolf.

Leonard said as we ran, "Where the fuck is that guy from?"

"Hell," I said.

We were coming up on the boathouse. I said, "Goddamn it. Let's take the boat and get away from that sonofabitch."

Looking back, I saw Big Guy minus his bucket, and he was really coming. When we got in the boathouse the kids were there with the bag of money. They had the other rain slickers on and the towels over their shoulders. They were just standing on the platform looking at the boat as if they thought they might be magically transported into it. The rain was really coming down outside the boathouse, and it could be seen through the big opening at the back where the boats went out and came in, peppering the water like buckshot.

"What the hell are you waiting on?" Leonard said to the couple. "Get in the boat."

"I'm scared of water," the girl said.

"Something comin' through that door you're gonna be a lot more scared of," Leonard said, and at that moment Big Guy came in, flinging the door back so hard it slammed against the wall.

The girl was in the boat faster than a jackrabbit. Tim just froze. Leonard and I crouched. Leonard said, "This time, we got to get him."

Big Guy, who seemed to have lost his wits, came charging along the planks and Leonard and I, as if through some mind-meld of knowledge, went for his legs, went low and lifted high. It wasn't quite perfect. Big Guy went a little to the right, out over the platform and hit headfirst in the boat. The boat cracked, rolled, sent the girl into the water with a scream. Tim, who was standing behind us and had caught some of Big Guy's body as it was thrown, was knocked the length of the platform.

The boat righted itself, and there was Big Guy, hanging on to the side of it. The girl, who was crying loudly, was clinging to the bow. I got down on my belly on the platform and grabbed one of the paddles floating in the water and stood up and cracked Big Guy over the head with it. It took about three licks before he went under.

There was movement at the door. I turned my head. Tonto came through, followed by Jim Bob. Somehow, Tonto had ended up with the double-barrel shotgun.

Big Guy was back, clinging to the side of the boat, trying to climb inside. Tonto came over quick and stepped off the platform and onto the boat. It was a graceful move and the boat only rocked a little. He got Big Guy by the hair and stuck the double barrel in his open mouth and pulled the trigger. The back of Big Guy's head jumped out onto the water, and something, pellets, skull shrapnel, rattled against the clapboard wall across the way.

Big Guy, missing most of his head, went under, except for one hand that clung to the side of the boat. Tonto squatted and took hold of the fingers and peeled one of them off and then they all came loose.

Leonard said, "You better find that sonofabitch and drive a stake through his heart. I don't want him coming back."

Tonto made his way to the bow of the little boat and pulled the girl out of the water, then handed her up to me. I set her on the platform. She was shivering with the cold, just like me and Leonard and Tim. Tonto climbed up on the platform and took a deep breath. He smelled like the shotgun blast.

"The others?" I asked.

"They're napping," Tonto said. "Deep napping."

"Yeah," I said. "There's one in the cabin, and he's kind of sleepy too."

41

At the top of the hill, with me carrying the bag of money, and it was a big bag and pretty damn heavy, we discovered that the two thugs were indeed napping by the Ford. While they were napping some red stuff had run out of them and onto the ground and had been mixed up and thinned by the rain so that it looked like spilled strawberry Kool-Aid. They were lying on their backs and they had some holes in them and their open mouths were filling with rain.

We grabbed the stuff from the cabin that belonged to the kids, got the guns, and wiped the place down of blood and fingerprints as best we could, hauling the dead guy out of the kitchen, putting him and the other two in the Ford. Jim Bob drove the Ford, Tonto drove his van, and Leonard took the keys of the Escalade from Tim and drove the rest of us out of there, me in the back with the boy, the girl beside Leonard. The windshield wipers beat methodically as he drove and the heater made it cozy. It was hard to believe that a moment before we had been in a gunfight, a fistfight, a wrestling match, and the like. It seemed surreal, though my ears were still ringing from the gunfire in the small cabin and I hurt all over.

We followed Jim Bob down a narrow clay road with trash thrown out on both sides. He parked the Ford and left it and joined Tonto in the van. Tonto and Leonard found places to turn around and got us back on the main road, which was a strip of aging blacktop.

We followed along behind the van. No one in our car had said a word. And then: “That man,” the girl said. “He … he was so strong.”

“Tell me about it,” Leonard said. “And he had a bulletproof vest on to boot.”

“You noticed that too,” I said.

"I did," Leonard said. "For a moment I thought Superman had gone bad, and it was a real relief to discover he was just a man."

"He was just plenty of man," I said.

"I hurt all over," Leonard said. "I feel like I been chewed up by a wolf and shit off a cliff and my pile got stepped on by an elephant."

"I hear you," I said. "I'm dizzy and I got a headache and I want my teddy bear. Bastard must have taken something. Some kind of drug. Damned if I know. But I'm going to dream about him, and I'm not going to like it."

"I used to have a teddy bear," the girl said out of nowhere. "His name was Lew. I think my momma still has him."

We let that sail around the car for a moment, then, "Figure guy owns the cabins has already called the law," Leonard said.

"No," Tim said. "He said he would be gone a few days. Went off somewhere with his brother. We paid in advance."

"I hope you left a dead body deposit," I said.

"We didn't give our real names. He wrote down our plates, but they're false. I switched them."

"Normally, I wouldn't want to encourage such criminal enterprise as license-plate switching in the young, but let me, at this moment in time, give to you a symbolic high five."

It was entirely symbolic. Neither of us moved.

Tim said, "So … are you going to hurt us?"

"Nope," I said. "We already would have if we were. But you got to go back."

"My dad … he turned himself in."

"For you. And he's going to talk to the feds. Putting himself in danger from the Dixie Mafia for one reason and one reason only. You."

Tim was quiet for a moment, then said, "He's done some bad things."

"He has, and I suppose he's actually going to get away with having done a lot of them if he tells the feds the right things, things they want to know. But there is this. He loves you pretty damn strong to do what he's doing. Putting himself in danger, maybe going to jail, or having to be in the witness protection program. Something you may have to do too. Thing is, he's doing what he's doing for you so you can maybe do something a lot better than he's done with his life."

"You think so?"

"I think so."

"What about me?" the girl said.

"I don't know yet," I said. "We'll figure something out."

"He just couldn't stand we were together, her being black."

"He got over it," I said. "He only wants you happy."

"He said that?"

"Yep."

"Are you friends of his?"

"Nope," I said. "Not even close."

"Then why are you doing this?"

"We sort of have our asses over a barrel and we got picked because we were expendable."

Leonard said, "Girl, what's your name?"

"Katie," she said.

"All right," Leonard said. "That's good to know in case I want to call you to supper. Hap, are you okay back there?"

"A little traumatized. Not every day you meet Dracula and live."

"Ain't that the truth? We owe Tonto one."

"We owe that shotgun one. Maybe we can take it to lunch."

42

Leonard wheeled us away from the lake, and Tonto, who was driving in front of us, pulled the van to the side of the road and parked. We pulled up beside him, real close, lowered the window on the girl's side. Tonto lowered his window, said, "Now what?"

"I think we ought to think this over before we do anything," Leonard said.

"What's that mean?" Tonto asked.

Leonard looked back at me. I leaned forward in the seat and spoke loud enough for them to hear. "I'm with Leonard. I think now we've done the deed, we should regroup a little. Gonna hand these kids off, I want to make sure I'm not dropping them in the lion's den. We maybe hole them up somewhere, then me and Leonard see how the lay of the land is, figure what to do next."

"I'm just along for the ride," Tonto said.

"Me too," Jim Bob said.

"All right, then," I said. "Let's drive over to Shreveport, put the kids in a hotel, and we stay there with them. Maybe we'll take a day or two and consider what we ought to do next."

Leonard turned, looked at Tim in the backseat, then at Katie. "You're not going to give us shit, are you?"

"I just want to go home," she said. She turned and looked at Tim. "I just want to go home, baby."

Tim reached over the seat and patted her shoulder. "I know. It was a dumb idea. I don't know why I had to take the money. That was stupid."

"Thing is," Leonard said, "we want to make sure it's okay you two go home, that you're safe. So we'll do it the way we're talkin' about, and we'll use some of the money you stole to pay for it. We'll tell the feds we had to use some to get the bulk of it back.

Expenses. I think they'll go for that."

"Got a feeling," I said, "Dixie Mafia might hold a grudge, we spend their money."

"Not like we're giving it back to them," Leonard said. "Once we give it to the feds, we're out of this deal and the organization is still out the money."

"I don't think we'll be out of hot water that easy," I said.

"Me neither," Jim Bob said from across the way. "It's not just about the money with these guys. For them, they get it back or they don't, they aren't going to like us much either way. Especially you guys. They know who you two are. Me and Tonto, maybe we can just go home, put our feet up."

"But you won't," Leonard said.

"Of course not," Jim Bob said. "Well, speaking for me, anyway."

"My favor isn't done till the job is done," Tonto said. "And it's not like I got kids waiting at the house. So count me in too."

◆

The Louisiana border wasn't far, and neither was Shreveport, so that's the way we went after we found a quiet place to switch license plates on the Escalade and the van again, doing it out in the rain.

I thought about what would happen if we were pulled over and for some reason a cop wanted to take a look and found the stuff under the flooring; the van was packed with enough weapons and license plates that the four of us could go up for about three thousand years wearing thumbscrews and without possibility of parole.

We drove into Louisiana, and not much longer after that, made Shreveport. Stopping at a filling station we got some gas, then we went to a nice hotel and spent some of the Dixie Mafia's money to put us in a connecting room with the kids, and to put Jim Bob and Tonto in a room together.

We had our clothes in overnight bags that we had left in the van, and we carried those into the elevator, and the kids carried their two suitcases, one of which, the girl's, was on rollers. Leonard carried the heavy duffel bag of money over his shoulder. When we got to the room, which was on a high floor in the hotel, Leonard and I pulled off our slickers, and then the four of us took turns taking showers in the two bathrooms and dressing in clean clothes. The way the suite was set up, there was a bedroom on either end with a bathroom in it, and in the middle was a big room with a couch and television set and chairs, and there was a kitchenette. Through sliding doors was a covered deck surrounded by Plexiglas. It gave us a good view of the city and the casinos and hotels.

After looking at a menu, we ordered up some bowls of chili and a pot of coffee, which seemed like a pretty damn good idea after the cold and the rain, and we went out on the protected deck to sit at the table there while we waited. A short time later, a waiter arrived pushing a wheeled table and we had him take it out on the deck, where the four of us sat and ate and drank our coffee with very little to say.

The day was dark and the lights turning on inside and outside the hotels and casinos on the strip made everything look surreal and strange through the rain. As we sat and ate, and gathered our thoughts, and let the food seep into us and renew us, night dropped down over the city and the multicolored lights appeared brighter than before and almost Christmas-like through the deluge.

I guess we sat there for nearly a half hour before I felt like I was actually going to live. Still, my back hurt where I had been slammed into the wall, and my head hurt where the shelf had cracked me, and when I had taken a shower and looked in the mirror, I was no longer surprised at the way people had looked at me in the lobby, the way the little guy behind the hotel desk had stared at me. I thought it was the old rain slicker that smelled like fish, and that most certainly was part of it, but my face looked like it had been through a buzz saw. Leonard, being darker of skin, didn't look so wounded if you didn't look right at him, but by the time we finished our meal one of his eyes had swollen near shut, and he was starting to look like an ebony Cabbage Patch doll with an attitude. I had found some aspirin in my shaving kit and took four of them, shaved while I was in there, and it was a tender job. When I looked at my hand, I noticed it was trembling slightly. I managed to cut myself only a little, brushed my teeth and went out and got a look at everyone else.

Spruced up, Tim was a pretty good-looking kid, and Katie was the sort of girl that if she told you she was a model for a clean-cut catalog like JCPenney's, you'd believe her. Even with her hair cut close like that, she was a knockout. Coltish in white shorts, with long legs and that long neck and a way of moving that made you wish you were young and single and cool and had a pocketful of money. Maybe enough to steal money and a car from your dad.

Out on the deck, I sat down and said, "We can tie you two up, or you can act like you got some sense and get a good night's sleep. Thing is, you'll be better off with us than out there on your own."

"We'll do what you say," Katie said, and looked at Tim. He nodded.

"It's for your own good," I said. "We don't want anything to happen to you. You're kind of our calling card for better treatment concerning a problem we have. You and the money. Just listen to us and do what we say, and everything will be all right."

"You won't let anything happen to us?" Katie asked.

"No, we won't."

"You promise?" she said.

"Yep," I said. "I promise."

She looked at Leonard. He smiled. "When he promises, or I promise, baby girl, we're promising together."

43

The kids got one bedroom, and Leonard won the other due to a coin toss. I got the couch. It was a good way to make sure the kids didn't get a wild hair up their asses and want to sneak out in the middle of the night. I doubted that would be the case, but insurance seemed like a good idea.

Leonard helped me move the couch close to the front door, which was the only way out of the room, and then I picked up the phone and called over to Jim Bob and Tonto's room to see how they were doing. Jim Bob was watching TV and he said Tonto had gone over to one of the casinos.

We bantered a little, but neither of us was really up for it. After I hung up the phone, Leonard and I took some time to clean and oil the guns we had with a little kit I carried in my overnight bag.

After that, Leonard went to bed and I got a pillow and blanket and turned out the lights and lay on the couch and went to sleep immediately. It was a deep sleep, but there were bad things down there in the deep with me, and so I came awake about three a.m. I lay there for a while, then finally sat up, and saw that Tim was out on the deck, sitting at the table looking at all the lights, which were clearer now, because the rain had stopped at last.

Pulling on my pants, not bothering to turn on the light, I went out there barefoot, and when I pulled the sliding door back, he turned in a kind of panic.

"It's me," I said.

"I don't know who I was expecting."

"Probably the guy you saw killed today. I keep thinking he's going to come back from the dead."

"Tough guy like you thinks that, I don't feel so bad."

"Don't fool yourself, kid. I'm not that tough."

"You look tough."

"I look tired, that's what I look."

I sat down at the table, and Tim said, "I couldn't sleep. Katie, she can sleep anytime. No matter what's happened, she can sleep. I wonder why that is?"

"I'm like you," I said. "Brett, my girlfriend, she's like Katie. We can have an argument, or something can go wrong that will stress me out and I won't be able to sleep, but she can lay down and hibernate like a bear."

Tim nodded. He said, "I really didn't mean to cause trouble."

"You know what your father does for a living."

"You know I do. For some time now."

"You know he has people to answer to."

"Sure. I just didn't think it would amount to this. I thought they'd be mad and he'd be mad at me, and what I did was a kind of vengeance."

"For the work he does?"

"It's not work. It's drugs and whores."

"I agree with you. It's not work and it's not good. You should have just run off with the girl. That said, my bet is her parents are worried sick about her."

"I'm sure they got the cops out after her," he said.

"The cops, the FBI, and us."

"What happens to the money?"

"The FBI gets it."

"And what do they do with it?"

"Good question. Three hundred thousand dollars is lot to do with."

"Three hundred thousand?" Tim said. "It's more than that."

* * *

I went into the living room with Tim trailing along behind me. I got the duffel bag with the money out of the closet and dragged it out and opened it up and poured the money on the floor. It was a mixture of hundred-dollar bills and twenties, some tens and fives.

I said, “Get down on the floor there with me, and let’s count it.”

We did that, and when we had it counted and in stacks, I said, “Just short of five hundred thousand dollars. That the way you had it figured?”

“Sure. I’ve counted it a few times. It was five hundred thousand when we started. We been living on some of it.”

“But your dad is saying three hundred thousand is missing.”

Tim shook his head. “I don’t understand.”

“I don’t know either, but I tell you what. Let’s put it back in the bag and put it away and go to sleep. Tomorrow we’ll see if something comes to us.”

* * *

Lying on the couch I thought about the money, and I thought about what we had been asked to do, and I thought about Hirem. Something was niggling at the back of my mind, but I wasn’t able to grasp what it was. I’d feel as if I almost had hold of it, and then it would move away from my grasp. I fell asleep dreaming of Big Guy coming out of the water with most of his head missing, climbing into the boat and onto the platform and chasing Leonard and me along the lake shore, and when I’d look back at him, he’d be wearing that minnow bucket over his head.

44

Next morning, Jim Bob joined us in our room for breakfast. Tonto was still out on the town. He hadn't come in last night. We ate out on the deck. It was fun spending someone else's money.

The lights were no longer on and the rain had gone, but the day was gray and the air was misty. Everything that had looked bright and amazing the night before now looked grim and sad, sort of sordid, like a used condom tossed in the gutter. Tim and Katie finished up eating and went back to the bedroom. They looked as glum as a couple of coffin carriers.

"Dumb kids," Jim Bob said.

"Love is dumb," I said, "and sometimes that's what I like about it."

Leonard tossed a thumb at me. "He's so cute."

"So Tonto's out on the town?"

Jim Bob grinned, said, "Funny guy, that Tonto."

"Yeah, ha, ha," I said.

"He kills people and then goes gambling," Jim Bob said. "Of course, I haven't lost my appetite."

"None of us have," I said, and then I told everyone about the money.

"That's a lot more money than your man said was missing," Jim Bob said.

"Yep," I said, "and I smell a rat about the size of a possum covered in slime."

Jim Bob poured himself some coffee and looked out at the misty morning. "You know, I got a kind of idea about what's going on here."

"There's a little something coming to me too," Leonard said. "A guy tells us there's three hundred thousand dollars and there's more than that, you got to wonder if it's that big of a miscount on his part—about what's missing, I mean—or he's just a goddamn liar."

"Yeah," Jim Bob said. "I think the thing is your man, Hirem, he made a special side deal with two FBI agents that doesn't involve the agency. You two go out and do the dirty work, bring the money back, not having counted it, and they slice them off a nice piece, turn in the three hundred thousand Hirem said was missing, and they get as good a deal as they can find for him in the system, witness protection, and they promise to protect the kid, and you two get out from under your charges. If you two decide to keep the money, then you're fugitives and you got this charge hanging over your head they could manipulate out of being self-defense and into being murder. You could go up for a long time."

"They could pull that trick anyway," Leonard said.

"Yeah," Jim Bob said, "but the way they see it is it'd be better for everyone all around if they got their money and Hirem got his deal and you two went back to being you two, which is kind of a full-time job."

Leonard and I touched fists. "Yeah, baby," Leonard said.

◆

About an hour later there was a knock at the door, and being paranoid, I carried my pistol with me and looked out the peephole. It was Tonto.

When I let him in he looked as fresh as he had the day before, and he was carrying a newspaper under his arm. He followed me out to the deck and sat in a chair and put the paper on the table, and poured himself a cup of coffee. He said, "You know that woman you rented the boat from?"

"Yeah," I said.

"You won't have to pay for that boat sinking. She's dead."

He reached over and flipped the paper open, scanned it briefly, put his finger on an article. I picked it up and read it. It said the woman had been found dead in her store, shot through the forehead. One of her fingers had been amputated.

I read this aloud, and when I finished, Leonard said, “Damn. I think somehow this is our fault.”

“I think someone wanted to know where we went,” I said, “and she didn’t want to tell, and whoever wanted to know cut off a finger to show they were serious, and then when they got the information, they shot her as a cleanup procedure.”

“What I don’t understand,” Leonard said, “is why didn’t she just tell them? She didn’t owe us a thing.”

“Her own ethics, I suppose,” I said. “You can’t just let anyone come into a novelty shop and push you around. Next thing you know, you’ll be giving the plastic dog crap away because bullies want you to.”

“Damn,” Leonard said.

“I guess our friends in the brown Ford were watching us when we rented the boat,” I said.

“Hell,” Tonto said, “I’m glad those guys are dead. They were kind of spooky. I thought I was kind of spooky, but those guys—”

“You are spooky,” I said.

“But sweet around the eyes,” Leonard said.

“Thing is, boys, there might be another player,” Jim Bob said. “Reason we didn’t see a brown Ford all the time was because it wasn’t just a brown Ford following us.”

“You mean we were being double-teamed,” Leonard said. “That’s why they could keep up with us, why they could watch us and we didn’t see them. They decided to let us know about the Ford, put all our thinking there, but there was someone else watching.”

“Why didn’t they join with the Ford at the cabin?” I asked.

“Maybe they got their wires crossed, something as simple as that. Whatever, it didn’t go according to plan.”

“So whoever was the backup is on our tail now,” Leonard said. “Maybe the ninja Hirem warned us about.”

“There will be someone else,” Tonto said, “and maybe someone beyond that, but it won’t be quite so James Bond as all that. I’m going to get some sleep. I suggest we take another night to get it together, maybe go out and get a steak and have a little entertainment, find some poontang that don’t cost more than an arm and a leg and won’t give us the ball rot, then we head back.”

“Since the poontang isn’t USDA-inspected, I’ll pass on that,” Jim Bob said. “Come to think of it, these days, not so sure that inspection would mean much.”

“Brett doesn’t let me date,” I said.

“Battin’ for a different team,” Leonard said.

“Whatever,” Tonto said. “Me, I’m going to get some sleep.”

Tonto finished off his coffee and went out.

“He’s even more confident than me,” Jim Bob said, “and that’s a scary thing. I’ve been around, and I’ve seen some things too, just like you boys, and what I’ve learned the hard way is confidence is a lovely thing, but too much of it will get you cut a new asshole.”

45

It wasn't that hard to convince Leonard and me to stay another day. We weren't the type that got to spend nights in good hotels and eat hotel food on murdering scumbags' money. I was also stiff and sore from our encounter with Big Guy and not exactly in the mood to deal with much.

That next night Tonto talked us into going to a karaoke bar he had found, and it wasn't far from the strip and it was pretty nice, and purposely ill lit, except for the stage where karaoke took place. We all went: Tonto, Jim Bob, Tim and Katie, and Leonard and I. They had alcoholic drinks, and I had one Diet Coke after another. I had long ago given up liquor, at least for the most part, and felt better having done so. Still, on this night I was thinking maybe I might have a whiskey, but the closest I got to one was thinking about it.

We were in the front row near the stage and the karaoke was as painful as it usually is.

And then one fine-looking blond woman came up and set her little white purse on the stage in front of her. She wasn't very big, looked to weigh about one-twenty, but was probably a little heavier because she was muscled in a lean sort of way that certainly gave her more weight, but it was weight carried in all the right places. She was young-looking, mid-twenties maybe, wearing white pedal pushers with white shoes with thick elevated heels, and she had on a white top. Her hair was gold as fresh wheat and she had a very fine face, and even from where we sat, we could see that her eyes were bright blue and she had a killer smile, and in the lights from the stage she looked as if all she needed was wings on her back and a message from Zeus.

Way it worked was the singers picked their tunes, and they were supposed to get two songs if they wanted it, and she got up and sang, and the thing was, she was good, very good. The first song was “Driving Wheel,” and she did it justice. Her voice was strong and it kind of surprised some of the drinkers, who actually shut up and listened. A few couples began to dance, including Tim and Katie. When the song ended there was a lot of applause, and we, out there in the front row, were giving up a lot of it ourselves. While she had been singing, she had been looking at Tonto, and I glanced to see if he had noticed, and he had. He looked like a little kid that had just gotten attention from the best-looking girl in class.

The second song was Dion’s “The Wanderer,” and she knocked it out of the park, changing certain words to fit a woman’s point of view, which made it clear to me she had done the song before and had given it thought. She moved a little as she sang, not much but a little, and with this girl not much was plenty. There was a seductive quality to her moves without them being overdone, and she had her eyes locked on Tonto.

Jim Bob leaned over to me, said, “Lucky sonofabitch.”

“What’s he got that I haven’t got?” I said.

“No girlfriend that will kill him, and from the size of him, about two extra inches on his dick.”

“Oh yeah, there’s that,” I said.

When the song was over there was applause again, and she ended up doing a third song, “Jim Dandy,” and then she stepped down and a guy about half in the bag got up and sang a bad version of some tune I didn’t recognize. The girl walked by Tonto and smiled at him. He said, “Buy you a drink?”

“Come to my table?” she said.

He did just that, and though I was happy for him, and wouldn’t have bothered with her had she been interested in me because I loved Brett, I was also a little jealous. A woman like that could make a Baptist preacher kill his wife and set fire to his church. I glanced over and saw Tonto with her. He was helping her into a brown leather coat, and the way she stood she was out of the light and cloaked in shadow, and the light from the back door was on Tonto, and his dark face seemed oddly cherubic. I turned away and looked out at the dance floor.

Tim and Katie were still dancing, and the way they looked at each other, held each other tight, made me miss Brett something terrible. I was thinking about this when Leonard said, “I’m thinking of getting up there and singing.”

“Now or never,” I said.

Leonard caught a turn and got up and sang Charley Pride’s “Is Anybody Goin’ to San Antone,” and he was good. He got some applause, and when he climbed down, we exchanged a few words, and then I looked where Tonto and the girl had been. Gone.

I said to Leonard and Jim Bob, “I think Tonto is trying to round up the cattle, and here we sit. If he goes off all night and drags in tomorrow about noon, I’m going to be pissed. He said we were leaving in the morning.”

“Women will make you do crazy things,” Jim Bob said, pushing his hat back on his head. “You got a sane guy, goes about his business, and then that gets wagged in his face, sanity and business go out the window. And for all his professionalism, I get the feeling Tonto can be pulled around by his ying-yang.”

“But not us,” I said.

“No sir, not us,” Jim Bob said.

“Ha!” Leonard said.

“You know,” Jim Bob said, “maybe it’s a small thing, but the money, it’s hidden under the floorboard of the van, and Tonto decides he’s going to go off with missy, I don’t like the idea of it being there. No biggie, but I’m going to see if I can catch him. I’ll pretend it’s laundry or something so the gal won’t know.”

“Let’s all see if we can catch him,” I said. “I’m ready to go back to the hotel.”

Leonard went out on the floor and got the dancing kids, and as we were starting out, Jim Bob said, “You know, Tonto would probably have said something to us, he was leaving.”

“Maybe,” I said. “But we got two vehicles. He’s probably thinking we could ride tight we had to. In fact, he’s probably not thinking that much. Not with the good head.”

“Point,” Jim Bob said.

*

We were parked out back, so we went out the back way. The Escalade was next to the van in the lot, and when I looked at the van, I saw the interior light was on, but I didn't see Tonto or the girl. The air was chilly, and our breath came out in clouds.

Jim Bob said, "This whole deal smells funny all of a sudden."

We looked around the lot and didn't see anybody, just cars. Pulling our guns, we put them by our sides and walked out to the van. Jim Bob went around the front and I stayed on the right-hand side, and Leonard went around back. I told the kids, "Stand back."

They went over and stood on the other side of the Escalade.

I looked in the side window and saw Tonto lying facedown across the backseat. He looked as if he had just stretched out. His pants were down and his ass was like a big moon. I took a deep breath. Leonard opened the door on the other side the rest of the way—that's why the interior light was on, the door was partially open.

Jim Bob and I went around and joined Leonard and we looked down at Tonto. His face was turned to one side and his ear was full of blood. Jim Bob leaned in and looked and said, "Ah, goddamn it to hell. The woman."

Leonard leaned in and looked. "Something sharp, right in the ear. Ice pick maybe."

"Where the hell did she keep it?" I said.

"Purse," Jim Bob said.

Leonard checked Tonto's pulse, looked at us, shook his head. Blood was now running out of Tonto's ear and down his cheek, collecting on the seat.

"Just happened," Jim Bob said, turning to look around the parking lot. "Seconds ago. Damn."

We had put the duffel bag with the money in the back under one of the traps in the floor. We went around and looked. The trap was open. The money was gone.

"Knew where to look," Jim Bob said. "Guesswork, maybe, but good guesswork."

We closed the door, cutting the interior light, put our guns away, and all of us went over and got in the Escalade, Leonard behind the wheel. Jim Bob, sitting next to him, said, “I was just starting to like that asshole.”

“He lived this long,” Leonard said, “and then he decided to throw in with me and Hap. That was his mistake.”

“I can’t disagree with that,” Jim Bob said. “Look, you guys, you go back to the hotel and get the bags, and I’ll meet up with you later. Don’t worry about me. I’m going to drive the van and take Tonto somewhere.”

“And where will that be?” I said.

“I don’t know. But I’m not just leaving him. He’s part of the team. He’s got someplace, or I’ll find someplace. Marvin will know something. He was our connection to Tonto.”

“We should have gone home,” Leonard said.

“We should have done a lot of things,” Jim Bob said. “You guys, you take the kids back, the money. Don’t go back to your place, Hap. Call me at some point. I’ll meet up with you.”

“We—we have a blanket in the back,” Tim said, “you want to cover him.”

“Yeah,” I said, “that’s a good idea.”

“We ought to look for her,” I said.

“No point in that,” Jim Bob said. “She’s a pro. That little darling is cool as an ice tray. She let him think he was about to throw the spear in the bull’ s-eye, and then she got him. Had to have practice at it. One good shot with something sharp in the ear, and he never knew what hit him.”

Me and Leonard and Jim Bob got out and I had the blanket. Leonard gave the car keys to Tim, said, “We’re going to cover him up, you hear? Stay in the car.”

Tim nodded. Katie took Tim’s arm. “Cold,” she said. “I feel so cold.”

“You want,” Leonard said, “warm the car up.”

We went back to the van, and when we were sure no one was in the lot, we opened the door and pulled Tonto’s pants up, got the van keys out of his pocket, and left him facedown with the blanket over him. Jim Bob shook the keys, said, “I’m going to take him now.”

Jim Bob got in behind the wheel and pulled away. We watched him go.

When he was out of the lot, Leonard turned to me, said, “Hey, I didn’t unlock the Escalade. It was already unlocked.”

A chill went over me that wasn’t due to the weather. We had been so distracted by Tonto, we hadn’t really noticed, not then, and that meant she had jacked the car open, and then got out of there fast. Maybe when we came out the back we surprised her, came out and didn’t give her time to lock things back

I turned toward the Escalade. Tim had climbed behind the wheel and Katie was sitting up front with him. We started walking that way quickly, and then I saw Tim move slightly, and though I couldn’t see what he was doing, I knew he was about to start the car, get some warmth from the heater.

I started to run, but then the car came apart in what seemed like slow motion and the parking lot turned red and there was a hot wind that picked me up and carried me away.

⁂

I was lying on my stomach, had the feeling I had been out for a moment. I rose up on my hands. My ears were ringing. I looked at where the Escalade had been sitting. It was a gutted wreck and flames were licking at it and I could see two dark shapes in what had been the front seat, burning. There was nothing to be done there.

Glancing around, I saw Leonard. He was lying on his face and he wasn’t moving, not making a sound. The back of his coat was feeding a little blaze. I tried to get up, but didn’t have the ability. Crawling toward him, I got there and slapped at his back with my hands, putting out the flames on his coat. Reaching out, I touched his pulse. He had one. Grateful for that, I put my face down on the cold parking lot cement and passed out.

46

The air was a little chill and my ears were ringing and throbbing and I didn't feel so good. I turned my head. It was a chore equal to the labors of Hercules. It was a hospital bed. I tried to call out, but my mouth was so dry I could only croak. I closed my eyes and went back to sleep.

◆

When I awoke this time there was a man in a chair by my bed, and I knew him. Drake. He looked at me like he really wanted to be somewhere else. He said, "When you two boys fuck up, you like to compound it, don't you?"

I didn't answer. I thought about nodding, but was afraid my head would fall off. Overall, I felt as if I had been rode hard and put up wet, and then shot for having bad ankles.

Drake got up and poured some water from a pitcher into a plastic glass with a straw. He brought it over and took hold of a little control on a cable and touched it. The head of the bed raised up, and when it was positioned, he stopped it and held the water for me to sip.

It was the best water I had ever had. I was convinced it was the best water anyone ever had. When my throat was wet enough, I managed to say, "Leonard?"

"They have to dig some more car shrapnel out of his thighs, but he's pretty much in the same condition you are, which is burned a little and banged up a lot."

"How bad?" I said.

"Not that bad. Not so bad the two of you won't recover and retain your native good looks."

"What are you doing here?"

“I’m asking myself that,” Drake said. “Thing is, they found you boys in the parking lot, and whoever was in the car. That would be Hirem’s boy and the girlfriend, right?”

I nodded.

“That’s all I know about the deal,” Drake said. “You were supposed to find them and find some money.”

“Batting zero,” I said.

“I figured.”

“Again, how come you’re here?”

“Your license, Leonard’s. Had your address on it. My town. So they called me, see if I could find out who you were, what you were doing here. I knew both of you, of course.”

“And you bothered to come?”

“I’m trying to figure why. I was thinking you two got off easy, and then they call, tell me what happened, and I’m thinking maybe not so easy. So I call a contact I got in the FBI, and he says you two are off their charts, officially anyway. But some things have changed, and they’re feeling kindly.”

“What’s changed?” I said.

“Someone popped those two FBI agents, and that same someone didn’t do Hirem any good. Tortured him.”

“They wanted to know where we were searching.”

“That’s right, and it looks like they found out. And any information he would have given the FBI, any money might have been recovered from illicit business, they aren’t getting that now. But the main thing was the names Hirem would have named didn’t get named, and now there’s nothing but his corpse. Done deal.”

“I think the bad guys killed a lady named Annie too,” I said, and told Drake about it.

He said, “The FBI has decided not to forget you. They’ve decided your heart was in the right place. They’re going to make sure there are no charges.”

“If there were charges,” I said, “what would they be for?”

“They have no idea, and neither do I, but we figure you did something. And they figure the something you did was to their benefit. And they figure it was a good thing they found these four guys in a Ford over near Lake O' the Pines, and they were good and dead and they all had records, and somehow, they think it just might be possible they are connected to problems they have, and it just might be possible you and Leonard solved those problems. As for the explosion, and the guns they found on you, you guys are getting a clean slate soon as you're able to get out of here. There's local cops watching your rooms. FBI is sponsoring that indirectly. Directly, they aren't doing squat, and everything I told you they would deny. They found out you had a room in a hotel, that there were two rooms. One for the kids?"

I lied. "Yep."

"They had your bags sent over, after they went through them. Oh, by the way. The local newspaper, it read that four people had died in that blast. That would include you and Leonard. So there are some bad people think you're dead. At least for the moment. Best just to take this as a freebie and not ask any questions."

"How long have we been here?"

"Three days."

"Damn," I said.

"What about Brett?" Drake said.

"She doesn't know what happened," I said. "I'd like to keep it that way for now. She's out of sight and maybe out of mind of these tin-pot gangsters. She knew I was hurt, or Leonard, she'd be here. I don't want that. Not now."

"I can understand that."

"This isn't exactly your jurisdiction," I said.

"Yeah, I got no authority, but I got concern for my citizens, and that includes you two jackasses. And my friend in the FBI, I'm sort of his and the agency's unofficial mouthpiece. What they want you to do is be finished."

"All right," I said.

"And mean it."

"You know, the person who blew up the car, they got the money."

"It wouldn't be stashed away somewhere, would it?" Drake said.

“Not by us.”

“That person blew up the car, you know who it is?”

“No,” I said, and I didn’t mention Jim Bob or Tonto. I was hoping he didn’t know about them, and I was hoping the FBI didn’t either. I didn’t mention the woman who had killed Tonto. She was mine. I didn’t mention the money had been in the van, figured Drake would logically think it had been taken from the Escalade, maybe our hotel room.

“These cops watching you, they’re only going to be here one more day. So you got to get well quick or hope nobody from the bad side of life is hunting you two down.”

“I’m feeling perky already,” I said, and this was true.

“Another thing, no charge for the hospital stay. FBI, they’re giving you a gift out of some funds they don’t have and didn’t give you. Understand?”

I agreed that I did. I said, “I’m surprised the FBI even cared.”

“Covering their ass is all,” Drake said, standing up. “Well, I’ve had it with you two. I’m going home. And next time I see you, if it’s just a parking ticket, I’m going to see there’s some way to throw you under the jail.”

He was almost to the door when I said, “Drake.”

He turned.

“Thanks, man.”

He nodded and went out.

* * *

I lay there and tried to put it together. Jim Bob had been right. There had been someone else in on the deal. Maybe an accomplice to our Dracula, Big Guy, or maybe as hired backup. Could have even been someone Big Guy didn’t know about. Someone to watch the watchers. Did that watcher do the torturing of Annie and Hirem and the FBI folks, or was it Big Guy and his pals? Probably never figure that one out.

Bottom line, the she devil was on our ass when we left Lake O’ the Pines, and Tonto was not quite the super ace he thought. Or he'd just gotten tired and, in the end, horny. She lured him out there and killed him and took the money. She had seen the kids and me and Leonard in the Escalade, and we were the hired hits. Anyone else got in the way like Tonto, they had to go. But she figured one bomb would take Tim and Katie and me and Leonard out. And if she was lucky, it would take the van too, Jim Bob, or anyone else in that wrong place at the wrong time.

She had made one error. Leaving the door on the Escalade unlocked. Probably because we came out more quickly than she expected and she had to get away, forgot the door. Had seen us come out and was gone like a ghost before we knew it. Bottom line was she had succeeded with the bomb. Set it so when the engine cranked, or when the heater was turned on, it would blow. It was just luck Leonard and I had survived.

I really hated that bitch.

Good-looking as all get-out, but still a bitch.

47

A little over two weeks later and out of the hospital we joined Marvin, and we all went out to Arizona. Leonard had tried to patch things up with John again, but John had got religion, and when that happens, common sense, logic, and the obvious fly out the window of the brain like a horde of bees.

Jim Bob we had talked to, and he had taken care of the van and Tonto. Turned out there was no real home where Tonto lived, just a cell phone number that wouldn't be answered again and a post office box where any mail he might get would pile up. Marvin told Jim Bob all of this, and Jim Bob took Tonto in his van and drove the van off to a place run by people he knew who owned an auto farm, old cars with a car crusher that made them flat. They used the crusher with Tonto in the van and then they put the cube of metal in the back of a truck and it was dumped in a deep wet place not far from Houston. Jim Bob said the people did it for him were longtime friends and that there were other crushed cars with crushed people in them in the deep waters nearby. He said he was on call if we needed him again, and we might, but I didn't want him now; didn't want to put anyone else into what we had created. It was our mess to fix.

There was one other thing. He said he had found the photograph of me and Leonard and Cindy the Bear in the van before he had it crushed with Tonto in it, and he mailed the photo to us.

Leonard and I, and Brett, we were all in Arizona now, but we weren't all in the same place. Marvin and his family were together with relatives, and we had been there to visit but the atmosphere was not warm. Gadget couldn't look us in the eye, and her mother and grandmother and great-grandmother made us feel as though we were only begrudgingly welcome. We didn't stay long. Brett, who had been there, was glad to leave; her ass whipping of Gadget hung over the household like a little dark cloud. We were given a rental the family owned that was empty. It was a condo with a little backyard next to other little backyards. There was limited furniture in the joint, just a bed, a couch, a table, and some chairs, and Leonard slept on the couch. On this day we were all sitting outside and the weather was cool but not too cold. We were wearing coats and sitting at a table, Brett and I close together holding hands. On the table were some empty plates that had recently held tuna fish sandwiches with apple cut up in them, heavy on mayonnaise, and there had been potato chips and coffee. I was sitting there enjoying the thought of what I had eaten, simple but good, and thinking about some of the vanilla wafers we had in the house.

“So, this hit person, she thinks you’re dead?” Brett said.

“For now. But before word gets out, we thought we might go see her in person.”

“You think you could hurt a woman, Hap … on purpose?”

“Hey, he punched Gadget,” Leonard said.

“You’re talking about killing her, though,” Brett said.

“Woman, man, shemale, they come after me with a gun, a knife, a pointed stick, I don’t like it. And I don’t want her coming around again. Thing is, she’s the best they’ve sent after us, and it’s only luck I’m here to hold your lovely hand.”

“And you didn’t get your dick blown off,” Brett said.

“That too,” I said.

“I consider that an important part of our relationship,” she said.

“As do I,” I said.

“You got it blown off,” Leonard said, “you’d be holding hands with a plastic love doll. Brett would be out of here.”

“Not true,” Brett said. “He’s still got a tongue.”

“That’s a little too much from the instructional manual,” Leonard said.

“Yeah, since when are you grossed out by anything?” I said.

“Since I’ve had a tragic near-death experience. Did you know, when I was knocked out on the ground out there, shrapnel in my shapely loins and lower stomach, I saw a white light, and I wanted to go to it, because when I got there, and if God was there, I was gonna whip his ass for what he'd let happen to us."

Me and Leonard touched fists.

Brett leaned over and kissed me. Her eyes were misty. I said, "I'm fine."

"We could stay here," she said. "I could get a nurse job, you could find work. Arizona is nice."

"Need those East Texas trees," I said. "And besides, I couldn't live with myself I didn't find that bitch and put a bullet in her head. And yeah, I can do it, woman or no woman. I don't want to live under the umbrella of her coming back. She thinks she's safe and we're dead, but I'm going to find her."

"Ditto to that," Leonard said.

"Can I go back with you?" Brett said.

"You do whatever you want to do, as always, but I'd rather you not. I think it'll be easier you don't. Leonard and I have been in this kind of thing before."

"Maybe not just like this," Leonard said.

"All right," I said. "Not just like this, but we can handle ourselves, now that we know what we're up against."

"That didn't sound all that convincing," Brett said.

"Well," I said, "I guess I'm not all that convinced. But I'd prefer you stay here, let us go after her."

"What was she like?" Brett asked.

"We don't know. All we know is what we told you, but when it comes to getting the job done, she's something. The whole thing with Tonto, that probably happened so quick he was still getting his hard-on. And the way she wired that bomb up, she's experienced."

"Didn't look that old, either," Leonard said.

"No, she didn't."

"You have some idea how to find her?" Brett said.

"Yep," I said, "I do. Let me ask you something—how's Gadget?"

"You could feel the cold air back at their place, couldn't you?"

"Yep."

"Marvin, he tried to make me feel welcome, but it got so I expected the women of the household to jump me. Except for Gadget. She had had her butt whipped soundly. I tell you, I was ready to take them all on, do a little head knocking."

"You're just the woman to do it," I said.

"Damn right," she said.

"You can stay here, alone?"

"Better than at their place. The atmosphere there is poisonous."

"Good. And now, Leonard and I, and because you are one of us by proxy, should celebrate our survival from a big car bomb with some vanilla wafers."

"Nope," Leonard said. "Ain't gonna happen. I got hungry last night, and I felt I needed a personal celebration."

"You ate them all?" Brett said.

"Everything but the sack, and I licked that."

"You turd," Brett said.

"And there are no more Dr Peppers. I had a kind of festival of life."

48

Marvin wanted to go back with us, but we made him feel bad about his leg and told him what a burden he would be and it was best he stayed out of action; it was true, of course. We did get some information we needed from him, though, and then we were in Leonard's car and he drove us back to East Texas in a two-and-a-half-day run, except for a four-hour stop in Cross Plains, Texas, where we slept a couple hours in a motel, and then we had to go over and see the Robert E. Howard house because Leonard liked his Conan stories and wouldn't hear of passing it up. I tried to explain to him that we were in a hurry because we had to find and shoot someone, but he wasn't moved, so we did a tour there and then got back on the road.

In the car Leonard said, "I get killed, I know I've seen where one of my favorite authors lived and shot himself to death."

"You get killed, what you saw isn't going to matter."

"Good point," Leonard said.

◆

With the information we had gotten from Marvin, we drove to my place briefly to get a few things, including a sawed-off shotgun, handguns, and a deer rifle. Then we drove over to No Enterprise in the dead of night, on out to where Marvin told us Conners lived. As Marvin had explained, it was out in the country some, and you could take a road that went up a hill, and you could look down on Conners' place, which was on a few acres with a little pond and a lot of junked cars that in the night looked like huge insects. We drove up there behind a little clutch of pines and some gnarly persimmon trees and sat. There were no lights in the house, which meant Conners could be asleep, but there wasn't a cop car in the yard, so we figured he wasn't home yet. Probably out doing something corrupt.

Being true professionals, and having driven really far, we both fell asleep.

When we awoke the day was bright and the sun was high. I looked out the windshield between the trees and saw the house looked the same. Still no cop car. We got out and crapped in the bushes and wiped on napkins we had in the car, and a little later on we took pee breaks and drank some bottled water and peed some more. That's the trouble when you're an over-forty tough guy. You have to pee a lot.

We got out of the car and washed our hands with some of the bottled water, and washed our faces, and tried to figure if we were well hid up on the hill, and decided as long as no one came up the little hunting road, we were snug as bugs in a rug. From down there, Conners' house, the only way we could be seen was if someone was looking for us.

We had some vanilla cookies with us, and a couple of cold burritos, and we ate those for lunch and drank some more of the water. If our guy didn't show soon, we'd be out of food, water, and napkins on which to wipe our asses.

A hawk flew into a tree above us, and we looked up at it and it looked down at us. We didn't worry it any. It was a large hawk and it cast a big shadow in the cold, bright day. Bored with us, it flew off.

We took turns taking walks along the hunting road to keep our circulation up, and then we took turns sleeping in the backseat of the car while the other watched the house below.

After a couple of hour naps, I felt pretty good, and got a paperback of an Andrew Vachss novel Leonard had in the car and read from that, and then it was his turn, and he read from it, losing my place in the process.

The sun dipped down and the night soaked in, and it got cold. I had slipped out of my jacket during the day, but now I was in it again, and we climbed out of the car and eased down among the trees, closer to the edge of the hill, and looked at the house and waited for some kind of revelation.

Leonard pulled his jacket around him and hunched his shoulders. He reached into his coat pocket and took out a blackjack and gave it to me. He said, “I got one, now you got one.”

“We are same alike,” I said.

“Only I am a handsome black color, and you are white of skin and small of dick.”

“Except for that, we’re same alike.”

Another hour or so passed, and then we saw headlights on the road below, coming toward the house. The road ran past the house, but it didn’t go far before it dead-ended, so we figured this had to be our man.

Sure enough, the car was a cop car and it pulled in the drive, and two men got out, dressed in cop clothes and holstered guns. One of them was Conners. He had looked big to me before, but recently I had seen Big Guy and he made everyone look small, even Conners. The guy with him was short and fat, but he had broad shoulders and carried himself in a manner that gave the impression he might be a load if you messed with him.

We, of course, were going to mess with both of them.

The fat guy was carrying a six-pack. They went inside the house.

Leonard said, “Ain’t that a shame. Man of the law buying beer, carrying it around in his patrol car.”

“Let’s go down and see can we have a little talk with them, maybe set them right on their civic duty.”

“All right.”

“But we don’t shoot anybody. I’m all worn out on shooting. At least until we get to our gal.”

“I will do my best,” Leonard said.

◆

Lights came on in the house as we walked down the hill and the lights were all concentrated in one place, and there was a thin white curtain at the window in the lighted room. We could see their shadows moving across the back of the curtain and eased up close to the house with our guns in hand.

I crept up to the window and looked. I could see through a crack in the curtain. They were sitting at a table and Conners was saying something that was making the fat man laugh.

Leonard slipped away from the window and went around back. I ducked under the window and slid over to the front porch and went up on it and nudged back the screen door and touched the knob, seeing if it was locked. It wasn't.

I took a deep breath, carefully turned the knob, and gently pressed the door back and edged in and then closed it without really pushing it all the way shut. Now I could hear them talking and I could see a slit of light that let me know there was a doorway and hallway and that the hallway led into the kitchen. I looked across the room, letting my eyes adjust, then made my approach through the opening across the way and down the hall. When I got to the lighted door I saw that the back door was at the far end of the hall, and that's where Leonard was. If it had been unlocked, he would have already been in.

With the gun held ready, I peeked around the corner and saw the fat man had his back to me and Conners was crossing to the refrigerator. I walked across the open doorway with my eyes on them, but made it all the way across without being seen. I tiptoed to the back door and figured out the lock by touch, and was able to twist it so that the sound it made was hardly noticeable. Then I opened the door and Leonard came in.

We went down the hall, and then with me in front, we stepped into the kitchen. When we did, Conners, who was coming back from the fridge, saw us and started to draw his gun. I said, "I wouldn't, unless you want a hole in your belly."

The fat man with his back to us dropped his hand to his holster. Leonard said, "That goes for you too, fat boy."

49

Leonard switched his gun to his other hand and reached in his pocket and pulled out the little blackjack and hit fat boy across the back of the neck hard enough to make him fall out of his chair and land on one knee.

"Goddamn," the fat man said, holding the back of his neck. "That hurt."

"No joke," Leonard said. "That's to show we mean business. We been shot at, beat on, nearly drowned, and had the shit scared out of us by some guns and Big Guy and a dead alligator, so we're in no mood to screw around."

Conners was still standing. I had my gun pointed at him. Leonard reached from behind and took Fat Boy's pistol away.

I said to Conners, "Unfasten your gun belt and let it drop."

While he did that, I kept my pistol pointed at him. When the belt hit the floor, I said, "Kick it my way."

He did and I picked it up and slung the belt over my shoulder, his gun at my back.

"Sit down, Conners," I said.

"Get up, fat man," Leonard said. "Find the chair."

When they were both seated, I went over and leaned on the refrigerator, said, "You know we heard you kind of set things up for shooters for the Dixie Mafia."

"They don't call themselves that," Conners said.

"I don't care if they call themselves the Dixie Bowling League. You know what I mean."

"You say," Conners said.

"Don't he love to talk?" Leonard said. "Hey, fat boy, ain't you got nothin' to say?"

“I don’t know a thing,” the fat man said. “I did, I wouldn’t tell you.”

“I think you would,” Leonard said, and swung the blackjack again, hitting Fat Boy on the neck, knocking him out of the chair.

“You just stay on the floor,” Leonard said. “It’ll save you the trouble of getting up.”

“You’re tough with that sap in your hand,” Conners said. “You wouldn’t be so tough without it.”

Leonard put the sap in his coat pocket and took off his coat. “We can see.”

“Nope,” I said. “I know you can whip him.”

“Yeah, but he don’t,” Leonard said.

The fat man on the ground said, “Conners would tie you in a knot.”

“See,” Leonard said. “He don’t know it either. Get up, Conners. Let’s you and me dance.”

“Not a good idea,” I said. “Having a macho queer moment. Don’t do it.”

Conners got up and I decided I wouldn’t shoot him. I pointed the gun at the fat man on the ground. “You crawl over this way a piece.”

Conners came around the table. Leonard moved a little to the side of the table, and then they were facing each other, six feet apart. Conners hulked over Leonard, though Leonard’s shoulders were easily as broad as his.

Conners had his hands up. So did Leonard. They stood that way for a long moment. Leonard said, “You waitin’ on an engraved invitation?”

Conners moved then, swung. Leonard ducked under it and hit Conners in the nuts with a right uppercut, then he swiveled and kicked at the inside of Conners’ leg, catching him just above the ankle. It brought him down.

Conners did a push-up and Leonard let him. When Conners was up, he said, “Them chink tricks ain’t gonna help you none.”

“They seem to be working all right,” Leonard said.

Conners came again, throwing a right cross that was so slow you could have gone out and bought a paper and been back in time to dodge it. It went over Leonard's right shoulder, and Leonard kicked out and caught Conners on the side of the leg, mid-thigh. The nerve cluster there lit up and Conners went down with a yelp. When he hit the floor, Leonard kicked him in the jaw. Conners fell on his back and groaned.

"You can get up if you want to," Leonard said.

I will say this, Conners could have just lain there, but he didn't. He got up and came again, and this time Leonard moved to the right and jabbed right-handed and caught Conners over the eye enough to make him step back, and then it was like a wolf at the slaughter. Leonard hooked Conners in the belly with a left, and then it was a double right jab to the face, and finally Leonard kicked out with his front leg and caught Conners in the lower abdomen and sent him flailing back against the table, which crashed underneath his weight, causing the fat man to slide on the floor and out of the way.

Conners lay in the wreckage of the table, bleeding from the mouth.

Leonard looked at Fat Boy. "Now, how about you?"

The fat man shook his head.

"Damn skippy," Leonard said, then looked at me. "That's what I meant to do to that big guy."

"Me too," I said, "but it didn't work out."

"Yeah, I just couldn't get warmed up."

"Was that it?"

Leonard toed the fat man a little, making him roll over on the floor so he could get to the refrigerator. He found a can of beer in there and brought it out and popped the top and took a foam-dripping swig. "There, assholes. I drink your beer. I kick your ass. And you will give us some information."

* * *

When Conners and the fat boy were back in their chairs, Leonard took the sap out of his pocket, said, "Just so you know, I'm ready to warm you up again."

“Tell us about the hit folk,” I said. “We’re tired of getting shot at. Tell us about who you sent after us, and just to make it easy on you, don’t say you don’t know what we’re talking about. Just talk or I’m going to give you to Leonard again.”

“We just do as we’re told,” Conners said.

“And why is that?” I said.

“Why do you think?”

“Money” I said, “and now that you’re in, you don’t want someone coming after you, am I right?”

“Something like that.”

“But you’re a bigger dog in all this than you’ve let on. You, and probably your fat friend here—certainly your fat friend—you pick the hitters, so you’re pretty well connected. What the fuck is your name, fat friend?”

“Sykes,” he said.

“I prefer Fat Boy,” I said. “Now, how goes it, Conners? How’s it work?”

“I’ve made some connections over the years,” Conners said. “I’m a cop. You meet people that know people, and you find you can make deals.”

“Sweet deals.”

Conners nodded.

“So, to get right to the fuckin’, no foreplay where is the woman you hired to kill us?”

“Woman?”

“Yep. She hit one of our pards, and blew up Hirem’s kid and girlfriend, and put me and Leonard in a hospital for a while, and just so you know, we’re mad.”

Conners smiled. “Vanilla Ride. I didn’t even know it was a woman. I got her contact a couple years back. She’s made ten hits for what you call the Dixie Mafia. She’s made hits for others. Made them through me. Sometimes those hits are more than one person. You two are supposed to be dead.”

“It wasn’t from want of trying,” I said.

“I’ve never even seen her, or a lot of the hitters. I got contacts, I told you.”

"Tell us how to contact Vanilla Ride. Me and Leonard thought we'd drop in, say hello."

"I contact her by mail. No e-mail. No phone number. I drop her a letter from a false address to a P.O. box, and the letter has names on it, some general information, where these people are. Then we get a FedEx from her with the names we gave her and she's got a line drawn through them when the job is done, and then the big dogs pay her at that P.O. box. She, huh? A woman. Now that's something. I thought Vanilla Ride was some big guy with a shotgun. And you guys, you were on her list with lines drawn through your names, drawing flies somewhere. That's what I was thinking, what I was hoping."

"She speculated a bit too much," Leonard said. "We're still here. Tired and pissed off, but here. She was on our tail, but she got cocky."

"Got a question," I said. "Did Vanilla Ride return the money?"

"No, not yet," Conners said. "Someday it'll just turn up on the right doorstep. No one will see who dropped it, it'll just show up. She knows everyone in the business, where they live, what they do. That's what makes her so deadly. Damn, a woman. Sounds like my kind of broad."

"What's the address?" I said.

"I give it to you, you'll kill us," Conners said.

"You don't give it to us I'll kill you," I said. "I'm in no mood to play games, man. Give me the address."

"You'll let us go?" Conners said.

"I don't want any more blood on my hands than I already have."

Leonard looked at me. I said, "I mean that, Leonard."

"Yeah," Leonard said. "I know you do."

"He wants us dead," Sykes said.

"Yep," Leonard said. "I do."

"So how's it gonna be?" Conners said.

"It's gonna be nice enough, you give us that address."

"It's a post office box in Arkansas."

"All right. Give it to us, and let me just say this. If we go on a wild-goose chase, or anyone gets on our tail, we will come right back to you and kill your asses dead, and then shoot you daily for a week just to make ourselves happy. Tell us what we want to know, this is a way you get out of it scot-free, but you screw with us, we hold a grudge."

"Hell, I hope you find her," Conners said. "No idea she was a woman, but you find her, from what I know of her work, you'll wish you hadn't."

"You tell us how to find her, you get to live," I said. "Hell, man, it's your choice."

Leonard looked at me like a puzzled dog, said, "They hired Vanilla Ride for the Dixie Mafia. She tried to kill us. What makes these assholes so special?"

"I want who hit our man and those kids and took the money and tried to blow us up, so I'm willing to trade."

"How do we know your word is good?" Conners said.

"You know as much as we know yours is good," I said. "Make a choice. Now."

50

Stopping by the all-night station/store in No Enterprise, we bought some traveling goods and filled up the gas tank and I looked for the guy in the garage, but he and his fuck book were not present and the door was locked. It was too late to work and too late to read. Maybe he was home doing what he had been reading about. Most likely he had the book in his left hand and himself in his right.

One of the things we bought was some bright blue stationery and envelopes. I wrote down the address Conners had given us on it, put it to Vanilla Ride, and then I wrote Conners' address, which he had been so kind to give us, in the left-hand corner as the sender. Since they couldn't phone her or find her any quicker than we could, I wanted to get things started. I wrote "Hi" on a piece of the blue stationery and folded it up and put it in the bright blue envelope and laid it on the dash of the car, waiting until we could buy a stamp.

We started for Arkansas, cruising along not listening to music, just quiet for a long time. We had left Conners and Sykes tied up in their kitchen with lamp cords and stripped sheets. I figured they'd work themselves loose in a couple hours or so.

Leonard finally broke the silence, said, "You know that was stupid, letting them live?"

"I do. But I think I have to draw the line somewhere."

"You draw the line on them but you're traveling all the way to Arkansas to kill Vanilla Ride."

"It seems a little more personal."

"I see them all as one big nest."

"I'm sure you're right, but I guess I've decided to focus my anger all on one, the one put the bomb under the car and killed Tonto and those kids and gave us a stay in the hospital."

“All right,” Leonard said. “But you know those guys aren’t through with us.”

“Yep.”

“We’ll deal with them again.”

“Yep.”

“I thought Conners was at the top of our list. You said to put stars by his name.”

“Yep.”

“So why didn’t we just nip it in the bud?”

“I’ve tried my best to explain.”

“And your explanation sucks.”

“I just couldn’t shoot them out of their chairs like that, in cold blood.”

“What if Vanilla Ride is sitting in a chair?”

“I’ll ask her to stand up.”

“You’ll be killing a woman.”

“She may be of that gender, but she’s no woman to me. I’m not even sure she’s human. Conners and Sykes do it for money, and Vanilla Ride gets paid, but, man, I got a feeling she loves that stuff. She liked baiting Tonto along like that, getting him to the point where he thought he was gonna get him a piece, and then, wham, he’s out of there. That’s cold, brother. And those kids.”

“I still don’t see a difference. She took the money. In the end, it’s all about money and they all want the money.”

“Maybe, Leonard, truth is, in the end, there’s no difference at all. Them. Us. We’re all killers, and in the end, the worms sort us out.”

◆

There was no real address for Vanilla Ride, just the P.O. box Conners had told us about, and the rest of the address was a town called Sylvester, Arkansas. What I had in mind was staking out the post office, waiting till she came to collect her mail. It wasn’t exactly a plan up there with Robert E. Lee, but then again, it was me and Leonard. We’re not dumb, but strategy is not our long suit.

It was about three hours to Arkansas, and it was still night when we got there, and we stopped at a station and put more gas in the car and checked our map to make sure we were heading the right way, then pushed on, like Mounties after our man, or in this case, our woman.

Daylight was breaking as we drove into the mountains amongst the trees, and there was a light frost on our windshield. The roads grew narrow, the trees thickened. Leonard rolled down the window to get some air, to keep himself alert, so as not to drive off a cliff. He let it blow cold on his face for a while, then touched the electric window button and sent it up. I looked ahead at the sun-stained road and the countryside and listened to the hum of the heater.

51

Sylvester looks almost unreal, a kind of holdout from frontier days, but the truth is it isn't all that old. It was founded some fifty years ago and built to resemble a frontier town, and they've kept it that way. Traffic was pretty intense for a place that claimed twenty thousand people, but the traffic would be the tourists, because there's a nice lake nearby with plenty of fish and the scenery is beautiful. It's the kind of place people come to rest and not Jet-Ski or mountain-climb or party all night. There are a few restaurant clubs, and from what I could see they catered to the older set as well. We parked and headed toward the post office. I read on a sign for a place called the Buckin' Horse Saloon that it opened at four for dinner, had entertainment, and closed at ten. If the horse bucked, it did it quietly and at reasonable hours.

At the post office, which was one open window commanded by an old man in a plaid shirt with a postal name tag (Jake), I bought a stamp for our bright blue envelope and mailed it. We walked around the post office and saw there were rows and rows of mailboxes with thick glass windows in them so you could see when you got mail, and finally we located the one that went with our envelope.

"All right," Leonard said. "She has to come here."

"Except she won't," I said.

"Surrogate?"

"Of course. She'd be too easy to find otherwise. Why do you think I got that bright blue envelope?"

"Ah, but what if she gets lots of mail and whoever picks it up mixes it with other envelopes, and we're watching from a distance. What if it's night?"

"Oh. Well, I didn't think about that."

Leonard sighed. "Guess we got what we got."

◆

We walked across the street to a hotel and Leonard stayed outside to watch the post office while I went inside. At the desk I talked the clerk into giving us a window facing the street, so we could enjoy the view, and then I took Leonard's spot on the sidewalk and he walked back to the car for our little bit of supplies.

For the next week we hung out in that hotel room, looking at the post office out the window, hoping we'd be able to spot the blue envelope come out in someone's hot little hands. From time to time one of us would walk over to the post office and look through the little window of her mailbox, and we could see the blue envelope was there, waiting, and no one had been in to get it.

We took shifts so one or the other could go out and buy food. We also bought underwear and we didn't shave, under the odd notion that maybe if Vanilla Ride saw us she wouldn't recognize us unshaved. It was lame, but again, it was what we had.

First day we were there we started seeing some interesting-looking guys showing up at the post office, watching for what we were watching for, I guess. But had they been smart enough to send her a brightly colored envelope? I thought not.

They couldn't hang around the place any more than us, but they did get a room in, you guessed it, our hotel. I passed one of them, a lean, greasy-haired fellow, on my way out to pick up some sandwiches. He was sitting in the lobby, and when he saw me, he watched me go out, and I didn't let him know I was watching him. Across the street, in front of the post office, another guy sat in a car, getting out now and then to feed quarters into the parking meter. He was tall and fat, with very little hair on his head. Sometimes he moved the car and parked elsewhere, but he was always parked so he could see the post office. I guess the other two were out buying sandwiches and underwear, same as us. But they all swapped out from time to time, and it was my guess they weren't lawmen and they weren't from the IRS and I doubted they were the men in black since their wardrobes were varied. All I was certain of was I had seen four of them over a period of time.

Back in the room with our sandwiches, Leonard said, "You know, this sucks. Those guys were sent here from Conners, and had we put a hole in his head, him and his fat friend, we'd be sitting here without contention, except for Vanilla Ride herself. But now, thanks to you, we got her and them."

"I know."

"You don't mind?"

"Hell, yeah, I mind," I said. "But I did what I could do, Leonard. That's it. I don't know what to tell you. It's my flawed nature."

Leonard shook his head and patted me on the shoulder. "I love my little idealist. In a gay sort of manly way, of course."

"Of course."

"Look at it this way: if we'd killed those two, you wouldn't have to kill these four. Or, worse yet, get killed by them."

"You are a goddamn sage, Leonard."

52

One day we're in the hotel room, looking out the window, having sucked down too much coffee, my personal plumbing backed up to where my insides felt like a brick factory, and I'm thinking a little fruit juice might be good, when Leonard, who is nibbling around the edges of a vanilla cookie, said, "These guys, they here for us or Vanilla Ride?"

"Maybe both," I said. "Could be they've decided she needs to go too. Maybe because she hasn't returned the money."

"You think she'll keep it?"

I shook my head. "I don't think that's her plan. I think she's a professional. But I also think the people she's dealing with are falling apart. The talent they've sent out has cost them big-time, and it would probably be nice to get the money back, but they want us because we're a couple of amateurs who have survived everything they've got, including Vanilla Ride. My guess is they haven't paid her because she didn't finish the job, because we didn't die, and now she's got their money on top of having not wiped us out."

"She's got more money than they think," Leonard said.

"That too."

"So, Hirem lied about the amount of money, which was probably because there was extra he was going to give the Mummy and his friend to make sure his son got a good deal with the FBI, and then they got whacked, and then we got the money, and then Vanilla Ride got the money, and she's thinking, well, they don't pay me, I got a little windfall. They do pay me, I keep the rest."

"That's the way I figure," I said. "And the Dixie Mafia is thinking they're running low on guys, and they aren't considered such bad dudes if they can't stop a couple of yokels from East Texas, and if they just quit, that looks bad too, so they got to keep them coming. And now, since Vanilla didn't finish the job, and we're on her tail, they're starting to see her as expendable. That way they don't pay her and she's dead and they're rid of her. I bet on top of all that, finding out she was a woman chapped their ass."

"If only she had been black," Leonard said.

"Yep, that would have been aces."

"And gay."

"Better yet. And we may have it all wrong," I said. "Guys following us could be just very persistent insurance salesmen."

53

One night I'm at the window, and the brilliance of the streetlights is all there is in the way of action, and what do my wandering eyes see but a lemon-colored Volkswagen pulling up at the curb in what might be called a sprightly manner, or what I might call in my East Texas vernacular, pretty goddamn fast. A young man, gangly as a puppet, with a dark mustache and a cap from under which shoulder-length black hair hung, got out and went into the post office, walking heavy.

I looked at my nifty Warner Bros. Looney Tunes watch with all the great cartoon characters on it with my flashlight and saw the time was three a.m. The post office lobby was always open. You could go in at any time. Just an old-fashioned town with an old-fashioned mailbox connected to an old-fashioned killer who liked to live quietly in Arkansas. I figured not a lot of folk were out and about at three a.m. in a town like this, and if they were, how many just decided it was necessary to check the mail at this time of night?

It could happen, but it made me curious.

He came out quickly and got in the Volkswagen and started up the hill. I yelled Leonard awake, and since he was already dressed, he only had to roll into his shoes, and then the two of us were on our way downstairs, pulling our coats over our holstered handguns and our manly buttocks.

The fat guy had his turn in the lobby chairs, and when he saw us he stood up and a magazine fell out of his lap and flapped to the ground. Leonard gave him a little wave. We went out and got in our car, Leonard driving, and he cranked it up and started up the hill in the direction the Volkswagen had gone. I looked back and saw the fat man was on the curb with a cell phone to his ear. They weren't any niftier than we were, which in real life is often the case. There just aren't that many James Bonds or Mike

Hammers outside of the pages of books or the brightness of film.

Of course, Vanilla Ride, now she was another matter altogether. That woman was spooky like Tonto was spooky, only more so, because she had killed Tonto right when he thought he was about to visit the fun house.

That's just mean.

◆

The road wound up through the mountains, and at one point, going around a curve, I could look back through a split in the trees and see car lights moving along the road behind us. I said, "I figure that's them."

"Yeah," Leonard said, "that is some good deduction there, Sherlock."

We hadn't caught up with the Volkswagen, which had to be hauling some serious ass, and we weren't all that far ahead of our friends the ugly thugs. I said, "When we get around this corner coming up, let me out."

"Are you nuts?"

"If it goes well, I'll catch up with you at the bottom of the hill. If you look back and see it isn't me running down the hill to leap into your arms, and instead it's them in their car, or even on foot, then I suggest you drive like you're in a stock-car race."

I climbed over the seat and pulled the backseat down and got the sawed-off shotgun out of the trunk and a box of shells. When we climbed up the hill and got to where it curved, Leonard stopped and let me out, said, "Nice knowing you, dumb ass."

"You just watch for me."

He motored away and I got back in the woods a bit and hunkered down and waited. More time went by than I expected, or so it seemed. Out here there were no streetlights and the moonlight wasn't much, and it took me a while to start to adjust to being able to see in the dark. My mouth was dry, and hunkering down like that was starting to hurt my calves, and I was about to switch positions when I saw headlights coming and then I heard the roar of a car.

When I could see the car well enough to determine that it was the car I had seen our trackers in, I braced the shotgun against me and waited until the car was almost even with me, and fired a little in advance, the blast lighting up the night and knocking the right front tire to shreds. The car swerved and twisted and threw up dirt as it went over the other side of the road and down a hill and out of sight. I heard a crash, trotted across the road and looked down. It was about a thirty-foot drop, but they had most likely rolled most of the way, and the slant was just enough so there weren't a lot of hard falls on the trip down, at least not as hard as I would have liked. The car was lying on the driver's side, and the right-side passenger doors were heaved open, and out came the four dark figures. No, seven. They had been stuffed in that car tight as impacted turds in a colon. One of them fell out on the ground, then got up to one knee and stayed there a moment. I could see the car was near a little deer path down there that dipped into the woods and ran back in the other direction, up toward the road where they had been driving. It wasn't much of a path, but if they could get the car upright, and if it still ran, they might be able to drive out of there.

I turned and started running up the road as fast my legs would carry me. I could tell when I was about halfway up the hill that I needed to get back to road work because my heart was pounding against my ribs hard enough to break them and my vision was a little blurry. I looked back and saw one of the thugs coming up over the edge of the hill, carrying a long gun of some kind. I took to the woods and went along there, getting whacked in the face with limbs for a while, and then when I was sure the road was sloping down, I stumbled out of the woods and went down the hill where I saw Leonard's car, and Leonard outside of it, standing by the passenger side with the deer rifle.

I huffed out some cold air and waved the shotgun above my head and started down at a speed I didn't know I had in me. Leonard got in the car and cranked it up, and when I made the passenger side, I was nearly out of wind. Climbing in, closing the door, I looked over at Leonard, said, "There are seven of them."

He said, "You dumb ass."

54

“Now where’s the Volkswagen?” Leonard said. “You’ve caused us to lose it.”

“But I managed to knock the bad guys off a hill and now they’re on foot.”

“Okay I guess that’s something. You get a pass. Seven, huh?”

“It was like a goddamn clown car.”

We continued driving and where there hadn’t been roads going off the main road there were now plenty. Leonard said, “He took one of these, or we would have caught up to him by now. I’m driving this thing like it’s got a real engine in it.”

Pausing at a dirt road that turned to the right, I got out of the car and bent down and tried to check the ground in what little light there was. Finally, Leonard backed the car so that the lights shone on the ground, and then I could see there were recent tire marks.

I got in the car, and Leonard said, “Well, Hawkeye?”

“There are tire tracks that look fresh,” I said. “It could be him. It could be someone else, but it could be him.”

“It’s what we got,” Leonard said, and started down the road. It was dark down there and the trees ate up the sides of the road until there was only room for the car, and then we came to a bridge that looked as if the headless horseman ought to be on the other side of it. We rattled over it and went around a curve that climbed through some trees with winter-dried moss hanging down. When we broke over the hill there was a clearing and an A-frame house, not too big, sitting at the peak of the hill and we could see the Volkswagen parked in the yard. There was a little road that went into the trees on the right and there was one on the left. Leonard took the one on the right and we drove down it a piece and found a place where the road was a little wide and parked on the right-hand side and got out, me with the shotgun and him with the rifle. We were carrying our handguns and we each had a nifty blackjack and a jaunty stride.

When I loaded up the shotgun, Leonard said, “Here, you’re a better shot. I should have the shotgun.”

We swapped, and I gave him the shells. I took the box of shells for the deer rifle and put the whole box in my coat pocket.

“How long will it take them to get up here on foot?” Leonard said.

“A lot longer yet,” I said, “and then they have to be smart like us and look at the tracks.”

“I’m going to give them that much smarts,” Leonard said. “Let’s get this over with. Maybe we can be in and out and in our car and down the hill before they realize it’s us coming back and they’ll be so startled they won’t shoot at us.”

* * *

We started crawling up the hill, down close to the earth, in line with the Volkswagen. It took about a century for us to make it that way, but we thought it might be preferable to being spotted and shot. When we got to the Volkswagen, I stood up behind it and glanced in. My blue envelope was on the seat next to the stationery I had written “Hi” on, and beside it was a black mustache and a cap with a headful of black hair.

I hunkered back down behind the Volkswagen, said, “Unless the driver has some kind of skin disease and his mustache fell off in the altogether along with all the hair in his hat, the guy who picked up Vanilla Ride’s mail was Vanilla Ride.”

“A master of disguise.”

“Well, I think maybe for us she doesn’t have to be all that masterful.”

“That’s certainly true. Now what?”

“I think the now what is I get my wind back.”

“Too many late dinners and not enough exercise, Hap. I’ve been telling you that.”

“Yes, you have. Now shut up.”

“So, in a couple hours when you get your wind back, what do we do?”

“We split up. You go right and I go left.”

“That’s it?” Leonard said. “You complained to me that we didn’t have a plan last time, and now your plan is you go one way and I go another.”

“Okay, what’s your plan?”

Leonard was quiet for a moment. “I go left and you go right.”

55

We were about to start our plan when we heard boots on gravel, looked up into the smiling face of Vanilla Ride, standing by the Volkswagen pointing an automatic pistol at us. It certainly seemed to be a big automatic. She had come up like a ghost while we were putting our war room together. She had her golden hair tied back in a ponytail, and she looked like some kind of female goddess of war.

"I have systems on top of systems," she said. "I knew you were here the moment you entered my perimeter."

"Damn," Leonard said. She got a determined look on her face, like she was about to pass an anvil through her bowels, extended the automatic, ready to pop us, and then a shot rang out and the window on the Volkswagen above me splintered and some of the glass rained down. Vanilla took a turn around the Volkswagen on one end, and Leonard and I scrambled around to the other side. We ended up behind a tire, close as lovers, and Vanilla was behind the other tire. When I looked at her, she jerked the automatic at us.

"Truce," I said. "They want us too."

She studied me for a long moment.

"You're wondering if you can trust us," I said, "and I know this isn't much right now, but we keep our word. Truce. For now, anyway."

After a moment, Vanilla Ride nodded, said, "I can kill you anytime I want."

There was an explosion as a low bullet caught the tire we were behind and rang off the rim and the pressure of the exploding tire blew us back about three feet. Vanilla darted for the A-frame, and Leonard grabbed me by the coat collar and started dragging me. I let him, clinging to my deer rifle like a child with a teddy bear.

When we were inside and the door was slammed, glass began to come out of the windows as shots rained down. It was a two-story house with a short stairway up to what was more a loft than a room. The middle floor had a low section and some standard couches around it. Except for some exercise equipment off to the side of the living room, the place looked as impersonal as a cheap motel room.

I got off my belly and on my knees and looked at Vanilla Ride. She was crawling across the floor toward the corner. She popped the flooring up there with remarkable deftness, took out a long, sleek black weapon with a very large banana clip, and she pulled a spare clip out of there too. She crawled back to where the glass was still dropping from the big window. The glass splattered around her like falling stars and she stood up and let the spare clip drop to the floor and cut loose with the gun. Down below, where their shots were coming from, the dirt leaped up in heaps and the trees whipped and then she went down again, behind the high windowsill where Leonard and I were lurking, but on the opposite end. We were bookends. Same alike. Except we were guys and she was a girl and she had a big gun that would shoot faster than ours.

“They got their car out of the ditch,” Leonard said.

“It was more of a drop-off than a ditch,” I said. “I didn’t think they could turn it off its side and drive it out. Not that easily.”

“You were wrong,” Leonard said.

“Yep,” I said.

“You didn’t do as good as you thought.”

“Nope.”

“Kind of typical, isn’t it?”

“It is,” I said.

“You see, they got it running, and now they are after our ass, and here we are with”—Leonard turned and looked at Vanilla Ride—“her.”

Vanilla looked at us and smiled. Damn, she was a beauty. “How have you two lived this long?” she said.

“Our sterling personalities,” Leonard said. “We charm just about everyone.”

I eased over so I was near the corner of the windowsill and the wall, and then I raised up. I could taste the cold air coming in through the shattered window and smell the pines down the hill, and I could see one of the men coming along where the hill spread up toward the house, and though there wasn't much light, I could see him well enough. He was the greasy-haired guy and he was stooped slightly, his head down, running for the Volkswagen, the only real cover he had.

I rose up and beaded in and shot and hit him in the top of the head and knocked him rolling down the rise.

I sat down behind the wall and looked at Leonard. He said, "Haven't lost your touch."

Vanilla Ride smiled at me.

Leonard said, "You wait until there's some real light, he can shoot the balls off a dog tick."

"My guess is they won't wait until it's light," I said. "They like it better this way. Daylight comes we can see them better from here than they can see us, and we got cover. In the light, they got dick, so they'll either cash in now or come soon. I vote that they come ahead."

Leonard looked at Vanilla Ride, said, "They may not even be after you, though I'd say that shot hit the Volkswagen was close to all of us."

"It doesn't matter," Vanilla Ride said. "They've invaded my home. So have you."

"But we have a truce, right?" I said.

"You came to kill me, didn't you?"

"That's right, we did."

"You're not too good."

"We're tougher and smarter than you think," I said. "Except for getting sneaked up on. That part, well, we're not so good."

"You want the money?"

"It's not about money," I said. "It doesn't even belong to us. You killed a couple of kids and a friend of ours."

"Business," she said.

"It didn't seem like business to us," I said.

She shifted slightly to a kneeling position, behind the wall. The gun she held shifted too. She said, “I don’t have any reason to believe you two about anything.”

“No, you don’t,” Leonard said. “But I will say this: I just saw one of those bozos cutting low across the bottom of the hill, moving to the left of the house. They’re trying to circle us. They got six and we got three, and we got the house, so in one way we’re better off. In another, they know where we are and we don’t know where they are, and there are more of them than there are of us. So that’s the situation. How’s it gonna be?”

Vanilla Ride was quiet for a few moments. She said, “I keep my word.”

“We keep ours,” Leonard said.

“Then we have to trust one another, don’t we?” she said.

“So we’re going to maintain the truce?” I said.

“Certainly,” she said.

◆

It wasn’t like I expected. They were brave. Either that or stupid. They came at us hard and they came at us quick. What they did was they opened up with automatic weapons that made the walls jump apart and a splinter from the wall popped into my cheek and it felt like fire. Without really thinking about it, Leonard and I crawled toward the center of the house, toward where the floor was lowered and the couches circled it. We crawled down in there and kept our heads ducked while the stuffings leaped out of the couch and things came off the walls and glass broke.

I looked up once, and there was Vanilla Ride, standing up, bullets buzzing around her like hornets, and she was letting down on that automatic weapon, and it didn’t even seem to jump in her hands, and I could see through the big open window where she was shooting that the ground was churning up, and I could see one body there where she had caught one of the guys, and then everything went silent. She hit the floor and the clip went away, and she pulled the other clip out and slipped it on the weapon smooth as a gigolo sliding on a condom.

The back door burst open with a kick and we raised up, saw a tough-looking guy with a shotgun. Leonard raised up and shot at him and missed. I lifted the rifle as the intruder's shotgun wheeled toward us, and just before I fired, I knew he had me beat, so I jumped and covered Leonard. The shot tore at the couch and I felt pellets hit my ass so hard one butt cheek slammed against the other. I came up scrambling and firing the rifle twice, and both shots hit the shotgunner as he pumped another load and I saw one of his eyes go big and red and then he was down and two were coming through the front window.

Vanilla Ride was no longer at the window. I wheeled around to shoot, but by this time Leonard was up, and he fired, caught one of them in the kneecap and he dropped with a yelp. Then a shot came from upstairs, and the other one took it through the right side of his head as he was stepping over the spot where the window had been. He seemed to lean against the sill, and then he turned his head slightly, like someone had called his name, sat down hard on the sill, dropping his weapon, his head falling forward in his lap. The guy Leonard had hit in the knee was screaming loudly. It was so loud and strange it made my skin knot up. He quit screaming when Vanilla Ride leaned over the stair railing and shot him through the head. He just lay quietly then, bleeding out.

"That leaves two," Vanilla Ride said.

56

“Someone’s got to die!” a voice called from outside.

“That would be you,” Leonard called out.

“Why don’t you chicken farts just come out and face us?” the voice said. “What’s stopping you?”

“Bullets,” Leonard yelled out.

“Chickenshits,” the voice called.

“Absolutely,” Leonard said. “Why don’t you just come and get us? We’ll put the coffee on.”

“We got two, you got three,” the voice said.

“You started with seven,” I said.

“Vanilla Ride,” the voice said, “we ain’t got nothing against you. We want them.”

“You fucked up my house,” she called out. “You nearly shot me trying to shoot them. You pick this moment to come after them. No. I think you’re ready to retire me because I know too much. Me and you, we aren’t friends.”

“I don’t have any friends,” the voice said.

“That makes us even,” Vanilla Ride said.

◆

They went silent out there and time slipped by slowly and the beginnings of light seeped in under the trees and rose up between them like a gentle flame. The back door was wide open, and it made me nervous, that and the big front window open as well. I moved once, just to see if I could make it to the back door, and a bullet plowed into the couch about a quarter inch from my face, so I got down and played it close to the floor, my ears perked.

This went on for a long time, and Leonard said, “Fuck it. Let’s you and me go get them.”

“You can’t hit the ass end of an elephant with a shotgun at two paces. That would be some shoot-out.”

“I can hit most anything,” Vanilla Ride said. “And you seem to be a good shot.”

I looked up at her on the landing, in the shadows.

“With a long gun,” I said.

“What about a short one?”

“Nowhere as good.”

“But he can hit stuff,” Leonard said. “His bad is someone else’s good. He’s got an instinct.”

“My instinct is to stay right here,” I said. “I don’t like where this is going.”

“I’m tired of waiting,” Vanilla Ride said. “You can go, or you can stay.” Then she turned her attention away from me and yelled outside. “Hey, you still out there, loudmouth?”

“I’m out here,” came the voice.

“You two, you show yourself, handguns only,” she said. “I’ll meet you outside, guns by our sides.”

“You mean that?”

“Hell yeah, I got better things to do with the morning.”

“Oh, you aren’t going to end up doing all that much today, Vanilla.”

“I guess we can find out, swizzle dick.”

There was a long moment of silence. Then the voice yelled back. “Deal.”

“Damn,” I said to Leonard. “You know I got to do it now.”

“Yeah, I know. I’ll do it, you know that, but—”

“You can’t shoot for shit.”

“Bingo,” Leonard said.

I took a deep breath and put the rifle on the floor and pulled the automatic from my belt. Leonard said, “If you get killed, I’m running out that back door like a goddamn rabbit.”

“No you won’t.”

“Yes I will.”

“No. You’re a macho queer.”

“Oh yeah, that’s right. Maybe. Christ, Hap, let them come for us.”

“Either way scares the hell out of me,” I said. “I’m always scared. I’m not like you.”

“Hey, I’m scared. You get killed, John doesn’t take me back, where am I to stay?”

Vanilla Ride came down the stairs carrying her automatic pistol in her hand. I eased away from the couch and along the wall near the window. I said to her, “Think they’ll keep their word?”

“Of course not,” she said.

Easing over to the edge of the window on her side, she called out: “There will be two of us, and two of you.”

“That sounds good,” came the voice from the dark.

“One of us will step out, and you’ll show one of you, with a handgun only.”

“High noon,” the voice yelled out.

“High morning,” Vanilla Ride said. She stepped through the gap where the window had been. A tall man with dark hair came up over the rise. He had his hand down by his side. I could see a handgun in it. I stepped out, but kept close to the edge of the windowsill.

The other man came up over the rise. I could see his handgun. He held it in such a way that it was in front of him and resting against his thigh. The sun was still coming up, and though the sun in our eyes should have been a hazard, this early in the morning and coming through the trees it wasn’t so bright and all it did was outline our targets neatly.

“Let’s walk out a ways,” said the tall dark-haired man.

“They’re going to fuck with us,” Vanilla Ride said so only I could hear.

“But we’re going to go on out a ways in spite of that, aren’t we?” I said.

“We are,” she said. “I got to tell you, I always wanted to do this.”

“Not me,” I said, and I could feel my hands shaking. It was all I could do not to break and run.

“What happens we get killed?” she said. “What about your friend?”

“They’ll have hell coming in and getting him,” I said. “It won’t be any cakewalk, that you can depend on.”

“Good,” she said.

“Do we have to do this?” I said.

“No.”

“Then what the fuck are we doing?”

By now the two had spread out. One was going wide, in the direction of the Volkswagen, and I knew he was my guy, as he was on my side. The other guy going the other way, I decided not to think about him. He belonged to Vanilla Ride.

My guy brought his gun up and a shot went by my head so close I felt the heat from it. I jerked my automatic up and fired. If I hit him, he didn’t show it. He started running low along the ground, and I fired again. He did a kind of bunny hop and went down. I heard shots to my right, but I didn’t turn my head. I could still see out of the corner of my eye that Vanilla Ride was standing.

She said, “Goddamn,” and then my guy leaped forward from where he lay, grabbed at an automatic rifle he had planted earlier, in the dark, hid it there waiting to grab it and cheat. I stepped forward and took my time, aiming one-handed, the way I had been taught, not with two hands, and when he lifted up I shot him somewhere along the jawline. It took part of his face off and he rolled on his side and lost the rifle, but he came up then, as if the pain had given him a jolt of power. He stumbled forward. He had another handgun, drawn from under his coat, and he was coming toward me fast, his face seeming to drip. He fired a shot and I found myself standing sideways all of a sudden, looking in the wrong direction. And by the time I had turned, having realized I had been hit, he was firing again, and this time one of his shots punched my coat but missed me, and I took careful aim and fired, hitting him in the center of the chest, but he kept coming. I fired again, and he must have been firing too, because there seemed to be shots popping all over, and I’m thinking I missed, but he went down, propped on a knee. I shot him another time and his body jerked and he went to his right side and lay there, his ruined face in my direction, his body kind of horseshoed behind him.

Turning, I saw Vanilla Ride was standing with her arm to her side, her gun in her hand. Her man lay on the ground squirming, holding his groin.

“Right in the goober,” she said, and started walking toward him.

He saw her coming. One hand went away from his groin and clawed in the dirt for his dropped handgun. He never got to it before she stood over him and shot him twice in the head.

She came walking back toward me. I could see her right side was stained with blood. She didn’t seem to notice. My left arm had grown heavy, and then I felt as if it was being set on fire. The way she walked, the way she was coming toward me made me nervous. I said, “We still good?”

“We are,” she said, and walked right past me.

57

“If she hadn’t been good,” Leonard said, “I was going to shoot her.”

He was standing at the edge of the house with the deer rifle. He had gone out the back door. He said, “You’ll find the guy you shot, he’s also got a rifle shot in his chest.”

“I thought I missed.”

“Nope. You hit him. I just hit him again.”

“That was cheating,” Vanilla Ride said to Leonard. “Ganging up on the guy.”

“Damn straight,” Leonard said. “You think I’m going to let that motherfucker kill my brother?”

She grinned at him.

My knees buckled and I fell down.

* * *

Inside the house on the couch, Leonard looked at my wound. Vanilla Ride came over. She had removed her shirt and was wearing a sports bra and a bandage around her waist, different blue jeans. She said, “I got hit, but it went through.”

“He’s still got the bullet in his arm,” Leonard said, as he pulled the splinter out of my face.

She took hold of my arm, looked it over, making me wince. “You’ll be all right, tough guy. We got to push the bullet all the way through. It’s in the fat of your arm. You didn’t lose a lot of blood.”

“Any is too much … what did you say?”

“You’re lucky it missed the serious muscle,” she said.

“About that pushing it all the way through business,” I said.

She went away for a while and I lay on the couch, kind of going in and out. She came over and I looked up and she had a kitchen knife, about half of it glowed red-hot.

“Now wait just a goddamn minute,” I said.

“Hold him down,” she said.

Leonard got on top of me and kept my back pinned to the couch, held my injured arm down and at my side. “It’s for your own good, dumb ass,” he said.

“I hate you,” I said.

Vanilla Ride took the knife and stuck it quickly into the wound and pushed and I felt the knife touch the bullet inside of me, and then I passed out. When I woke up, she was cutting at the back of my arm, freeing the bullet. I passed out again.

When I came to I was bandaged up and sick to my stomach. There was a lot of sunlight now, but it was very cold. Leonard was sitting on the couch with the rifle across his knees. He said, “She’s gone,” and when he spoke a cloud of white mist came out of his mouth. “We should have killed her, I guess. She had it coming, Tonto, the kids and all. But she did help save our ass.”

“What?”

“Gone. She left us four hundred thousand dollars. Took the Volkswagen, told me to tell you if she was older, or you were younger, you might be her meat.”

“She said that?”

“She did.”

“But we came to kill her.”

“Doesn’t seem to hold it against us. I feel sort of mission unfinished, you know, but she patched you up, brother, so what was I gonna do?”

“What?”

“You keep saying that.”

It was because I was so stunned, I didn’t know what to say. After sitting there stunned for a moment, I found a few words. “The money. I don’t get it.”

Leonard patted the duffel bag, which was lying next to him on the couch. “Look, man. Focus. She gave me three hundred thousand to return to the Dixie Mafia, with her regards, and gave us a hundred thousand to keep, or pretty close to it—minus what the kids spent, we spent, and she spent. But, man, it’s still over ninety thousand. She kept a hundred thousand for herself.”

I sat up on the couch. “She trusted us to return the money?”

“I know. What you gonna do? She asked for my word.”

“And you gave it?”

“Of course.”

“And she accepted it?”

“Duh. I got the money, don’t I? What the fuck is wrong with your hearing?”

“I don’t know,” I said. “The world feels like a big banana.”

“What?” Leonard said.

“I don’t know,” I said. “It don’t mean nothing.”

“You’re delirious,” Leonard said.

“Maybe,” I said, and passed out again.

58

It was a few days later and I had my arm in a sling, courtesy of a veterinarian Marvin knew who wouldn't report he had treated a gunshot wound. He said whoever had done the first aid had done a good job.

Anyway there I was in a sling and we were in No Enterprise sitting in the little station/cafe with connecting grease monkey shop. It was me and Leonard and Marvin Hanson, Conners and his fat friend, and two other guys. One of them was Cletus Jimson, and he was a fortyish guy with tattoos on his knuckles that I couldn't make out but were meant to be some kind of symbols. I guess they were Chinese, which, considering he was supposed to be a stone racist and the current head of the Dixie Mafia in this part of the country, seemed odd to me. Marvin had managed to get us in touch with him through Conners. The guy with Jimson had a lot of bulges in his coat. Some of them were muscles, some of them were guns. His head was shaved and he had a crease on the side of his head that looked to have been put there by a blunt instrument.

"So, you kill a bunch of our guys, and you want to come and make a truce?" Jimson said.

"That's about right," I said. "We also bring gifts."

"Gifts," Jimson said. "What kind of gifts?"

I had a box with me and it was tied with ribbon. I picked it up and put it on the table and he untied the ribbon and picked up the lid and looked inside. I knew what he was looking at. Three hundred thousand dollars.

"That's not a gift. That's what's owed me."

"Not by us," I said. "We sort of came into this deal sideways."

"Yeah?" Jimson said.

"Yeah," I said.

“He come over and pistol-whipped us,” Conners said.

“Actually, most of it was done with a blackjack if I remember correctly,” Leonard said. “Oh yeah, and there was that part where I just plain ole pure-dee whipped your black ass with assholes and elbows.”

“Yep,” I said. “That’s the way I remember it too.”

“So you brought me my money home,” Jimson said.

“Courtesy of Vanilla Ride,” Leonard said.

“She really a woman?” Jimson said.

“Oh yeah,” I said.

“How about that,” he said. “A split tail that’s a gunner. That’s some precious stuff, that is.”

“Precious,” I said.

“Conners here,” Jimson said. “He tells me he knows Marvin here, says Marvin says you guys went to kill her and didn’t, but killed my guys instead.”

“That Marvin, what a blabbermouth,” I said.

Marvin Hanson chuckled.

“It seemed like the right thing at the time,” I said.

“I don’t like that,” Jimson said.

“Get some better guys,” Leonard said.

Jimson sat back in his chair and looked at Leonard. If he thought Leonard was going to flinch he was out of his mind.

“So,” Jimson said, “you two, you’re tough guys, huh?”

“That’s about it,” Leonard said. “But we’d like to end this. We got put into this when we didn’t want to be.”

“How’s that?”

I explained.

“That’s some story,” Jimson said when I was finished.

“It’s true,” I said. “I say you’ve wasted a lot of guys on us, and I say it’d be best we didn’t shoot at each other anymore. There’s your money back.”

“It wasn’t about the money,” he said.

“I know that,” I said, “but it’s our peace offering, your money back.”

“Yeah,” Leonard said, “and now we’re going to sweeten it.” He reached inside his coat pocket and brought out ten thousand dollars in ten one-thousand-dollar bills.

“That’s nothing,” Jimson said.

“It’s ten thousand dollars,” Leonard said, “and it’s money we don’t owe you. Call it a present, a peace offering.” Of course, Leonard failed to mention that there was a little over eighty thousand dollars we had left for ourselves.

“Like I said,” Jimson said, “it’s not about the money. I spent more trying to have you guys hit.”

“And what they’re telling you,” Marvin said, “is why spend any more?”

“I could pop you right here,” Jimson said. “All of you.”

“No,” Leonard said, “I don’t think so. You could try, but I don’t know it’d work out.”

“You people,” Jimson said, “you always got to be smart-asses.”

“When you say ‘you people,’” Leonard said, “do you mean queers or niggers? I’m a little perplexed on the matter.”

“You’re queer?” Jimson said.

“I’m so queer queers call me queer.”

“Wow,” I said. “That’s pretty queer.”

“Isn’t it?” Leonard said.

“You aren’t going to do anything here,” Marvin said to Jimson. “That would be plain stupid.”

“I got some law here,” Jimson said. “I could make it look the way I want.”

“Maybe,” I said, “and maybe not, but it won’t do any good if you’re dead, now, will it?”

Jimson grinned. “All right. All right. You guys, I give you this, you got you a set, both of you, queer or not.”

“It’s just me that’s queer,” Leonard said. “I’d rather not be included with heterosexuals. Bad for my reputation.”

Jimson turned and looked out the window, then picked up his coffee and drank. “We call it even, that means you stay out of my business, right?”

“Unless that business gets into our business,” I said. “And I don’t know how Vanilla Ride feels about things. Me and Leonard and her have a truce. But you guys, I don’t know. She might not like you sent men to kill her.”

“I sent them for you.”

“Well,” I said, “far as I know, they’re still in Arkansas.”

“I’ll worry about Vanilla Ride,” he said.

“Just a polite warning,” I said.

“Fair enough,” he said.

“But we owe them one,” Sykes said. “Me and Conners.”

“That’s your problem,” Jimson said. “Me and them, we’re done.” He hesitated a moment, then turned to Conners and Sykes. “And you know what, you two, you’re done too. Leave them alone. They come around on some other matter, that’s something else. But on this, you’re done. You took a lickin’. Learn to like it.”

“Good advice,” Leonard said.

“Don’t push it,” Jimson said, stood up and pushed his chair back. His man got up at the same time. Conners and Sykes got up too.

Leonard said, “Been good doing business with you, and just one last thing. Keep your word. We expect it. You don’t, we won’t like it.”

Jimson smiled. “Say you won’t?”

“Absolutely,” Leonard said.

“Yeah … well,” Jimson said, and he and his man and No Enterprise’s finest walked out and got in their cars and drove away.

We ordered pie.

59

Couple months later, upstairs in our bedroom, my arm all healed and wrapped around Brett, she said, “You’re not exactly hot with the flesh pistol tonight.”

“No,” I said, “I’m not.”

“A lot on the mind?”

“You know it.”

“You told me everything, didn’t you? Got it off your chest?”

“Yep. But I still feel like I have a hole in me.”

“You’re healed up fine.”

“I don’t mean that, and you know it.”

“It’ll pass, baby.”

“I hope so. I just don’t think I was cut out to do what I do and not feel bad about it.”

“Leonard’s not bothered.”

“No, he’s not. He said, ‘If they deserve it, I got no problem. They don’t deserve it, then I got a problem. They deserved it.’”

“Words to live by.”

“I guess.”

“Vanilla Ride … Leonard said she sort of liked you.”

“He has a big mouth. And I think she said what she said as a kind nod to my courage. Truth was, I was scared to death.”

“But you went out there and did a stupid thing knowing it was stupid.”

“That’s called stupid, not courageous.”

“I have to agree.”

“I guess I was caught up in the moment. Thing I got to think—to consider—is Vanilla Ride. Beautiful young woman like that, what was done to her? Why is she like that? Why did she learn the skills she learned?”

“Some man is at the bottom of it, I can promise you that,” Brett said.

“Most likely. Probably childhood. Bottom line is she killed Tonto. He wasn’t any friend, but he was our partner, so we were supposed to do something. The kids, they didn’t deserve it. They were just stupid. Shit, she tried to kill us. All that, and in the end we let it slide.”

“But she helped you against the others.”

“True.”

“And she cut out the lead in your arm.”

“Also true. It makes the whole thing kind of confusing, at least in the sense of trying to figure where loyalties lie.”

“So, she was beautiful?”

“Not like you.”

“You liar.”

“Really.”

“Keep on.”

“You are the beauty of all beauties.”

“That’s what I want to hear. Bet her real name isn’t Vanilla Ride.”

“Bet you’re right.”

“But you’re thinking about her, aren’t you?”

“She’s got me stumped. She let us go. She could have killed us.”

“You like that she had a sense of honor, don’t you, baby?”

“I guess I do. But I still wonder why she is the way she is. The killing part… I’m not like her, am I?”

“You do what has to be done and for the greater good. She does it for money.”

“That’s what I keep telling myself.”

“You do odd jobs, Hap, and you’re an honorable man, but you don’t do psychology. Quit trying to figure her out, or yourself. There’s no clear answer.”

“Yeah, you’re right.”

“Say you could figure out all the ills of the world, it wouldn’t stop them from happening. Humans suck.”

“When you’re right, you’re right. How was it in Arizona with Marvin and his family?”

“It blew. I like Marvin, hate his family. Gadget is a little bitch who not only needs rehab, she needs a daily beating and someone to cuss her for an hour every Thursday.”

“You’re open for that, aren’t you?”

“If it was a paying gig. What about Leonard and John?”

“You talk to him all the time. Why are you asking me?”

“I didn’t want to ask him about that. I thought it might make him sad.”

“But I can ask him?”

“You two talk about stuff like that, and you know it. What’s the skinny?”

“Not working out. Not yet anyway. They talk now and again. Leonard has his own place, not a motel room but an apartment. Just got it. Me, I’m not that hopeful they’ll work it out, but then again, tonight I’m not exactly full of cheer.”

“You have half of eighty thousand dollars,” she said. “A gift.”

“A little more, actually. Leonard split it right down to the penny.”

“Well, that’s good.”

“I keep thinking about where it came from. Women flat-backing and dumb asses mainlining, or whatever.”

“So it’s bad money you can put to the good for eating and renting this house and you also don’t have to work out in the weather for a while.”

“Yeah, I thought about that. A lot.”

Brett snuggled up close to me and rubbed my stomach. “You want to try again?”

“Not just now. I think he’s sleeping.”

“It’s okay. I love you even if you are a failure sexually.”

“Thanks. I needed that.”

“You know I’m joking.”

“Sure.”

“Now don’t brood. There’s always tomorrow morning. And afterward, I’m going to make waffles.”

We snuggled awhile, and then Brett fell asleep. I thought about Vanilla Ride and the way she had looked, the way she had marched around with that bandage across her stomach, and wondered if she had been hit worse than she let on. I had wanted to kill her badly, and now I wondered where she was and why she was what she was, and if Brett was right about me and Vanilla Ride being all that different. Down deep it seemed to me that at some point, me and her, we were exactly the same.

I lay there trying to sleep, my head turned, looking first at the dim outline of the photograph Brett had framed of me and Leonard and Cindy the Bear. It was on the nightstand. I rolled over and looked out the window. The moon had turned nearly full and it was very bright out and the light came through and fell onto the carpet and onto the end of the bed. I felt funny about that light, like if I stretched my foot out, it would move away. It was as if something inside of me had shifted and gone deep inside of myself, into the shadows, and no matter where I sat, stood, or lay, no light would, or ever could, shine on me.

A NOTE ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Joe R. Lansdale has written more than a dozen novels in the suspense, horror, and Western genres. He has also edited several anthologies. He has received the British Fantasy Award, the American Mystery Award, seven Bram Stoker Awards, and the 2001 Edgar Award for best novel from the Mystery Writers of America. In 2007 he won the Grand Master Award at the World Horror Convention. He lives in Nacogdoches, Texas, with his family.

THIS IS A BORZOI BOOK
PUBLISHED BY ALFRED A. KNOPF

Copyright © 2009 by Joe R. Lansdale

All rights reserved. Published in the United States by Alfred A. Knopf, a division of Random House, Inc., New York, and in Canada by Random House of Canada Limited, Toronto.

www.aaknopf.com

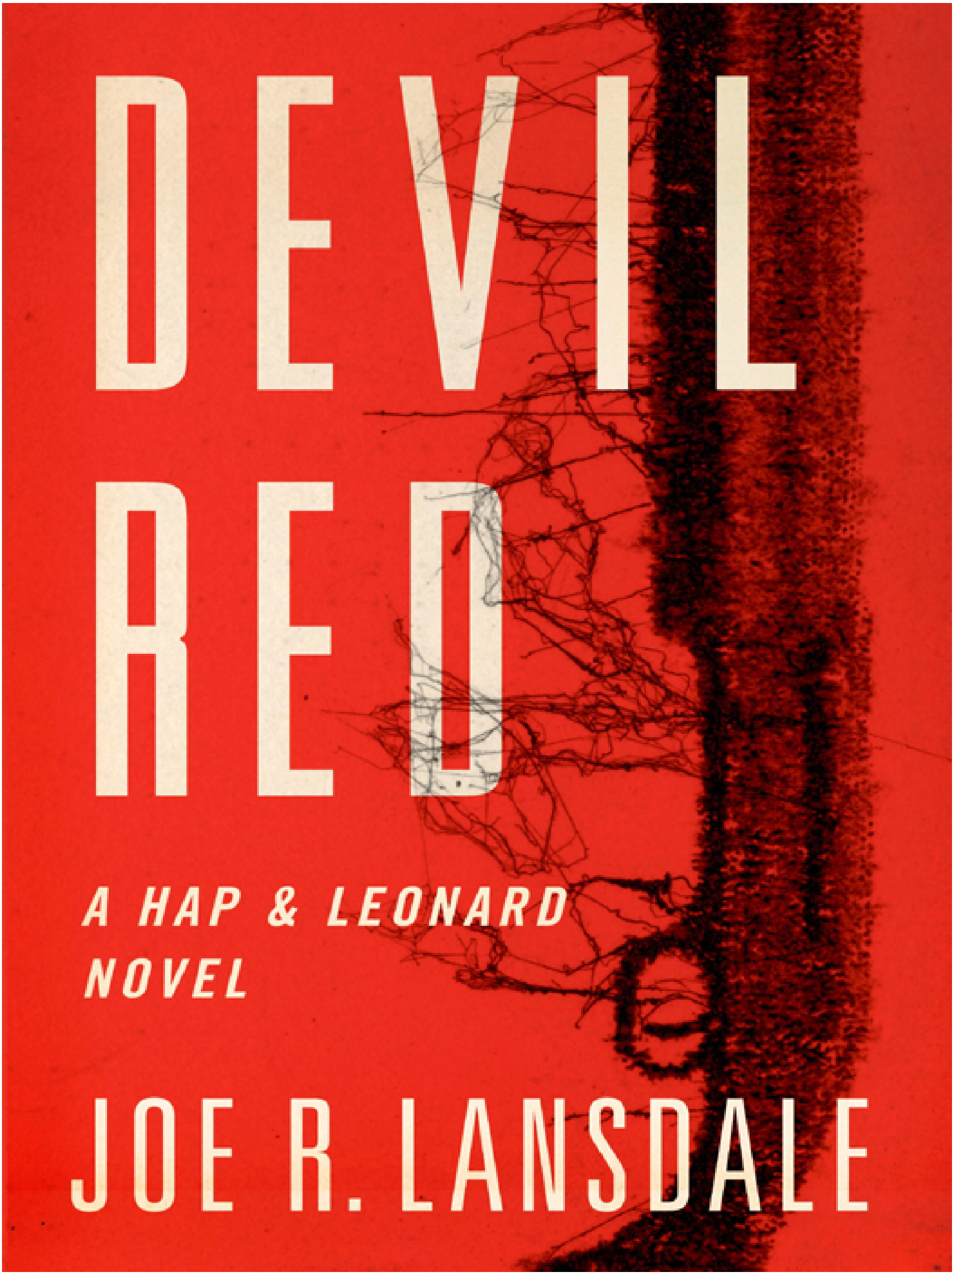
Knopf, Borzoi Books, and colophon are registered trademarks of Random House, Inc.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Lansdale, Joe R., [date]
Vanilla Ride : a Hap and Leonard novel / by Joe R. Lansdale.—1st ed.
p. cm.
“This is a Borzoi book.”
eISBN: 978-0-307-27229-4
1. Collins, Hap (Fictitious character)—Fiction. 2. Pine, Leonard
(Fictitious character)—Fiction. 3. African American men—Fiction.
4. Drug dealers—Fiction. 5. Mafia—Fiction. 6. Texas—Fiction.
7. Adventure fiction. I. Title.
PS3562.A557V36 2009
813′.54—dc22 2009008821

This is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents either are the product of the author’s imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, events, or locales is entirely coincidental.

v3.0



DEVIL RED

A HAP & LEONARD NOVEL

JOE R. LANSDALE

Also by Joe R. Lansdale

In the Hap and Leonard Series

Vanilla Ride
Captain Outrageous
Rumble Tumble Bad Chili
The Two-Bear Mambo
Mucho Mojo
Savage Season

Other Novels

Leather Maiden
Lost Echoes
Sunset and Sawdust
The Bottoms
A Fine Dark Line
Freezer Burn

Devil Red

JOE R. LANSDALE

Alfred A. Knopf New York 2011

THIS IS A BORZOI BOOK
PUBLISHED BY ALFRED A. KNOPF

Copyright © 2011 by Joe R. Lansdale

All rights reserved. Published in the United States by Alfred A. Knopf, a division of Random House, Inc., New York, and in Canada by Knopf, a division of Random House of Canada Limited, Toronto.

www.aaknopf.com

Knopf, Borzoi Books, and colophon are registered trademarks of Random House, Inc.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
Lansdale, Joe R., [date]
Devil red / Joe R. Lansdale. — 1st ed.
p. cm.
eISBN: 978-0-307-59535-5
1. Collins, Hap (Fictitious character)—Fiction. 2. Pine, Leonard (Fictitious character)—Fiction. 3. Assassins—Fiction. 4. Inheritance and succession—Fiction. 5. Cults—Fiction. 6. Texas—Fiction. I. Title.
PS3562.A557D48 2011
813′.54—dc22 2010047476

This is a work of fiction. Names, characters, places, and incidents either are the product of the author's imagination or are used fictitiously. Any resemblance to actual persons, living or dead, events, or locales is entirely coincidental.

Jacket design by Jason Booher

v3.1

This one's for Karen

You are what you do.

—Old proverb

if I bet on Humanity I’d never cash a ticket.

—Charles Bukowski

Contents

Cover
Other Books by This Author
Title Page
Copyright
Dedication
Epigraph

Chapter 1
Chapter 2
Chapter 3
Chapter 4
Chapter 5
Chapter 6
Chapter 7
Chapter 8
Chapter 9
Chapter 10
Chapter 11
Chapter 12
Chapter 13
Chapter 14
Chapter 15
Chapter 16
Chapter 17
Chapter 18
Chapter 19
Chapter 20
Chapter 21
Chapter 22
Chapter 23

Chapter 24
Chapter 25
Chapter 26
Chapter 27
Chapter 28
Chapter 29
Chapter 30
Chapter 31
Chapter 32
Chapter 33
Chapter 34
Chapter 35
Chapter 36
Chapter 37
Chapter 38
Chapter 39
Chapter 40
Chapter 41
Chapter 42
Chapter 43
Chapter 44
Chapter 45
Chapter 46
Chapter 47
Chapter 48
Chapter 49
Chapter 50
Chapter 51
Chapter 52
Chapter 53
Chapter 54
Chapter 55
Chapter 56
Chapter 57

Chapter 58
Chapter 59
Chapter 60
Chapter 61
Chapter 62
Chapter 63
Chapter 64
Chapter 65
Chapter 66
Chapter 67
Chapter 68
Chapter 69
Chapter 70
Chapter 71
Chapter 72
Chapter 73

A Note About the Author

1

We were parked at the curb in Leonard's car, sitting near a busted-out streetlight. We were looking at a house about a block up. It was a dark house on a dark street next to another dark house, and beyond that was an abandoned baseball field grown up with summer-burnt grass that had died two months back but was still standing, the tops curved over like bent sword tips. A fresh fall wind was bullying some dead leaves about and we had the windows rolled down and the air was cool and soothing. Beyond the baseball field it was dark too.

The whole area wasn't exactly what you'd call a great place to hang out. You did, there was a chance they'd find you next morning in a ditch with your throat cut, your pockets turned inside out, and sperm in your ass, or perhaps a sharp instrument. It was the kind of place where the mice belonged to gangs.

But there we sat. Sacrifices to fate.

I said, "I feel like a hired leg breaker."

"You are a hired leg breaker," Leonard said.

"This is pretty mean."

"He beat up an old woman, Hap. Took her money. That's so mean the mean has to wear a hat and tie."

"A hat and tie?"

"It's an expression."

"No it's not."

"All right. I made it up."

"Of course you did."

"Thing is," Leonard said, "the cops didn't do dick."

"They took him in for questioning."

"Whoop-te-doo," Leonard said. "And it was Mrs. Johnson's word against his and now he's free and he's sleeping in that house, him and his bud, and they got the old lady's money."

"The bud didn't hit her," I said.

"Yeah, well, the bud ought not to hang around with the wrong people."

"I hang around with you."

"But I'm charmin'," Leonard said, cracking his knuckles. "You ready?"

"I don't know," I said.

"What's to think about? We took the job."

"The money for one. Twenty-five dollars, to split. Really? That's our payment?"

"Since when do you worry about money?"

"Since it's twelve fifty."

"It'll pay us back for those cheap-ass baseball bats," Leonard said.

"It will at that. We might even make a quarter or two when it's all over."

"So what are you complainin' about? You're comin' out ahead."

"We could go to jail. That's one complaint. It could be me and you and Marvin and Mrs. Johnson, all of us sitting on a cot in a jail cell knitting sweaters with the words DUMB ASS across the front."

Leonard sighed, leaned back in his seat, and adopted a tone akin to a father about to explain to a son why making bad grades in high school won't get you far in life. "This douche bag ain't gonna say squat. He's got a badass reputation to maintain. Think he wants to say he got caught off guard and beat up by a worn-out honky and a handsome majestic queer with baseball bats?"

"Reputation? He beat up an old lady, what kind of reputation is that?"

"He probably doesn't advertise that part, just the stuff about him being a big gangster and all. He's a legend in his own mind. We're just here to get Mrs. Johnson's money back."

"We're going to rough somebody up for eighty-eight dollars?"

"And some change."

"Yeah, don't want to forget that, Leonard. He got another forty-five cents."

"Forty-six. If you're living on a fixed income, it matters. And, hey, we're getting twenty-five dollars of it, and Marvin, he's got a cut comin'."

“You know we won’t take any of it, and he won’t either, and that this isn’t a real job. This is a favor. Marvin to her, us to him.”

“Yeah, but we can pretend,” Leonard said. “It’s fun. Didn’t you ever play pretend?”

I gave Leonard a sour look. “While we’re pretending, guys in the house might be serious. And I’m tired of beating up people and getting beat up.”

“All right, then. I’ll do the hitting. You don’t break anything. Him or the furniture. We’ll just let him know we don’t like him doin’ what he’s been doin’, and I’ll hit him on the meaty parts.”

“You’re just saying that, aren’t you? You’re going to break something.”

Leonard was silent for a time. “He broke her hand, so I got to think maybe his hand has to get broken. But you don’t have to do dick in that department, brother. Just come and watch out for his friend. The big guy, Chunk. I might not want him runnin’ up my ass.”

“Isn’t the friend’s supposed to be pretty damn big,” I said.

“Would it put you in better spirits if you broke the guy’s hand and I watched for the big guy?”

“No.”

“Hell, man. You get to choose. Which is it?”

I sighed. “You do the breaking.”

“So we’re on?”

“Yeah, but remember, when we’re doing a stretch at Huntsville, I didn’t like the idea.”

“Noted,” Leonard said. “I’ll even give you my bread in the prison cafeteria.”

“What’s this guy’s name again?”

“What’s it matter?”

“I like to know who I’m beating up.”

“Thomas Traney took the money. The big guy, he’s called Chunk, that’s all I know. You heard this already.”

“Yeah, but I wasn’t listening so good. I didn’t think we were really going to do it. Next we’ll be twisting grade-schooler’s wrists to find out who took whose lunch money. Or maybe we can take their lunch money ourselves, being tough guys and all.”

“You through bitchin’?” Leonard said, pulling on a pair of skintight gloves, then handing me a pair.

I nodded, put on the gloves, leaned over the seat and got the baseball bats, and handed one to Leonard.

2

We got out of the car and started across the dark yard, went over the dry grass, and up on the back porch. I looked back toward the baseball field and the dark there, just in case someone was watching.

Nothing.

Leonard leaned an ear against the door.

“Quieter than a politician’s brain,” Leonard said.

“We ought to leave it that way.”

Leonard touched the door and pushed gently. “This is a weak and shitty door,” he said.

I didn’t say anything this time. I knew it was too late. It was on.

Leonard stepped back and stomp-kicked the door hard. The door’s lock broke and there was a sound of splintered wood and the door swung wide and slammed against the wall, and we were in.

There was a hallway, and we went along that quick. There was a room to the left with the door open, and I looked in there. There was nothing but heaps of trash. I looked at Leonard and shook my head. The house stank of cigarettes.

Leonard went down the hall ahead of me, a man on a mission. I rushed to keep up. He boldly opened a door on the right and went in and I looked in after him. There was a mattress on the floor, and a woman on it, and there was a window to her right and a bit of moonlight coming through it. All I could tell about her was she was dark-skinned and her eyes were wide and she was nude from the waist up; the rest of her was covered in bedclothes. I knew from the way her head went a little to my left that she was watching someone in the corner, and I said, “Watch it!”

Leonard wheeled and a gun fired and everything went bright for a moment and a bullet whistled through the air and smacked into the wall. I saw Leonard move, and he was across the room fast as an arrow in flight. I could hear the air split as he swung the bat. The gun barked again from the shadows, and I jumped. I rushed inside the room, even though I wanted to do anything but that.

Leonard had someone on the floor in the corner and his bat went up and then down. The person on the floor screamed, and I heard something behind me. I turned in time to see a black giant in undershorts fill the doorway, then come into the room carrying a cane knife, wearing a moonlit expression that wouldn’t pass for humor.

He cocked back the cane knife and I swung the bat at him, hit him in the shin. He barked and stumbled. I hit him again, this time in the side. I heard him grunt and he dropped the cane knife at my feet. I put one foot on it and pushed it back and away from me, into the shadows.

I heard Leonard’s bat come down hard, and I heard him say, “How do you like it?”

But I had my own business. The giant tried to get up and I hit him across his broad back. He made with another grunt but got up, and I swung for his kneecap. He went down screaming, rolling on the floor, clutching at his knee. His shadow rolled and crawled along the wall with him.

Leonard said to his man, “You got some money?”

The guy on the floor, who I figured was Thomas, was only wearing undershorts. Just as a fashion note, his and Chunk’s shorts did not match. He said, “You robbin’ me?”

“Nope,” Leonard said. “I’m takin’ back somethin’ you took that don’t belong to you. Where’s your wallet? And you better hope there’s money in it.”

Thomas had one hand up, to try and ward off the bat. He was otherwise stretched out on the floor, his head lifted a little.

“My pants are on the floor, by the bed. Wallet’s in the back pocket.”

“I’m on it,” I said. I went over and found his pants and took out his wallet and went over to the window where the moonlight was shining in. I stood to the side so I could watch the big man on the floor. He was still rolling around moaning and clutching at his knee. I figured I had destroyed it. It had been one hell of a swing.

“He’s got maybe three hundred dollars,” I said.

“Take a hundred,” Leonard said, standing over his victim, the bat raised. “That covers what’s owed, plus a bit for our time and him trying to shoot us, and a little extra for the bats.”

I took out the hundred and dropped the wallet on the floor. I looked at the girl. She was kind of pretty, or would be with twenty pounds on her. The last meal she looked to have had probably came out of a needle and didn’t have taste. I wanted to save her, of course. I wanted to save everyone. I wanted to be somewhere else as well, and I wanted to be someone else, and I wished I hadn’t flunked algebra in high school.

I held up the hundred. “Got it,” I said.

“Good,” Leonard said.

“You’re crazy, man,” said Thomas. “I’ll come for you.”

“I don’t think so,” Leonard said. “You’re a fuckin’ coward.”

I saw the man turn his head and look at the gun he had fired. It was on the floor where Leonard had disarmed it. It was maybe six feet away.

Leonard said, “That’s right, go for it. I’d love to make a homer with your head.” Leonard lightly tapped Thomas’s shoulder with the ball bat.

I could see by the way Thomas’s shoulders drooped that hope for the gun had gone the way of his young dreams. He was screwed and he knew it.

“Let me leave you with two bits of advice, one verbal, the other demonstrative,” Leonard said. “First, don’t rob and hurt old ladies. Second,” and with that Leonard brought the bat down on Thomas’s hand where it rested on the floor. The scream Thomas let out crawled up my back and nestled at the top of my skull and took a shit.

“That’s the demonstrative tip,” Leonard said. “That’s to let you know messin’ with and hurtin’ an old lady, that’s gonna get you hurt. You come back, you touch her, next time they find you it’ll be with this bat up your ass and your dead mouth wrapped around Chunk’s dead dick.”

Thomas was holding his hand, which, in the moonlight, looked kind of flat to me. He was breathing fast and lying on the floor, completely stretched out. A sound like a dying mouse seeped out of his mouth.

Leonard leaned over him. “Let me make it even more clear. You bother me, or send someone to bother me, or my brother here, provided you even know who I am, who he is, and I’ll kill them, and then I’ll kill you, even if I don’t know for sure you sent them. And then I’ll kill you after you’re dead. That’s how much I’ll kill you. Savvy, asshole?”

Thomas had his mouth open and was holding his hand. It was like he wanted to speak but nothing would come out.

“Savvy!” Leonard said.

“Savvy,” Thomas said.

“That’s good.” Leonard said, then went over and picked up the gun and put it in his belt. He looked back at Thomas. “I’m not just whistlin’ out of my ass. I mean what I say.”

“Yeah,” said Thomas. “I got you.”

“But do you believe me?”

“I do.”

“Let me hear an amen.”

Thomas looked at Leonard like he’d lost his mind. So did I. Leonard just kept looking at Thomas, waiting.

“Amen,” Thomas finally said.

“That’s right, ass wipe,” Leonard said, turned toward the door, stopped, and looked down at the giant. He said, “You can get big as you want, Chunk, but eyes and balls and kneecaps, they’re what we like to call vulnerable. Tell him, Hap.”

“Vulnerable,” I said.

“Don’t let me see your ass around either,” Leonard said. “You might consider a different climate. Comprehend what I’m saying?”

The man didn’t speak. Everyone in the room was so quiet, we could hear their IQs drop. Of course, they didn’t have far to fall.

Leonard kicked him on the kneecap he was holding. Chunk bellowed.

“Well,” Leonard said.

“I understand,” Chunk said.

I looked down at Chunk, and even in the dark, I could tell he was looking at Leonard the way I sometimes looked at him, like he was looking into a deep dark pit that had no bottom.

“Good,” Leonard said. “Our work here is done.”

I looked at the woman on the bed, said, “Probably goes without sayin', but maybe you might not want to say or do anything either. And you're maybe two pounds shy of organ failure. Eat something greasy."

She nodded.

"Good," I said. "Thanks."

3

Out back we slung the baseball bats in the direction of the ball field. We went and got in the car. Leonard said, “You thanked her? And gave her a diet tip?”

“It just sort of came out,” I said.

“It took the edge off my witty remarks.”

“Sorry.”

“Well,” Leonard said. “You got to be you. How about we go by Wal-Mart, buy some cookies-and-cream ice cream, some vanilla wafers to dip in it?”

“Nothing like leg breaking and dessert,” I said.

“I broke the motherfucker’s hand, and I think I got a rib too,” Leonard said. “You’re the one broke a leg. A kneecap.”

“I can still hear it crack,” I said.

“Maybe we’ll get a couple cartons of ice cream, brother.”

Leonard started up his car and pulled out.

I said, “That really made you feel good, didn’t it, Leonard? Hittin’ that guy.”

“I don’t know good is how I feel, but satisfied sort of fits,” Leonard said. “And he didn’t shoot me, so I feel good about that. Motherfucker would have done better to throw the gun at me, his aim was so bad.”

Leonard took Thomas’s gun out of his waistband and handed it to me and I popped out the clip and cleaned it with a Kleenex. I wrapped the clip in the Kleenex and Leonard drove by a Dumpster behind a mall and I dropped it in. Then we drove out to the edge of town and I wiped the pistol clean and wrapped it in a piece of newspaper from the backseat and gave it to Leonard and he carried it out into the woods. When he came back, he said, “There now, all done. I dropped it down an armadillo hole.”

“If we hear of armadillos taking over possum kingdom, then we know what happened,” I said.

We took off our gloves, Leonard drove us to Wal-Mart, and we bought ice cream and cookies. I didn’t say much when we got to Leonard’s place, which was recently rented and cheap and in a part of town only slightly better than the one we had just left. We went upstairs and sat in fold-out chairs in a corner that served as a kitchen at a crate that served as a table, and with a spoon apiece, and cookies to dip, we ate and counted roaches racing across the floor. There were a lot of roaches, and some of them were bigger than my thumb. I was glad Brett wasn’t around for a change. She would charge a rhino if she felt it necessary, but the clicking of roach legs on linoleum could run her ten miles and make her climb a tree.

When we were done eating, Leonard said, “You want to go home, or you gonna stay?”

“Drive me home,” I said. “Brett will be waiting. Besides, I don’t want to get eaten by roaches.”

“You have gotten so persnickety,” Leonard said. “I remember a time when you would have named them, made them each little hats, and called them your friends.”

4

On the drive to my place, Leonard shifted his eyes over to me and sighed. He said, “You’re sitting there all forlorn.”

“I feel forlorn,” I said.

“Some things you do, not because they’re pleasant, but because they have to be done.”

“But I’m not sure that was one of them.”

“You got way too many feelings, Hap.”

“I suppose.”

“Look at it this way, brother. I got feelings too, but they’re for those who deserve feelings. There are some people don’t have feelings, and don’t deserve yours. The only kind of feelings they got are pain and fear.”

“Governments use that tactic. Never seems to work too well.”

“We ain’t governments,” Leonard said, as he pulled into my drive. I got out and walked around on his side and looked at him through his open window. He said, “I’ll see you tomorrow at Marvin’s.”

I nodded. He looked at me for a while longer, almost said something, but didn’t. He backed the car into the street and I watched him drive away.

I went inside and locked up and went as quietly as I could upstairs and into the bedroom. I could see Brett’s shape in the bed. I took off my clothes and pulled on my pajama bottoms and got in bed as carefully as possible. When I was positioned, Brett said, “What you been doin’?”

“Killing what’s left of my soul, baby.”

Brett rolled over and put her arm across my chest. She smelled good. “You got the old woman’s money back, didn’t you?”

“We did.”

“I figured you were gonna do that.”

“Last thing I said when I went out was I wasn’t gonna do it. I told myself that when I met up with Leonard. Told myself that when we parked out front of the house where those guys were, and I told myself that up until the moment I swung the baseball bat and took out a kneecap.”

“I knew you were gonna do it.”

“But what is it about me that made you know that? What’s wrong with me?”

“You think things ought to be fair, and they aren’t, and you try and make them fair.”

“I broke a guy’s kneecap. Leonard, he broke the other guy’s hand and maybe a rib, and we scared a young woman who was there. I don’t know how fair that was. We were so mean our mean wore a hat and tie.”

“What?”

“Nothing.”

Brett rubbed my chest a little, said, “Was he a good guy? Guy’s knee you broke?”

“Not in the least.”

“Did you hurt the girl that was there?”

“No reason to … No. Of course not.”

“Okay. Guy’s hand that Leonard broke. Was he a good guy?”

I knew where this was going, but I went ahead with the ritual. “He’s the guy broke the old lady’s hand, took her money.”

“There you go. If he’s the bad guy, you got to be the good guy.”

“Who says?”

“Me. I just did.”

“Yeah, well, you’re sort of on my side.”

“Big-time. A guy takes an old woman’s money and breaks her hand and she goes to Marvin for help, what are you gonna do? She deserves her money back. It’s not the first time you’ve helped someone and had to get rough. Hell, I’ve had to get rough.”

“I know that. But this wasn’t self-defense, and it wasn’t personal.”

“Anytime you can help someone get back at a bully, it’s personal enough. Baby, you got to learn how to tell the good guys from the bad guys.”

“You sound like Leonard.”

“He can be wise when he sounds like me,” Brett said. We lay there for a while. Brett stroked my chest. “I got to leave tomorrow.

Early.”

“Damn. I forgot.”

“Figured you did. You been kind of preoccupied with your morality and your mortality … But it’s okay. I won’t be gone long. A week maybe.”

“That’s too long,” I said.

“Poor baby. You’re in the dumps.”

“Big-time.”

“Because you got shot a while back?”

“Well, duh, that has something to do with it,” I said.

“Would some sympathy pussy help?”

“Well,” I said. “I don’t know I’ll feel any more right about what I did, and I won’t miss you any less when you’re gone, but it certainly would improve my spirits.”

“I thought it might,” Brett said, shifting to slip off her panties.

5

I slept a short while after we made love, and then I woke up and got out of bed gently and went to the bathroom. I came back and sat in the chair by the window. I looked out at the yard where a fence rose up and another house swelled on that side slightly covered by a large tree and its shadows. The darkness from the tree made the house look like a natural formation. There was moonlight in the next-door neighbor's backyard, which was clear of trees, and there was a kid's swing set back there; it looked like some kind of Martian insect lurking.

I turned and watched Brett while she slept. The window was framed in such a way that it had four panes and the panes were filled with moonlight and the light lay across the bed and the thin slats that held the panes in place divided her like dark straight cuts. Her face was at peace and her mouth was open and she was snoring slightly. I could see her white teeth and the way her long red hair, which looked dark as the shadows, curled around her chin and spread out on the pillow like an oil spill.

I loved the way she looked and the way she made love and the way she made me feel. But there was nothing she did or could do that would make me feel good about what I had done. Not tonight, anyway.

I thought about going downstairs and reading, maybe listening to music with the earphones, but I didn't feel strongly enough about it to do it. I went back to the bathroom and closed the door and turned on the light and found a magazine on the back of the toilet, picked up the pair of Wal-Mart glasses I kept in there—I kept several pairs around the house—and put them on and sighed because I needed the damn things to read close-up print. I was too tired and too old to be beating people up. A man who was old enough for reading glasses should have a job in some place air-conditioned and his most violent activity should be sliding his zipper down.

I read from the magazine, but nothing I read stayed with me. I finally gave it up and took a couple of light sleeping pills and went back to bed, and when I woke up it was late morning and Brett was gone.

6

It hadn't been that long since I had healed up from a bullet wound, and in the process of getting that wound, I had ended up splitting some good money with Leonard, so I wasn't sure why I was working. It wasn't my style to do something when there was money already to be had. I preferred desperation and overdue bills as a work incentive.

I showered and got ready for work and thought about Brett and her whore of a daughter. Brett had gone off to see her before and had come back blue and not so friendly for a couple of days, and then she would see it all for what it was, come around, and be okay for months. Then some idea would strike her, or the daughter would e-mail her, or some such thing, and the blues would open up again like a deep hole in the sea, and down Brett would go. I couldn't do a thing for her when she was that way. She had to deal with the depths and what was down there in her own manner and in her own time, same as me. She got like that, she was nothing like she was the rest of the time, and it was really best she did leave me for a while. That way they wouldn't find my decapitated head on my pillow.

But she was never like me. She was always able to find some truth in herself. Me, I wasn't sure I knew which way was up, let alone which way was true.

As I finished getting ready, I thought too about how I had come by the money I now had in reserve. Vanilla Ride, the beautiful assassin who had been hired to kill me, gave it to me and Leonard as a gift. It had worked out strangely, with me and her and Leonard in a cabin in Arkansas. Nothing as kinky as that sounds. The three of us bonded together for a moment to have a shootout with Clete Jimson's Dixie Mafia goons. The goons didn't do well. I came out with a wound that a good veterinarian took care of. But, most important, we had parted from Vanilla with a truce intact and a pile of dough that had belonged to some unsavory characters who I liked to believe would just spend it on unsavory things. It was still hard for me to grasp the insanity of it, or to understand how someone like Vanilla could be so deadly, and yet, in her own way, honorable.

It was also hard to believe that the very man who had wanted us killed, Clete Jimson, we had also formed a truce with, primarily because we had made it not worth his while, and there was in the background the threat of Vanilla Ride, and Jimson hadn't wanted any part of that. No one in their right mind would.

I was ready just before noon and sat at the table drinking decaffeinated coffee, waiting for Leonard to pick me up. Our friend Marvin Hanson had started a private detective agency. His plan was to hire us as grunts from time to time, which was best, because as detectives we made very good grunts.

Today we were supposed to meet him at the office to talk about a real job, not getting some old lady's money back. Then we were supposed to go to lunch and put a game plan together. What I wanted to do was go back to bed and read, or watch some TV, or just lie around on the couch. But if fish could fly they'd live in trees.

About eleven-twenty, Leonard showed up and drove us over to Marvin's office. The car had a smattering of bird crap across the windshield, and Leonard tried to clean it by turning on the windshield wipers, which made a slick whitish smear across the glass. Leonard cursed at it and hit the wipers again and made it worse than before.

I made a note to self. Do not try and clean bird shit off a windshield by using the wipers. It doesn't work. Cursing does not clean it either.

7

Marvin's office was in a nice area off the main drag, down a house-lined street. We parked in front of a huge, broad oak and got out. A space of dirt had been left in a rare example of city planning. Someone, perhaps leaving it as a kind of sacrifice to the forest gods, had placed a used rubber and a potato chip bag by the tree trunk, and it smelled like someone had taken a piss, but otherwise it looked natural and lovely and gave off a bony kind of shade.

As we sniffed the urine on the fall air, brown oak leaves were dropping and tumbling across the lot with a crackling noise, like someone stepping on paper sacks, or like someone breaking a big guy's knee with a baseball bat.

Across the way, a sweet gum tree had shed messy gum balls onto the concrete in a way that made me fear for its future with the city council.

Marvin's office was in a two-story building next to a one-story comic shop with a big blue blow-up gorilla on the roof. Some days it was a giant red ant, and on other days it was a big silver alien. One day there was a great brown bear wearing Bermuda shorts with a fish in its air-filled teeth and a fishing rod in its paw.

The bottom part of the building Marvin was in was a bike shop. The building had been painted a bright yellow. A young blonde woman, who from the shape of her legs looked like she rode a lot of bikes herself, was out front, defying the cool, wearing shorts and a T-shirt and flip-flops. She was unlocking the bike shop door when we came up. She turned and flicked her long blonde hair and smiled. She had a smile that would make a family-values Republican stab a hole in the Holy Bible with a buck knife.

The stairs were metal and a little slick from the rain that had come and gone. We went up. On the door was a sign, black letters on a green plaque. It read HANSON INVESTIGATIONS.

Inside Marvin was behind his new desk and a middle-aged woman was sitting in the client chair. She turned and looked at us as we entered. She was good-looking in a church lady, next-door-neighbor kind of way. She was dressed well, but not fancy, and her hair was a little too red and so were her cheeks. She looked as if she had been crying. She had a tissue balled up in her fist, a piece of it escaping between her fingers as if the stuffing was coming out of her. I assumed this was the client he had asked us to meet.

There was a young man with her. He was pouring coffee into a Styrofoam cup. He was tall with shaggy black hair and looked fit and had an air about him that made you think he might be tough and know it. At the same time, he looked like something for the girls. He stirred his coffee with a plastic spoon, came over, and sat in another of the client chairs. That was the end of the client chairs. That meant Leonard and I had to stand. I decided I didn't want to do that, so I went around and shoved my butt onto the edge of Marvin's desk and rested there. This put me so I was right in front of the guy. Leonard leaned against the wall, near the door, not too far from the lady. He put his hands in his pants pockets.

Marvin, who no longer needed his cane as of a month back, got up from behind his desk and limped over to the water cooler and put some water in a paper cup and brought it to the lady.

He looked at us, said, "This is Mrs. Christopher, and this is a family friend, Cason Statler. He works for the newspaper over in Camp Rapture. Folks, this is Hap Collins and this is Leonard Pine. If they say something embarrassing, understand they're friends of mine and I have to put up with it."

"Nice introduction," I said.

Mrs. Christopher smiled a little, sipped at her water.

Marvin said to us, "They're clients. They want us to check into something."

From the way the woman acted, I figured she had some romantic problems, a husband straying, or perhaps her husband had died and something was unresolved and we were supposed to resolve it. Whatever, I figured it would be simple and pretty near honest work.

“So, you’ll look into it?” the lady asked.

“I will,” Marvin said. “I’ll put these two right on it.”

“They look tough,” she said.

“They are,” Marvin said.

“What I mean to ask is,” she said, “are they detectives?”

“They are operatives,” Marvin said.

I thought: Yeah, baby. Operatives. That’s us. We’re so operative, our operative wears a hat and tie.

I glanced down at the desk and saw a check there in front of Marvin. It had Juanita Christopher’s name signed on it. Better yet, it had a juicy figure written on it. I wondered how much of that was mine and Leonard’s.

“Satisfaction guaranteed, or we give you half your money back,” Marvin said. “By the way, how’d you find out about us?”

“I saw your add in Cason’s newspaper.”

“Just curious,” Marvin said, “so I have some understanding of how my advertising works. What drew you to the ad?”

“Your last name. My maiden name was Hanson, but since you’re black and I’m white, maybe there’s no connection.”

I thought to myself there might be a lot of connection. In this part of the country the richer branch of the Hanson family had been slave owners, so it wouldn’t have surprised me to discover there were some woodshed relatives.

“Oh,” Mrs. Christopher said, “I didn’t mean that to sound the way it came out.”

“It didn’t sound any kind of way,” Marvin said. “Don’t worry about it.”

She stood up from behind the desk and stuck her hand across at Marvin and he shook it.

She didn’t sit back down, and she didn’t shake our hands. “I think I’ve explained everything, Mr. Hanson. I’ll let you fill your men in.”

Hanson nodded, and she started for the door. Statler stood and spoke to her. “Do you mind if I meet you in the car, dear? I want a word with the gentlemen. You can handle the stairs fine, can’t you? And watch how slick it is.”

“I’m not an invalid,” she said. “I’m just sad.”

“Of course,” Cason said, turning on a smile that if it had been an inch wider and a smidgen brighter, might have knocked out the local electric grid.

After she went out, Cason waited a moment, picked up the check she had written from the desk, and returned to his seat and rested the check on one knee with his hand on top of it. We all watched the check like buzzards discovering what was thought to be dead might still have some life in it, and just might get away.

Cason said, "I know what she told you seems like an impossible job, because of the time factor. It's a cold case. But I want to say, she's serious. I brought her over here because she's a friend of my mom's and because I know a little about her subject. I'm a newspaper reporter. I've looked into this case, there's something to it."

"So," Leonard said, "what you're saying is don't just cash her check and hang out here drinking coffee?"

"Something like that," Cason said.

Marvin said, "I not only resent that, I resent it enough to come out from behind this desk and slap the shit out of you. Even if one of these boys has to hold me up to do it."

"It might take more doing than you think," Cason said.

"My goodness," Leonard said, "you must have had an extra bowl of oatmeal this morning."

"You want to be first?" Cason said.

"Hey, Cason," I said. "You look like a guy might be tough, but you mess with Leonard, when they're cutting you open and putting your ruptured liver in a jar, your ghost will still be trying to figure out what truck hit you and when."

Cason looked at Leonard for a long moment. Leonard said, "What he said."

Cason smiled, studied Leonard. "You two are buddies. That is so sweet."

"Yeah," I said, "we're tough, and when times are rough we can sew our own clothes and grow a garden."

"Really?" Cason said.

"No," I said. "But we're tough."

Cason smiled. "All right," he said. "We're all tough guys. It's just that Mrs. Christopher is a friend of the family. Was my third-grade teacher. Her family has money, though she doesn't look like it or act like it. Her dead husband was in oil, and he was in a lot of it. She came to me for help because I used to work for a paper in Houston doing investigative reporting. Now I'm over in Camp Rapture, writing a bullshit column. I decided she needed help that could be on it twenty-four seven, and that wasn't me. Camp Rapture doesn't have a private investigator, but she saw your ad. I was a little reluctant, but I didn't know what else to do for her."

"Good to know we're deeply wanted and widely respected," Leonard said.

"I put those ads in every paper in a fifty-mile radius," Marvin said. "Your paper got me the only response."

"Try the online ads," Cason said. "More people read those these days. I'm lucky I got a job, way newspapers are changing. But, the thing is, I knew a lot of investigators when I worked for the paper in Houston, and I didn't think much of them. They mostly took up time and took up money. So I wanted to make sure you really would look into things."

"You can bet we'll look into them," I said. "Marvin is so honest it hurts our feelings, and we're so honest we hurt our own feelings."

Cason grinned. "Mr. Hanson has my number. You need anything, give me a call. I have a friend who is a bear for research. Maybe we can help you."

"We'll keep it in mind," Marvin said.

Cason put the check on the desk, smoothed it out where he had wrinkled it by pressing his palm across it twice, and went out. As he closed the door Leonard said, "Please do be careful of the stairs."

When he was gone, I said, "Damn, he's out of our sight, what, three seconds, and I miss him already."

"Too bad he isn't gay," Leonard said. "For him, I could ditch John in a minute. He wears Old Spice. I like Old Spice."

"Frankly," Marvin said, "he's just the kind of guy I'd like to punch in the mouth."

"And," Leonard said, "he's just the kind of guy I'd like to have put something in my mouth."

"One of you is mean," I said, "the other one is nasty."

8

Marvin locked up and we walked downstairs to the lot. The girl in the shorts was no longer visible in front of the bike shop, but I checked just in case.

"Now, what exactly is it we're saying we're gonna do?" I asked Marvin as we walked. "We're all up in Cason's face, and we're all behind you, and we don't even know what we're talkin' about."

"That isn't new for you, is it?" Marvin said.

"Ha. Ha," I said.

"For all we know," Leonard said, "you've signed us up to jack off donkeys at an animal sperm bank."

"And the way I hear it," I said, "you get through with the donkeys and go home, they don't even call or write."

"I'll explain at lunch," Marvin said. "You get the money back?"

"We did," Leonard said, "and a teeny bit more. We figured it wasn't dishonest for him to tip. Mrs. Johnson can use as much of it as she can get."

"What I'm wondering," I said, "is what if Thomas and his friend Chunk want revenge on us or the client?"

"Would they?" Marvin asked.

"Well, one of them is missing a kneecap," Leonard said, "and the other one will have to have his girlfriend pick his nose, wipe his ass, and pull his crank because his hand is kind of swollen up."

"He had it comin'," Marvin said. "The sonofabitch."

"Some people might think the same of us," I said.

Marvin gave me a confused look.

"He's been reading some self-help books or somethin'," Leonard said.

I took the hundred I had taken from Thomas's wallet and gave it to Marvin. “Here’s the booty.”

“We’ll take it to her,” Marvin said, and put it in his wallet.

9

The day had started to grow cooler, but not so cool it was uncomfortable. The sky was gray and there were strips of gloomy clouds across it and they had fuzzed out the sun so that it looked like a lightbulb burning behind gauze. In the distance, on the horizon, in line with the street, the sky was darker and I saw a strip of lightning jump and flash away. The rain that had come early in the morning and retreated now had a companion, and it was blowing our way.

We drove in Marvin's car over to Mrs. Johnson's house, which was on the edge of the area where we had been last night. We parked in her gravel driveway and got out. It was a very small house, but brightly painted in a kind of marigold color, and there were flower beds on either side of the little gravel walk. All the flowers were dead or sleeping.

The rest of the neighborhood looked like a war zone.

The house next door was up high on stone blocks, and lying just under it was a dead cat. It had been there long enough to have gone flat and was mostly an outline made of bits of white hair, scattered bones, and a skull. There was just enough flesh on the body to hold it in place. From where the cat was lying, and the looks of the place—a car out front with grown-up grass and a washing machine lying on its side—I had a feeling there wasn't anyone over there looking for their kitty. The cat, like the washing machine, was just part of the landscape to Mrs. Johnson's next-door neighbors. They might have been all-right people doing the best they could, but I got to tell you, you got a dead cat lying in your yard you ought to bury it. That's my motto. No dead animals in the yard for more than fifteen minutes.

"I don't think Fluffy is taking a nap," Leonard said.

"Nope," I said.

At her door, Marvin knocked, and after what seemed like time enough for a new species to have developed from a single cell, the door was answered by Mrs. Johnson. She looked like all the sap had been sucked out of her, she was so small and so wrinkled, but there was a hardness in her eyes that showed her life had been full of experience, and some of it might even have been good. She had a swollen right cheek and a cast on her hand.

"Marvin," she said. "And your boys?"

We were all about the same age, so I found that comment amusing. But I really liked her voice. It was like high cane syrup with a touch of sulfur and a hint of gravel.

"Yes, ma'am," Marvin said, suddenly about twelve years old. "Me and the boys, we got somethin' for you."

Marvin took out his wallet and removed the hundred-dollar bill and gave it to Mrs. Johnson. She took it and looked at it, said, "I ain't got no change, son. But if you want to go change it, or wait until I can get someone to take it to town—"

"No, ma'am. The fella who stole it, he decided he'd pay a little interest."

"He did, did he?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"You're a terrible liar, Marvin," she said.

"Yes, ma'am."

"You think it's right I take more than he stole?"

"I think you have a cast and that cost money and a hundred dollars doesn't cover it."

"Would you like to come in, sit a spell?"

Marvin said, "No, ma'am, we really can't. We've got some work to do. I don't think you're gonna be bothered again. But, you see him around, or he gives you any reason to feel nervous, call us, and we'll have a talk with him."

"I always see him around," she said. "He lives in the area."

"Yes, ma'am. I know. But … Well, you have any cause to worry, you call me."

"All right, dear," she said. "And thank all of you."

Leonard and I smiled and nodded, and turned away, and just before the door closed, Mrs. Johnson said to me and Leonard, "Did you boys hurt him?"

"Yes, ma'am," Leonard said.

“So he didn’t like it much?”

“No, ma’am,” I said. “Did you break anything?”

“Yes, ma’am, I believe we did.”

“Like what?”

“Well,” Leonard said, “I broke his hand, and Hap here broke the other guy’s knee and maybe a rib.”

“I screamed when he broke my hand,” she said. “Did he scream?”

“Yes, ma’am,” Leonard said. “And he whimpered too.”

She grinned. “But you boys didn’t get hurt?”

“No, ma’am,” Leonard said. “We came out fine, though I may have strained my elbow a bit on a downswing.”

“That Thomas sonofabitch had it comin’, breakin’ an old lady’s hand like that,” she said, “and me knowing him all my life. And that Chunk just watchin’.”

We went to eat, and then Marvin took us to a coffee shop and showed us the file. It wasn’t what I expected. After coffee, Marvin took us to our car, and we didn’t say any more about it. Leonard drove me home and went home himself.

10

At home, I thought about what Marvin had shown us in the folder, what he had explained to us. I put my folder on the coffee table in the living room and left it there and walked around the house for a while, then tried to read and tried to watch television, and finally just sat on the couch and watched it get dark and start to rain in a way that made me feel sleepy and gloomy at the same time.

I didn't open the folder again, but that didn't make what was in it leave my head. I thought about it all the time. I was also thinking about that poor dead cat, lying out beside a house where people lived or had lived, and it bothered me they had left it that way.

I went upstairs and stripped down to my shorts and sat by the window. The rain plunked and splattered on the panes so hard I thought they might break. Lightning lit up now and again, and when it did I could see the house next door, appearing to stand behind a stream of bright blue beads, and then the lightning was gone, and it was as if the world had fallen down inside a pit.

I got dressed and went out to the carport and got a shovel from the shed, a rain slicker, an umbrella, and drove over to where the house with the dead cat was.

I got out of the car with my umbrella and shovel, and when I got to where the dead cat lay, I put the umbrella aside. A hard wind was blowing, and when I put it down, the wind rolled it across the yard.

It was maybe midnight and nothing was stirring. I started digging in the yard. I dug a good hole that was long and deep, and then I used the shovel to pry the cat up from the ground. I put it in the hole and carefully covered it and told the cat I was sorry. I got my umbrella and shovel and went back to the car. By the time I put the shovel away I was so wet, rain slicker or not, I was starting to sprout gills.

I still had the stuff Marvin had told us about to deal with. But I didn't have to think about that poor cat anymore. It was down in the ground, wrapped in the earth, not just some hairy outline lying on the grass, pulverized by sunlight and moonlight and savage rain.

When I got home, I undressed and toweled off and lay on the bed naked. I finally slipped under the covers, listening to the rain, the thunder. It sounded good now, not as forlorn as before, but I couldn't sleep.

I thought a little more about what Marvin had shown us, and then I thought about Brett, but that made me miss her. So I thought about something that soothed me as a kid. I was a man in a rocket ship, traveling through space, on my way to a brave new world. I was in a container with a mild unseen, odorless gas that was putting me into suspended animation. I would awake just before arrival and guide the ship in. It would be a world full of beautiful plants and weird animals, but there I would be strong. Like John Carter of Mars my Earth muscles would give me incredible strength and abilities on a world where there was lesser gravity. I would end up with a sword and I would kill monsters and get the girl in the end, and she would look like Brett.

Only problem was, that little trick didn't work this time. I still couldn't sleep.

I got up and put on a CD of selected doo-wop, but that wasn't what I needed and I cut it off halfway through. I settled on Abbey Road and Sgt. Pepper's Lonely Hearts Club Band, played them through, and when they were done, I turned off the CD player, settled in under the covers, hoping this time I could sleep.

And then I heard a noise. It was a slight noise, a snicking sound coming from downstairs, and then someone gently closing the front door. I got my gun out of the nightstand drawer, and still naked as birth, eased open the bedroom door. A light went on downstairs. I heard the refrigerator door open.

I eased down, slowly. When I got to the bottom stair, I turned and looked in the kitchen. Leonard, wet and dripping, was sitting at the table. He was eating a sandwich and had a glass of milk beside him. A bag of vanilla cookies was open and on the edge of the table. He looked at me, put his hand over his eyes, said, “For heaven sake. Put some clothes on, Hap. I’m trying to eat here. You could make a vulture throw up. That thing looks like a spoiled turkey neck.”

11

I went upstairs and put the gun in the drawer and pulled on my pajama bottoms and a T-shirt, slipped into my bunny ear slippers, and went downstairs. Leonard was at the kitchen counter with a loaf of bread and some fixin's, making a fresh sandwich.

"I see my nudity didn't put you off eating my deviled ham," I said.

"Tuna fish," Leonard said. "And I could suggest a better brand."

"You pay for it, I'll buy it," I said, taking a place at the table. "So, what are you doing up at three in the morning eating my food and drinking my milk, and for all I know wearing my underwear and using my downstairs toothbrush? I knew I should have got that key back. I forgot all about it."

"You want a sandwich?"

"Yeah. There's some chips in the cabinet."

"Left side?"

"Yep."

Leonard got the chips down and another plate and made me a tuna sandwich with cheese, light on the mayonnaise, just the way I like it. He made his with mayonnaise and mustard, got the jug of milk out of the fridge, put it on the table and then the sandwiches. He got a diet cola out for me and sat down.

I said, "Just for the record, you are the only one in the universe that has mustard and mayonnaise on tuna, and you don't drink milk with a tuna fish sandwich. Starving people all over the world wouldn't eat mustard on tuna."

"I like milk and mustard on tuna."

"I'm just saying that makes you an alien and universally wrong and you're keeping me up."

He chewed carefully. "I figured since I couldn't sleep you shouldn't, so I came over. Your car, the hood was steaming from the rain. You went out recently. So my guess is you haven't been sleeping so good either."

"Is that really your business?"

"Of course."

I sighed and put down my sandwich. "You remember that dead cat by Mrs. Johnson's house?"

"Yeah."

"I buried it."

"You went out in the rain and buried a dead cat? Anyone see you do it?"

"Don't know, and don't care."

Leonard nodded. "Cookie?" he said, pushing the cookie bag toward me.

I took a vanilla cookie from the bag. Leonard moved the bag to his side of the table, and got up and removed a Dr Pepper bottle from the fridge, sat back down, and twisted off the cap. He took a long swig. "Man," he said. "These are the good ones."

"Right from the warehouse where the originals were made," I said.

"You are the man. Have I ever told you that, Hap? You are the man?"

"Whenever I have something you want me to keep having around, yes, you have told me that."

"Like Dr Pepper?"

"Like that."

"And vanilla cookies."

"Yes."

"Then that whole 'you are duh man' bit has power?"

"A little."

The rain was brutal now. It hit the house hard and the windows rattled. We got ourselves more to drink, turned out the lights, and went into the living room and sat in the dark.

"Isn't this where we say something like 'Well, the farmers need the rain?' " Leonard said.

"I suppose it is."

The file Marvin had given me was still lying on the coffee table. I glanced at it. Leonard glanced at it. We both glanced at it. Neither of us picked it up.

"You ain't been quite yourself for a while, Hap."

"Nope," I said. "I haven't. And you haven't been all that hot since John has been gone."

"Guilty as charged. John's brother is trying to convince him that God can make him straight. His brother says being gay goes against tradition."

"I don't always have turkey on Thanksgiving. That's a tradition. But the world keeps spinning even if I don't eat turkey."

"Yep. It's silly."

A peal of thunder made the house shake.

"Okay," I said. "That makes me think God is on the side of the traditionalist."

Leonard laughed.

12

Here's how it had gone down the day before.

At the coffeehouse, Marvin took out his big folder and gave us each a small folder from inside of it. He had asked that the information be prepared, and Mrs. Christopher, with Cason's help, had done just that.

Marvin said, "Before we open them, let me lay some things out. General information that may or may not be important. Mrs. Christopher is a widow. She has been rich all her life. But not so it shows. She lives simply. Nice home, but nothing flashy. Drives a standard automobile. Inherited money from her husband, who died of a heart attack. She had a nervous breakdown after her son's death, spent some time in a mental institution. Nothing severe. Just there to be watched and evaluated. She came out a couple months later. As far as the death of her son goes, the police believe this is a done deal. That whoever did it is long gone and there's no way to find them. Mrs. Christopher obviously doesn't believe the police know what they're talking about. She believes it wasn't what it appears to be."

"Do you think she's wrong?" I said.

"I'm open to another view if there's evidence to suggest it," Marvin said.

"This Cason Statler," Leonard said. "He seems to believe her."

"Yeah," Marvin said. "But that doesn't mean anything."

"He seems solid enough," Leonard said.

"You just liked the way he looked," I said.

"If he's that pretty, he's honest, and noble, loyal, and trustworthy," Leonard said.

"That's a lot of the Boy Scout oath," I said.

"He wears tight pants and has broad shoulders and is really nice-looking,” Leonard said, “so, I thought I’d give him some good attributes.”

“I can show you some things in this,” Marvin said, tapping his folder, “that are definitely true. So let’s pretend this is our first day at school, and we’ve got our supplies in front of us, and one of those is a nice folder like this one, and I’m gonna be the teacher, and I’m gonna say, Shut up, and open ’em up.”

We each opened our folder. There was a photo on top.

“Damn,” Leonard said.

The photo had been snapped near a run of water, and at first I couldn’t decide what water it was, and then I realized it was the creek that ran by the university at Camp Rapture, wound its way through a very nice park of pecan trees and oaks, and twisted on through the poorer part of town and went on to somewhere beyond my knowledge.

Brett and I had actually gone over to Camp Rapture once to look at a used car. We ended up buying it. I drove our old car, and she drove the one we bought to that park to have a picnic. Brett knew the place and told me about it. I remembered it well. I even remembered that we had tuna sandwiches with bananas cut up in them, along with crushed potato chips. Something Brett came up with. I thought it was a terrible idea until I ate one.

The park was along the edge of a hiking and jogging trail. The trail was wooded on both sides, and beautiful. There were wide spots with picnic tables, and there were big hickory and pecan trees there. We took a walk along the trail. There was a large Hoss apple tree near the edge of the creek. Its thick limbs twisted in unusual ways. We stopped next to it and kissed. The tree was in the photo.

Near the tree, there was woman lying facedown by the side of the trail, not far from the creek. Her hair was dark as sin and her body was pale as bone and she was amazingly thin. Her ribs stuck against her flesh like the framework of a canoe. Her clothes, what looked like shorts, underwear, a bra, and T-shirt, were heaped nearby. All of her clothes were black. Including the underwear.

“Shot in the back of the head,” Marvin said. “Name’s Mini Marchland. She was on her last outing with Ted Christopher, Mrs. Christopher’s son. Turn your page, class.”

I lifted up the photo and placed it aside. There was another. A man lying dead on the trail with his face turned to the side. The creek was not visible. He was wearing black jogging shoes, jogging pants, and a dark green T-shirt.

“When did this happen?” I asked.

“Two years ago,” Marvin said. “The couple had gone jogging, and when their car was found in the park driveway, and no one came to claim it, people went looking. The bodies lay there for half a day maybe.”

“On a jogging trail?” I said.

“That day, the only two people feeling like they needed to be physically fit were these two. They would have ended up better had they sat on the couch in front of the TV at home and ate cheese doodles and sniffed glue.”

I looked at some of the other photos. They were more of the same at closer and different angles. There was one close shot of their heads so you could see where the bullets had gone in. Close photos of the girl’s clothes heaped up. Close-ups of the ground and shoe marks, and a close-up of Ted’s shoe bottoms.

“How did Mrs. Christopher get all of this material?” Leonard asked.

“She knows a lot of people,” Marvin said. “And Cason knows a lot of people. Money and connections solve a lot of problems.”

“Was the girl raped?” I asked.

“No,” Marvin said. “Just stripped. Some of the cops thought maybe he was interrupted.”

“If he was,” Leonard said, “wouldn’t shooting her in the head have been a bigger interruption? Did anybody notice gunfire?”

“Nothing about that in the files,” Marvin said. “The guy’s wallet was taken.”

“He had it in his jogging pants?” I asked.

“That’s what they figure. The pants have a back pocket. He didn’t have a wallet on him, and there wasn’t one in his car. Also, his ring finger was cut off. His mother said he wore a high school graduation ring.”

“Did it ever turn up?” I asked. “A pawnshop, that sort of thing?”

“Nope,” Marvin said. “Not yet.”

“Anything stolen from her?” I asked.

“Her shoes were missing. And her socks.”

“Anyone see the couple earlier that day?” I asked.

“Nothing here to indicate that,” Marvin said.

“So how did anyone know they went jogging?” I asked.

“When they found the car and found the bodies and jogging clothes, they put two and two together. Jogging clothes. Jogging trail. No brains were overheated in figuring that part out.”

“Did you guys notice the bottom of the Christopher kid’s shoes?” Leonard said.

We picked up our photos and looked.

“Nice tread,” I said.

“Yep,” Leonard said, “and I have noticed something that we elite in the crime business like to call a clue.”

I turned the picture left and right. I said, “The shoes are clean.”

“Yep,” Leonard said. “If they were new, and he did a bit of jogging before he got interrupted and shot in the head, maybe they’d look kind of clean, but these look really clean. I think someone at the police department thought the same. Otherwise, why would they take a close-up of the bottom of his shoes?”

“Damn, Leonard,” Marvin said, “that may be the first time you’ve ever had a good idea. You’re like a regular Miss Marple.”

“And her shoes are missing,” Leonard said. “So maybe they got taken away before she was dumped. They got the clothes dropped all right, but forgot the socks and shoes.”

“So, you’re thinking they weren’t shot on the trail?” I said.

Leonard nodded, and now he had about him an air of superiority. That’s how he was, one good idea and for a day he thought he was Einstein. “And the car, it could have been left there when the killer dumped them. Or maybe the car was dropped off later. I don’t know. It’s just an idea.”

“It kind of makes sense,” I said. “I was bothered by the fact the bodies lay there that long and no one found them. Could have been that way, but I been to that place, and it’s pretty busy with people running, walking, picnicking, screwing in the bushes. But if they were killed somewhere else and dropped off early … Any information on time of death?”

“They were killed in the morning, was their determination,” Marvin said. “That’s all the report there is about that. As I said, half a day maybe, if they were lying there the whole time. It’s a guess. They’re country cops and country doctors. Not stupid, just not geared toward that sort of thing. The place doesn’t have a real coroner.”

“What about blood evidence?” I asked. “That would let you know something about where they were killed."

"There's no blood evidence information here," Marvin said, shuffling through some pages with writing on them. Leonard and I shuffled through the same pages. I said, "Isn't that a little odd? I mean, they got all this information, but nothing on that?"

"Again, the Camp Rapture police aren't noted for efficiency," Marvin said. "They do have a hell of a fund-raiser with an assortment of different kinds of barbecue, including raccoon and possum, and a country band once a year, but blood evidence tools … not so much. The chief over there is new, and the one before him was an educated idiot. Degrees out the ass and all the common sense of a duck. Anyway, the new lady they got is all right. Before her it was just good old straightforward corruption, so they've moved up a notch."

"You think this is something the cops of that time were in on?" I asked. "Some kind of cover-up?"

"I think they were just incompetent," he said.

We sipped coffee, looked at the photos and the information for a while. When I was through, I looked up, said, "There's a kind of neatness about it."

"That's what Mrs. Christopher thinks. That it's all too neat."

"What does she think really happened?" I asked.

"She thinks it was a hit," Marvin said. "She thinks he made someone mad, or knew something he shouldn't, so they killed him, made it look like another kind of crime. A lot of that is just motherly instinct, but Cason thinks maybe there's something to it."

"So you care about what he thinks?" I said.

"He is an investigative reporter. You grow some instincts, you do that enough."

"And maybe," I said, "Mrs. Christopher is just grieving and trying to make more sense of this than just a standard old murder. The idea that anyone can die for any kind of stupid thing is hard to take, especially if it's someone close to you."

"That's also possible," Marvin said. "The daughter, June, Ted's sister, thinks there's nothing to it."

"You talked to her?" I asked.

Marvin shook his head. "That will be your job. Mrs. Christopher said Ted and his sister didn't get along well, not even when they were kids. She also said June was bothered that Mrs.

Christopher planned to leave her money to Ted. Which on the surface sounds tough, but she said she planned to do that because June married into money and divorced real well. Ted, without family money, would have ended up with the lint in his shorts. I should note too, that the private detective she hired didn't believe it was a hit either."

"So we're sloppy seconds?" I said.

"Yep," Marvin said. "She told me that right up front. I knew the guy she hired, Jimmy Malone. Used to run into him from time to time doing police work. Not exactly on the up-and-up. When he didn't find anything, Mrs. Christopher let it lie for a while, then got it on her mind again that it was a setup, and hired us."

"So," Leonard said, "she thinks Malone took the money and did nothing?"

"My guess is," Marvin said, "that's what Cason thinks and is afraid we're gonna do the same. Me, I don't know. Jimmy was a shit, and a womanizer, and he liked money too much, but he usually did the job. He just didn't always do it the way it ought to be done. He didn't mind playing angles. But the thing is, he didn't find out any more than the police knew."

"We could talk to him," Leonard said.

"Only if you talk to the dead," Marvin said. "He retired, then promptly drowned in a boating accident out at the lake."

Leonard said. "What's this?" He was holding up one of the photos of the dead girl.

"Kind of obvious, don't you think?" Marvin said.

"Not the girl. The tree."

"Let me see," Marvin said. "I'm going to go for Hoss apple."

"The other tree," Leonard said.

"Hickory nut," I said.

"No. What's on the tree?"

We each found our copy of the photo and looked at the hickory tree. There was something on it all right. It was an angled view but it was some kind of drawing. What I could make out was a horned head and a partial face. It was painted there in red. Spray paint, most likely.

"Graffiti," I said.

"Yeah," Leonard said, "but is there anything about it in the notes?"

"No," Marvin said. "And that's because no one thought it meant anything. Kids paint on trees and underpasses and walls all the time. Why would someone kill them and then make a design on a tree?”

“All I’m saying,” Leonard said, “is Mrs. Christopher may be right. It might not be a random murder.”

“That whole mystery clue thing with paintings on trees and feathers and moles in the shape of the state of Rhode Island on a blonde’s ass, in real life, it doesn’t happen much,” Marvin said.

“He’s working his way through the Sherlock Holmes series,” I said. “He’s gotten a little obsessive about mysteries. He found a pair of socks he’s been missing for a couple of months, and he thinks he’s full of deductive reasoning now. Like maybe the socks had some kind of plan to hide out.”

“Listen, Ace,” Marvin said. “You and Hap just go out and ask questions and bumble around. I’ll do the real detective work from the office.”

“Ouch,” Leonard said.

13

So that’s how it went. Now we were sitting on the couch looking at those same photos and reading the information that came with them, thinking back on our meeting with Marvin.

It had started raining hard again, and the atmosphere had settled on the house like a woolen cap. The electricity blinked and crackled a few times but stayed on. It was so dark outside we had to turn on a light.

“So,” Leonard said. “Where do we start?”

“Same place the cops did, with the people who knew the victims.”

“There’s a long list here,” Leonard said, flipping through the folder.

“I think we should do what Marvin suggested. Talk to the sister.”

“To do that,” Leonard said, looking out the window at the rain, “we have to get off the couch. And drive around. We could wait until tomorrow.”

“We weren’t hired to stay home and play Scrabble.”

Leonard’s eyes lit up. “It’s a perfect day for Scrabble. Me and John used to play Scrabble when it rained.”

“I’ll get us a couple of rain slickers and we’ll go to work.”

“So,” Leonard said, “you’re not suggesting we sit on the couch in rain slickers and play Scrabble and call that work?”

“Nope,” I said.

“Dang it.”

We left Leonard’s wreck in the driveway to let the rain work the hardened bird shit off his windshield, took my car.

Before we left, Leonard got something out of his car and slipped in beside me. He laid what he had on the seat between us and pulled off his slicker and put it in the backseat with mine. He picked up what he had laid down and put it on his head.

"What in the hell is that?" I said.

"It's a deerstalker cap."

"A deerstalker cap?"

"You know, Holmes wore one in the movies."

"I know, but what are you doing with one?"

"I'm wearing it."

"Should I wear a bowler and carry an umbrella and let you call me Watson?"

"Would you?"

"Where did you get that?"

"I bought it last Halloween, for a party."

"You dressed up like Sherlock Holmes for Halloween?"

"I don't get to dress up often," Leonard said. "John went as Watson."

"So why are you wearing the hat now? Halloween is long past."

"We're on the hunt. The game's afoot."

"Leonard, you are not wearing that foolish cap."

"Why not?"

"Because you stand out like a hard dick in a nunnery."

Leonard quit looking at me. He turned and stared at the windshield.

"So you're gonna give me the cold shoulder?"

He didn't respond.

"You have this thing for hats, Leonard, but you are not a hat person … Look, you can wear it in the car. The car only. Got me?"

Leonard put on his seat belt, rested his hands in his lap, and stared straight ahead.

"Outside the car, you got that thing on I might have to kill you."

14

First on our list was Ted's sister's house. My idea of a really neat house is one that doesn't have to be held up with a stick, and there are no burnt cans in a pile in the driveway or an old Dodge on blocks with chickens roosting under it.

This house was way past that. It was so cool and connected to the center of the universe it stopped raining when we got there. It was behind a fence and a barred gate. As we cruised up, through the gate, we could see there was enough green yard to play the Super Bowl. Even the colorful leaves that fell from the trees and blew across the grass seemed embarrassed by the intrusion.

We parked in front of the gate. I rolled down the window and pushed a button on a metal box inside a brick indentation. There was a buzz and a long silence. I was about to push it again when a snappy female voice with an accent south of the border asked if she could help us.

I explained who we were and what we were doing and that June's mother had hired us to look into something for her. The voice went away. I turned and looked at Leonard. He was still wearing the deerstalker.

The voice came back, said we could come up, but the tone now was sharp and hard enough to clip paper dolls from cardboard. I guess she had hoped we would be rejected.

The gate slid back and we glided in. The driveway was a big loop of shiny wet concrete in front of a yellow adobe house with a Spanish tile roof. The house was big enough and tall enough to hold all of Noah's animals and a spare woodchuck. You could have driven four horses running abreast through any of the windows, and the doorway was tall enough and wide enough to accommodate at least one war elephant if it bent its head slightly and went through politely.

No one rode out to meet us in a golf cart, so after I made Leonard take off his hat, we got out and stepped up the walk. When I looked back at my car, it looked unnatural in the driveway. That driveway knew and adored limousines and sports cars, not functional metal, plastic, and glass. I leaned down by the side of the walk and felt the grass. Damn if it wasn't artificial.

Leonard wanted to ring the doorbell, so I let him. I wanted to ring it too, but sometimes you have to give in to the children. You could hear it chime throughout the house.

No one inside made a rush of things. Of course, a house that big, you might have to pack a sandwich before you went to answer the door.

When the door was finally opened it was the woman that went with the voice over the intercom. She was a petite Hispanic woman in her late twenties and she was actually wearing a maid outfit, just like in the movies. She had beautiful black hair and great skin and lips that looked like they would have been fun to suck on. Because of her stern voice, I had somehow expected her to look like the ass end of a mule and be built like a linebacker.

We were invited inside. I tried not to rubberneck. I had been in government buildings that size, but not a house, and the government buildings weren't so well furnished.

The maid hustled us along a long wide hall with blue and white tile floors. The walls had paintings on them that looked like they had been painted by madmen and recently. I liked them.

We were led off the hall through another war-elephant-size door and into a library that made the one downtown look like a used-book store. The books smelled of leather and old paper and more knowledge than could be acquired in three lifetimes, plus a whiff of cigar smoke covered in a light overcoat of air freshener. The place had a masculine feel about it, with leather couches and chairs and sliding ladders to climb onto to look at books on the upper shelves. There was a large window at the back and looking through it we could see a shiny pond out there, recently swollen by the rain. Beyond that was a wall like out front.

The maid told us to make ourselves comfortable and went away.

We sat on the couch and Leonard said, "Can you believe this is in the center of town? Hidden up here in the trees?"

“I can’t believe a place like this is anywhere,” I said. “I thought they made this stuff up for the movies.”

“The movie screen wouldn’t be wide enough to hold this place,” Leonard said. “It might take a few theaters just to get that hallway in frame.”

A moment later a woman came into the room. She was some woman. She looked like she was dressed to go out on the town, and not our town. Someplace in Manhattan, perhaps Paris, London, or Rome. Her long blonde hair was waved and she wore a pantsuit of shimmering white and she had a small glass in her hand and it was half-filled with a golden liquid that I knew wasn’t fruit juice.

“Good afternoon, gentlemen,” she said. It was a nice voice full of pep and insincerity. “I’m June. I hope you don’t mind if I don’t offer you a drink. I thought we could race through this rather quickly.”

“That’s fine,” I said.

She came and sat in a leather chair across from us and put her drink down on the wooden coffee table between us, no coaster. It was a heavily stained table and it was the only thing in the room besides the books that looked old.

“So, you’re private detectives,” June said, smiling. She had nice teeth and just the slightest bit of an overbite.

“We’re not exactly private detectives,” I said.

“Oh,” she said.

“We’ve still got the training wheels on,” Leonard said.

“So should you be on the job?” she asked.

“We’ve had a lot of experience,” I said. “We’re just not what you’d call official. We’re operatives. We work for a private detective.”

“So someday you may get a little badge, a whistle, and a canteen,” she said.

“Our boss,” Leonard said, “he started with Where’s Waldo books to sharpen us up, but now we’ve moved on to interviews. We mostly ask short questions.”

“I see,” she said. She grinned and leaned back and sipped her drink and studied Leonard, then me. Her eyes were very green and very penetrating.

“You boys look a little rough,” she said. “Like you’ve been around the block a few times.”

“Maybe more than a few,” I said.

“Oh, I didn’t mean anything by it. I like the way you look. Most of the men I know use skin cream and have straight noses and the most violent thing they do is grunt playing table tennis. Sometimes, in their sleep, they fart dramatically. Oh, I’m telling, aren’t I?”

She moved her head slowly, so we could have a look at her profile, and then she moved it back and sipped her drink.

“It’s just that I don’t know why my mother is bothering with all this, or why she would send you to talk to me. There’s nothing I can add. Ted and his girlfriend were murdered for sex and money. Though they didn’t get the sex, and my guess is they didn’t get much money.”

“Do you know what was actually stolen besides his ring?” I asked.

“Well, he may have had money in the wallet,” June said. “But I don’t know.”

“Credit cards?”

“Most likely. Several. Mostly filled to the brim and leaking over, would be my guess.”

“Did the police say anything about anyone trying to use them after his death?”

“No. I know you’re thinking that might mean the robbery was a sham. But I think whoever did it panicked and took what was in the wallet and was afraid to use the cards. Afraid they’d be tracked. Or maybe the cards got canceled before the killer could use them, and they just disposed of them.”

She leaned back in her chair and crossed her long panted legs and dropped her head slightly. I was sure she knew the effect this had; the way her hair fell across one eye, and the way she looked when she lifted her head and smiled that sexy beaver-toothed grin.

“Look,” she said, “my brother, he and I weren’t close. I’m sorry about what happened to him, but it was an unfortunate accident. Wrong place. Wrong time. I suppose it could have been someone who knew him, knew he was going to be there, thought he had money, and jumped him, but I think he was a victim of opportunity.”

“What about the girl?” I asked.

“She was a tramp. And in case you’re vague on that, let me translate. She was Miss Insert Slot B."

"That covers a lot of ground," I said.

"And a lot of ground was covered," June said.

"Only thing that surprised me about her was that she got killed in the daytime."

"Beg your pardon?" Leonard said.

"She didn't go out in the daytime."

"Fear of skin cancer?" I said. "She freckled?"

"Nope … Wait for it … She thought she was a vampire."

15

"Big teeth?" Leonard said. "Bite your neck, suck your blood? Wear a cape? Turn into a bat?"

"I doubt she turned into a bat," June said. "A bitch maybe, but not a bat."

"So, you're not denying the cape?" he said.

She smiled at Leonard.

"You knew Mini, then?" I said.

"Some. Liked to wear black and her hair was dyed so dark it looked like strands of shadow. She mainly went out at night. Claimed the sunlight made her weak, unless she needed to go out, and if she did, she seemed spry enough. She was out that day, wasn't she? The day she got popped. She was said to drink blood. Mostly it was her who said it. She was a goddamn nut. Being a nut was kind of her hobby. Some people collect stamps or keep a diary, she practiced doing nutty things."

"It probably has nothing to do with anything," I said, "outside of it's just weird as all daylights and I want to hear about it, but could you give us some more background on her?"

"I didn't know her well. I didn't want to know her well. But she told me a few things when she got out of jail."

"Jail?" I said.

"Yeah. She and my brother dated for a while, and I was trying to patch things up with him, because, as I said, we didn't get along. So, in the process, me and her hung a little and she talked a lot. I picked up other bits of her story here and there. Mini roosted with a really screwball crowd. Especially Evil Lynn."

"You're yankin' me?" Leonard said. "She had a friend named Evil Lynn?"

"I haven't had the pleasure of yanking you."

She smiled at Leonard seductively. I thought: Lady, you are wasting the possibility of a few wrinkles around your mouth on someone who is seriously batting for another team. Look this way.

She didn't.

"Was Evil Lynn her real name?" I asked.

"Of course not. Her last name was Gonzello. I called her Godzilla, not Evil Lynn. I can't remember Godzilla's first name. Cassie. Candy. Canola. Something like that. Only met her once, at my brother's place, and that was enough. There were several of them, actually. Vampires I mean … Let's walk outside. My husband used to smoke cigars in here, and I can still smell them, and him. Both stink."

We walked through the hallway, outside into the backyard. There were trees and a few leaves, and there was a man in work clothes walking around with a stick with a point on the end of it. He was stabbing the leaves and putting them in a big, black plastic bag he was dragging.

"I know a guy works doing special effects in movies," she said. "I'm thinking about having plastic trees put in. These are so messy."

Leonard looked at me out of the corner of his eye. I looked back and tried not to laugh. Plastic trees?

Underneath one of the pesky real trees was a stone table with a bench on either side. We sat down there.

June rattled the ice in her glass, looked at what was left of her drink as if it were the last of all sunshine, and said, "This is what I know, and all I know. And when I tell you what I know, I don't want to talk about it again. I'm all through. Just thinking about her and her nutball friends makes my ass tired."

She shifted her tired, but very nice, ass on the bench and looked at the pond. There was a big insect, a dragonfly, cruising over the water. She put her focus on that for a while. Maybe she was thinking about having it killed and crucified on the edge of the pond as an object lesson, then having the yard sprayed with insecticide. She could always get her special effects friend to make her a robotic dragonfly, maybe some birds. She drank and moved the liquid around inside her mouth in case her teeth were in need of a whirlpool bath. The man with the pointed stick and the bag full of leaves moved across the yard and around a corner of the house and out of sight.

June swallowed loudly, said, “Mini hooked up with Ted because they were both a little freaky. Ted, he was into anal, and she didn’t mind it. His girlfriend before, Lori, not so happy about it. She had two kids, and she told me all Ted wanted to do was crawl up her poop chute. It’s all he talked about. Had videos and magazines and a game plan in bed that always, if you’ll pardon the pun, ended the same way.”

I wasn’t sure where this was going, and maybe it was going a little too far south, but Leonard and I let it go. I kind of like nasty stories.

June said, “She started thinking, from the way the kid’s toys smelt and felt, that while she and the kids were out, Ted was greasing up and shoving toys up his ass.”

“Ouch,” Leonard said. “Hope one of those toys wasn’t a bicycle.”

“So, she confronts him, and he admits it, and she is major pissed off, and he says, ‘Hell, just wash them off.’ He wasn’t concerned. It was all about his ass, his fetish.”

“And that was, rim shot, so to speak, the end of the relationship,” I said.

“Not yet. She thought maybe he could change. We always think our men can change, and they can’t. Assholes at birth, assholes at death. A motto I live by. Anyway, one day she comes home, and she’s got the children with her, and what does she find but a drunk and drugged-out Ted passed out in the living room on the rug, naked, with the engine of a hard plastic toy train up his ass, the rest of it dangling out, all the way down to the caboose, like it couldn’t make the hill.”

“Oh, hell,” I said. “That had to hurt.”

“Yep. Bled on the carpet. Children were traumatized, and no one wanted to play with the train thereafter. And she’d already dealt with him and a rubber duck and a twirler’s baton, so she’d had enough. The train set was expensive. You can buy a duck or a baton anywhere and mostly cheap, but not those buddies. She was fed up with him, and she liked that carpet. Moroccan. Way more expensive than the train. So, it was choo-choo-choo-cha-boogie, you are gone, baby. So, that leads him to Mini, who is connected to Godzilla and a couple other girls who drink blood. Good thing for Ted is, Mini didn’t have a problem with the ass business.”

“Will there be more trains and tunnels in this story?” Leonard asked.

“No. We’re switching tracks,” June said. “I’m just trying to say nuts attract nuts. Now we’re going to the Children of the Night. That’s what they called themselves. Is that hokey or what?”

The maid, as if on cue, came out with another drink, set it on the table in front of June, and without a word went back to the house. I watched her swing away with more than a bit of pleasure. Being male is a full-time, and sometimes tiring, job.

“You like that maid outfit?” June said to me.

“I don’t think it would fit me,” I said, “but it’s very nice. I don’t have the legs for it either.”

“You ought to see me in one,” she said.

“And what days do you wear it?” I asked.

She snorted and sipped her fresh drink. She was starting to get pretty lit, though she was an experienced drunk and wasn’t losing her focus on the story, and the words came out clear, if slightly spaced, as if they had to stop and rest before going on.

“I don’t know why Mini felt she could talk to me, but she did. Maybe she needed to get away from all weird all the time. Also, she was drunk and at a party here at my house, and she was fresh out of jail and no one else wanted to talk to her. Word gets around. Had I not been drunk, I wouldn’t have wanted to talk to her myself. She told me she and these other girls, Godzilla, as ringleader, would go out to the cemetery and have ceremonies, reading spells out of witchcraft books, lighting candles, that kind of crap, calling on Satan to come on up and see them sometime. Then one night, Godzilla’s girlfriend … Let’s see … She was called Trip. I don’t know what her real name was, but she was called that … So, one night, they’re in the cemetery, and they’re doing some ceremony or another, and it leads to Trip letting Godzilla cut her neck a little with a pocketknife and suck blood from the wound. And then everyone has to have a taste, so there’s more cutting. Everyone giving up a little blood, except Godzilla. They all take turns sucking neck, which I figure is pretty damn unsanitary.

“Godzilla and Trip, who were lesbian lovers, end up making out. Then the nonlesbians say what the hell, and they’re all making out, followed by more blood sucking. Anyway, they’re sucking blood and suckin' whatever, and Godzilla, who was a pretty tough-lookin' broad, or seemed that way the time I saw her … I figured about three feet of chain and two stiff drinks and I could have whipped all of them."

"And without the chain?" I said.

"Might have been touch and go," June said.

"So you were saying?" I said.

"Well, they were doing vampire things, I guess. But Mini, she tells me that the night in the graveyard when everyone got naked and tried to find a place to bite, Godzilla started talking about killing people. Feasting on their blood, as she put it. Mini thought it was cool talk, but just talk. Like you know, when you say you're putting a band together in your garage and you're going to cut a record and go all the way to the top, and you know you're not, and the best that happens is you end up playing a bad version of 'Wipe Out' or 'Free Bird' at a bar for tips. Anyway, Mini claimed she was just playing along. Told me she thought she was a vampire on the weekends and late at night, and the rest of the time, she had to work at RadioShack. The other girls, they all had money and time to waste. Harder to be a vampire when you have to be nice to customers and earn a paycheck."

June took a long ice-rattling drink from her glass. When she started talking again her tongue had grown a little thick.

"What happened was, one night they're driving along in Godzilla's car, four of them, Godzilla, Trip, Mini, and this other goober I can't think of, and they come across this drunk frat-rat on a bicycle. Mini said they could see him pedaling along ahead of them. He was all over the road, like a sidewinder snake trying to drive a tricycle. So they pull over and get out, and this guy, he thinks he's hit the jackpot. Four hotties giving his drunk ass attention. Well, three hotties and Godzilla.

"They get him to abandon his bicycle, which he tells them he stole off a front porch, and he climbs into the car. Mini said Trip showed him some tit and a bottle of whiskey, and now this sap thinks he's died and gone to heaven."

Something clicked while June was talking. I remembered this. I had seen stuff about it on the local news, a while back. The vampire angle had been mentioned, but I had forgotten all about it.

"They drove over to Camp Rapture, teasing him and giving him whiskey, and then Mini said Godzilla said something about her and Trip taking the boy out behind the warehouse district and doing him a favor. By this point, this guy was so drunk and worked up he'd have humped a crippled sheep wearing stockings, a garter belt, and a purple beret. To him, even Godzilla was probably starting to look like a runway model. Man, where's my maid? I need another drink."

"Finish your story," I said, "and I'll look her up for you."

June held up her glass and shook the ice in it, hoping the maid might hear. She didn't. June shook the glass harder. After a moment she gave up and placed it on the table and burped pleasantly with her hand almost making it over her mouth.

"There's not much left to tell," June said. "They took him out back of a shed, down in the warehouse district. Mini said she could see what was happening from the inside of the car. They were a ways back, but it was all in full view. While the guy is shucking his drawers, thinking he's going to get to churn the log in the mill, out of her purse Godzilla pulls a big knife and sticks the guy in the neck."

June made a stabbing motion in the air, gritting her teeth as she did.

"Then Godzilla pounced on him, started sticking him, lots of times. He screamed and fell down on his face. Godzilla kept after him. She wasn't any slacker. She tried to hand Trip the knife, but she wouldn't take it. Godzilla went back to it. Trip went back to the car and got in and sat there and all she could say was that there was a hole in the guy's back big enough to shove a wiener dog through. Or so Mini said. They watched Godzilla bend over the body and start sucking at the blood.

"When it was over, Godzilla came back covered in gore. Mini said her eyes were wide and bright and she had that big wet knife in her hand and a loopy blood-smeared smile on her face like she'd just had a seven-course dinner and someone had been polite enough to burp her.

"Mini said right then she was through playing vampire. She got out of the car and made a run for it. And when she looked back, Trip was out of the car and chasing after her. But Trip, drunk, or just worn out by shock, fell down in a stretch of trees, and Mini just kept going. They were way out in the country, so she got lost. Wandered through some woods and over a little creek, finally saw lights. It was Camp Rapture. She could see the university tower all lit up.”

June paused and closed her eyes. The last words she had spoken had begun to have fuzz around them. I said, “So, she saw the tower lit up.”

“Real pretty, that tower at night,” June said.

“Yeah, it’s nice,” Leonard said. “What happened after Mini saw it?”

“She went into town and found the police and told them about it. They went out, and sure enough, they found the guy. He looked like bloody rags, he was so cut up. And when they found Godzilla and Trip and the other girl back at Godzilla’s pad, Godzilla was still covered in blood.

“They arrested all of ’em, includin’ Mini. But it was decided she didn’t do anything but hang out with the wrong crowd, so they let her out of jail and told her to hang up her gothic duds and turn state’s evidence. She did. Oh, God. I’m drunk. Do I sound drunk?”

“Amazingly,” I said, “not much.”

“Godzilla had somehow dropped her credit card, near the body, so when they found the body they found the card, and that established the likelihood of her being there. Later all the girls turned on her, even Trip. That put the nail in her coffin, which, for a vampire, seems appropriate. But there was one more thing. Godzilla threw up when she was arrested. All that blood. Samples were taken. Eventually, the results came back. It was the guy’s blood, of course. She actually had sucked down about a half quart of it, the greedy whore.”

“Do you remember the dead boy’s name?” I asked.

“Shit,” June said, “I’m two sips off startin’ to have a hard time rememberin’ my own name. All I know is the family was a good family out of Houston, and they were in court during Godzilla’s trial. I heard rumors Godzilla swore she’d get all the other girls, kill them, or have them killed. But I heard one of my cousins say he saw Bigfoot once, and I just got to take him at his word.”

“And how are the girls?” I asked.

“How the hell would I know?” she said, put her head on the table, closed her eyes, and in a moment she was snoring like a water buffalo.

“Well,” Leonard said. “Reckon that’s our cue.”

16

We went back into the hall and the maid met us there. She was friendlier now and her voice was less gruff. She said, “She drunk yet?”

“Yes, but she went down a pretty clear talker,” I said.

“Passed out?” the maid asked.

“Yep,” Leonard said.

“She’s like that. Talks almost like she hasn’t had a drink, then she’s snoozin’. You got to watch sometimes so she doesn’t bump her head, she’ll go down so fast.”

“We’ll take that under advisement,” Leonard said.

“You know, in spite of what she says, she loved her brother very much.”

“So, you been listening in?” I said.

“Absolutely. I knew she wanted another drink too, but I didn’t bring it. She didn’t need it.”

“We heard she was pretty upset about her mother leaving the money to the brother,” Leonard said.

“Not really,” the maid said. “She was worried that Mini would get her hands on it. She didn’t want that to happen, and that’s all there was to that. I’ve worked for her for five years, and she’s not as heartless as she can sound when she’s drunk. She and her brother didn’t get along, but she loved him. She just didn’t know how much until he was dead. I’ll walk you gentlemen out.”

Outside, Leonard said, “That’s some story.”

“Actually,” I said, “I remember hearing about the case on the news. I don’t remember the details, but I remember hearing about it.”

"Me too," Leonard said. "But it happened before Mini bit the big one, and before she was dating Ted, so I'm not sure it means anything, even if those girls could actually change into bats."

"No one said they could change into bats," I said.

"I know, but that would be way cool, wouldn't it?"

"Oh, yeah," I said, and we bumped fists. "Do you think Mini telling June about all that in such detail means anything other than they were both drunk?"

"Got me," Leonard said.

Back in the car Leonard put on the deerstalker.

"You're just jackin' with me, aren't you? You know you look like a moron, but you're wearing that thing to get my goat and all its children, aren't you?"

Leonard leaned over and adjusted the car mirror and looked at himself. "I think it fits my personality."

"What personality?"

"That's just mean, Hap."

I put the mirror back the way I liked it. "We'll take back streets," I said.

"I want a Sonic burger."

"You have money?"

"Not on me … You have money?"

"Yes."

"Will you buy me a burger?"

"Will you take off the hat?"

"You can eat in the car at Sonic."

"Yes, but the waitress who brings it out will see you and know I'm with you."

"No one will know you."

"It's not a chance I'm willin' to take."

"I hate you," Leonard said.

17

In Marvin's office, Marvin looked up some things on the Internet and made a few calls to cops, a warden, some prison guards, and other people, including a sandwich shop that delivered.

He didn't offer us a sandwich, nor did he offer to let us order our own.

Leonard, wearing the deerstalker, sat in a client chair reading one of Marvin's fishing magazines. I sat with my hands on my knees feeling like a bored kid.

After a long while, Marvin put the phone down, scribbled some notes, said, "Okay, I remember this vampire case. I checked some of the details, and it appears June is pretty accurate in her story. I just didn't put Mini together with it, didn't remember her name and Mrs. Christopher didn't mention it."

"It seemed too coincidental to ignore," I said.

"It damn sure looks like the vampire killings and Mini go together," Marvin said. "It also appears that—"

Marvin paused and looked at Leonard. "You know, Leonard, if I'm going to talk seriously, and you're going to listen seriously, you have to take off that goddamn shitty hat."

"Thank you," I said.

"Et tu?" Leonard said.

"Now he's trying to show some education," I said.

Marvin just looked at him.

Leonard slowly removed the hat and placed it on his knee. "All my life people have been jealous of me."

"Keep tellin' yourself that," Marvin said. "So, what June told you, it's pretty much right. We'll just have to take her word on her brother and the toy train."

"Oh, man," I said. "That was something I could have gone to my grave without knowing.”

Marvin nodded. “Yep. Me too. What June didn’t tell you, and probably doesn’t know, but what my phone calls just found out, is about two weeks ago, Evil Lynn, real name Ray Lynn Gonzello, Godzilla to June, had a prisoner start somethin’ with her over who knows what. Godzilla beat her down like she was tenderizin’ meat. Then she challenged a fellow ass-whipped prisoner to cut her. Let her get to the shiv she’d just taken away from her. Wanted to show her that it wouldn’t hurt. That any wound she got would heal. That she was in fact a vampire.”

“Uh-oh,” Leonard said. “This isn’t going to end well.”

“On the nosey,” Marvin said. “Fact was she didn’t heal up at all. Got stabbed under the armpit and bled out faster than you could say ‘Oh, shit. I’ve been stabbed under the arm and it hurts like a motherfucker.’ According to what I got here, Godzilla had some actual last words.”

“I’m guessin’,” said Leonard, “it’s not the stuff about ‘Oh shit, I’ve been stabbed under the arm.’ ”

“Kind of sad, really,” Marvin said. “She said, ‘I’m just a girl.’ ”

“Nothing like experience to put things into perspective,” I said.

“What I’m thinkin’,” Marvin says, “is every day she’s eating crappy food in the cafeteria, and she’s not suckin’ blood—I don’t think—and she’s behind bars like a zoo animal, no vampire powers at work, and she still didn’t get it. That’s the part amazes me.”

“The knife was the only kind of explanation she understood,” I said.

“Now here’s some more CliffsNotes. A year back, Trip, real name Tammy Trip, the vampire’s assistant, was found dead in her apartment, hanging from a doorway. Drove a big nail there, attached a short noose made of two woven nylon stockings, and hung herself. She was all dressed up in her best black duds. Course, according to my buddy over in Camp Rapture who works for the cops, cop who found her said she had shit herself and her tongue was hanging out so far and so thick, they thought she had a partially deflated balloon in her mouth.”

“Dressin’ up don’t help much,” Leonard said, “if you end up with shit down your legs.”

“Six months ago, one of the other girls, one who stayed in the car with Mini, name was Joan Carter, was found in her bedroom with a hypodermic needle no longer full of heroin in her arm. She had been dead a few days. Her dog ate most of one of her legs and a large chunk out of her naked ass, but was kind enough to do all his pissin' and shittin' in one corner of the room."

"Leonard can't even do that," I said.

"Then we go back to Mini and her boyfriend," Marvin said. "They were killed two years ago."

"Seems like belonging to or being associated with the vampire clan brings a person bad luck," I said.

"Yep," Leonard said. "But I do have a suspect. Van Helsing."

Marvin ignored that. He said, "Now, I hate to tell you this part, and I suppose when I do, Leonard, you can put the deerstalker back on. Cop over in Camp Rapture tells me that a bunch of them thought from the start the bodies of Mini and Christopher's boy had been killed somewhere else and dumped. And it wasn't the first time they'd seen the devil head symbol, but all of that was kept hush-hush."

Leonard put the hat on, lounged loosely in his chair. "Yeah, baby," he said.

"So the cops weren't as stupid as we thought," I said.

"No," Marvin said. "They thought they'd keep some things back, something they could use to nail their guy later on. Not let it be known they were onto the right idea. Of course, it didn't help. The cases still went cold."

"Are you about to tell us the Devil Red symbol was at the scenes of their deaths?"

"It was found in the apartment where the girl hung herself. It was marked above the doorway where the noose was fastened. Other girl, one with the needle … It was drawn on the headboard of the bed. Small, but in sight if you were looking. And, lastly, as you noted, Leonard, it was drawn on one of the trees where Mini and Ted's bodies were found. Since the murders took place in different towns, and some time apart, no one put it together right away. Maybe it should have been obvious, the girls being part of the vampire group. But, different towns, different departments. Mini was killed in Camp Rapture along with Ted. Godzilla in prison—and there wasn't any symbol there, which means she may not have been part of the pattern at all, just stupid. Trip was in LaBorde at the time, having just moved there, and Joan, the dog's lunch, died in Tyler. They figure the killer is spacing his victims out to keep from being connected, to avoid expectations, or is playing a kind of game. Wants to taunt the authorities, show how clever he is. Thinks he's smarter than everyone else."

"And so far," I said, "that's been true. But whoever is whacking them is leaving the devil head symbol, so they're not hiding that hard."

"Here's something else. Mini was about to inherit enough money to not only buy some plastic vampire teeth, but on top of that there would be eight million dollars left over."

"Holy shit," Leonard said, "she invent a perpetual motion machine?"

"Nope. Her mother won the lottery."

18

"That's some lottery," I said. "Eight million dollars."

"Poor girl," Marvin said. "She never got to spend her inheritance." Marvin picked up the notes he had made, glanced at them, and continued. "Her father died when she was young. Her mother remarried, and the old gal wasn't exactly tip-top in the high value department. A drunk. A bit of a whore. Picked up for shoplifting a couple of times. Even had Mini in on the job once, teaching her to stuff items down her pants. And the kid was five. Mother was fired from a lot of jobs, mostly for not showing up, or showing up drunk, and once for giving another employee head in the back room for fifty dollars. She also paid a fine for dumping a dog beside the road and wishing it good luck in the future."

"Everything but wearing polyester jumpsuits," Leonard said.

"The sources for all this reliable?" I said. "We didn't have this info before."

"I wouldn't use them if they weren't," Marvin said. "They don't know it all, but they know a lot. Mostly from cops and retired cops, a couple of lawyers who are only partly shark. But it's just background stuff, nothing that solves anything. It just means all that money might somehow have been a motive. Figuring out if it was or wasn't, that's our job."

"Shit," Leonard said. "I was hoping someone else had done the work and we'd be through after today."

"Actually, that vampire business opened the gate," Marvin said. "Gave me an idea of who to contact on the force over there. Once I knew stuff they didn't, they were more forthcoming with things I didn't know. They figured they might as well tell me. The case was cold to them. So, I hate to give you guys a compliment, but you did good. It's the way it works in the detective business: The more you know, the more others are willing to tell you."

Marvin returned the notes to the table and leaned back in his chair. His chair was much better than ours. It was comfy and had wheels on it. "Mini didn't have true friends because her personality was a little strange. That's why she latched onto the vampire business, got in with that crowd."

"She was pretty," I said. "I could tell that in the photo. A little still, a little pale, and way too dead, but no discernible ants or maggots or signs of rot, still pretty until the bloating. Usually, pretty girls are popular. When they're alive, anyway."

"She was popular with some in a certain way," Marvin said.

"Local hole punch?" I said.

"Yep," Marvin said. "According to Will Turner, a retired cop I talked to, guy who actually interviewed Mini first, after Godzilla did the chop and suck thing. He got the impression that Mini was trying to fit in. Boys liked her for the drawer shuckin' part, but not for too much else."

"If only she could have yodeled," Leonard said.

"You are a heartless sonofabitch," I said.

"I was thinkin' she and her buddies killin' that drunk frat rat was the heartless part," Leonard said. "And as a reward, her mother wins eight million dollars for buying a two-dollar ticket. What's up with that?"

"Bought the ticket at a filling station," Marvin said. "When she got some of the money, she went out to get drunk in celebration, leaving her husband home with a glass of milk and a bologna sandwich. She got so drunk she fell asleep in her car on the railroad track."

"I see this coming," Leonard said.

"She didn't," Marvin said. "A train knocked her ass about two miles down the track and into some woods and into a sink of water. Next morning they found the car. Someone finally saw the roof of the car sticking out of the water, shining in the sunlight. She turned out to have a car engine stuck up her ass. But the good news, my contact said, was the air bag opened."

"That technology," I said, "it's somethin'."

"I presume the husband inherits?" Leonard said.

Marvin shook his head. "Nope. Mini's mother, Twilla, bought herself a new car and a hairdo and about three thousand dollars' worth of duds on credit, then went to a lawyer and made a will.

She left it to her daughter should anything happen to her. This was two weeks before Mini was found dead. Little later, Twilla got hit by the train. Not long after, the daughter and the boyfriend bit it."

"Was anyone next in line for the money after Mini?" I asked.

"The animal shelter," Marvin said. "She liked cats. Not dogs, just cats."

"Prejudice is an ugly thing," Leonard said.

"Bert, her husband, wasn't completely left out. He got ten thousand. But that had to bite his butt. Him with ten thousand and the cats with almost eight million dollars. That buys a lot of catnip."

"So Bert could have a grudge," I said.

"I guess the cats are looking over their shoulders," Leonard said.

"Cops looked into him," Marvin said, "up one side and down another. They couldn't find anything that led them to think he was involved or did anything himself. But it's a motive. I don't know how it would connect to the other girls, but maybe he was trying to make it look like the murders were connected with what Godzilla and the girls had done. According to what I got here in my notes, Bert wasn't big enough or tough enough to do much but give Sharon's cats to the animal shelter. That was about the extent of his mean as far as the cops can see. Still, we won't take him off the suspect list."

"June might have a place on that list too," Leonard said. "I don't know how much I buy the 'she really loved her brother' bit. She didn't like the idea that he might get that inheritance instead of her. She had the money to make a hit, and if Mini was there when it was set up, so be it. Not that June needs the inheritance, but the ones who don't need it are often the ones who want more of it."

"All right," Marvin said. "June's on the list too."

"Do you think it's odd that Mini's mom made out a will right after getting the money?" I said.

"Not really," Marvin said. "She was old enough to think about it. Maybe she finally felt motherly and thought if anything happened to her, Mini would get it and she would check out making up for not being the best mom in the world. And if Mini died, well, there was the animal shelter. The husband did hire a lawyer on contingency to try and pry the money from the fuzzy little paws of all those desperate kitties. I don’t know how that worked out. But there’s nothing about Bert that has to mean murder. And the mother, well, I figure too much alcohol and a big case of the stupids did her in.”

I glanced over at Leonard and his deerstalker. I turned to Marvin. “Do you come across many murders where a fella didn’t like his best friend’s hat?”

“No,” Marvin said, looking at Leonard, “but I can understand the impulse.”

19

Marvin gave us some contact information for people we might want to talk to, and I folded that up and put it in my coat pocket. We left when his sandwich arrived. We knew when we weren't wanted.

At my place we fried up some egg sandwiches and sat on the couch and turned so we could look at each other. Leonard had finally taken off the deerstalker, so it was easier to do.

We decided we had to see Mini's stepdad, Bert. I called the cell number we had for him. The phone rang awhile, but finally he answered.

I told him we were investigating his stepdaughter's murder, that the mother of Mini's boyfriend had hired us, and could we meet up with him.

"Can't we just talk over the phone?" he said.

"I suppose, but we'd rather do it in person."

"Not anything I can tell you, and since I don't know you, I ain't wantin' you to come out to the house."

"Okay."

"I've had threats."

"Threats?" I asked.

"That's all I'll say about it."

"Look, I don't know about the threats, but we're on the up-and-up. What say we meet someplace public? We'll buy you lunch."

"Made a sandwich already."

"Well," I said, "how about just meeting you in town?"

He was silent for so long I thought the connection was broken. But just when I was about to give up, he said, "I'm going out to the auction barn, catch me there."

"Not sure what you look like."

"Call my goddamn cell, man. Use your head. When you get there, call me."

On the way out to the auction barn, I said, "He sounds paranoid."

"Doesn't mean someone's not after him," Leonard said.

"Take off the hat, Leonard. Where we're going is cowboy country. You going in there looking like that, you're asking for trouble. Only thing missing is a purse."

"This is anything but effeminate," he said. "In Merry Ole England they wore these to hunt deer. Real men. Real guns. Real deer. And this hat."

"Deer probably laughed themselves to death."

When we got out to the auction barn, the parking lot was full of pickups and trailers and everything smelled like animal shit; it was so thick you almost had to climb over the reek to get to the auction barn.

Inside, the place looked like an ad for chewing tobacco and blue jeans. Cowboy hats floated on the crowd, and there was a lot of crowd. Last time I'd seen that many people was in a rerun of The Ten Commandments. Who knew cows were that exciting. The animal crap smell was now so intense I felt I needed mountaineer equipment to scale it.

We started moving in among them, and as we went, Leonard pulled the deerstalker out of his back pocket, unfolded it, and popped it out like a wet towel and put it on.

"You sonofabitch," I said.

20

As we rambled through the crowd, a tall cowboy with a hatband full of toothpicks watched Leonard pass with open curiosity. I was right behind Leonard. I said to the cowboy, “He’s working a child’s party after this.”

The cowboy looked at me and nodded, like that explained everything.

We found a spot with a break in people, and went there. I took out my cell and called.

“Yeah,” Bert said.

“This is Hap Collins. I spoke to you earlier.”

“What about?”

I was more than a little certain now that Bert was not the sharpest knife in the drawer.

“Your stepdaughter. You told me to call.”

“Oh, yeah. I’m over by the door. Too many people in there, and hot.”

“Okay,” I said. “Meet you there. What’s your description?”

“What’s yours?”

“There’s two of us. I’m about six foot with brown hair, stocky. The guy with me is black—”

“Black?” He seemed surprised.

“Yeah. There’s a whole race of them. He’s just one of them.”

“Black, huh.”

“Now and always.”

There were actually a few black cowboys scattered about the barn, but they had on the proper duds. I said, “You’ll know us because he’s bigger than me and has gray at the temples. Oh yeah, he’s got on a funny hat.”

“Hey,” Leonard said.

21

It was hot in the auction barn, and it felt good to come out into the open air. There were a number of men and women in cowboy hats and gimme caps out there, and a few of them were smoking cigarettes. One was wiping cow shit off his boots, scraping them over the edge of a concrete step.

That guy, the shit scraper, turned and looked at us. He smiled when he saw Leonard. I had a suspicion he was Bert. He was tall and strong-looking in a working man sort of way; had long muscles and a face that had seen too much sun, and maybe too many fists.

“Damn, man, that is the ugliest goddamn hat I ever seen,” Bert said, coming over, pushing his cowboy hat back on his head. “You just wear that to crap in?”

I thought, Bert, my man, you are taking your life into your own hands. Leonard stood there with his hands in front of him, right folded over left, at his belt buckle. That was how he stood when he wanted to look casual but was ready to knock your head off.

Leonard said, “Naw, I crap in cowboy hats. This I keep clean.”

Bert and Leonard looked at each other. Bert looked like a tough hombre. Thing was, though, Leonard was a tough hombre.

I said, “Bert, we’re just trying to find out who killed your daughter.”

“Stepdaughter,” he said. “Could have been anybody.”

“So no idea?”

“I got an idea.”

“And?” Leonard said.

“Keeping it to myself.”

“You tell the cops what you thought?” Leonard asked.

“Nope.”

“Why not?” I said.

“Didn’t care for Mini much. A real weird one and a bitch. Don’t like her mother much now. Left her money to the daughter, then to a bunch of fuckin’ cats. How about that? Cats. What the fuck are cat’s gonna buy?”

“Cat toys,” Leonard said.

Bert gave Leonard a look.

“And there’s catnip,” Leonard said.

“Listen, I don’t really care I talk to you guys or not,” Bert said.

“What if there was money in it?” I said. I wasn’t sure where I was going with that, but I had a hunch Mrs. Christopher might be willing to put out a few dollars for information.

“That depends,” I said.

“On what?” Bert said.

“The quality of the information,” Leonard said, just like he knew what I was thinking. And he probably did.

“Well, money talks, and bullshit walks,” Bert said. “You two don’t exactly look like fucking Fort Knox.”

“We’re not talking about our money,” I said.

“How much of the other fella’s money, then?”

“Again, that depends,” I said.

Bert let that run through his head, which I considered was an easy task.

“I don’t know,” he said. “I got a feeling I say too much I might get in trouble.”

“With who?” I said.

“That’s my business.”

I could see he was actually nervous, but was waffling on the matter.

“How about I give you a card,” I said, “and you call us if you change your mind. This offer is short-term.”

“How short-term?” he asked.

“How about tomorrow morning,” Leonard said.

“I think you’d take it two weeks from now,” he said.

“And I think you don’t know us too well,” Leonard said.

I took out my wallet and opened it up and took out a card. I gave it to him.

He looked at it, then at me. “Hanson Investigations. Well, if you’re Hap Collins, then you must be Hanson.”

“Nope,” Leonard said. “We work for Hanson.”

"You change your mind, call us," I said.

Bert turned the card around and around in his hands. He was giving it serious thought. Finally he put the card in his shirt pocket. He said, "I'll consider on it."

And then he turned and walked away, across the parking lot. We watched until he got in a black truck so old I didn't know what decade it was from. He cranked it, and we kept watching while it coughed smoke and rattled away like something broken tumbling downhill.

"You have cards?" Leonard said. "I don't have any cards."

"Marvin gave them to me."

"He didn't give me any."

"He told me to tell you we would share."

"How are you sharing if you're carrying the cards and I don't have any?"

"I'll share for the both of us," I said.

Driving back to my place, I said, "What do you think?"

"I don't know," Leonard said. "He's an odd one. He's either paranoid, or has delusions of his own importance, or he knows something and he didn't tell us. And what he knows he's trying to turn into money. Maybe with someone else, and us, but the someone else may be someone he shouldn't have messed with. I think he may actually have been afraid. He was acting tough, but —"

"He was overacting," I said.

"Yep, we ought to know. We do it all the time."

22

Back home, upstairs in the bedroom, I called Brett on my cell. She answered on the first ring.

"So, just sitting around waiting for me to call?" I said.

"Actually," she said, "I'm sitting around in case my boyfriend calls."

"Is he handsome?"

"Not particularly, but he looks great by phone."

"Is he hung?"

"Nope, but I can dream."

"This boyfriend, would he be me?"

"He would."

"Thanks for lifting my spirits."

"You know I love you, even with all your deficiencies."

"How are things?"

"Well, pretty good for a small-blown crisis, but it's the same crisis," Brett said. "The one where my daughter is leading a screwed-up life, but pretends she wants to change and tells me all her woes, then goes right back to doing what she's always done, being who she always was and is. A whore who drinks too much and buys her clothes at expensive stores in Houston, and her underwear at Wal-Mart."

"And you're thinking it's your fault?"

"Some of it is my fault. Except for the Wal-Mart underwear … Oh, hell. Who am I talking to? You know I buy mine there too."

"Your ex had a little to do with Tillie's problems."

"True, but I didn't have to set his head on fire. I think it set a bad example."

"Maybe a little," I said.

“Are you doing okay in the private detective business?”

“Well, I’m in it. And there’s supposed to be a big check at the end of the rainbow, and me and Leonard got to hear some neat stuff about vampires, devil heads, a dog-eaten body, and a white trash winning the lottery and getting hit by a train. Oh, and a bunch of cats inherited the lottery money.”

“Say what?”

I told her all that I had learned.

When I finished, Brett said, “That’s some weird stuff.”

“You think? When are you coming home?”

“Tomorrow. I’ll be home by noon.”

“Really?”

“I just made up my mind. Tillie was the same before I got here, and she’ll be the same after I leave.”

“How is the prostitute business?”

“Booming. One of her johns asked me if I wanted to pull a mother and daughter.”

“No shit?”

“Yeah, I made three hundred dollars and there was a pony involved.”

“Is that all you made? The pony factor alone was worth three hundred.”

23

Leonard was about his business that night, which I thought might be trying to call John and talk him into coming back. I figured Leonard was close to the end of his rope on that. He was sticking with John better than anyone before, but I knew him well enough to know he had a destination in mind, and once he arrived there, if John came back to him bare-ass naked swinging his dick, Leonard wouldn't be interested anymore. Once he cut you loose, he cut you loose.

Me, I pined over everything, worried about everything. I was worrying now. I was worrying that Bert wouldn't call. I was thinking if he did, he wouldn't know anything and that he would just try to work us for money. I was thinking me promising money was stupid. I was thinking I could dip into my savings and come up with a few thousand, if I had to, but I didn't want to, and I didn't want to spend the client's money either.

I was also thinking Bert was just a dumb goober with a brain full of imaginary foes. A man shot down by disappointment, thinking about those cats with his dead wife's lottery money, as if they actually held it in their little furry paws.

I went upstairs and crawled into bed with nothing on but my underwear and read from a good book until midnight. Then I put the book down with only one chapter to go.

I put it down because I was thinking about things that had come at me sideways, out of the past. I don't know what sent them to the forefront, but this sort of thing had been happening for a while. All I could think about when things got quiet was the violence I had done in my life, or been around. Gunfire and fistfights, blood and gray matter splattered on the wall. The way it hit me right then, it was like I had looked in the wrong direction while crossing a road and had been hit by a truck.

I found that I was even breathing rapidly.

I twisted so I could sit on the bed and put my feet on the floor. I took some deep breaths. I tried to imagine encasing my thoughts in a dark balloon and letting it float away.

I had to float a lot of balloons.

After a little while, I felt better. I decided to take a hot shower and stand and soak the back of my neck for a while. I did that, and when I came out, toweling off, I checked the clock for the time. It was late.

I looked at my cell lying on the nightstand.

I had missed two calls.

I checked.

They were from Bert.

24

There was a message on the cell.

"Hey, this is Bert. Saw you and the colored guy with the silly hat at the auction barn, today, remember?" the message started, like maybe we wouldn't remember him. "Give me a call, you got some money. I got something for you."

I called his number.

Nothing.

I left a message.

I had missed his call by only a few minutes. Where the hell was he?

I finished drying off and crawled back into bed and picked up my book. I read only a page or two before I called him again.

Nothing.

I finally turned in and went to sleep, and in the middle of the night I woke up thinking about Bert's call. There was no reason to suspect anything odd, anything foul. He had called and left a message, and I had called back and left one, and that was it, but I couldn't get the paranoid feeling out of my head that something was wrong.

He hadn't said anything particularly suspicious in his call, but I had detected a worried tone in his voice. Or had I? Maybe I was projecting.

I rolled over and tried to go back to sleep, but that didn't work.

I turned on the light by the bed and tried to read some more, but my mind wouldn't focus on the words. I got up and dressed and drove over to Camp Rapture and the address I had for Bert. It was about a forty-five-minute drive.

His place was off the main road and over a cattle guard, down a drive that was little more than a crease in a pasture. As I turned into the long drive, a car nearly sideswiped me, and was gone.

I couldn't tell much about the car, but I thought it was some kind of SUV. All I had seen was lights, and the blur of a passing vehicle. It could have been any dark color.

I drove on cautiously, came to where he lived, which was a green-and-white trailer up on blocks in a little grown-up yard next to a creek on one side, an aluminum outbuilding with the door missing on the other side. I could see a lawn mower in there and what looked like an automobile engine up on sawhorses.

Bert's trailer didn't look as if it had been new when it was new. His pickup was in the yard. The closest house around, another mobile home up the road, wasn't close at all. Maybe half a mile. It was a lonely kind of place.

I sat in my car for a moment, then reached over and opened the glove box and got my .38 Super out of there, along with gloves and a little pocket flashlight. I mention it was a Super because if I don't Leonard always says something like "They don't actually make thirty-eights in automatic." And I always think if they don't, then why do they call it a .38 with a word behind it? Shouldn't he know I'm talking about a .38 Super? Gun fanatics make my ass tired.

This was the sort of thing I thought about when I didn't want to think about doing what I was about to do, because I knew it was stupid, more stupid than Leonard wanting me to say Super on the end of .38. But it settled the nerves. I figured whoever was in the SUV was long gone, and if they were someone I should worry about, that worry was doing seventy-five miles an hour down a dark road. I hoped.

I looked back that way. No lights. No shapes in the dark. Just lots of empty pasture. I didn't see any cows. Maybe Bert was planning to go into that business. Or maybe he had been in that business, but no more. Maybe he just liked cows, and that's why he hung out at the auction barn.

I stepped out of the car, put the gun and flashlight in my coat pocket, and pulled on the gloves. I walked up to the front door. A cement block served as a footstep. I stepped up on it, tried to look through the little diamond-shaped glass on the door, but it was designed for looks, not use. It was opaque. It was certainly nice that a fine wood-and-aluminum rectangle like a mobile home had so much class about its door window. Inside, maybe there was a chandelier over a coffee table.

I knocked, lightly at first, and then more briskly. I went around the trailer to the back. There was a rickety, weathered porch there. I went up on it and knocked again. My knock echoed through the trailer and then the noise died like a ball that had quit bouncing. I walked around the trailer and tried to look in the windows, but all the curtains were drawn, and I had to stand on my tiptoes to look at them.

I could hear the air conditioner that poked out of the bedroom window humming, which, considering we were on the edge of winter, seemed unnecessary.

I went to the front door again, thought about trying to jimmy it, but couldn't see any future in that, other than a visit to the Camp Rapture jail.

Then I thought, What the hell, and tried the doorknob.

It was unlocked.

I wasn't sure if that was a good thing or not. I looked at the edge of the door frame, near the lock. The wood was cracked there. It was the kind of thing a professional could do in a second, and almost soundlessly. The hair on the back of my neck stood up like brush bristles.

I opened the door and hoped what I smelled was a rat in the wall, but I had smelled that before and I knew what it was. It wasn't old death. It was the smell of fresh blood and excrement, the common result of violent death.

The thing to do was to call the police and not go inside. So I didn't call them and went inside. That was my style. I put my right hand in my coat pocket to keep the gun warm, and used my other to flash the light around, but otherwise, I stayed where I was, sniffing that stink, half-expecting someone to pop out at me.

There was a very large and nice television in the front room, and it took up most of it. There was a painting of dogs on the wall playing poker. Someone had to have one. I spent more time admiring it than it deserved. The place was so small, living there might require acrobatics. I kept looking at that painting of the dogs playing poker in the light of my flash. Anything to keep me from going back there where the stench was coming from. The air conditioner hummed and it was cold enough to be uncomfortable.

Finally, I pulled my feet loose and started walking. There was a bedroom in the rear of the trailer, and the door to it was open. I went inside. I bounced the light around. It looked as if it had been hit by a small tornado. Drawers were emptied on the floor, on the bed. Under some of the stuff on the bed was a heap that seemed to be the source of the smell.

Since no vampires seemed to be lurking in the shadows, I put the gun in my pocket and took out my flash and turned it on, shined it on the bed. I took hold of the edge of the covers topping the heap and moved them.

A body was underneath, not sleeping. I pulled my T-shirt up over my nose, but it didn't help much; that blood and excrement smell was stout. The body lay on its back and it was nude and dark and bloody. I moved the flash over it carefully.

It was, as I expected, Bert.

There was a hole in the forehead. The bedsheets behind the head were thick with dark, drying blood. In the beam of my light it looked as if the victim had leaked black wax. His hands were stretched out and held with rope. The rope had been pulled down on both sides of the bed and tied to the bed rail. His feet were tied off at the end of the bed in the same way.

I moved the beam down his bare chest, down to the groin. There was something there that looked like the remains of a penis, because it had been worked over with something sharp. You might call it a major circumcision.

A cockroach crawled out from under the body and scuttled over the sheet, proving Bert wasn't much of a housekeeper or the killers had brought their own roaches. Between his legs, about calf level, there was a design drawn on the sheets in dried blood.

A devil's head.

25

I threw up out by the car because the stench of the dead man was still in my nostrils. It wasn't the first time I had seen anyone dead or smelled death, but tonight it clung to me like shit on a stick.

Driving home, I could still smell it.

Several times I thought about pulling out my cell and dialing the cops, or calling Leonard, or Marvin, telling them what I found, but I didn't. I don't know why. I was overwhelmed with the feeling that had I arrived at the trailer just a little bit earlier, I could have ended up like Bert. It wasn't my first close call, but it seemed to me there had been a bunch of them now, and that my string was bound to be running out.

As I went along the road that led out to the main highway, I kept feeling as if I were disconnected. A part of me kept wondering if I was still asleep, dreaming about all this. But I knew better.

When I got to the highway, I saw a dark SUV pull out and move up quickly. Maybe it was the one I had seen before. Maybe not.

I put my foot on it and sped up. I might as well have been walking. The SUV passed me like I was standing still, but when it got in front of me, it kept going.

Moving along like a jet. Pretty soon, it was out of sight.

My cell rang. I almost crawled out of my skin when it did.

It was Bert's number.

I said, "Hello."

The phone went dead.

Shit. They had Bert's phone, and they had my number. If they had a way of tracing it, they could find me, and these days, with all the Internet stuff, that would be easy. I didn't like it. I didn't like what I did for a living. I didn't like me. I didn't like most anything I could think of at that moment.

I thought about Bert, and I thought about a person, or persons, who could do to him what they had. He'd been tortured. Maybe he did know something important, or maybe it was back to what I had thought before, they thought he did. Now maybe they thought I knew something.

Damn.

When I got home, I got out of the car and went carefully inside with my gun drawn. I looked around, went upstairs, looked it over.

I went back downstairs and looked out the living room windows, and then the kitchen windows, but didn't see anything that made me want to start shooting. I felt strangely weak, in a way I had never felt before.

I thought about Brett. I could call her. I could tell her what I found.

I didn't.

I sat in a chair in the living room and laid the automatic on the chair arm. I kept telling myself to get up and go to bed or make a call to someone. Leonard. Marvin. Brett. But I didn't move.

I didn't want to go upstairs.

I didn't want anyone sneaking up on me.

I wanted to be near the front and rear doors by being in the center of the living room in the chair. I tried to sleep in the chair, but I couldn't. I felt like I wanted to go to the bathroom, but I couldn't.

I sat there.

And sat there, and then I realized I had gone to the bathroom. I was in the chair and I hadn't got up, and I could smell myself. My mind seemed rational. Like it knew what was going on, but it wouldn't connect to the physical. My emotions were on holiday.

Time folded in on itself. I didn't move. I sat there and smelled myself and thought about getting up, but still I sat.

I had a feeling vampires were in the room. That they had turned to shadow and slid under the door and were behind me, but I couldn't turn to look. I couldn't move. I felt them come closer and closer and closer. They were crawling along the walls.

I could see them out of the corner of my eye. When cars drove by on the road out front their headlights moved the vampires away and washed them into the walls, and as the lights passed, the vampires returned and melted down the walls and into the floor. I sensed they were flowing along close to my feet.

But still, I sat.

The sun came up. It reddened the curtains.

The day passed in what seemed like instants. I watched shadows moving along the wall again. They weren't vampires this time. They were glimpses of time being stolen from my life. The room was as dark and heavy as if it were covered in thick black velvet.

I heard the door open, and Brett called out, "Hap?"

I tried to answer, but all my answers, like my emotions, were still on vacation. I kept thinking I would gather them up and weld them together and be myself, but I didn't move. I might as well have been a turnip waiting to be plucked.

The room grew suddenly bright.

Brett touched me and called my name, and then I saw her nose wrinkle up from the smell of me, and I wanted to say I was sorry, but it just wouldn't come out. Then I climbed into my spaceship and stretched out on my bunk and buckled in and looked through the windshield at the stars and colorful planets moving closer. I was cruising through the great black star-studded forever that was space. Twinkle, twinkle, little star, vampires suck blood, and humans make war. Ducks have feathers, goats have hair, pigs have pink feet, and Davy Crockett killed a bear.

A big black planet swung in from the right, and I could see the planet had eyes. The planet moved closer and I could see the planet had a resemblance to Leonard. The planet Leonard had arrived, and the knowledge of that made me feel better.

I heard Brett say, "I found him like this. I checked his vitals. They seem okay. Maybe I should have called nine-one-one."

"I got him," Leonard said.

I wanted to say something back. I could hear them and I could understand their words, but what they said were like trains passing in the night. I could see their words go by, but no way they were gonna stop and let me ride.

I was pulled right out of my spaceship. I felt myself floating upward (antigravity, baby), and I could see Leonard's face clearly, and he was looking right at me. Brett said, “I’ll call the doctor.”

“He don’t need no doctor,” Leonard said.

“But—”

“I got him. Open the bathroom door.”

Yeah. That would be nice. I need to go to the bathroom. Again.

And then I was sitting on the floor by the tub and Leonard was leaning over the tub running water. I finally turned my head. It was no more trouble than trying to screw a large bolt through the center of the earth.

“Throw this shit away,” Leonard said.

I saw Brett’s hands taking my old clothes.

I felt cold. And then I was lifted, and I felt wet. But it was a warm wet. I didn’t feel cold anymore. I was drifting comfortably through space, and the great black planet called Leonard was leaning over me in the tub.

“He going to be okay?” Brett said.

“Goddamn right he is.”

I closed my eyes, and as I drifted down into the wet warmth, I heard Brett say, “What … what is it? What’s wrong?”

“Life,” Leonard said.

26

When I opened my eyes I was still warm, but I wasn't wet. I was warm because I was in bed with the covers pulled up to my chest. Leonard was sitting by my bedside reading one of my paperbacks. I said, "What are you doing here?"

"Well," Leonard said. "I finish this book, I'm gonna steal everything you got while you're lying there like a dumb ass. And then I'm gonna turn heterosexual and me and Brett are gonna run off together, but not until we sell your organs to science and burn the house down and collect the insurance money. I was thinking we might buy a pig to take with us, start a hog farm."

"You need two pigs," I said. "One male, one female."

"Guess I hadn't thought that through." Leonard reached out and took my hand. "You back, brother?"

"Was I gone?"

"Oh yeah."

"Brett? I remember seeing her, hearing her, but I couldn't answer. Where is she?"

"Downstairs fixing me and her some breakfast. Want me to add you to the list?"

"That would be nice … But, what happened?"

"You had what some people call a nervous breakdown, and what I call a major fuckup by way of an easy chair and crapping your pants. You peed too. The world got hold of you and whipped your ass, Hap. But only for a round. You're back now and pretty soon you'll be off the stool and back in the fight. Though you may have to start with some tomato cans and work your way up to the contenders."

"I'm glad Brett called you."

"I'm not. I had to change your clothes and bathe you, wash the shit off, and then dry your ass with a towel, put you in your jammies, and carry you upstairs. I tell you now, boy, you got to lay off the pancakes if you want me carryin' your fat ass up a flight of stairs. Let me have Brett fix you some eggs or somethin'."

Leonard got up and walked toward the bedroom door.

I said, "Leonard."

He paused, looked at me. "Yeah?"

"A man couldn't ask for a better brother."

"Hell, I know that."

27

I was halfway through my scrambled eggs and bacon, sitting in bed with a tray, enjoying it, looking forward to my coffee, when suddenly I felt there was something I was trying to remember, something I wanted to say. It roamed around the alleys of my mind like a drunk trying to find where he'd dropped his car keys.

Brett was in bed with me, stretched out beside me, a pillow propped behind her head. She wore shorts and a sweatshirt. She smelled like perfume and fried foods. Leonard was in the chair next to the bed. He had been talking about things that didn't matter, and it was exactly what I wanted to hear. Those things that didn't matter were really good conversation right then. I knew Leonard thought I was bad off because he even asked me if I would tell a joke. He hates my jokes.

I didn't have a joke. I was too weak to have a joke. I could see he was actually relieved, and so was Brett.

"Did Leonard tell you I wanted to put you down, but he insisted you were going to be all right? I was about to call the vet and have it done, and he showed up."

"There was a moment there when I would have invited it."

She pushed my hair off my forehead and kissed my cheek.

Right then I loved her more than I had ever loved her.

I was sipping on my coffee when I had a flash as clear as daylight. I said, "Bert's dead."

"Bert?" Brett said.

"Mini's stepfather," Leonard said.

"He's dead," I said.

"You just have a psychic vision or something?" Leonard asked.

I put my cup of coffee on the tray. "No," I said. "I saw him dead. Last night."

I told them what I had seen.

Leonard said, “Maybe you never left the chair. Maybe you thought you saw what you saw. You told me vampires were after you.”

“I did?”

“You did.”

“It all seems like a dream. I think I remember thinking I’d call the police, then Marvin, then you, Leonard.”

“Was I on the list?” Brett asked.

“You were next.”

“But you didn’t call,” Leonard said.

“I guess not.”

“It was a kind of trigger, Hap, you seeing Bert’s body, or thinking you did, or dreaming you did. It was the straw that broke the camel’s back. And in case you’re not following my cliché, you’re the camel.”

“You really think you saw a dead man?” Brett said. “Or are you screwed in the head, honey?”

“Sympathy like that,” Leonard said, “is why you’re a nurse.”

“I’m just sayin’,” Brett said.

“I don’t know,” I said. “I really don’t. I’d have a hard time trying to remember my shoe size right now. But it seemed real. I had this feeling that things weren’t right, and I went out there. He called, see, and I went to sleep, and I woke up feeling like it wasn’t right.”

“But you don’t know for a fact you went to see him?” Brett said.

I shook my head.

“You been kind of goofy lately,” Leonard said. “I saw this coming, but I wasn’t expecting it to be like this.”

“What were you expectin’?” I asked.

“It didn’t involve you shittin’ yourself while sittin’ in a big armchair,” Leonard said. “That much I can tell you.”

“Which, by the way,” Brett said, “I have disposed of the chair. I took it to the dump. You owe me a chair, Hap.”

“I’ll get right on that,” I said.

Leonard got up and started for the door.

I said, “Where are you goin’?”

“To get Bert’s Camp Rapture address from the folder, then I’m going to go see if you’re nuts.”

28

Sometime later, Leonard came through the bedroom door. Brett and I were snuggled up together under the covers.

"Glad I didn't come back fifteen minutes later," Leonard said. "Or was it fifteen minutes earlier?"

"Whatever time you came in, it would have been the same situation," Brett said. "His little friend is as tired as he is."

I said, "Do we need to get me sized for a straitjacket?"

"It was just like you said, including the devil drawing on the sheets. The place was thrown about, maybe just to look like a robbery. He was tortured good. His tongue was cut out. Air conditioner was running, which might have muffled screams and it would keep the body from going to rot too fast. That happened, you could smell that stink for a mile. And maybe Bert just liked it cold. Bottom line, though, is he's dead."

"Jesus," Brett said.

"Good to know I'm not going to be spending Christmas in a rubber room. But, on the other hand, bad to know Bert really is dead."

"Yeah, with his passing, the world has really lost a big bit of charm. As for you, you're not off the nut hook yet. I think you need to stay where you are for a while. Get your marbles back together."

"Yeah, you're kind of fucked up," Brett said. "You boys want more coffee?"

"That would be nice," Leonard said.

"Well," Brett said, "I want some too, so I'm going to do what any good domesticated woman does, I'm going to have Leonard make it."

"Hell with that," Leonard said. "I'm going to the coffee shop."

"You know what?" Brett said. "I think I was just bitten by a ghost of women past. I'll go down and make the coffee. You two visit."

When Brett was downstairs, Leonard pulled his chair closer to me. "You feelin' better, brother?"

"I think so. I'm just not entirely certain what's real and what isn't, but more and more things are coming back to me."

"Do you remember that five hundred dollars you owe me?"

"Nope. That isn't coming back."

Leonard grinned and gave my hand a pat. He said, "Now, while you're weak, I can smother you with a pillow."

"Way I feel, you could smother me with a thought."

We sat silent for a few moments.

"Sometimes in war," Leonard said, "there are soldiers who killed too much and saw too much, and they have nervous collapses. Sometimes they have it right there, right after they killed someone, or lost a buddy, but mostly they come home and have it years later."

"And you never had any of that?"

"Once I woke up in a sweat remembering that I had lost a harmonica in the war."

"A harmonica?"

"My uncle gave it to me, and I had it over there. I never played it. He gave it to me when I was a kid. That and a cap gun and cowboy bandanna. I lost the cap gun, and once when I was in the woods, hunting, and had to shit, I wiped my ass on the bandanna and lost my sentimentality toward it. But I had that harmonica, and though I couldn't play a lick, I took it to war with me. It was kind of like a charm."

"So, you're telling me I lost my harmonica and had a nervous breakdown? I don't own a harmonica, Leonard."

"In a way, I am telling you that you lost your harmonica. There were guys went over there to war and came back and went along fine for years. I was once told by an army buddy that anyone killed someone had some kind of hole in them, even if they felt the person killed needed to be killed. Because on some level, human beings identify with other human beings to such an extent they start to see themselves as the dead human. You may be okay for a while, but in time, those things you do, things you've seen, they come home to roost, like pterodactyls."

“Do you have moments like that?” I asked.

“I don’t. Not if I thought what I did was the right thing to do. I’m pretty self-righteous. I mean, there are guys out there, sociopaths that end up in war, and for them it’s like a free hand job every day. They like it. They don’t feel. That’s different. I think it needs to be done, I don’t brood. You, you’re always digging into your feelings. You leave them raw, mess with them so much. You’ve seen plenty, but last night you saw one too many. And I think Vanilla Ride, meeting her, may have been a big trigger, not just poor old Bert. She was the gun. Bert was the bullet.”

Vanilla had been a while ago, but he was right, she was in the back of my mind all the time.

“Vanilla is a beautiful woman,” Leonard said, “charming, very feminine, and she can kill you with an ice pick or a gun, maybe her bare hands, and sleep like a baby. And I know you. In the back of your mind you’re thinking: Once she was a kid like me, and she grew up to kill, and she grew up do it for money and not care who she killed or why. You feel like you might be slipping over into her bit of darkness. I tell you, man, no way. You ain’t comin’ from, and ain’t never been comin’ from, the farm where she was raised.”

“Farm?”

“Figure of speech.”

“How bad was I?” I said.

“I’ve seen a lot worse. But, know what I think? I think you might have sat in that chair for days, maybe starved to death if Brett hadn’t come along, called me.” Leonard swallowed and his facial expression changed. “You know what Brett said to me when you were in the chair? She said he’s your brother, he loves you, maybe more than me. Fix him.”

“And you did,” I said.

“I put a Band-Aid on it. You got to be your own doctor. A little bed rest perks you up. A little experience helps you deal with it. But it’s like a super staph infection. It gets better, but it doesn’t go away.”

29

In Marvin's office, he said, "I thought you fuckers had retired."

"No," Leonard said. "We were on strike."

"For what?"

"Better working conditions

Well, you're shit out of luck."

"What we figured," Leonard said. "That's why the strike is over."

Marvin eyed me. "You're awful quiet. Usually I can't shut you up. No wisecracks?"

"Not today," I said.

"Hap found a body. Bert, Mini's stepdad. He's been killed."

"No shit," Marvin said.

"I just missed the murderer," I said, and I told him what we knew. About how Bert was scared, and claimed to have information, and then he was dead. I told him about the SUV, the phone call from Bert's phone.

"You tell the police?" Marvin asked.

"Not yet."

"That's not smart," Marvin said.

"I haven't been feeling smart," I said. "I have been, shall we say, under the weather."

"I can work this out a bit," Marvin said. "An anonymous tip. Let the cops know the body is there, but not who told them. Or I know a couple of them well enough they'll pretend they don't know who told them. You all right, Hap?"

"Pretty much," I said.

Marvin picked up a pencil from his desk and tapped his teeth with it. "How does Bert's murder tie in with the rest of it?"

"Therein lies the pickle," Leonard said. "We don't know."

The pickle of it all hung in the air like a zeppelin.

“So we don’t know shit?” Marvin asked.

“If we do,” Leonard said, “we haven’t figured out that we do. Not yet. But no doubt in our minds, it’s all connected.”

“You said Bert thought someone was after him?” Marvin said. “Couldn’t it have been someone else did it? Someone not connected to all this? I mean some reason besides our case?”

“Yeah,” I said. “But it’s all a little too sweet to be a coincidence. We talk to Bert. He wants to see us. He ends up dead. And I get a call on his phone, and a hang-up. I think that was a kind of threat. A warning at least.”

“All right, then,” Marvin said. “See if you can tie it all together.”

“We will go about detecting, then,” Leonard said, standing up.

“You mean you two will go about bumbling in the hopes that happens to lead to something.”

“Yeah,” Leonard said. “That’s pretty much it.”

30

Out in the parking lot, as we got in Leonard's car, he said, "To Marvin, we are nothing more than a couple of minions. Carrier pigeons to carry messages and bring messages back. Slaves to his judgment. Faces in the crowd."

"You've had way too much coffee," I said.

"I do feel a little itchy, like my nerves could jerk a decorative knot in my dick. But, minions though we may be, it beats honest work."

"Actually, we don't seem to do much, just find out about dead people," I said.

"And in your case, you even found one that's fresher than the rest."

"He wasn't all that fresh."

"Since the others, the vampires, are all in the ground," Leonard said. "He was the lily of the bunch."

"Ha! If they're vampires, they may not be in the ground."

"Oh, you are wise."

When we were well situated in the car, seat-belted in and hoping it would start, Leonard said, "I'm confused."

"About what?"

"Who do we annoy next? We have a list, but … who?"

"I vote Cason Statler," I said.

"Why?"

"Because we can."

"Now you're startin' to sound like yourself," Leonard said.

But I wasn't myself. I wasn't even close.

The drive over to Camp Rapture was nice because it was a pretty day. The rain had cleared up and the sun was out, and the car was a little warm inside. We wheeled to the Camp Rapture Report, the newspaper Cason worked for, and went inside.

Cason was sitting at his desk in the middle of the newspaper office. There were other reporters around, but fewer than I had imagined. There was also an advertising department. One of the women who worked there was overweight and frumpy with pissblonde hair that looked to have been made by electricity and a sense of humor. She was wearing a too-short top that showed a lot of belly and a silver belly ring. She had on shorts that showed way too much ass and on the ass was a tattoo that looked like something an arthritic chicken had scratched in the dirt while dying.

My take is you can dress any way you want, but my amendment to that is that you have to have mirrors at your house, and you have to use them, and you must not lie to yourself about what they show.

"Damn," I said. "I think my right eye just went dead."

"Wishful thinking," Leonard said.

"Oh, the humanity."

Cason looked up from his work, saw us, stopped typing, and watched as we approached his desk. There was one spare chair, and I took it. Leonard put his hip against the side of Cason's desk. All three of us looked at the woman in advertising with the too-little clothes and the too-much flesh.

"I try to forget she's over there," Cason said, "and then I get my mind off forgetting, and look up, and there she is, and I'm wounded all over again."

I said, "Does she actually sell any advertising?"

"She threatens to take the shorts off if they don't buy any," Cason said.

"Ouch," Leonard said.

"She's the curse of the newspaper," Cason said. "The editor is starting a dress code just to get some clothes on her. The flyer went out today from the boss saying we got to dress nicer, and a certain way. Normally I'm against dress codes. I think it violates our civil rights, but in Carrie's case, I'm going to make an exception. You got to think of the children. Small animals. Our way of life. The planet earth."

"If you're through insulting the poor woman," I said, "is there a place where we can talk private?" I said.

"The break room."

Our trip to the break room was short. By the time we had gotten bad coffee in Styrofoam cups and told what we knew to Cason, we were being shuffled away. Cason followed us out to the car. He said, "There's this guy works here, does research, Mercury is his last name, he can find something about anything. I'm gonna put him on this."

"Really?" Leonard said. "His name is Mercury?"

"Really," Cason said. "He lives for research, and anything to do with something odd, that's his meat. Dumb-asses who think they're vampires, that's odd and he'll like it, and he'll research them until he falls over dead. I'll talk to him and see if he can get on it."

"You seem quick to shuffle us off."

"Got a lunch date."

"With a lady?" I said.

"None of your business," he said, got in his car, and drove away.

31

As we were driving, Leonard said, “You think Cason’s too busy dropping the rope down the well to do us any good?”

“I think he’s the kind of guy that can screw and chew gum and do math problems all at the same time.”

“I doubt Cason’s date would appreciate his ability to do more than one thing at a time.”

“True,” I said, “but my guess is he’ll have lunch, knock him off a piece, get with this Mercury fella, and have something for us pretty damn quick. He’s pretty high-energy.”

“And if your description is right, he’s not particularly thoughtful,” Leonard said.

Leonard made a curve and looked at me out of the corner of his eye.

“How you feelin’, Hap?”

“I don’t know,” I said. “It comes in waves. Sometimes I feel fine, other times I want to go back to that big armchair and not get up.”

“The chair’s at the dump, and since we’re not going to the dump to let you sit in it, that means you just got to live with things.”

“How do you do it, Leonard?”

“Because I have to.”

“That’s no kind of answer.”

“It’s my answer. I look at it this way. If what I choose to do seems right to me, I do it.”

“And what if,” I said, “what I choose to do seems right, but isn’t. Ku Klux Klan people think they’re right, but they aren’t.”

“I get your point. But you just made a point. You said they aren’t right, those KKK fucks, and being a black man, I have to agree. But saying they’re wrong means you have what you think is a clear-cut position, and you back it up with experience and facts. Like it or not, you believe you can tell right from wrong, and I trust your judgment and mine on those matters more than I trust the judgment of paranoid and inferior-feeling assholes who are all about making people’s lives miserable because they can. I’m simple enough about the matter to consider that if I’m doing something to protect someone or make their life better, and I have the ability to do it, and I’m going to feel good about myself afterward, that’s what I do.”

“Seems more complicated than that to me,” I said.

“Didn’t say it wasn’t complicated for some. What I said was it’s easy for me. Do you think if we hadn’t killed those who were trying to kill us in the past, they would have let us go with a pat on the butt? Do you really think there’s a god that sorts them out and punishes them if someone here in reality land doesn’t?”

“No. But we’re part of the problem.”

“Let me ask you why we put ourselves in those positions.”

“We’re stupid.”

“Next answer.”

I sighed. “We were trying to help someone, or we were trying to help ourselves, and at least once, we were trying to make some money.”

Leonard turned a wicked eye toward me, and then put it back on the road.

“That was my fault,” I said.

“Just looking for an acknowledgment … Let me give you the bottom line, Hap. People we’ve chosen to help over the years, had we not helped them, it wouldn’t have turned out well. The people we killed, if we hadn’t, would have gone on doing what they were doing, which wasn’t good. You are who you are, and you are an avenging angel. You were born to it. For some years I’ve been trying to figure what my career ought to be. What can I make of myself? Then one night, while I was pulling my johnson, having to use both hands, of course, I had a epiphany. I’m following my calling as surely as those who grow up to be astronauts or firemen or doctors. So are you. Maybe it’s a kind of post-traumatic stress you’re suffering. But I don’t think the reason you had a nervous breakdown was about what you’ve done. It’s about you trying to find a way to stop being you, and you can’t.”

32

We went to my house and sat around because we weren't exactly sure what in the hell we were doing or how to go about it.

Brett was at work, wouldn't be home until midnight, so we broke out the checkers and played for a while.

Late afternoon my cell rang. It was Cason.

"Mercury is on it, and he'll have something for us day after tomorrow at the latest, maybe sooner."

"Us?"

"Am I helping, or what?"

"You are."

"Then it's us. So long, Hap."

…

We were too lazy to cook, so we drove into town and had dinner at a café. We digested awhile at a coffee shop, then went over to the gym to work out, kick the bag and punch the mitts, then we drove back. As we turned on my street, we saw a car stop three houses up from mine in the Apostle's Baptist Church parking lot and turn off the lights. The car was one of those low-slung jobs that in the light from the street looked like an angry rodent crouched to attack.

Leonard slowed, said, "Think maybe those are eager churchgoers who have come to wait until the church doors open on Sunday?"

"Seems unlikely."

"My thoughts exactly."

We drove by. I turned in the seat and looked out the back. The car was still sitting there. A little red dot from a cigarette was visible. No one had got out.

“What do you think?” I said.

“I think they’re bracing themselves to do something bad, and I got a feeling it isn’t the church they got a quarrel with.”

“Couldn’t be us, could it?” I said.

“It’s hard to believe anyone could be angry with us,” Leonard said, “but yes, I believe they have come to visit us. Call it instinct. Call it experience.”

“Someone somewhere is always mad at us.”

“Yeah, that’s probably more accurate.”

Leonard turned the corner and we went around the block and on the back street. We parked at the curb next to an empty lot with high grass. I opened Leonard’s glove box and got out his automatic.

“That’s my gun.”

“Not today,” I said.

Leonard pulled a short club out from under his car seat, lifted his deerstalker from the middle of the seat, and put it on. We got out and went across the field. At the end of the field we came to a backyard, and crossed that without any dogs barking. From there we could see mine and Brett’s house and the board fence around the backyard.

We didn’t say anything to each other. Sliding across the yard, through the night, we came to the fence and climbed over it, and fell into the backyard. We went across the dead grass and I got my key and opened the back door and we slipped in.

I went right, toward the kitchen, and Leonard turned to the left, toward the downstairs closet.

I was at the corner of the kitchen and the living room, thinking maybe we were overreacting, and that the car we’d seen had been nothing more than the preacher of the church stopping by to pick up a Bible, when the front door was kicked open with a bang and two men with guns plunged inside along with the light from the street lamp.

33

It was as I feared and suspected. Our beatings hadn't put the fear of the devil into them after all. They had found out who we were and where we were, but as luck would have it, they didn't know what car we were driving or that we had passed them by on the street.

The first one in the door was Thomas. He had a cast on his right hand. It was up in a sling. The other was Chunk, and he was limping, had a cast on his leg and some kind of heel on it to help him walk. They both had handguns.

Without meaning to, I said aloud:

"Really? You've got broken hands and legs, and … Shit, really?"

Thomas and Chunk paused there in the light, as if for a dance number. Thomas saw my shape and lifted the gun, held it sideways like a movie thug, said, "You fucks broke my right hand, motherfucker. But I'm left-handed."

There was a ca-chunk sound, and then I heard Leonard in the shadows by the open closet say, "Yeah, and I got me a shotgun in the gauge of twelve from the closet, cocksucker."

The world seemed stuck in amber.

Finally, Thomas said, "Well, okay."

That hung in the air like a popcorn fart for about thirty seconds.

Thomas's gun was still pointed in my direction. I had Leonard's automatic held down by my side. I said, "Put the gun down, or Leonard will blow you both out the door like so much dust."

"Actually," Leonard said, "what I've found, you shoot a guy with a shotgun, he don't blow backwards so much as he drops like a curtain and it makes a mess you wouldn't believe. There ain't enough janitors in town to clean it up right, but then again, that's just my personal experience."

As he said this, Leonard was moving forward, the shotgun at his shoulder.

"You know, I got a gun too," I said. "I could shoot somebody."

They ignored me. They were all about that shotgun.

Besides, I had yet to lift the automatic from my side. My face was covered in sweat and my gun hand was trembling. I had tunnel vision. You get that when you're scared. It's a thing happens when you're in a tight situation, especially one of potential violence. Me, I had gotten over it a long time ago. I could control it.

Or could. But tonight, not so much.

Leonard hit a light switch.

Thomas, without lowering the gun he was pointing at me, glanced at Leonard, did a kind of double take at the hat.

"You don't worry about it," Leonard said. "How's it gonna be? A maybe shot you get to take at me and Hap, or a certain boom from the shotgun, and the both of you blood and rags. My aim don't have to be as good as yours."

Thomas and Chunk let their handguns drift to their sides.

"Ain't nobody doin' nothing," Chunk said. "I told this fool we ought not mess with you two crazies."

Thomas turned his head slightly, looked at Chunk. Right then he knew his number one man had climbed out the window, so to speak.

"Now, with your guns at your side," I said, "dip your knees … Oh, sorry, Chunk. How about just drop them."

"You two," Thomas said, "I hate you both. I hate you cocksuckers big-time."

"That comes up a lot," Leonard said.

34

The cops came and took Thomas and Chunk. Drake, the chief of police, was with them. He was lean and black and his nose looked even flatter than when I had seen him last. He stayed after the other cops left. We had the lights on now. Very cheery.

Leonard moved the shotgun so he could sit on the couch. Drake said, “Don’t handle the gun anymore.”

I sat in a stuffed armchair and tried not to let anyone see that my hands were shaking. They had been that way for days, and tonight, after the events, they were shaking even more. I shoved them down by my sides in the chair.

“I’ll take that with me when I leave,” Drake said, nodding at the gun.

“Okay,” Leonard said.

They had already taken the automatic, which was registered to Leonard. I was a little uncertain how that would play out, but I didn’t point out it wasn’t mine or that I was the one that had held it. I also didn’t mention that we had a number of cold pieces hidden around the house, the best of them upstairs in the crawl space above the closet.

Drake declined me fixing him a cup of coffee, giving him a soda, anything. No bribes were considered. He sat on the couch and shook his head a few times. It made me feel sort of sorry for him, and sad about the two of us.

“They did break in,” I said.

“Yes,” Drake said. “That’s why they are gone and you are still here. But, you know, what they told me was you two broke into their house and broke them up a few days ago, and they were paying you back.”

“That’s some story,” I said.

"Yeah," Leonard said. "That's some shit, that is."

"You did break them up, didn't you?"

"I'm trying to remember," I said.

"Never mind," Drake said. "Not right now. I don't want to hear the lies. It just makes me tired."

There was a knock on the door. Leonard answered. It wasn't anyone else there to kill us. It was Marvin. Of course, considering the circumstances, maybe he wanted to kill us too.

Drake, still sitting on the couch, looked up at Marvin, said, "You got to get you some better friends."

"Tell me about it," Marvin said.

He took a chair across the way and sat. He and Drake looked at each other like two parents who knew how bad their kids were and had both had just about enough of it. Reform school seemed to be in mine and Leonard's offing.

"We didn't shoot anyone," I said.

"No," Drake said. "You didn't do that."

"I wanted to," Leonard said, "real bad. But I held back. I fought against that bad side and done good. That ought to amount to something."

I was thinking that if it hadn't been for Leonard I would have been dead. I had frozen. I had been unable to move. My brain went blank and my hands had felt like catcher's mitts, too big and clumsy to use. The thought of aiming a gun at someone again, pulling the trigger, I hadn't been able to do it. I wondered if I'd ever be able to do it. I was trying to decide if that was a good thing.

If Leonard hadn't been there, one thing was certain, at that moment in time, good it would not have been. Right now a crew with tweezers would be extracting my brain matter from the wall.

Drake said, "So, you boys didn't do anything to piss anyone off? I find that hard to believe. You always piss me off."

"Let me give you a scenario," Marvin said. "Say there was this little old lady, and she was walking home from the grocery, and this guy, we'll call him Thomas, assaulted her for the money in her change purse, and that money was less than a hundred dollars. And there were people in the neighborhood who saw this happen, and I know them, and they told me it happened, but they wouldn't go on record, wouldn't talk to the police, even though the little old lady, we'll call her Mrs. Johnson, because that's her name, talked to the police and told them, but there was no validation, no proof. At least not anything the cops could use."

"Let me finish this for you," Drake said. "But the little old lady told you and you got these two guys to go over and politely ask them for the money."

"Very politely," Marvin said.

"And things got testy, and they decided to hurt your two boys, and your two boys hurt them instead. So the other boys had a grudge against your boys, found out where Hap lived. So Hap and Leonard, innocent and as pure as baby chicks, are attacked in Hap's home."

"That's pretty much it," Marvin said.

"Yeah," Leonard said. "That sounds about right."

"Is that mostly true?" Drake asked Marvin.

"Yep," Marvin said. "Mostly."

"Did the little old lady get her money back?"

"Yep."

Drake nodded. "Well, I don't know. Maybe I can play it some kind of way where the two numbnuts—the other two numbnuts—go down for breaking and entering. They'll tell their story to a lawyer, but even if it's a true story they tell, there's still the part that involves guns and breaking into a home. But the story Marvin just told me, supported somewhat by our two friends trussed up in plaster casts, sort of supports you two breaking into their home."

"Oh," I said.

"Anyone see it happen?" Drake asked. "This event involving you two that didn't happen, but might have."

"If it happened," I said, "and I'm not saying it did. I don't think so."

"And in this case," Marvin said, "these two citizens called the police and asked for assistance. Those two goobers didn't call anyone, so their story is well after the fact and could just be a goddamn lie. This could have been nothing more than home invasion. Possible robbery. Right?"

"Yeah," Leonard said. "We could have killed them and buried them in the backyard and not mentioned it. Planted some flowers over them. But we called, because that's just the kind of guys we are. Fucking law-abiding citizens."

"Satisfied?" Marvin asked.

“No,” Drake said. “Not really. But I think I can live with it. I can’t promise they can’t stir enough shit that charges get brought against the stooges here, but maybe I can get the charges against them trimmed slightly, making them more jovial than they might be otherwise. And maybe part of the persuasion would be they leave you two alone legally.”

“How trimmed will their charges be?” Leonard asked.

“They’re going to go up for sure. Just can’t tell you how long. And you guys, well, if there are no witnesses to fit their story, it’s just a story. You two were smart and called the cops. They had guns, you were home, and you had a bigger gun, which is called home protection and self-defense, and nobody was killed.”

“That’s the story I like,” Leonard said. “It has a nice ring to it. One more thing, if they are mad at us for something they think we did, then they might think the old lady who got robbed ought to get some mojo. She ought to be checked on.”

“The two dumb-asses … The other two dumb-asses … told us you seemed to think you were avenging an old lady you claimed they hurt, and they gave us her name, and we called and checked on her, and she’s all right. Of course, if you didn’t do what they say you did, then you shouldn’t know Mrs. Johnson and what happened to her. Right?”

“Oh, no,” Leonard said. “We could know. Word gets around. We heard rumors.”

“Rumors?”

“Yep,” Leonard said. “Rumors.”

Drake kept looking at Leonard out of the corner of his eye. Finally he sat up straight on the couch, looked right at him, said, “Hey, Leonard. I’ve been trying to kind of let it go. But what in the living hell have you got on your head?”

35

Brett was sitting in the living room with me and Leonard and Marvin. Drake had gone away. It was after midnight and she was back from work. We told her what happened. My first thought was she'd finally decide it was time to ditch me. I was like a shit magnet. It always found me. No matter where I went, what I did, it came flying out of the air and landed on me.

Well, maybe there were things I did that attracted it.

Like breaking that guy's knee, messing up his ribs.

But it wouldn't matter. I could stay home in front of the TV and trouble would arrive in the form of a singing telegram. And if it didn't find me, it would find Leonard, and that was the same as finding me.

"So, you were just minding your own business," Brett said.

"Really," Leonard said. "We were."

"I believe you," she said. "I'm on your side."

"We're the three musketeers," I said. "Oh," I said, looking at Marvin, "sorry to leave you out of the musketeer thing. In the book, there were actually four."

"I don't want to be a musketeer," Marvin said.

"Now, come on," Leonard said. "He didn't mean to hurt your feelings. You can be a musketeer too."

"I'm fine," Marvin said.

"My sense of things," Leonard said, "is that you really do want to be one, and just won't admit it."

"Actually," Brett said, "I always wanted to be a Mouseketeer."

"Oh, Christ," I said, "is there any way some night I can get you to wear a set of mouse ears when we, you know—"

"Oh, hell yeah," Brett said.

Brett went into the kitchen, came back with some corn chips and sodas, said, “Enjoy, this may be as housewifey as I get.”

We had at the chips and drinks. It was like a feeding frenzy at the zoo.

“So, the deal is,” Brett said, “you’re trying to find the connection between the vampires and the man in the trailer, Mini’s stepdad? And you’re thinking Mini’s money is part of the deal?”

“It makes sense,” Marvin said. “And I can tell Hap has kept our confidential rule and not mentioned any of this to you.”

“Oh, he never shuts up,” Brett said.

“Figured as much,” Marvin said.

“Want to hear what I think?”

“Might as well.”

“Maybe I should wear Leonard’s deerstalker since I’m giving my valued investigative opinion based on nothing but a hunch.” Leonard handed it to her and she put it on.

“Whoa,” Marvin said. “That looks good on you.”

“Hell, yeah,” I said. “Forget the mouse ears.”

“It looks all right,” Leonard said.

“The money is all coincidence,” Brett said. “It’s clouding your judgment. The law got Godzilla for the murder of that frat boy, but Mini, she got off the hook, and so did the others. They got their wrists slapped. Somewhere, someone’s bound to be mad about that, and it doesn’t have to do with them being vampires, or there being money involved, or even Ted Christopher being killed. With me so far?”

“We’re listening,” Marvin said.

“Wouldn’t you be mad someone killed someone you loved, and the batch of them got off by tattling?” Brett said.

“They got off because they turned evidence on Godzilla, who did the actual killing,” Marvin said. “She was the one stabbed the kid, sucked his blood. I’m not saying they’re pure as the driven snow, but they didn’t do the stabbing.”

“I know,” Brett said, “but if someone killed Hap, I wouldn’t be satisfied if the one person most responsible went to jail and didn’t even get the death penalty. That deal would suck, especially since the others got to go free and weren’t even told their breath stinks. If I was the frat boy’s family, maybe I would have a serious grudge. Now that I think about it, I’ve never heard any of you even mention the dead boy’s name.”

We looked at one another.

"I guess we been thinking it had more to do with Godzilla or Mini or Ted," I said.

"You got your notes, Hap?" Marvin asked.

I got them.

Marvin opened them. "Kid's name was Jason Kincaid. His parents are divorced, and the mother is dead. Cancer. The father is a sixty-year-old accountant in Houston. Had one other child, a girl, Florence, died of a drug overdose. Has some wealthy clients, and therefore is pretty wealthy himself. His name is Howard Kincaid. He was looked at by the cops some years ago. They came up with zip. He hasn't been high on our list, because they caught the one who killed his kid. Godzilla."

"Maybe Kincaid could get another look," I said.

"It's worth a shot," Marvin said. "I could send you boys to meet him, or we could get someone good."

"That is some amusing shit you got going there," Leonard said. "That is funny, how you cut us down, and may really mean it."

Marvin grinned. "I suggest we talk to Cason Statler. He's friends with Mrs. Christopher, and he used to work in Houston. Probably has some contacts you could talk to. And, of course, you can talk to the kid's father. Personally, I don't think there's anything to it—no offense, Brett—as it's been looked into. I'd think the cops would have sensed something being there, even if they are the worst cops since Keystone. But they didn't note a thing. I think it has to do with Mini. I think she's the key, and I think it maybe has to do with Ted. The others are connected, of course, but I think the chain starts with her and has to do with something she or Ted knew or something they did. I think Godzilla may just be unlucky, and that Mom was a bad driver and a drunk. But Kincaid, I don't see it."

"I like my idea," Brett said, "because it's mine."

"May I have my hat back now?" Leonard said.

Brett gave him the hat.

"Jim Bob is from the Houston area," I said. "We know him. We've worked with him. Maybe he'd do better than Cason."

"We'd have to pay him out of our money," Marvin said.

No one said anything for a moment. Then Leonard said, "Yeah, you're right, let's get Cason, and we can work on his loyalty to Mrs. Christopher, and just have to buy him lunch or somethin'."

36

After Leonard and Marvin left, I set the door back in place, but it was beyond fixing. I didn't have any boards to nail over it, so I put a chair under the doorknob. A kitten with anger issues could probably have pushed it over, but it was something.

Me and Brett locked ourselves in the upstairs bedroom just in case our two cast-wearing vigilantes escaped the long arm of the law and came after us.

I said, "What you said about the father, Kincaid, that was solid thinking, baby. We've been so certain it was someone who just hated these people for their weirdness, or was one of them, that it didn't occur to us. We should have considered it, but we didn't, and that's why Leonard and I do odd jobs and are not professors of physics."

"That's the truth," Brett said.

"I give you a compliment, and you wound me? You are one mean woman."

"What about Marvin?"

"Well," I said, "I'm not saying you're definitively right and he's wrong, but he thinks of himself as a detective, and on some level, having been a cop, I think he wants to generally believe they know what they're talking about. And usually, truth is, they do. But sometimes, a person standing back from it all can point out the obvious."

She snuggled close. "What made me think of the father, Kincaid, really wasn't obvious thinking."

"No?"

"No. It was those two jackasses that broke into our house. Here are two guys that had their hand, a knee, and a rib broke. A couple of bully types, the sort they always tell you if you stand up to them they won't fight back. But they did."

"Most of those little schoolyard homilies prove to be false. Bullies are not always cowards, but they are always bullies," I said. "And they had guns. That helps make you braver, just in case you're lacking in the courage department."

"They went to the trouble of figuring out who you two were, and coming here. They wanted revenge. I thought Kincaid might feel the same way. And it turns out he has the money to make it happen."

"It was good thinking," I said. "I was thinking the law got Godzilla, so what's for Kincaid to do? It was taken care of. But it wasn't my son. Had it been, I might not be so easily satisfied."

"I'm going to change the subject."

"Okay."

She ran her hand down my side. "Want to make love?"

"Of course," I said. "I'm no idiot."

"No mouse ears and Leonard took his hat back."

"We'll just pretend."

"I can squeak like a mouse."

"Baby, you say the sweetest things."

We made love and fell into an uneasy sleep. Or at least my sleep was uneasy. Within seconds, Brett was sawing logs. Me, I lay there for a while and wondered what would have happened had Leonard not been there with me tonight.

The answer was obvious.

37

Next morning, early, I went to a hardware store and bought the stuff I needed and brought it home. Brett and I replaced the doorjamb and lock, with her doing the precision work. Stuff like that for me is like trying to write cursive on a notepad with my toes while taking verbal directions from a monkey. But with us working together, it was a fair job. It still needed painting, and I had forgotten the paint.

After Brett left for an afternoon shift, I called Leonard, invited him over for lunch. He passed, said he was having lunch with Cason.

I tucked a sandwich away, went to town, and bought some paint. When I got back, Leonard's car was parked in the drive. He had let himself in and was watching the downstairs television, some show about the life of Willie Nelson. Leonard was a bear for all things related to country music.

While I painted the doorjamb and he lounged, I asked him:

"What about Cason?"

"He's in. A couple of tacos and I had him on the job."

"When do we go?"

"He's waiting on a call."

Cason had us meet him at the newspaper office, and then took us downstairs to meet Mercury, the man who collected facts. He told us Mercury had been with the paper a long time, and all he did was fact-check and catalog the morgue. He was seldom seen, and his work was rarely questioned. In fact, Cason told us that unless you needed something from downstairs, in what he called the dungeon, you stayed out of there. Mercury liked it that way.

Downstairs was like a hole in the floor with steps and it was crowded with more crap than a junkyard: boxes and files and desks and tables with stacks of papers. It was poorly lit down there.

Mercury had a desk in one corner, and the desk, unlike the rest of the room, was well lit by a gooseneck lamp. He was sitting in front of the desk in a wheeled, wooden chair with his legs crossed. He looked in his thirties, blond hair, blue eyes. A nice-looking guy with a real set of shoulders on him and a face that needed some sun.

He didn't get up as we got closer. We went to him and shook hands.

Cason took a position on the edge of the desk, said, "So, Jack, you find anything?"

"The actual case you're working on, not much. Thing interested me was the devil head at the scene of the murders. I ran it through the computer, and came up with some similar things, but most of it was not similar enough. Except for these."

He turned in his roller chair and picked up the file and spun back around and gave it to me. I opened it. It was a thin file. But there were some crime photos in it. Some may have been suicides, some murders. There were separate photos of little red devil head drawings.

"You got these off the computer?"

"I got some information off the computers, but these photos I got through contacts and through Mrs. Christopher spreading some money around. You can thank her, my government friends, and FedEx for these. The devil head was at the scene of these crimes. Each crime took place miles apart. Let me see the file."

I gave it back to him.

"There was … Oh, here's one in Louisiana. Took place not long after the hurricane. The one there was a mobster. The devil head was made really obvious, was drawn on a mirror with the man's blood. The others, they're less obvious. There's Oregon … Here's one in New York."

"You're saying these killings have a connection?" Leonard said.

"I'm saying that there's a devil head drawn in blood at these death sites. You want me to do your work for you?"

"That would be nice," I said.

"Here's what I can tell you. Those drawings are either connected, or someone knows about them and copied them for the murders you're investigating. The drawings and the murders, or what look to be suicides—all of them suspicious—took place over five years. There could be more devil heads and more murders that are just not known. Or maybe the killer didn't always do the devil head thing. No one like me has sat down and tracked this stuff, or had the connections to see how many of these devil heads are out there. Me, I like doing this sort of work. You start to see patterns in stuff like this. I'm big on patterns."

"So, is there one person doing all this?" Leonard asked.

"Hell, it could be two, three, a copycat, or a weird coincidence. But it would be one hell of a weird coincidence, and since someone like me would have to put together the fact that there's something to copy, I think a copycat is unlikely as well. Another thing. I checked out any so-called vampire connections to the devil head. Nothing. All of the murders seem unconnected, except for the ones that took place in the East Texas area."

"So what we got is a serial killer?" I said.

Mercury paused. "You know, I'm not so sure. There doesn't seem to be any sexual obsession. There is the devil head, a kind of signature, but maybe our killer just likes to sign his work. It's missing the qualities one usually thinks of when using the term 'serial killer' to mean someone who kills due to some sort of sexual obsession."

"Bert had his tongue cut out," Leonard said. "His penis cut up."

"Torture can be sexual, but I think this was punishment. I think the killers just consider it business. They wanted him to tell them something, and whatever they wanted, he told them. I can promise you that, truth or not."

"Didn't the Son of Sam just shoot people?" I said. "He was a serial killer that didn't mess with the bodies. It was about power. That's what serial killers are really after."

"Yeah," Mercury said. "It could be just like that. I'm not saying I know. I'm saying my experience looking at this kind of stuff for years tells me it may be something else. But, hey, when it comes right down to it, your guess is as good as mine."

38

We went to the hospital and I told Brett we were leaving for Houston. She gave me a kiss and we tried not to make too much of it, me going off only a short time after she had come home, but the feelings were there.

I left her and we drove to my place, and then Leonard's, packed a few overnight things. I saw that Leonard packed the deerstalker. He was swift about it, but I saw it done. At least it was packed and not on his head.

We tooled back to Camp Rapture to get Cason. He had needed time to settle some work details and go home and do his packing.

On the way over, Leonard said, "This is like being in a mystery novel with no detectives."

"Nailed it," I said, and we bumped fists.

We picked up Cason at the address he gave us. It was an apartment complex on the far side of town. Nice place. He told us he had just moved there. We didn't give a shit, but he told us anyway.

Driving along, Cason entertained us with some amusing stories that mostly involved the misfortune of others, which, of course, is what most humor is about, and then explained we would be staying with a friend of his over Houston way, out near the airport. A former police officer.

What he didn't tell us was the former police officer was a hot late-twenties blonde named Constance and she lived in a one-bedroom apartment with a cat named Yo-Yo. She put Leonard and me in the living room, him on the couch, me on a blow-up mattress. We lay there listening to Cason and Constance all night long. For all I knew, maybe Yo-Yo was involved. There was a banging of heads on the bedstead, a whimpering of delight, a cry of servitude, a yelp of triumph, and a smacking of genitals that sounded like someone snapping a leather strap across bucket seats. After a few hours it ceased, then near morning it started up again, loud enough to wake us. Once I thought a siren had gone off, but it was just Constance.

Early morning someone let Yo-Yo out of the bedroom. Listening to that all night, even Yo-Yo's pert little ass made me horny. But Yo-Yo the cat didn't swing that way. To compound matters, it didn't help any that Constance came out of the bedroom adorned in a thin white T-shirt that showed she had very pert nipples and more ass than shirt.

She said excuse me and went to the bathroom and came out wearing dark sweat pants with the T-shirt. The ass was protected, but the nipples still looked like .45 slugs.

Constance offered us some breakfast, and while she was in the kitchen, Cason came out in sweatpants and a wifebeater, scratching his nuts.

I said so Constance couldn't hear, "I had the impression you had a girlfriend at home."

"We aren't connecting like we used to," he said.

"You seem to have been connecting with Constance last night."

"That's none of your business."

"Well, since it sounded like you were screwing next to my air mattress, you made it more of my business than I expected. There were a couple moments when I thought I ought to be wearing some kind of contraceptive. Leonard had morning sickness."

Leonard, who was sitting on the couch in his shorts, nodded. "I'm going out later to buy a bassinet and a baby stroller. Do you have a color preference?"

Cason smiled a smile so thin no teeth were visible, said, "You can both go fuck yourself."

"I've tried," Leonard said. "Doesn't work."

We ate breakfast, and then Cason made some calls on his cell while Constance got ready for work. Turned out she was now working for a private investigation agency. A cooler more successful one than Marvin's. Fifteen agents worked there, and unlike us, they were most likely real detectives, and one of the real detectives was a hot blonde who could screw all night and work all day and had a cat named Yo-Yo.

Constance exited the bathroom, looking professional in a black suit with a frilly white shirt. Her hair was brushed and glossy as a show horse's mane. She sat on the couch and put on her shoes. I noticed her toenails were painted pink and had little silver stars in the middle of them.

I asked her, "Do you know a private investigator from Houston named Jim Bob Luke? Know it's a long shot, but I was just wondering."

"That conceited asshole," she said, giving me a hard look. "Yeah, I know him. He a friend of yours?"

"No," I said. "Leonard knows him."

39

Cason, with his boyish phone charm, got us a meeting with Howard Kincaid.

Driving over there, me at the wheel, I said to Cason, “No problem with him talking with us?”

“I told him we were investigating his son’s death, looking for new connections. I didn’t have to say much else.”

Howard Kincaid had his office in one of the supertall buildings downtown. It seemed to be made completely of glass and metal and the only stone about it was the wide steps in front, and that stone was polished. In the sunlight the building was as shiny as the snot under a kid’s nose. There were people moving about on the street and cars crowding mine as I drove. I was glad I was visiting Houston, not living there. Three days in a place like this I might have a screaming fit. Of course, that couldn’t be any worse than sitting in a chair and crapping on myself.

We found a parking place in an underground garage and took an elevator up to the floor we wanted. When the elevator opened, the floor was so freshly buffed it gave off a shimmer like a heat wave in the desert, not quite as bright as the building outside, but bright enough. There was a large opening at one end of the hall, and in it were a lot of plants. It also had brightly colored birds in cages, and the birds were trilling. I hate seeing birds in cages. I had an urge to open the cages and let them out.

We cruised through the jungle of plants without being attacked by tigers, and into an even wider foyer. There was a desk there. There was a young black woman behind it. She appeared fresh and professional and very nice-looking. Her dark brown eyes were as smooth and cool as refrigerated chocolates. She smiled at us as we walked up. She gave Cason an extra smile, and I thought she showed him more teeth than she showed us. They were nice teeth, by the way.

Cason told her why we were there. There were a series of chairs along one side of the foyer, and we went over there to sit while she pushed a button on her phone. She talked quietly for a moment over the intercom.

“You can go in right away,” she said.

As we passed her desk, Cason gave her a wink, and she smiled. Just before we went inside, I said to Cason, “Are there any women who don’t like you?”

“Yes,” Cason said. “But it’s a short list.”

40

Kincaid's office was about the size of an airport and there was some nice furniture there, including a large couch, and there were paintings on the walls. The paintings were mostly of birds, though there were some that looked to be nothing more than splashes of color. Maybe the splashes were birds too.

Kincaid was sitting behind a large desk, and he looked older than sixty by no more than a hundred years. He was white-headed and his face seemed to have collapsed at some point and been blown back into shape with a water hose. He hardly had a chin and there was a clear tube running up from behind the desk that ended in a little fitting that went into his nose. He was on oxygen. The gray suit he was wearing was like a tent that folded up around him. I saw that he was in a motorized chair.

At a smaller desk nearby was a middle-aged woman in a blue dress. She was stout of build but nice-looking. Her hair was tinted blonde and well sprayed. She looked healthy enough to wrestle a steer.

She got up from behind her desk with a catlike grace and came out to greet us, shook our hands, told us her name was Miss Sara Clinton. She directed us to chairs in front of Kincaid's desk the way a waitress shows you your table.

"Which one of you is Mr. Statler?" Kincaid asked. When he spoke, the words fell out of his mouth as slow and gentle as a sweet afternoon rain. Hearing him talk made me sleepy.

Cason said, "That's me."

"I spoke with you over the phone."

"Yes."

"These are your associates, of course."

"Yes," Cason said, gesturing to each of us. "Leonard Pine and

Hap Collins."

"Hap," he said, "that's an unusual name. Is it short for anything?"

"Hap," I said.

He smiled a little. The act of talking seemed to tire him out. "You mentioned my son. I wanted to know what you had to say, but what can be said? He's gone, and the people who did it are, according to the police, all dead."

Cason nodded. "That's true, sir. We have been asked by the mother of a boy who was killed with one of the women, Mini—"

"I know who she is," he said, not wanting to hear the rest of the name. "I followed the case, obviously." His voice was less gentle now, like the rain had suddenly been disturbed by thunder. "You aren't lawyers are you?"

"No," Cason said.

"Good."

"Why would we be lawyers?" Leonard asked.

"I don't know for sure," he said, "but I had this sudden feeling you might be, that maybe you were trying to tie me to the whole mess, a civil suit. Well, I thought maybe all of you were lawyers but you."

He nodded at me.

I wasn't sure if that was a compliment or an insult.

Leonard leaned over to me, said, "I look like a lawyer."

I thought: Let's get your deerstalker and have you put it on, and then we'll see how much you look like a lawyer.

"Why would you think that, sir?" Cason said. He was using all of his buttery personality, and it was working. I suppose it was the reporter in him, experience with others. He hadn't been buttery when we first met him.

"Because that Mini you mentioned. Her stepfather tried to tie me to her death. I would gladly have killed her, and all of the others, myself, but I doubt carrying an oxygen tank and having to ride around in this chair would have made me much of an assassin."

"How did he try to tie you to them?"

"I'm not really sure what he was thinking, but he decided somehow we were responsible, like we had paid to have it done. Ridiculous."

"Well, we have nothing to do with him," I said.

“We represent a Mrs. Christopher,” Cason said. “We’re trying to find information concerning the death of her son, trying to figure what connection there could be to him having been killed.”

“You’re detectives?”

“Mostly,” Cason said.

“Wrong place, wrong time,” Kincaid said.

“What?” Cason said.

“The boy,” Kincaid said. “He must have been in the wrong place at the wrong time. Should have kept better company.”

“Perhaps,” Cason said.

“Those are the hard facts. My only son was killed by these animals. Anyone who would associate with them is no better than the animals they were. Vampires! Seriously, now.”

“Animals actually have a much more polite and less devious agenda,” I said.

“I agree,” Kincaid said.

“It’s just that we’ve been hired to investigate,” I said, “so we’re asking some questions. It’s not meant to be personal. We’re just trying to fit some shoes, so to speak.”

“I’m not Cinderella. Whatever you’re asking, whatever shoes you’re laying out, my feet don’t fit.”

“Well,” I said, “long as we’re on a fairy-tale theme, you might call us Goldilocks. We have to try out different things to find out which ones are just right. It’s our job, nothing more.”

He grinned at me. His teeth, though clean and shiny, looked loose in his mouth. “You’re thinking that I didn’t kill them, but that I have money, and I had them killed. The ones who got off, I mean. You’re thinking like the stepfather. I didn’t do anything to them. I should have. I wanted to. But I didn’t know how to go about it. Besides, the law took care of the actual killer, and fate took care of the accomplices and the young man who was in the wrong place at the wrong time.”

“The stepfather, Bert,” I said. “He’s dead too.”

“How unfortunate. He came to me trying to tie me to the death of this … Mini. He was certain I had something to do with it. He wanted money. I told him where he could go, and he must have gone there. I haven’t heard from him, or of him, again, until just now.”

“The others, way the law took care of them,” Leonard said. “That satisfy you?”

“No. But the fat queer got what she deserved in prison. The others got theirs as well. As I said. Fate. I’m not satisfied with the law, but fate has satisfied me as much as a man can be satisfied in a situation like this.”

“Do you have any idea how the others might have died?” I said, trying to make the question sound as casual as if asking him if he wanted a back massage.

“No. Why would I? I was told they were all dead. My assumption is they died due to their connections, others who were as crazy as they were. If I knew who those people were, provided I didn’t think they too were somehow connected to my son’s death, I might throw them a parade. Well, gentlemen. I’m a busy man. I have a nap to take. It’s when I do my best thinking.”

Miss Clinton, who had gone behind her desk to sit, got up and came over and directed us toward the door. She even took my arm and led me. Why the hell was I getting the bum’s rush? Why not Leonard or Cason? Was it because I didn’t look like a lawyer?

We were hurried out into the foyer, where the receptionist waited behind her desk. As we passed she looked at Cason the way a dog looks at a pork chop. He looked back at her and smiled and then she smiled again. There was enough sexual tension in the air between them you could have sparked a candlewick to flame.

We stopped in the jungle section with Miss Clinton. There were still no tigers. The birds were screeching loudly, making me a nervous wreck.

Miss Clinton said, “He doesn’t mean to be rude, but questions about his son, they disturb him.”

“He seemed awfully hostile for someone happy with how things turned out, the killers getting theirs,” I said.

“That was his only son. His only child. He’s dead and he isn’t coming back, and it was all because of some kind of prank, or belief, whatever you like to call it, son.”

“Hap. Or Mr. Collins,” I said. “I don’t go by son.”

“Don’t be cute with me. You’re not that cute.”

I thought: And you’re not old enough to be my mother, so don’t call me son. But I didn’t say it aloud. I was kind of glad she thought I looked that young. You got to take compliments where you find them, even if the remark wasn't actually meant as one.

"Thing is," she said, "any discussion of his son always upsets him."

"Then why did he let us come discuss it with him?" Cason asked. "We're not here to harass him. Just to find out information that might help our client."

"He wanted to hear anything that might be about his son, and he wanted to hear nothing. Do you understand?"

"We regret if we upset him, or you," I said. "You seem very loyal."

"Loyal? That's not the word. He's my ex-husband."

"Your ex-husband," Leonard said. "So, the boy was your son?"

"No. Mr. Kincaid divorced me, married … another woman. She died of throat cancer … smoked like a chimney. I was his personal assistant when we were married, and I stayed that way."

"I can respect that," I said.

"Can you? You can? Well, I don't need your respect."

"Well, you don't get mine," Leonard said. "I think you're a goddamn doormat."

"You don't have to be rude," she said.

"Duh," Leonard said. "Of course I don't have to be. Neither do you. We are grown-ass adults and we both decided to be rude."

She left then, went past the squawking birds and back through the doors that led into Mr. Kincaid's office. She was a real fast walker.

Leonard looked at me. "You respect that shit? I think she's goddamn pathetic."

"I think it's kind of sweet," I said.

"You two hash that out," Cason said. "These damn birds are making me crazy."

We stood there while Cason went back to the desk and talked to the receptionist. When he came back he had her name written on the back of Kincaid's business card.

41

Since Cason had a date with the Kincaid secretary, Lateesha, we thought staying at Constance's place might be bad form, so we rented a room in the Holiday Inn Express near the airport. It had two beds and a rollaway; we left that death trap for Cason.

Cason didn't come back that night, so we sat around and watched television and went to bed late, like parents worried about their boy who had passed his curfew. In the morning, we went downstairs and looked at the free breakfast and understood why it was free, so we walked to a restaurant next door.

As we walked, Leonard said, "If Cason doesn't show soon, he's going to have to find a ride home. I'm not taking that motherfucker in to raise."

"I thought you said he was loyal, and—"

"Oh, shut up."

We were going inside the restaurant when Cason came up. Out in the lot, we saw Lateesha driving away in a red sports car.

"Good to see you," I said. "But we didn't come here to serve as a dating service."

"Oh, I got that date all on my own."

Cason held up a disc.

"What's that?" Leonard said.

"A list of all of Kincaid's clients," he said. "Lateesha got it for me off her computer. It occurred to me that—and I know this will be hard to believe—Kincaid might be lying."

"What has the world come to?" I said.

"I'm going to send it to Mercury, have him cross-check it and see if there's anyone on it that might be someone who would do Kincaid a favor. So to speak."

"The old organized crime figure on the accountant sheet trick," I said.

“That’s it,” Cason said.

The greeter came over and guided us to a booth in the back, which is what we asked for. Soon as we were seated a thin waitress who looked as if it would be all right with her if everyone who ever wanted to eat in a restaurant was dead, arrived and took our coffee orders and went away.

“Mercury can do that?” I said. “He has that kind of list available to him?”

“He has a list of lists,” Cason said. “If there are people on this disc that cross-check as criminals, or are associated with criminals … We can check. It might lead to something, and it might lead to nothing. But it seems like this baby”—he held up the disc—“has made the trip worthwhile. It’s more than Kincaid would ever tell us just by asking.”

“Lateesha get anything out of this?” I asked.

“About six inches of dick and a marvelous breakfast,” Cason said.

“Six inches and about ten feet of bullshit is what I figure,” Leonard said.

“I’m not the world’s best person to be around women,” Cason said. “And the worse thing is, if I really get interested in them and they lose interest in me, which seems to happen as I tend to get preoccupied with things—”

“Like more women,” I said.

“That would be one of the preoccupations, yes,” Cason said. “But if they lose interest in me, I become a half-ass stalker if I don’t watch it. It’s hard for me to let go.”

“So you have an inferiority complex,” Leonard said.

“Could be,” Cason said.

“What about Constance?” Leonard said.

“I’m seeing her next weekend,” Cason said.

“What about Lateesha?” I said.

“Constance Saturday, Lateesha Sunday.”

“Do you take vitamins?” I asked.

“Push-ups and clean living,” Cason said.

Driving home, Cason and Leonard talked about this and that. I tuned out and thought about Kincaid. If he had done anything to get rid of those associated with Godzilla, and her crime, I had a hard time figuring out what made him bad and us good. I had his money and resources I might have done the same thing. Hell, without his money I had done that kind of thing in the past, and Leonard was with me and he was proud of it.

So why did his shit stink and ours smelled like perfume?

And Bert had an idea, maybe a guess similar to ours, that Kincaid might have done the daughter in, and since he had lost all that money to the kitties, maybe he thought he could get some out of Kincaid. Only thing was, Kincaid hadn't bit, and he may not have bit because he may not have been guilty. Or the only card Bert was holding was a guess, and Kincaid knew it. He struck me as a shrewd and intuitive man. And Miss Clinton, she didn't seem like a slacker either. But the bottom line was, Bert was dead. Why would Kincaid bother to have him killed? Or had he. And if not, who did?

No answers presented themselves.

42

By the time we got back to LaBorde, Leonard and Cason had become buddies. They both had been in the military, in different wars, but they had some similar experiences. When Cason got out of the car at his place, Leonard got out and they hugged.

When Leonard got back in and we were tooling along, I said, “That was some hug.”

“Don’t worry,” Leonard said. “You’re still number one.”

We drove to Marvin’s office. The girl at the bicycle shop was standing in the open doorway. She was dressed warm today. The weather had turned cold and there was a hint of rain on the air. She had on a woolen cap and her hair cascaded out from under that. She wore a leather bomber jacket with a sheep’s wool collar, blue jeans, and some big boots with fur trim. The only thing missing was the sled dogs.

In the office, Marvin had a small heater plugged into the wall and he was sitting by it in his rolling chair.

“Can’t find the money for some real heat?” I said.

“Central air is out,” Marvin said. “And I can’t afford to fix it. We get through with this case, I can. I may even get a new coffeepot and a better water cooler.”

We pulled the client chairs over by the heater. Leonard said, “Are you hinting that we should hurry up?”

“No,” he said, “but a conclusion at some point in time would be nice.”

“We’re starting to believe Kincaid was looking for vengeance for his son,” Leonard said, “and he knew someone whose accounting business he took care of was also someone who, for a fee, could take care of business for him.”

“You think that because Brett thinks that?”

“No,” Leonard said. “Because it’s logical.”

“Another thing,” I said, “Bert tried to blackmail Kincaid. Kincaid admitted that. I think Bert was guessing Kincaid had Mini and Mrs. Christopher’s boy killed. He may not have seemed smart, but when it got right down to it, he could have had things figured out. Kincaid may have had him whacked. He knows the right people, and he makes millions for them on their taxes and accounts. He might be able to have them to do him a favor. Or pay them for one.

“Actually, it’s all guesswork for right now, but it’s all we got. Frankly, I haven’t ruled out June either. She had money too, and she didn’t like Mini, and how much she liked her brother is up for debate. She struck me as a hard ass in a soft-ass body.”

“But you have no proof that anyone did anything?” Marvin said.

“We do have something that might give us some proof by way of our new BFF, Cason.”

We filled Marvin in on all that had gone on. Told him about how Cason got the disc with the names on it.

When we finished, he said, “Cason got two pieces of ass in as many days?”

“Gets two this coming weekend as well,” I said.

“I knew I hated that guy,” Marvin said.

“You’re married, and I might as well be,” I said, “so it’s of no interest to us.”

“Okay, we’re married, but damn, I’m jealous.”

“All right,” I said. “Me too. And Leonard here, I think he was hoping him and Cason might play a little grab-ass.”

“It was merely an affectionate hug between comrades,” Leonard said.

“About the case?” Marvin said.

“Cason is having the disc checked,” I said, “and we’ll get back to you.”

Marvin said, “You know, guys, I don’t want to be paranoid here, but I’m starting to look over my shoulder.”

“You think we’re in danger?” I said.

“I don’t know,” Marvin said. “But if Kincaid is responsible for Bert’s death, it doesn’t take much to piss him off. Why would he bother? It’s just one more death that might tie itself to him. He could have let it go and probably been better off.”

“That may not be his way,” I said. “He strikes me as a man that likes to win at whatever game he’s playing, and from the looks of his office digs, he has the money to make the kind of arrangements he wants for most anything next to a body transplant.”

Marvin got up and poured himself a cup of coffee, came and sat back down.

“So, how do we play it?” he said.

“I’m not one for quitting,” Leonard said.

“Here’s my thought,” I said. “Best thing for us to do is to keep poking our noses in other people’s business and find out if someone will come out and play.”

43

I was lying in bed with Brett, and I had told her about our day and the day before. Leonard was downstairs sleeping on the couch. From where I lay I could see the window and the night sky. It was a velvet-soft night. No rain.

"How are things between Leonard and John?" she asked.

"John's being taught that his sense of future direction ought to include deep desire for a woman's vagina."

"Who's teaching him?"

"His brother."

Brett shook her head. "Families can be a mess."

I reached over and took her hand. "I'm gonna change the subject a little."

"That sounded ominous."

"I know you have a child, a grown child," I said, "but have you ever thought about starting a family with someone else?"

"Someone else?"

"Yes."

"Who would that someone else be?"

"Oh, I don't know. Someone off the street. Someone about my height and weight and general disposition."

"You're serious?"

"I guess I am."

Brett lay without speaking for a long time. "I have thought about it, Hap. I've told you how much I love you, and how I stand by you. But … if we had a kid, there's no way you could do what you do."

"I could quit. Though I'm not sure what I'm quitting, since I don't know what my job is."

"You know exactly what I mean, Hap. Don't act coy."

"I think I could actually finish college."

"You tried last year and quit."

"I wasn't motivated enough."

"Now you are?"

"I could try. Unlike just about everyone else, I really had a good family. I know how to be a father. I would be good at it."

"Your lifestyle isn't exactly conducive to tricycles and soccer games and PTA meetings. You'd do all right for a while, and then you'd be … you know, back out there with Leonard. I don't know if I could manage it. I have a grown child that drives me crazy. I don't even know if I could have another one. I'm probably too old."

"We could find out," I said.

She reached out and patted my cheek gently. "I don't think so, baby. I love you. I do. But, Hap … I don't think so."

44

Morning came, and downstairs I found Brett making coffee. I said, “Where’s Leonard?”

“I sent him to his place.”

“Sent him?”

“To get his stuff. His rent plays out in the next couple of days. He doesn’t need to be staying in some rat hole, and besides, I like having him around.”

“I like having him around too … but not that much.”

“It’s temporary. Me and him talked.”

“He has enough money right now to rent or put down dough on a good place, he just hasn’t done it. He’s cheap.”

“He’s not ready for that. Not with the way things are with John.”

“And things may never get better,” I said. “But they might. And if they don’t, he’ll move on. Leonard’s a survivor.”

“He is at that.”

“What we talked about last night,” she said. “I been thinking.”

“That’s all right,” I said. “I was having a sentimental moment.”

She put her arms around me. My hands cupped her buttocks.

“How long before he gets back?” I asked.

“Let me start the coffee, then let’s go upstairs and see if you can make a hole in one before he shows.”

I let go of her. She turned off the coffee. She took my hand. We went upstairs.

Fore!

45

The case didn't exactly die on us after that, but it went a little south for a while while we waited on Mercury to cross check things. Me and Leonard spent time at the little gym where we had a membership, and it was a cold place to be, as the heating wasn't enough to warm up a mouse.

We were often the only people there. The owner was a big fat man whose only exercise was sitting in a chair near the door and taking money or, as in our case, checking memberships. The gym wasn't pretty, but it served our needs. It had a heavy bag, which I hate, and a speed bag, which I love, and it had a good mat we could spar on and throw each other down on. I noticed that when I was thrown it hurt more than it had just a couple years back. Time seemed to have made the ground harder, even if it had a mat over it.

The cold made us train briskly, skipping rope, pounding the heavy bag, punching the speed. After that we sparred a little.

It was good and fun to work out with the weather going wonky, dropping uncharacteristically down to seventeen at night, and in the high twenties during the day. Weather like that, you had to keep moving. Even as we sparred our breath puffed little white clouds. It was odd weather for East Texas, the sort that came once in a blue moon.

We finished up by going over self-defense drills, doing them pretty rough, to make sure we weren't slacking, then we did our groundwork, so we would be ready if we had to end up there, then we went into the cold shower room with our feet freezing on the tile, took hot showers not only to clean up, but to warm up, got dressed, and drove home.

When we got there, Cason's car was parked out front with the engine running, the exhaust pumping into the cold air. After we parked, he climbed out, dressed in a bomber jacket and slacks and a shirt and tie. He held up a folder. “Mercury,” he said.

I invited him inside, sat him at the kitchen table with Leonard, and made some hot tea.

“How British,” Cason said, as he took his cup of tea.

“I see that dress code has kicked in,” I said.

“Yeah,” Cason said, “it has.”

“About the file,” Leonard said.

The file lay in the center of the table. Cason tapped it with a finger.

“Mercury cross-checked names, and there are people on the list that are kind of scary, including a nasty guy named Cletus Jimson.”

“Oh yeah,” Leonard said. “He’s a sweetheart.”

“You know him?” Cason said.

“We’ve crossed paths,” I said. “He doesn’t like us.”

“We’re often misunderstood,” Leonard said.

“Do you think Kincaid could have hired him to do it?” Cason asked. “Kill those folks?”

“Cletus doesn’t do that sort of work, he has it done,” I said. “I suppose Kincaid could have contacted him about a little help, though.”

“Jesus Christ,” Leonard said. “I hope it isn’t Vanilla Ride.”

“Who?” Cason said.

“You don’t want to know,” I said. “Those other devil head murders. Ones up in Oregon and so on. When were they?”

Cason told us.

I said, “Those are too long ago for Vanilla. She’d have been in the womb. She’s not that old. And even if I add five or six years to what I think her age is, she’s still too young. I hope.”

“That’s a relief,” Leonard said. “I keep thinking we’ll see her again, and may not like it when we do.”

“I don’t think she and Jimson are on that good of terms,” I said. “Not the way I remember it. So, taking that fact and adding her youth to it, I think we can safely say, no Vanilla Ride.”

“Money and need make strange bedfellows,” Leonard said. “And I don’t think Cletus has forgotten us. He had these others killed for Kincaid … hell, maybe even June, and it all leads to us sticking our noses into his business, he might decide to put us on the list, and considering our past history, perhaps he'd do it with a certain amount of enthusiasm. But that's private. You don't need to know any more than that. He doesn't like us."

I nodded.

Cason had been watching us in a tennis-match fashion. Head first to one, then the other. "So, I'm sort of out of this part of the conversation," he said.

"Yep," I said. "We don't want to explain that part of our past. But it's possible Jimson did Kincaid a favor, if he got something big in return."

"Should we talk to him?" Cason said.

"That could be tricky," I said. "It's like stirring up a snake. He's sleeping all quiet like, hibernating maybe, and we go in there with a stick and twist him around with it, piss him off, and we are in for some shit when he may not have anything to do with this. So, we could get bit for nothing."

"I got the impression you boys get bit a lot," Cason said.

"That's why we don't want to get bit again," I said.

Leonard looked at me, then looked away. He said to Cason: "I don't mind talkin' to him. We need to, we will. But is he the only one on your list? I think before we stir him up, we got to decide if these murders connect somehow with the murders in Oregon and the like. I think Jimson would kill his mother if he thought he could get a nickel for her bloody Tampax, but I don't think he'd go out of the South. He's sort of regional."

"Yeah," I said, "his territory is East Texas and western Louisiana mostly. I reckon he could do some business outside of this area, but I don't know the business he'd do would be that sort of thing. He's got his niche here. He's got contacts and has the right people paid off, but up north, not so much would be my guess. What I think Jimson likes is being a big frog in a small pond. It's his comfort zone."

"Anyone else on that list suspect?" Leonard asked.

Cason nodded. "Couple others, but the thing is they aren't that big-time. They're little operations, and I got a feeling our killer, our Devil Red, is well trained and works for big money. That's why I thought of Jimson. He's much bigger time than the other two jokers."

"Where are they from?" I asked.

"Midwest," Cason said.

“Kincaid isn’t afraid to do business with bad people,” Leonard said. “Keep their taxes clean and fresh. So that makes it even more likely he would have been willing to make some kind of deal to get even for his son.”

“Maybe he just does their taxes and tells them how to save on weather stripping their homes,” I said.

“Yeah, right,” Leonard said.

“If Kincaid did arrange it, I’m not sure I blame him for wanting to get even,” I said. “Losing first a daughter to drugs, then a son to murder is bound to weigh on and mess up the mind—”

“Wait a minute,” Leonard said. “I just had a flash. Detectives like to call it inspiration.”

“Yeah,” I said. “What do you call it?”

“The drug-dead daughter,” Leonard said. “What do we know about her?”

“I think the whole she’s dead part about covers it,” Cason said.

“Let’s look into it,” Leonard said.

“May I ask why?” I said.

“Yes,” Leonard said. “You can ask, but I got nothing to say about it yet. I may be full of shit.”

“All right,” Cason said. “We can check on her. I’ll get Mercury on it.”

46

After Cason left, we called Marvin and asked if he could set up a meeting with Jimson. The whole thing about telling Cason we didn't want to see Jimson really meant we didn't want Cason in on it. We had a history with Jimson. All bad. We didn't want to put Cason on Jimson's doo-doo list.

We sat around for about an hour, then Marvin called us back.

"What'd he say?" I said, pressing my cell phone to my ear while standing at the kitchen window, looking out at the yard, the house beyond. It had turned off clear and the sun was out, but there was ice in little spots where the water ran out of the grass and collected along the concrete walk at that side of the house. If I was married to Brett and had a child, the most I'd have to think about today was maybe going to work and coming in to read the papers and play with the kid. It was a pipe dream, but I liked it.

"He said he didn't want to see you," Marvin said.

"That's not nice."

"No, it isn't."

"I don't know about you," I said, "but my iddy-biddy feelers are crushed to the bone."

"Mine too, but that's what he said. He also said eat shit and die."

"You're exaggerating."

"Yeah. Actually, I didn't talk to him. But the message from his associate, one of his bodyguards, was pretty much in that ballpark."

I turned to Leonard. "Jimson doesn't want to see us."

"Then we should respect his wishes," Leonard said.

47

Within fifteen minutes we were on our way to the little burg of No Enterprise. It wasn't much of a place, a four-way stop with a string of buildings here and there, but for some odd reason, Jimson lived over in that area and did a lot of his business in a little service station that also had sodas and liquor and snack goods, had some tables in the back with some chairs, and sold hamburgers. Good burgers, bad fries. The pie was good too.

Jimson spent a lot of time there in the afternoons with his goons. If he wasn't there, well, we'd have chocolate pie with meringue. If he was there, we'd probably have it anyway. Maybe a hamburger. Me and Leonard, we believed in living large. It's just how we roll.

It took us a little over half an hour to get there because there were some low spots in the highway and water ran across those, and in this weather they had frozen, making an occasional shiny ribbon of ice across the road. Mostly it took us a while because Leonard had a new country music CD and he wanted to hear all of it before we stopped. He said, "They get rowdy, and I get killed, I like to know I heard all of it."

"You're dead, what does it matter?"

"It's the idea of it," he said. "I just want to know I consumed it all, at least once."

"You've heard it before."

"But it's a different collection of the same songs. I like that they're in a different order."

"Jerry Lee Lewis singing country sounds pretty much like Jerry Lee Lewis singing country in any order."

"Oh yes, and oh so good."

I had to agree. He told me to shut up and played the CD.

We were both armed. I had my permit pistol, and Leonard had a sawed-off shotgun without a permit fitted inside his long coat. He flared the coat back, he could pull it out of there faster than you could blink.

When we arrived the café part was absent of Jimson and thugs. In fact, it was absent of any patrons. There was a guy at the counter, and when we sat down back there, he said, "You got to come up here to get menus."

I got up and got us a couple of menus. I noticed there was a large jar of pickled eggs on the counter and a small jar with a kid's photo on it and a request for money due to burns received in a car wreck. I put a buck in the can and took the menus back to where Leonard had picked seats. There was a door back there that was an emergency door. It didn't open from the outside. Anyone came in, they had to come in the front door and come along the path between the counter and the tables to reach us. There was a wide row of glass to our left, but we were sitting at a table where I had my back against the wall, and had a bit of wall to protect me. Leonard was point man. Anyone came up, he could see them through the glass, and if need be he could cut down on them with that shotgun, start pumping out loads.

We ordered two hamburgers from the guy when he came over. He was a little nasty-looking for a man who worked as a cook. His fingers were nicotine stained and his teeth were the same. In fact, where the stains were missing, black decay had filled in between his teeth like dirt washed down from a hill.

Leonard said, "Two hamburgers, no fries, hold the hepatitis."

"What?" the man said.

"I mean wash your hands. I like to think that's nicotine, but for all I know it could be from you sticking your finger up your ass."

"You guys leave," he said.

"We work for the health department, mister," I said. "I wouldn't push it."

He looked at me, said, "Show me your credentials."

"We don't carry any. We're here to surprise people, not let them know we're coming."

"Credentials just show who you are," he said. "I'm already surprised."

“True,” Leonard said, “but you’ve got on my bad side. Go wash your hands.”

The man studied Leonard for a moment, figured quite correctly we weren’t with the health department, but he wasn’t really sure about throwing us out. Especially Leonard, who had a kind of lazy look that said “I’d love to kill you very much.”

“All right,” he said. “Two hamburgers.”

“After you wash your hands,” Leonard said. “And I even think or consider you might spit in my food or mess with it, I will personally see you get some big demerits. And on top of that, I will hold your face against the stove until it cooks your nose off.”

“No need to get nasty,” the man said.

“Your fingers are nasty enough,” Leonard said.

The man went away.

I said, “Leonard, why do you always try to make friends wherever we go?”

“Our man Jimson comes here all the time, so he’s got to tip Shit Fingers something or another now and then to use the space, and I figure whatever he tips him is big enough to buy some loyalty. I figure Shit Fingers is in the back there now, punching him up on the cell phone. I figure it’s a way to pull Jimson out of the Jacuzzi and get him on the road.”

“You know, you’re not as dumb as you look.”

48

Our hamburgers arrived, and about the same time we saw Jimson and two of his goon balls push through the door, start toward us. Leonard turned so that he was facing that direction. He had his hand inside his coat. Things went south, he'd have the shotgun up and ready. I put my hand in my coat and felt for the automatic, but to tell you the truth, I wasn't sure I could use it, way I'd been lately. I hoped I could at least talk tough.

Jimson was a fortyish guy who looked as if he was trying to smooth his image with expensive clothes. He was wearing a tan fedora, a very nice brown leather coat over a maroon sweater, and tan slacks so tight you wanted to yell "snake."

With him were two men that couldn't look sophisticated if they were wearing tuxes and monocles. One of them was so muscular he looked as if he had been pumped up with air. The other was leaner, and he carried his right hand close to him with his palm folded back, his coat slightly pushed. He'd be the shooter, the big man with the muscles would be the hitter.

As Jimson walked toward us, he turned to Shit Fingers, said, "You're right, they're not the health department. More like sewer."

Jimson sat at the table near us and looked at us like we were wild animal exhibits. Leonard had turned completely around in his chair. He wouldn't even need to take the shotgun out of his coat. All he had to do was lift and shoot through fabric. A shot from that sawed-off and Jimson would be mixed in with the pickled eggs.

"Fancy meeting you here," Leonard said.

"Yeah," Jimson said, "imagine that. Last time I seen you guys I didn't like it, and now I see you again, I don't like it some more."

"Is that line out of the movies?" Leonard said.

"That's an original," Jimson said. "I got a feeling you boys didn't just come over for a hamburger."

"Well," I said, "there's the pie."

Jimson smiled. "Yeah. There is the pie. So, I get a call from Marvin Hanson, a guy I don't like much, but knows me all right, and he says can his boys come see me. And you know what I say?"

"No," Leonard said.

"That's right. I say no. And then you know what?"

"Pray tell," Leonard said.

"You show up anyway."

"Not at your house," Leonard said.

"At my spot."

"Here?" Leonard said. "Really? This is your spot?"

"You been hasslin' my man over there." He nodded at Shit Fingers. "He kind of keeps me an open office here. I let you hassle my man, what kind of reputation I got with the locals?"

"What do you get out of him letting you have your office here?" I said.

"Pie."

"All right," I said. "I can see that."

Leonard nodded.

"Look, I don't know what you two assholes want, but I got nothin' to do with nothin' you're dealin' with."

"Now, how would you know that, when we haven't told you what we're dealing with? We could be selling Girl Scout cookies for all you know."

"Them's some good cookies," said the man with muscles.

Jimson turned and glanced at him. Muscles looked embarrassed, then tried to look as serious as a heart attack.

"I come here 'cause my man there called," Jimson said, "and I come here to show you guys I'm not afraid of you, that you ain't got no mojo on me. You dig on that?"

"I think 'dig' went out with the beatniks," Leonard said.

Jimson sighed. "You don't even try to work with a man when he's trying to work with you. I wanted, I could rub you guys out. I still owe you a shitstorm that didn't never come down."

"Actually," I said, "you threw a lot of shit our way, but we sort of threw it back."

“I’m talkin’ about what I could have done.”

“Woulda, coulda, shoulda,” Leonard said. “That was then, and this is now.”

“You fellas don’t want this,” Jimson said. “You don’t want me mad.”

“Do we look nervous?” Leonard said. Leonard didn’t. Me, I wasn’t so sure about. “We made you mad before, and we’re still standing,” Leonard said.

“I thought you made a deal to stay out of my business if I stayed out of yours,” Jimson said.

I nodded. “It’s a deal we like, stayin’ out of each other’s business, but we’re thinkin’, considerin’ what we know lately, maybe your business is in our business again. And if it is, well, we got to come say howdy.”

“And what in the hell business could that be?” Jimson said.

Leonard said, “You know, I’m gonna pause and eat this hamburger. It’s better when it’s warm. Hey, Shit Fingers. Come over here.”

Shit Fingers was behind the counter. He looked at Jimson. Jimson nodded.

Shit Fingers came out from behind the counter, over to Leonard.

“Let me see those hands,” Leonard said.

Shit Fingers showed them to him. They had been washed.

“All right, go on about your business,” Leonard said.

I looked at Jimson. He was starting to fume. That’s the way Leonard wanted him. He liked people he was dealing with mad, especially when he was trying to find something out. Me too. They were more likely to mess up, reveal something they shouldn’t. They were easier to read when they were angry. It’s the way we worked. Either that or kicking their ass. Subtlety was not our long suit.

Muscles said, “You want me to fuck ’em up, boss?”

Jimson shook his head. “I don’t know you can.”

Muscles looked hurt, the way a kid might if you told him his drawing of the sky and a moon looked like a boat on the ocean.

“Here’s the thing,” Leonard said. “We got this client, and our client has a problem. Someone she knows, family, was murdered, and there were other murders, and they’re all connected by a little symbol. A devil’s head. Red. Left at the scene of the murders. You know anything about that?"

"No."

Leonard said, "Oh, Shit Fingers. I'll have a slice of pie. Hap?"

"Oh yeah," I said. "Big slice."

"I don't see how this has anything to do with me," Jimson said.

"Got that whole Kincaid-does-your-taxes thing going," Leonard said.

"Yeah, and I got a grocer, this filling station where I buy my gas and do my business, and I got a mechanic and a plumber, and a girl on Fridays comes over and pulls my dick so I don't have to."

"So you got nothin' for us?" I said.

"If I had, why would I give it to you? You come in here, you insult Shit Fingers … I mean Toad—"

"Toad?" I said.

"We called him that in high school. I've known him a long time. Same for these two. We grew up together."

"I used to beat him up on the playground," Muscles said.

Jimson turned and looked at him. "You could have saved that."

"Sorry, Cletus. I just thought it was funny … as a memory. Not that I would do it now—"

"That's all right," Jimson said. "Just be quiet."

Muscles went quiet.

"Here's what I got to say," Jimson said. "I've got nothing to do with the devil head murders. Nothing. What I can say is this: I've heard of a hit person who uses that mark. The only person more deadly than this person, so they say, is this Vanilla Ride, and you've had experience with her. They're both a lot more deadly than you are. Say I wanted somethin' done, I used to go to Vanilla. She got the job done, but now me and her got this disagreement on account of you two."

"I call bullshit on that," I said. "You decided to kill her. That's the disagreement."

"Whatever. I wanted someone killed in a bad way, I might go to this devil head killer. I might go through Kincaid. I might know he can arrange it. But me, I don't want anyone killed, so I'm not doin' that. I didn't do it in the past. I got to tell you now, you boys are startin' to annoy me. You're not keepin' your side of the bargain about stayin' out of my business."

"As long as it's out of our business," I said. "That was the bargain.”

“And I’m tellin’ you, if my accountant is hirin’ someone to knock fuckers off, it ain’t through me. That’s what I’m tellin’ you, and that’s my word.”

Shit Fingers, aka Toad, brought the pie.

“Get me one too,” Jimson said.

“Yeah,” Muscles said. “Pie all around. And some milk. What we got here, five milks?”

Toad looked at Jimson. Jimson sighed. “Why not? More pie. Bring milk. We might as well see if anyone wants coffee.”

“I’ll top it off with coffee,” Muscles said.

Jimson shook his head a little.

Leonard took a big bite of pie, worked it around in his mouth, and swallowed. “Any chance you might hook us up with this Devil Red killer, like maybe we act like we got a job we want that bad boy to do?”

“No.”

“Come on, man,” Leonard said. “Here we are sharin’ pie, and you won’t hook a brother up.”

“I belonged to the Aryan Nations in prison, so I don’t hook brothers up.”

“Unless it’s to fasten ’em to a chain to get dragged by a car,” Muscles said.

This time the tall thin man who hadn’t said a word yet grinned. It was like seeing the Grim Reaper get a chuckle.

“Oh, that’s funny,” Leonard said.

“Look here. I ain’t into all that nigger hatin’ anymore,” Jimson said.

“That’s big of you,” Leonard said.

“Only way you might see this Devil Red dude, as you call him, is if he comes to shoot your black ass, and your white pal too.”

“That’s so sweet,” I said. “Both of us, and in the ass.”

“Look here,” Jimson said. “We’ve had a talk. I’ve bought some pie.”

“We’re not asking you to buy our pie,” Leonard said. “The milk maybe, as your man ordered that.”

Jimson snapped both hands in the air, making a crosscutting motion.

“Forget it. I’ve got the whole goddamn bill. I just want you two to go away and stay away, and let’s go back to where we were before. I'm out of your business, and you're out of mine. You jackasses are like having seed ticks imbedded in the balls."

"All right," Leonard said. "But before we go, and before I say thanks for lunch, let me confirm some things. There is a killer who works for money who uses a red devil head as a symbol to sign his work?"

"That's what I'm told," Jimson said.

"And you're sayin', and I know you might lie to a brother, you're sayin' you've got nothin' to do with these hits?"

"If I did," Jimson said, "them crossin' your path would just be a coincidence."

"So you're sayin' you did have somethin' to do with it?" Leonard said.

"No," Jimson said. "For Christsakes, no. That was one of those hypotheticals."

"You learn that word in prison?" I asked.

"I just added an s to it, that's all. I have nothing to do with Devil Red. I have never had anything to do with Devil Red. I might consider havin' something to do with Devil Red in the future. Maybe the very goddamn near future."

"That a threat?" I asked.

"Hell yeah," Jimson said.

"Don't forget," Leonard said. "Vanilla Ride is a personal friend of ours."

"No need to bring that bitch into this."

"You are such a misogynist," I said. "If you can't be sweet, don't have anything to say at all."

"Yeah," Leonard said, tossin' his napkin on the table. "You're gonna talk like that, then we'll just have to leave."

He got up. I got up. I went to the fire door and pushed it. The alarm went off. I backed slowly out of it, and Leonard backed out after me. We went around by the side glass on our way to the car. Jimson, Muscles, and the Grim Reaper were watching us from the table. Well, Muscles was actually eating pie and drinking milk. Jimson and the Reaper were watching.

Toad wasn't in sight.

Nobody pulled a gun.

49

On the way home, Leonard said, “Did Jimson seem a bit grumpy to you?”

“He did.”

“The guy with the big arms, he didn’t worry me none. Neither did Jimson, but the quiet one.”

“I call him the Grim Reaper,” I said.

“Yeah, him. He’s someone could be trouble.”

“We’ll file him away for any future associations.”

“That part of the file, people that don’t like us, might kill us, and just ought to be watched, is getting sizable.”

“It is,” I said.

“Hap?”

“Yeah.”

“You feelin’ better?”

“Sure.”

Actually, I had no idea how I felt.

50

When I got home, Leonard took his car and went away somewhere to do Leonard things, which probably meant he was giving Brett and me time together.

Inside, Brett was sitting on the couch with her suitcase parked by her.

I closed the door and said, “Problem?”

“It’s Tillie.”

“You just got back from there. You said yourself you can’t change her.”

“I can’t. She got beat up. Her pimp did it.”

“Shit. How bad?”

“Bad. She’ll be all right, but she’s bad.”

“Damn, Brett, I’m sorry.”

“I got to go. I was just waiting on you.”

“Why didn’t you call?”

“Your phone was off.”

“Oh.”

“And I wouldn’t have called anyway. I wanted to see you before I left.”

“How’d the hospital take it?”

“They took it,” she said, and stood up. “I get there, I’ll give you a call.”

When she stood up and came close, I could see there were tears on her cheeks.

“Long as you need, of course,” I said.

We kissed and I picked up her suitcase and carried it out to her car. She kissed me again and got behind the wheel and started the engine and rolled down the window.

“You didn’t offer to settle the pimp’s hash for me,” she said.

“No. I didn’t.”

“It’s all right. It won’t change him and it won’t change her.” She smiled at me and drove away.

I went upstairs and took off my clothes and closed the blinds and put on my pajamas and got in bed. It was early afternoon and still bright out. But not with the blinds drawn. I lay back on my pillow and pulled her pillow to me. It smelled like she smelled and I liked it.

51

When my cell phone rang, I woke up and didn't know where I was for a moment. I rolled out of bed and pulled it out of my coat pocket and flipped it open.

It was Cason.

"You and Leonard ought to get together with me and Mercury," he said.

"Got somethin'?"

"Yeah. Leonard with you?"

"No. But I can hustle him up."

"When can we get together?" Cason said.

"I don't know. I'll call him, we'll call you, and we'll get together."

"Tell Leonard not to wear the hat."

We showed up at Cason's apartment, way he said. Mercury was there with him. Leonard didn't wear the hat.

As we went inside I gave the place a once-over. It was sort of thrown together with home-made bookshelves and an old couch and a coffee table that looked as if it had been salvaged from the dump. It had so many glass and cup stains on it, it almost looked designed.

I could see the kitchen from the middle of the room, and the sink was full of dishes. Through an open doorway I could see an unmade bed and clothes on the floor. It reminded me of every place either I or Leonard had lived until Brett and I got the house. As much as was possible, she had civilized me.

Mercury had a laptop with him and he placed it on the coffee table, and we all found a place to sit. Cason asked if we wanted beer. Leonard took one; so did Mercury and Cason himself. I passed.

Mercury turned on the laptop, said, “You don’t need to see this ’less you want to. I can read off my notes and tell you what I got.” We agreed this was fine.

“Kincaid’s daughter died of an overdose,” Mercury said. “That much you know. But she died in Oregon. Did you know that?”

“No,” I said.

“Guys that got killed and had the devil head painted at the site were all drug dealers. You startin’ to see a pattern here?”

“Kincaid’s daughter died of a drug overdose, and the drug dealers she dealt with are the ones found dead with the devil heads,” I said.

Mercury nodded. “And his son is killed by crazies, and the crazies die. I think the one in jail, Gonzello a.k.a. Godzilla, was the subject of a hit, but she was tougher than the hit. But when she gave the knife back, thinking she was immortal, well, she messed up. And the train accident. Who knows? Maybe that was some kind of rig too. The Christopher boy … Wrong place, wrong time. Probably caught and killed him and Mini somewhere else, tried to make it look like rape and robbery. However, they just couldn’t resist leaving their mark. Right there in the open, thinking no one would see the connection. But they would know, and it would please them. That’s what conspiracy theorists like myself call a pattern. A pattern of deaths, a pattern of markings—a signature, if you will.”

“So it all does go back to Kincaid?” I said. “He wanted revenge, so he hired Devil Red to do the deed, but Devil Red couldn’t resist leaving his mark. I guess someone killed my son and daughter, I’d feel pretty vengeful.”

“Thing is,” Cason said, “Devil Red seems to put a lot of people to sleep, all over the country. They can’t all be people who’ve done something to the Kincaids. What Mrs. Christopher wants is whoever killed her son. She wants Devil Red, and I’m sure, if possible, she wants whoever arranged it, so the Kincaids aren’t off the hook, no matter what.”

52

When we arrived at my place, we were hungry. I decided on chili.

I got a wide and deep cast-iron frying pan out from under the cabinet and put hamburger meat in it. As it fried, I black peppered it.

Leonard cut up half an onion and a jalapeño, scraped that off the cutting board into the meat. I stirred it while he got the chili powder out of the cabinet and shook some of that in.

I let it cook for a while, and we got soft drinks and sat at the table and smelled the chili cooking.

“So, what do you think?” Leonard said.

“I think Mercury is probably right,” I said. “It’s all connected, and the thing now is, how do we get enough evidence to nail Devil Red, and find a way not to nail Kincaid and Ms. Clinton.”

“I’m not sure I care as much about them as you do,” Leonard said. “There’s something about this whole thing still bothers me. It’s like an animal called Not Quite Right crawled up my ass and is wiggling around.”

“I thought you enjoyed that kind of thing.”

“Wrong kind of animal.”

“All right. How about we try to find evidence to nail Devil Red, not make an effort to stick our vengeful couple, but if things shake out that way, and we can’t keep it from happening, we let it. Him in that chair, and she his former wife, they might get off with something light.”

“She might not have anything to do with it,” Leonard said.

“Oh, she did somethin’, all right. She’s still in love with him. That much was easy to tell. And if anyone knows his business, it’s her.”

“He dumped her, and she’s still moonin’ over him like a preteen," Leonard said. "I don't get it."

"I think love is hard to explain, brother."

"Yeah. Well, I think it's made up."

"You do? What about John?"

"I think I was attracted to him, and him to me, and we had certain things in common, both being queer was right up there, and—"

"He made you laugh, right? That's what everyone always says."

"You and Brett make each other laugh. Me and John, not so much. But I think our basic attraction created love. I think love is real, but I think it's created, kind of like a smoothie."

"You are such a romantic."

"No. No I'm not," Leonard said.

The chili cooked for a long time, and we were starved when it was ready. We ate quickly, devouring huge bowls of it with crackers, and then we did seconds. Between it all, we made some general plans about going back to Houston to shake Kincaid's and Clinton's tree some, see we could get them to make a mistake, wiggle something out of the woodwork. It wasn't a plan up there with Patton, but it was a plan. We had plenty of clues now, plenty of circumstantial evidence. Thing to do was to see if our knowing what we knew made them nervous.

And then the worm turned.

53

Leonard had a lot of his stuff at my place, so we decided he could easily pack and go from there. Some of his clothes were dirty, though, so we put them in the washer, and while it churned, we sat and talked.

Sometime later, Leonard moved his clothes to the dryer and put on a fresh shirt and pants. He came back from changing, said, "I'm cravin' more of that chili."

"Help yourself," I said. I was sitting on the couch with my feet on the coffee table, glancing at one of Brett's magazines. It didn't really have anything to do with anything I was interested in, but it killed a bit of time.

"No more crackers," he said.

"Eat it without crackers."

"I like crackers."

"I like steak and baked potato, but what you have is chili, no crackers."

"I'm gonna go get some."

"You want crackers that bad?"

"It's the way you eat chili."

"You have a rule book?" I asked.

"I know things."

Leonard got his coat. "And you're out of vanilla cookies."

"Wow, wonder where those went."

Leonard put the coat on and took his deerstalker out of the pocket and put it on. I didn't say anything, but I'm sure I sighed. Going out the door, he said, "I'll be back in twenty or thirty."

"Don't screw around," I said. "We need to pack and get gone. We have people to irritate."

"I wouldn't miss that," he said.

Leonard was gone about five minutes when I realized Leonard had left his wallet on the table with his cell phone, and even his pistol. The sawed-off was there too. He had taken them out of his pants when he had changed clothes. He was driven to have those crackers and cookies and he didn't think he needed a gun to get them. A wallet with money, though. He needed that. And frankly, the idea of him being out there, and Devil Red maybe being out there, and Leonard without a gun, it unnerved me a little. I was starting to get as paranoid as Bert was.

I got his wallet and phone and my own gun, and drove over to Wal-Mart. I knew that's where he'd go. It's where he always went.

As I drove over, it started to sleet and I could see that ice was cresting the grass in yards I passed.

When I got to the lot, I cruised around, looking for his car, and I saw it and I saw him. Leonard was in the lot walking. He had his hands in his coat pockets and his head down against the sleet.

I saw a black SUV turn down the row of cars where Leonard was walking, and when I did, my heart sank.

I drove faster, but the SUV was on him, and the back side window came down, and I saw a pistol poke out of it. I honked my horn at the same time Leonard was turning, reaching under his coat——for nothing.

His guns were at home, on the table.

There was a blast of fire from the open window. Snap. Snap. Snap.

Leonard went down.

I pulled over quick and got out and fired at the dark-windowed SUV and the glass popped and made a spider design but didn't break. The SUV gunned in. They came by my position. I could see a shape inside, through the open window, but my main concentration was on the gun poking out at me. I fired once and leaped over the hood of my car. A bullet scraped something and I lay down tight behind my tire, peeked out and under.

The SUV was roaring away. I stood up and draped my gun over the roof of my car. Someone screamed. I saw a shopper pushing a cart go right behind the SUV. No shot there. No license plate either. Not that it would have mattered. They knew what they were doing. Those plates would be false.

I screamed because I couldn't do anything else.

I put the gun away and ran toward Leonard.
It seemed to take me forever to get there.
He didn’t get up. He didn’t move.
The lights from Wal-Mart seemed to strobe.

54

There are some things that happen to you that thicken the air around you until it is as heavy and as hard to penetrate as stone.

I don't know a better way to explain it. It's as if air and gravity are coconspirators, pulling you down. I tried to move fast, and I suppose I was moving fast, but I felt like Brer Rabbit caught up in the tar baby. The more I struggled, the worser I got.

My feet didn't know how to work, and my head wasn't thinking clearly; my brain was echoing with the sound of gunfire.

When I got to him, he was breathing. But he was bloody, and he was bad. His stupid hat was lying nearby. There was a stream of blood flowing away from Leonard's body and it was about to touch the hat. I took the hat and put it in my coat pocket.

I said, "Leonard," but he didn't so much as blink.

I touched the pulse in his throat. He was going fast.

I stood up to see a half-dozen people standing around me. And the crowd was growing.

A lady said, "I called nine-one-one."

"I hope you hit the sonofbitch," someone in the crowd said.

After that, it seemed as if I was down on my knees forever, holding Leonard's head across my knees. Then there were sirens, and lights, an ambulance and cops.

They took my gun and put me in a cop car and I sat there not able to speak, watching through the window as the ambulance with my best friend—my brother—drove away.

They let me make a call. I called Marvin. They asked me some questions. I did my best to answer them. There wasn't a lot to say. The cops knew me. They knew Leonard. That wasn't necessarily a good thing. And they knew Marvin.

I went downtown, and my memory of that trip is all a haze. Finally they let me go away with Marvin. I had heard only one thing, a cop saying it to another cop, out in the hallway. It was about Leonard. He wasn't expected to live.

He should have had chili without crackers, I thought. Goddamn it, Leonard. If you don't die before I get to the hospital, I'm gonna kill you. Crackers and vanilla wafers. That got you shot? Maybe killed? You sonofabitch.

Don't die, goddamn it, don't die.

Shot outside Wal-Mart. How ignoble was that? A man who had fought in a war, and had fought dozens of tough customers over the years, gunned down in a parking lot.

"Who do you think?" Marvin said.

"Jimson. He was mad at us from the time before. And we just saw him again."

"And you were not endearing."

"No. It was the usual."

"Who else is on the list?" Marvin asked.

"Vanilla Ride, maybe. Devil Red. I don't know. We pulled someone's chain a little too hard this time, and someone didn't like it, or hired someone to not like it for them. They must have been scoping us out at the house. Saw Leonard alone, thought they'd take him. Come back for me. Normally, that wouldn't be an easy thing. But this time, it was."

"There's no rhyme or reason to that sort of thing," Marvin said.

"They caught us apart. We're not easy apart, but together, we're really difficult. Except this time."

"Even monkeys fall out of trees," Marvin said. "It's not always about how good you are."

"Take me by the house before the hospital. I want to get something."

…

Marvin parked down the street and let me out, and then he drove by, to see what he could see. I walked across two backyards and went to my back door. No one was waiting on me. I used the key and went inside.

Upstairs, I got Brett's little revolver and put it in my coat pocket. Simple gun. Light enough. No jams.

Downstairs, I looked out the back window. I could see our neighbor’s fence, and nothing else.

I went to the living room, peeled the curtain on first one window, then another. The yard was empty, except for dead grass nipped over with ice.

I put my hand in my pocket and went outside and looked around. I didn’t see a sniper’s nest or black helicopters or Bigfoot.

Marvin coasted up front. I got in and we went away.

It had turned very icy by now, and we almost went off in a ditch once. But we made it.

As I walked into the hospital, shaken to my core, the last thing I told myself was it no longer mattered what had been going on inside of me as of late, because I was past that now.

It didn’t matter.

It was behind me.

Whoever did this to Leonard was going to die.

55

They wouldn’t let us see Leonard. He was in surgery. Me and Marvin sat in uncomfortable chairs in an overlit waiting room with a TV on without the sound and a lady wrapped up in a blanket sleeping in a chair across the way. From time to time, Marvin got up and made some calls to the cops and who knows who all.

When he came and sat back down, I said, “Thomas and his crony aren’t out of jail, are they?”

“First thing I thought of,” Marvin said. “Answer is no.”

“No idea of anyone else?”

Marvin shook his head. “Folks saw the SUV.

Heard shots. But didn’t really see anyone, same as you. A woman got the license, but—”

“It’s not to an SUV.”

“That’s right. It’s not. It was stolen from a car that’s already been traced. They must have taken it off the car tonight. Quick and fast. They’ve already traded the license plate on their car back by now, tossed the other one.”

“Shit. I should have been with him. We’re together, shit like that doesn’t happen.”

“Of course it does. You two have just been lucky. All of us, we just been lucky. We’ve all been shot, nearly killed. Just not as bad as Leonard got tonight.”

“I’m thinkin’ maybe Jimson,” I said. “We rode him pretty hard.”

“Possibility.”

“And then there’s Devil Red.”

“Really?” Marvin said.

“Could be. Jimson implied he knew how to contact Devil Red.

Like maybe he could hire him, he wanted to. Or maybe we got Kincaid stirred when we were in Houston and he put Devil Red on us. I don't know. Anyone say anything about finding a drawing, something with a devil head on it?"

"No. But that might be information even my buddies wouldn't tell me," Marvin said. "But, if it was Devil Red, he might not leave a warning if there's no time. Also, since the shots came from the back window, he's got help."

"That could point to Jimson," I said. "It might just be him and some of his boys."

Marvin was hesitant. "Well, when it comes to you two, there is a long list. Only thing I can say, it wasn't random, and it wasn't for robbery. They had one purpose. Shoot Leonard. And if they did that, I pretty much think you're next."

It was a long time before Leonard came out of surgery. We weren't allowed to see him then, just a glimpse as they pushed his gurney onto an elevator and took him away. He looked ashen, and when a black man looks that ashen, it's not good, not good at all.

The surgeon met with us in the break room a few minutes later. The surgeon's name was Rogers and he was out of his surgery duds and wearing some loose clothes with slip-on shoes.

We sat at a break table in plastic chairs. The room seemed too bright.

"He's pretty bad," Rogers said. "He's tough, though. I'll tell you that. I couldn't believe he'd taken those slugs, bled that much, and was still alive. He could even talk a little."

"He say who did it?" Marvin asked.

"He asked me if we found the cookies."

"The cookies?" I said. "Why that silly sonofabitch. The last thing he asked about were cookies? He never even made it inside the store."

"He was kind of out of it. He asked about a hat too. Neither meant anything to me."

I smiled. Thought: That's probably why he was shot, that hat. "Wish I could tell you he was going to be better," Rogers said. I held my breath.

"I can't," he said. "He could recover. Like I said, he's tough. But he lost a lot of blood, lots of trauma."

"What kind of chance does he have?" I asked.

"No way of really knowing," Rogers said. "But I'd say he's on the low end of possibilities."

"What's that mean?" Marvin said.

"This is all guesswork, gentlemen. Ten, twenty percent maybe."

"Oh, hell," I said.

"Ten, twenty percent, that's something, though," Rogers said. "It's a wait-and-see situation, not a wait-for-certain-death kind of deal. And like I said, he seems to have a lot of willpower. That's what makes someone tough. Not just muscle and flesh, but willpower."

"He'll make it," I said.

Rogers stood. "We're doing all we can."

"Do all you can and more," I said. "That's my brother in there."

56

After we talked to the surgeon, I told Marvin to go home, be with his family. I walked outside with him to his car. He opened his trunk and got out a golf club bag with clubs poking out of it. He said, “Borrow these.” I just looked at him.

“Inside,” he said, “is a sawed-off pump shotgun, twelve-gauge. You might want to put it together.”

“I might at that,” I said.

I opened my trunk and he put the bag inside. “We’re on hospital camera, you know,” Marvin said.

“I know.”

I closed the trunk.

I called Brett. I waited in the parking lot till she arrived. I put the golf bag in the trunk of her car. She didn’t say anything. We went up to the waiting room. We were the only ones there.

Brett was red-faced and her eyes were red too. Her hair was tied back and her shoulders were slumped. She sat down beside me and took my hand.

“How is he?”

“No word,” I said. “I think the same.”

She patted my hand.

“I know you need to find out who did it,” she said.

“Yeah.”

“I know what you’ll do when you find them.”

“Yeah.”

“Those weren’t just golf clubs, were they?”

“No,” I said.

“So, how are you gonna get who did it sitting here?”

“I want to know how he is. I want to know he’s okay.”

“We have phones. You sitting here doesn’t change anything. You get that sonofabitch. Whatever it takes, you get him. And if you need me to help you get him, I will.”

“I know,” I said.

She pulled my head around and looked me directly in the eyes. “I’ll stay here. You … you have any ideas. Any way to get ideas, anyone to get ideas from, you do it. Take my car. And when you find who did this, and I know you’ll find them, show no mercy.”

57

I drove over to No Enterprise. I drove carefully. There was a little park by the side of the road just outside of the city limits. I pulled over there and opened the trunk and took out the golf bag and dug in there until I found the shotgun. It was in two pieces. There was a little bag with tools in it. I put the shotgun together swiftly. There were shells in a plastic bag. I loaded the gun.

I looked up as a black Volkswagen drove by, heading back the way I had come. I hoped they weren't pulling into the park.

They drove on.

I put the bag back in the trunk and took the shotgun and laid it on the front passenger's seat and drove on into No Enterprise. There was no reason to expect Jimson to be where I hoped he was, but Shit Fingers or someone there would know. I'd get him to come there if I had to beat the information out of an innocent bystander. I might even make them drink the coffee.

When I got to No Enterprise, I saw the service station/convenience store. It occurred to me as I arrived that it might not be open. But it was. It was all night. It was the swinging spot in No Enterprise.

The lights were on, but right then it wasn't swinging.

I cruised into the lot and parked. There was a dark SUV parked in front of the store, near the door. I tried to determine if it was the one in the Wal-Mart lot, came to the conclusion it was not.

I got the shotgun off the seat and opened the door. My legs felt like lead, but I made them move anyway. I held the gun down by my side, and used my other hand to tap the revolver beneath my coat.

I walked straight to the door and went in.

No one was there. That was alive.

I saw Jimson on the floor, his head turned funny and his mouth open. So were his eyes. His blood was all over the floor. He had one hand inside his coat. Probably reaching for a gun.

Sitting in a chair at the table was Muscles. He had his head thrown back, and his mouth was open, like something you were supposed to toss a ball into.

The thin man lay on the floor. He was on his back. He had his hand on his gun, but it wasn't drawn. He had a hole in the center of his forehead, nice and neat, like it was painted there with a paint pen. The back of his head was oozing blood. The place smelled of blood, gunfire, and feces from evacuated bowels.

I took a breath and looked around. No one. I walked over to the counter and looked behind it. Like I expected. Shit Fingers. He was dead too, crumpled on his side with his knees drawn up. His mouth was leaking blood. Blood was splattered on the cigarettes in a rack behind him.

For some reason the only thing I could think was a dedicated smoker could buy those cheap.

Blood. All of it fresh. This had just happened.

I felt the hair on the back of my neck crawl around. I took another deep breath and backed out of there.

58

I went home to get a bigger gun.

I went home to get more than one.

I went home to break into the stash upstairs. A twelve-gauge pump better than the sawed-off, and a .45 automatic pistol. I kept them inside the closet there, behind the opening in the ceiling, up in what served as an attic. Both were cold pieces. There was plenty of plastic-wrapped ammunition up there too.

Sometimes when I thought of those things up there, I felt as if a sleeping dragon were just waiting for me to call it out and use it wrong.

But this time, I was happy. Whoever had wiped out Jimson and his men, and Shit Fingers, they had been the one who shot Leonard. Had to be. Too big of a conincidence otherwise. And I had no reason to doubt that I was next on the list.

This time I couldn't wait to get my hands on those guns, to let the dragon loose.

I was thinking about all that as I drove into my drive, got out carefully, and looked around, Brett's revolver hanging loose in my hand. I thought I heard the icy grass crunch once, but I went still and waited and didn't hear it again. It could have been anything. Ice shifting. A cat or a dog running across the backyard. Anything.

Or nothing.

When I was on the porch I kept Brett's revolver in my right hand and held my keys in the left.

As I was pushing the key in, a voice said, "I wouldn't do that." I dropped and wheeled.

Standing in the yard, wearing a long heavy duster-style coat, was a young woman with long blonde hair. In the glow of the single streetlight at the end of the drive her hair appeared to fall over her shoulders and down the front of her coat like a waterfall of butter. She had a gun in her right hand, and the hand was leveled at me, and I knew before I could even get a shot off, I'd be dead.

It was Vanilla Ride.

59

Once upon a time, Vanilla Ride had been hired to kill me and Leonard. But her employer, one Cletus Jimson, got greedy on the money he owed her for other hits, and decided to hit her together with us instead. It was a cost-cutting plan.

As it worked out, Leonard and I helped her fight them off. There was a lot of gunfire, a lot of blood, and the hit on the hitter failed.

That gave us a connection with Vanilla.

It gave me and her another kind of connection that I can't explain. Not romantic. Brett wouldn't like that, and in the long run, neither would I. But it bonded us. Still, I never really expected to see her again.

Or hoped I wouldn't.

"Hi, Hap," she said, as cheery as if we were meeting for coffee. "So, it was you who shot Leonard."

"Don't be silly. He'd be dead. I'm not here to shoot you. I'm here with a warning."

"What do you mean a warning?"

"I'm not going to shoot you. Not unless I have to. I don't even have a silencer on my gun. I'm not here for business."

I knew she was right. She walked like a ninja and had the aim of Annie Oakley. Had she wanted, she could have killed me and I would never have known she was there. I lowered the revolver by my side, but I didn't put it away.

I said, "I'm not in the mood, Vanilla. You could kill me, maybe. But I might not die so easy."

"Yeah, you would. This is a twenty-two. Not a big caliber. But I can put a bullet where I want to standing this close. I can write my name in bullet fire on your forehead before you hit the ground."

"Yeah," I said. "But I bet you'd have to leave out one of the l's." She smiled.

"What's the warning?" I said.

"Let's start with don't open your door, because if you do, you'll get blown out into the street."

I looked at the door.

"How do you know?"

"I know. I've already checked. But I didn't disarm it. Wanted you to see me do it. I wanted you to know I'm not here to kill you."

"I was here not long ago," I said.

"And they must have been here a few minutes ago," she said. "While you were in No Enterprise looking up Jimson. Don't look so surprised. I passed you as you were going in, stopped by the road getting something out of the trunk. A gun would be my guess."

"Sawed-off. I left it on the seat. Now I wish I hadn't."

Vanilla put her gun away, came up on the porch, turned the key, and unlocked the door. I stepped back off the porch. Way back.

I saw her push the door open ever so slightly. She reached in her coat and took out a little leather parcel. She pulled a small flashlight from it and turned it on and put it in her teeth. She knelt down on one knee and removed something else from the parcel. She used it on something near the bottom of the door. A trip wire I figured. I heard a slight snip, and then another snip.

"Disarmed," she said, and pushed the door open.

Inside, just for safety measures, we turned on the lights and looked through the house. There was a bomb at the back door too.

Vanilla cut some wires like before. She said, "This would have blown you in half. Either one of them. You pushed the door open, it would have pulled the wires, and that would have pulled a trigger. You go boom, baby."

She picked the bomb up and carried it inside and placed it on the kitchen table, which is where she had put the other one. She walked into the living room, looked around. Her coat fell open and one long, black, panted leg poked out. Just for the record, she was wearing what Brett calls sensible shoes, low slung and soft and easy to move in. Even under the circumstances, I couldn't help but note she was breathtakingly beautiful—an evil wet dream with vanilla crème skin, sea blue eyes, and bloodred lipstick.

"Cozy," she said.

We stood across from each other. I still had the revolver in my hand. She said, "You really ought to put your rod away."

I put the revolver in my coat pocket.

"We never seem to meet just to say hi," she said.

"This is only the second time we've met," I said.

"But it was such an exciting meeting."

"Truth is, I don't feel like a lot of chitchat right now."

"Because of Leonard," she said.

I hesitated before I answered. "That's right. How would you know about that? How would you know to check my house for a bomb?"

"I've been watching you. I wasn't watching Leonard. I wasn't sure I was going to warn you. I was here to do it, but I wasn't sure I'd go through with it. I was down the street, parked in a car at the curb when Leonard left. I saw it was him, I stayed. I'm here to protect you, not him. Later, I followed you to the hospital. I figured things out. I know how to ask the right questions at a hospital desk without seeming nosy. I told them I was your sister. They told me whatever I asked."

"How clever of you."

"You and me, we need to sit down on the couch and talk."

"I don't feel all that chatty. Thanks for not letting me get blown up, but I got things to do."

She looked back at the kitchen. "You have anything to drink?"

"Vanilla …"

"No. Really. We need to talk."

60

"So," I said, when we were seated on the couch, "you were just in the neighborhood."

"You don't have any vodka?"

"No. You already asked."

"A beer?"

"Nope."

I had given her a diet soda, and she was sipping it. I was so nervous I was about to vibrate out of the room. She seemed very casual. We had turned off the main lights. She thought it a good idea, in case anyone was watching the house, waiting for it to blow.

The only light on now was the little plastic fish-shaped light plugged into the kitchen outlet over the counter. The light from it stretched into the living room, but it was faint and soft.

"You didn't get blown up, so they'll come back," Vanilla said.

"Are you Devil Red as well as Vanilla Ride?"

"Devil Red," she said. "That's a funny name."

"So is Vanilla Ride."

"That's the name I was given," she said. "Devil Red, that's made up."

"But you know who I'm talking about?"

"I do. And we can use that term if you like."

"Considering you tried to kill me before, you're awfully pleasant."

"I'm always pleasant."

"I've seen you less pleasant."

"Oh, come on, Hap. Let bygones be bygones. We made up, remember."

"We never quarreled. And still, you tried to kill me."

“Killing people for money. It’s what I do.”

“Look, Vanilla, my brother may be dying. Someone shot him. Someone is gonna die if I have my way. If that’s you, or whoever —”

“It’s not me. But it is …” She hesitated as she worked the words around in her mouth. “Devil Red.”

“All right, now I know. I just have to find him.”

She looked at me and smiled faintly. “You’re not up to it, Hap. You’re not up to me.”

“So, why are you here? Tell me where I can find Devil Red, and let me get about my business, up to it or not.”

“Don’t you wonder how I knew you were in trouble?”

“It’s not high on my priority list right now.”

“Let’s put it there. Jimson called me.”

By then, of course, I knew that if she had seen me beside the road, that it was her who had given Jimson a visit. But I didn’t let on. I wanted to hear it from her.

“I thought he was afraid of you,” I said.

“He wanted me and him to be friends. He wanted me to know the whole thing about deciding to have me killed was just business.”

“How’d you take that?” I said.

“I understood his position. I understand business. I would probably have just taken the job he was offering me if it hadn’t been you.”

“Why are you so concerned about my welfare?”

She studied me for a moment. “I seem to be infatuated with you.”

“Me?”

“Go figure.”

“I’m just a middle-aged guy going to seed. What’s the attraction?”

“The same your girlfriend Brett has, I suppose. She’s some looker, Hap.”

“You know about her too?”

“I know all kinds of things about you. I’ve made it a point to know. Once I was supposed to kill you, remember? I did my research.”

“Nothing like research,” I said.

“Jimson, he wanted me to kill you and Leonard. I told him I didn't want to. But not before I went to see him. I was in Shreveport when I got the message through contacts. I was finishing up a little job there. Nicely done, I might add. I told him I'd come see him pretty soon."

"You got close to Jimson pretty easy. I'd have thought he was nervous about that, considering your past."

"He had never seen me before. He just contacted me. He knew how to do that through certain parties. I've known about his habits for over a year. I keep tabs on my old connections, just in case they decide to be trouble. Anyway, I went there, this little station where he spends time. He didn't know me. He saw me. He wanted to know me. That happens to me a lot."

"I bet."

"Why thank you. He had his two bodyguards with him. I sat down. He bought me a cup of coffee, started his hustle. Thought he might get some tail. And then I told him who I was."

"How'd he take it?"

"Surprised. I think he expected me to be huskier. He knew Vanilla Ride was a woman, but he had me pegged different."

"Yeah, you don't look the part. You look more like a James Bond villain."

"That's so sweet. He immediately started saying how trying to have me killed was all business, and could I take care of you and Leonard, since it didn't work out last time. He offered me double. Do you realize how many pounds of dope and how many whores he'd have to run to pay me as much as he offered me?"

"I don't know how much he offered."

Vanilla smiled. When she did, she almost looked like a cherub. "Let's just say it was a lot."

"All right, let's say that," I said. "So how's this story end?"

"Quit pulling my leg, Hap. I said I passed you. You were there. You know how it ends. I told them no, and then I shot them all."

"All of them?"

"You know that too. But, just in case you like to hear it. All of them."

"You shot the thin man first, didn't you?" I said.

"I did. He's the one that actually looked like trouble. But no. He wasn't any trouble at all. He was quick, but I was quicker. Then I shot Jimson, and then I shot the big man with all the muscles. For the hell of it, I shot the guy behind the counter. The coffee he brought me sucked."

"Yeah, coffee there isn't too good," I said. "Didn't that cause a stir, all that shooting?"

"No one else was in the place. Lucky for them. A twenty-two is pretty quiet compared to a larger gun. I didn't have a silencer. I've used them for some guns, but not this one. Doesn't work well on it. Four shots. Four dead, and I was out of there." She sat up straight when she told me that, like a proud girl in class who had just answered a hard question.

"You did that for me?"

"I did it for me. I didn't like him. And I didn't want to shoot you and Leonard. Leonard, maybe. But you, no."

"So you were supposed to come after us for Jimson. And Devil Red is after us because we've been snooping."

"That's pretty much it," she said. "But you got this figured. I can tell the way your eyes light up."

"I know some of it," I said, "but a lot of it is guesswork."

She nodded. "Jimson put Devil Red on you two as well. He wanted me for backup. The whole thing is he wanted me and Devil Red on you guys because you were so hard to kill last time."

"For that I refuse to apologize."

"This time Leonard was easy for Devil Red."

"He dropped his guard," I said. "He had shopping for cookies on his mind."

"He's tough, and so are you, but this isn't his profession, and it's not yours. Me, it's what I do."

"I bet your mother is proud."

"I wouldn't know. Way I think Jimson had it planned is he also hired Devil Red to take me out. I don't think he forgave as easy as he said, business or not. He was scared of me."

"And for good reason."

"He told me to take out Devil Red. So I think he thought he'd get rid of one connection one way or another. If it left Devil Red, not so bad. He didn't have an ugly history there. If it left me, well, he paid me off and he probably thought that would soothe things over between us and he wouldn't be worried about looking over his shoulder for me. He probably thought if Devil Red was out of the picture, that would just be one less connection to him. In time, maybe he thought he'd get me."

“So, I’m not worth as much as you led me to believe. It was a combination job.”

“Pretty much. But still, you and Leonard, you were worth a lot. You can take some pride in that.”

“Oh, goodie. But now Devil Red is after you.”

“The guy that would pay them, he’s not around anymore.”

“Then why bother with me and Leonard?”

“That’s personal. You may have already been on their list, and with you talkin’ to Jimson, and him talkin’ to them, that sealed it. You know, he was quite a talker. I think I made him nervous. He told me all about you and wantin’ to know about Devil Red. The whole nine yards … You know why I didn’t take the job to kill Devil Red?”

“Because you shot the guy who was going to pay you,” I said. She wrinkled her brows. “Well, yeah. There’s that. But also there was this: I didn’t want to kill Devil Red, because I know them.”

“Them?”

“You’ve met them. Mr. Kincaid and his former wife, Ms. Clinton.”

61

I couldn’t have been more surprised if I had just discovered Jesus had sent me a Christmas present of the Holy Ghost with a personal note signed “Love and kisses.”

“The old man and his ex-wife?” I said. “They’re Devil Red?”

“Isn’t that a kick?”

“Can’t be.”

“Can and is. Where do you think I learned my craft?”

“Them?”

“Oh, Hap, you are so cute when your jaw is on the floor. Yes. Them. Let me tell you something. Mr. Kincaid, he looks like hell, but actually, he’s quite spry and doesn’t need the chair or oxygen. Sometimes, garbed up like that, he uses it to get close to people. Who expects an old-looking man in a wheelchair breathing through a tube to be a killer?”

“You’re foolin’ with me, aren’t you?”

“I’d like to fool with you, but no.”

“And my client’s son? His girlfriend’s mother and stepfather. You know anything about that?”

She held up her hand and spread her thumb and forefinger. “Teeny bit,” she said. “Mr. Kincaid and Ms. Clinton have a kind of get them all and poison the well attitude. My guess is Mini’s stepfather—”

“Bert.”

“Whatever. He made a wild guess they were involved, stirred them up, like you did, and they took him out. The mother, she was probably an accident. They tried to kill Leonard. You’re next. I wouldn’t be surprised if they went after your employer.”

“Marvin?”

She nodded. “Maybe your redhead. Anyone associated with you.”

“Did Jimson know Kincaid and Clinton were Devil Red?”

“He didn’t really know who I was. Just my reputation. But he knew how to contact the ones you’re calling Devil Red. And he did. And he contacted me. But did he know Mr. Kincaid and Ms. Clinton were in fact Devil Red? … No.”

“You said Kincaid and Clinton trained you? There’s people who do that? That’s not exactly a college course.”

Vanilla shifted her long legs seductively and leaned forward a little.

“Some people find the job naturally. Others have it thrust upon them. I had it thrust upon me and took to it naturally. I developed my own style, my own way. But they were my mentors. I am who I am, and I have come to embrace it. I’m almost the best there is.”

“Almost?”

“There are my instructors.”

I knew how good Vanilla was, and that made me realize even more what I was up against. I said, “Why would anyone want to raise you to kill?”

“Family business. Though I doubt you could call us a real family. There was never what you would call love, whatever that is. But there was affection of a sort, like you might have for a goldfish, I suppose. I don’t know. Never had a pet. There was also another reason. They were a kind of factory. I wasn’t the only well-trained and well-oiled cog in their machine. There were others.”

“Jesus,” I said.

“He didn’t train there,” Vanilla said. “Once we knew the trade, they hired us out. Male and female. Prostitutes of Death they called us. We got a cut of the kill, and they got the bulk. I didn’t know it was unfair for a few years, us making so little. I was fifteen when I made my first hit. I wasn’t even scared.”

“It didn’t bother you?”

“I didn’t know the man I killed, so no. I’m not sure it would have bothered me if I had known him. Hell, Hap. He could have been my father. He was the right age. I don’t even know why they wanted him killed. It didn’t matter to me.”

I let that soak in. I said, “Kincaid had a second wife, right? What did she think about all this?”

"She was unaware of the business. An airhead. She bore him two children. Ms. Clinton couldn't have children. There was an arrangement. He cared for his wife, but Mr. Kincaid really cared for Ms. Clinton. Maybe it was love. I don't know. I'm a little confused on that issue, Hap. They never really stopped being together. There was a house in town for the wife, and an estate in the country where he and Ms. Clinton spent their time. Where I was trained."

"You call them Mr. and Ms.?"

"That's how I was taught. I can't think of them any other way. But this isn't about me. This is about you, Hap. You and Leonard. Though they may have already punched his ticket. They'll wait and see. Why take an extra chance? It's my bet he never even saw his shooter. They're too good for that. But if he doesn't die, they'll be back to finish the job. And there's you."

"They leave a devil's head at the scene of their murders, staged events. Why? Why leave any indication?"

"Did Picasso sign his work?"

"They see it as an art?" I asked.

"You could say that. So do I. But I don't sign my work. They don't if time and situation doesn't permit. But they are proud of their craft. After years of doing something well, on some level, they want to be recognized, not caught. It was also a way they could challenge anyone trying to discover them. Here's our calling card. Respond if you can."

"So you deserted them at some point."

"Most do. It's the way of the job. They always have a few who live on the grounds. People who protect the place and them. They saw us as their retirement. But they haven't quit. They won't retire."

"No one should be raised to be a killer," I said.

"You could say I was exploited. But it has given me a livelihood. And I am an artist."

"You're a killer, Vanilla. That's all."

"For me it beats being a teacher or a nurse. No offense to your redhead."

"Plenty taken."

I thought I saw her blink when I said that, but it could have been the light.

"And you?" she said.

“What exactly are you?”

“I suppose I’m the same as you.”

She looked at me for a long moment. Her face seemed so soft, her lips so kissable. She was mesmerizing. I sat farther back from her.

“You’re not like me at all, Hap. You’re not even close. For me, there’s no passion in the act. It is what it is, and I do it artistically. That’s what makes me second to them. They are still passionate about their work. And you, you’re no artist and you don’t do it for money. You have reasons, views. I don’t get that.”

“And you’re telling me all this because …?”

“I don’t know really. I feel we have a connection. Do you feel it?”

“I do.”

“What is it exactly?”

I shook my head. “I don’t know. I’m old enough to be your father.”

“Maybe that’s it,” she said.

“I hope not. All I know is, I have to get them. They shot my friend.”

“He means that much to you?” she said, turning her head slightly, as if trying to position herself to believe that idea.

“He does.”

“They’ll kill you.”

“Maybe.”

“They’re better than you,” she said. “I’m better than you.”

“The chips aren’t down yet,” I said.

Vanilla shook her head slowly. “No. It won’t work out for you.”

“Just tell me where to find them and when.”

“I don’t know when, and I won’t tell you where.”

“You think I can’t find out where they live? If I can’t do it myself, I have friends who can. I’ll find them. I’m asking you to speed up matters.”

“I’m not one to betray.”

“They betrayed you,” I said. “They took a child and made a killer. You may not think that matters now, but maybe some part of you knows that isn’t the life you had to have. It can’t be that good a life.”

I watched her face. It revealed nothing.

“It was you who got snookered, baby,” I said. “The fact you came to me means you feel something other than professionalism. And if you think you're helping me by not telling me where they are, all you're doing is giving me a reprieve. They'll get to me eventually. At some point, it'll be me and them."

"Run."

"I'm not into running."

"Man's got to do what a man's go to do, huh?" Vanilla said.

"Something like that. If you're not going to help me, then leave and let me get about my business. And thanks for the warning."

Vanilla set the diet soda can on the coffee table, careful to make it fit into one of Brett's coasters. "Do you have weapons?" she asked.

"Yes."

"They certainly do. And they probably have at least two bodyguards on the grounds. Maybe more. And dogs."

"Dogs."

She nodded. "Yep. And a security camera."

"Oh, good. And do the Mummy and the Wolf Man work for them too?"

"There you're safe."

"That's a relief."

"And consider this. They may or may not be home. If they were here earlier, it would take them almost two hours to go back to the estate. It's on this side of Houston. In the woods. A hundred acres or so. They would be there by now if they went home. But you don't know. It's a gamble."

"What isn't," I said. "You gonna help me, or not?"

"Get a pen and paper," she said, "and I'll draw you a map. But when I do, it's like me signing your death warrant."

62

Not long after that cheery little comment from Vanilla, I had warm clothes on, including a wool cap, the heater turned up, and my foot heavy on the gas pedal. I had a thermos of coffee and a tuna fish sandwich in a plastic bag on the seat beside me. Brett's revolver was holstered on my hip. In the glove box was my .38 Super. In the trunk, the twelve-gauge pump and ammunition for all three weapons. Also there was a toolbox with a pair of snips in it and some other things I needed. I had my clasp knife in my pocket and a roll of breath mints so as not to offend anyone I might want to stab or shoot. Marvin's sawed-off I had left at the house, replaced by my own twelve-gauge. Call me sentimental. I preferred my own gun.

Outside the air was damp with a cold mist, and the highway in the beam of the headlights looked like a ribbon of blue steel. It was late and the road was oddly empty, as if while Vanilla and I talked there had been some kind of apocalypse.

I was still trying to wrap my mind around what Vanilla had told me, and there were parts of my brain that doubted what I heard. For all I knew she was setting me up. But that didn't make a lot of sense. If she wanted me dead, she would have done it. I'd have had a bullet up my ass while I was still trying to find my house key. Not to mention that since she suspected a bomb, she could have just let it go off and they would have found my pecker in a tree the next day. And when I came downstairs from fetching my guns, she was gone, and she had taken the bombs with her.

A tidy cleanup for someone who would want me dead. And if she was using me to take out the competition, so far I wasn't proving to be that good. Neither was Leonard. A bag of crackers and cookies had got him shot, maybe killed, and Vanilla had snuck up on me while I was on my porch about to unlock a door that would have blown me apart.

I decided to believe she was on my side. I also thought maybe she had arrived at the house by means of teleportation. Where was her car? And after she had drawn the map, and I had gathered up my weapons and ammunition, how did she get out and gone so quickly, without making a sound?

That girl was creepy.

No more slacking. No more being distracted. No more feeling sorry for myself. Tonight, I had to be back on my game, like the old days.

I called Brett and asked how Leonard was doing.

"Same ole, same ole," she said. "You on the road, baby?"

"Yes."

"For reasons discussed?" she asked.

"Yes."

"That was quick."

"I had some help."

"Help?"

Brett knew about Vanilla Ride, and what she knew about her she didn't like, so I decided not to mention her.

"I'll tell you about it later," I said. "At some point I'm going to cut off my phone. Not for a while, but in the next couple of hours."

"Be careful," she said.

"Always careful," I said. "Take care of Leonard."

"You'll be back to do it."

I hesitated. "You'll take care of him, right?"

"You know it," she said.

When I finished with Brett, I called Marvin.

"I need you at the hospital. To watch Brett. To make sure she and Leonard are okay. I know I told you to sleep, but—"

"Say no more. I'm on my way."

"Marvin … I know what happened. I know who did it."

"Wait until you're not so steamed up, Hap. You know who it is tonight, you'll know who it is tomorrow, and you can put a plan together. Right now you're acting on anger."

"I am at that."

“Cool some.”

“Now’s the time,” I said.

“Tomorrow we can get Jim Bob. Me. My leg is better. I’m sort of up to it now.”

“No you’re not.”

“You’re gonna hurt my feelin’s, Hap.”

“Right now I don’t have room for that, my friend. I’m tellin’ it like it is. You’re not up to it, and I’m not waiting. And I don’t want to pull you or Jim Bob or anyone else into this. At least not directly. This is goddamn personal. And they don’t expect me to come to them. That’s the only edge I got. That and knowing you’re there with Brett and Leonard.”

“Who are they?” Marvin asked. “Who are them?”

“I told a certain someone that if I didn’t come back, they were to let you know what happened.”

“Who’s that certain someone?”

“You’ll know if I don’t come back.”

It was a promise Vanilla had made me before I went upstairs to get the guns. If I didn’t come back, she’d let Marvin and Brett know, warn them that Devil Red would be after them. I hoped they were smarter than me. I hoped they’d take Vanilla’s advice and run. I hoped she would keep her word. I was pretty certain she would.

Marvin said, “You sound a little dramatic.”

“I feel a little dramatic,” I said.

I heard Marvin sigh. “You doing something like whatever the hell you’re doing, and Leonard not being there … Man, that don’t seem right. I can’t think of one of you without the other. It’s like Siamese twins have been halved.”

“Tell me about it,” I said.

63

It had started to snow. Real snow. Highly unusual for East Texas. The flakes were huge, like cotton balls. Normally snow in this area was little more than flakes that barely stuck and lasted about as long as it took to melt one on your tongue. If I hadn't been on a mission to blow people's brains out, I might have enjoyed its uniqueness and beauty. Right now, it was nothing more than a hindrance.

I wasn't far from where I wanted to go. There was a rest stop nearby and I pulled in there and tried to eat the sandwich because I thought I was crazy hungry, but it just turned out I was crazy scared. I drank a cup of coffee, slowly, because my hands were trembling. I turned on my overhead light and looked at the map Vanilla had drawn on a piece of paper. I studied it. I was close. I was very close. I turned off the light and sat and thought, and it seemed as if the trees in the roadside park were drawing nearer to me, as if the darkness between them were gathering together into something solid and demonic, trimmed in snow and ice.

I squeezed my eyes shut, and then opened them. I didn't look at the trees.

I poured another cup of coffee and tried to work my courage up as I sipped it.

My cell phone rang.

I almost jumped out of my skin.

It was Brett.

"He's slipping," she said.

"Oh, shit," I said. I felt the bit of sandwich I had eaten churn in my stomach and nearly rise up.

"Hap, I'm so sorry. They don't think he'll make it through the night.”

“Goddamn it! Goddamn it to hell!”

“They let me in to see him. They said I could come in because I’m all that’s here. I shouldn’t have told you to go. Oh, shit, Hap. I never thought he’d die.”

“He isn’t dead yet.”

“I held his hand. I told him you were taking care of things. I told him we loved him. Marvin is here. He’s out in the waiting room.”

“I told him to watch over you,” I said.

“He has a gun under his coat. And he gave me one. But really, a shootout in the hospital?”

“I’m just being cautious … So the doctor said … no hope?”

“Just said he was slipping away.”

“Tell Leonard I have his hat.”

“What?”

“Whisper in his ear. Tell the big bastard I have his deerstalker, and if he wants it back, he’ll have to take it from me. Tell him, he dies, I’ll shit in it. You tell him that.”

Brett laughed a little. It was strained, but it was a laugh.

“I’ll tell him. If he can hear me, he’ll come back just to kick your ass.”

“Right now I’d let him. You go back in there, and you take Leonard’s hand, and tell him his brother loves him. You hear me? You tell him that again. And you tell him what I said about his hat.”

“I will,” she said.

“I’m gone,” I said. “And so is the phone.”

I turned off the phone. I rolled down the window and tossed the coffee from the cup and threw the cup on the floorboard and sat for a moment. My stomach was really churning now. I got out of the car quickly and walked around back of it and upchucked the sandwich and the coffee. It burned my throat.

“Leonard. Don’t you die,” I said out loud.

I got back in the car and got a Kleenex out of the glove box and wiped my lips. I tossed out the sandwich. I put a few of the breath mints in my mouth to kill the vomit taste. I pulled away from the rest stop onto the highway.

Devil Red, I’m coming.

64

There was a little logging road, and according to Vanilla it went down behind Kincaid and Clinton's property. I took it, bumped along, almost got stuck a couple of times, made my way to where the road stopped amid what looked like the results of a nuclear strike but was in fact the end product of logging. In the moonlight, I could imagine the snow as nuclear ash, all the world dead and turned to powder.

Off to the south, that myth dissolved. The woods were thick there. Out there without lights, the moon behind cloud cover, all I could see were vague tree shapes, nature's own palisades rising thick and wild against the dark sky.

I got out with the .38 Super and my flashlight and went crunching over the frozen leaves and pine needles to the trunk of the car and opened it up, removed the shotgun, and laid it on the roof. I opened the toolbox, got the snips, and removed a little strap-on headlight like the kind you use to read in bed so as not to wake up your partner. I turned it on and slipped it over the wool cap on my head. It wasn't a big light, but it was a good enough light. I turned off the flashlight and put it in my coat pocket. I got a machete from the toolbox and the ammunition out of the trunk and stuffed my pockets with it. I made sure I had the Super's spare ammo clips where I could get to them quickly. The shotgun had a strap, so I slung it over my shoulder.

I took a pee.

I picked up a wad of snow and made a snowball in my gloved hand and threw it at a stump of a tree. I missed.

I hoped that wasn't an omen.

I was ready as I was going to be.

Way Vanilla had explained it, I had to go through the woods there, had to find my own trail, of which there were a few, and if I kept going south, I'd come to the high wall that led to the grounds of the estate. How to get over the wall was another matter, but Vanilla felt that since there were high woods on my side of the wall, on property other than their own, the logging company's property, I could maybe find access that way.

I didn't think that far ahead. If I did I'd turn around whimpering and head back to the car.

I tried several times to find a path but couldn't. The woods were thick and dead winter vines were twisted up between the trees like ancient fencing. Worse, I was no longer exactly sure which way was south. It was too damn dark, and among the trees I couldn't see anything but the whiteness of the snow and the occasional glare of moonlight on dangles of ice.

I made an attempt to follow my instincts, knowing full well that could get me in deep doo-doo, but I went ahead with it.

Hacking my way through the undergrowth, following the little beam of my head-strap light, I fought my way forward. At some point, I came upon a path through the trees and I followed that. It finally veered off to the right. I reluctantly abandoned it and started hacking again. I kept moving forward, inch by inch. I figured by the time I got through this mess and arrived, it would be two weeks from Tuesday.

Even in the cold weather, wearing all those clothes and hacking away, I was steamed and had to pause to cool it. I opened my coat and leaned against a tree. I was glad Leonard and I had been doing more workouts as of late. I had dropped a few pounds and my wind was better. Still, I was tired.

I reached up and turned off the head-strap lamp, leaned against the tree in darkness. I thought about Leonard. I thought about how long I had known him. I thought about all we had gone through. Here I was in the deep woods hacking through twisted dead winter vines and brush, and he was lying up in the hospital without me. That didn't seem right.

For a moment I considered going back, driving to the hospital to be with him. But then I thought about what Devil Red had done. I thought about how I had been sympathetic toward their killing of those who hurt their loved ones. And then I thought about what they had done to Vanilla and so many others, made them Prostitutes of Death. I was better than they were. I was much better.

I reached up and turned the light on again, and started forward.

In a very short time I saw a glow ahead of me. It was faint and blurry in the misty night. As I neared, I realized it was not a small light, but a large light that spread to my left and right, and that it was shining between the trunks of the trees. I kept going, and finally came to a thinning of the pines and saw a wall ahead of me. It was at least twenty feet high. The light was seeping over it.

Okay.

Now we separate the men from the mice.

Squeak. Squeak.

65

I walked along the edge of the barricade, feeling like a Mongol considering how to make it over the Great Wall and into China. I finally found what Vanilla suggested. A tree that grew with limbs close to the wall.

But not that close.

Kincaid and Collins kept the limbs pretty well trimmed off their side. I'd have to climb the tree and jump to the wall, and then drop down on the other side. The trick then, according to Vanilla, was to move along a certain line of trees, and then onto a long open veranda. All of this was in a blind spot for the camera. Then I had to snip a certain wire in a certain hidden place just inside the foyer, and then I had to get in, all of this without the dogs or the guards or the camera seeing me. Then I had to kill two of what she said were the greatest assassins alive, and once that was done, all that was left was to sneak out and go over the wall without being shot by the guards or having being torn apart by the dogs. Piece of cake.

I turned off my headlight, slipped the machete in a scabbard on my belt, started up the tree, which was a kind of sickly pine coated in a light casing of ice that crackled as I went. Snow drifted down on me, both from the sky and from where it had gathered on limbs. With me in my heavy coat and with the shotgun strapped on my back, I kept getting hung up, and I kept slipping on the ice, but finally I made it without falling, nestled on a limb, and gathered myself.

I was high enough up I could see over the wall. There were lights there, most of them closer to the house. There was a huge brick estate with a long veranda and a sloping roof nestled in the center of some open land. There was a line of thick-limbed trees that ran from the wall toward the house, but ended some thirty or forty feet before they got there. Everything was covered in snow.

I began to think Vanilla was way right. I was in over my head. I was having a hard enough time getting over the wall, let alone going into the house and killing Devil Red—the both of them.

Finally, I felt rested enough to scoot out to the edge of the limb, and just as I was trying to get up on it to jump, it broke, and I fell.

I lay on the ground for a long time. I had landed with the shotgun strapped to my back, so that didn't help matters either. I felt as if it had been driven into my back. The fall knocked the breath out of me and I lay there trying to get it back. I felt like the Oz Scarecrow with the stuffing pulled out. Only colder.

I was off to an excellent start, if I was a comedian.

Eventually, I felt strong enough to stand. I looked up at the tree. The limb had been my best access, and now it was gone. I went down the fence row again, this time in the direction closer to the shrubs, looking for a new way over, and finally came upon a sweet gum tree with a limb that projected just over the wall and hadn't been recently trimmed.

The problem was there were few limbs until you got up about ten feet, so I had to climb using the pressure of my palms and the soles of my shoes. The tree was damp and it was no easy business. By the time I got to the first limb I could reach, I felt on the verge of a rupture. I got hold of the limb, swung up, and sat on it for a moment. I was much closer to the line of shrubs here. I could see them through the cluttered boughs of the leaf-stripped, snow-coated tree.

I had too much stuff on me, and that was making it hard to move along, so with reluctance, I removed the machete and dropped it on the ground. I crawled out on the limb. It dipped slightly, like a horse nodding for me to get off. The wall was festooned with barbed wire and sharp pieces of metal and broken glass that had been imbedded in the cement when it was drying. Vanilla said there was a camera, but the trees had grown large and bushy and would hide someone from sight if they came over the wall in line with them.

I was in line with them.

I eased out farther on the limb, near to its thinning tip, and that made me nervous. It was long enough that with my weight on it, it dipped over the wall. I grabbed hold of the limb and swung out, catching my pants on the glass in the wall, but only slightly. I dropped to the ground inside the compound and went down on one knee, giving things a look. The wet ice and snow came through my pants and made my knees numb.

I went at a crouch along the line of trees, and if Vanilla was right, out of camera shot. My back ached from the fall. I felt a little light-headed. Either not enough food. Too much activity. Being scared. Or a combination of all three. Fortunately, I didn't have to go number two, so I had that going for me.

66

I had only gone a few feet when I found a dead Doberman. It lay just inside the shadow of the trees, right before they broke and there was that space between them and the house.

I bent down and touched it. It was warm, and it was bloody. Bending over, I clicked on my headlight and took a look. A bullet most likely. Right through the front right chest. From the way the ground looked, the snow creased and bloody, I knew the dog had dragged itself here and died.

I clicked off the light, sat there thinking.

A thought crossed my mind. One I couldn't hold on to with any conviction, but it was there. I decided to let it go, and to move on. I hadn't come this far to turn around and go back over the wall.

I moved to the end of the trees, stopped, and bent down and studied the gap between where I was and the veranda. As Vanilla had said, it was well lit, except right at the corner closest to me. Presumably, if what Vanilla knew about the place was the same, there wasn't an angle there that accommodated a camera. All I had to do was make a straight run into the shadows, and then, if she was right, pull myself into an indention in the wall and gather my wits, which might take a lot more time than I had available. After that, I had to move quickly, and then it was assholes, elbows, and hot ammunition.

I was about to lunge forward, and then I saw him.

He was just to the front of the veranda. A big man. A very big man. Lying on the snow-covered lawn. A rifle of some sort lay on the snow beside him. I had an idea he hadn't stopped to put his ear to the ground to hear the sweet vibrations of the earth. He was one of the bodyguards, and I was more than certain he was as dead as Abraham Lincoln; and if not, he was close enough to being dead to see Lincoln's ghost. Like with the Doberman, the snow around him was coated red.

I went across the stretch and made the edge of the veranda, and slid up against the wall. The dark indention was there, as Vanilla said. I slipped into it and caught my breath. I didn't know for a fact that the trees and that space between them to the veranda was in a camera blind, or even that I was in one now, but I had to play it that way.

I took the wire snips out of my coat pocket, and turned to where I was supposed to be able to reach through a gap and cut a wire that hooked to the camera, and another that hooked to the alarms. Snapping on my headlight, I saw there was indeed a gap, and that it was some sort of flaw in design. The concrete should have come together in that spot, but it didn't. I could get my hand in there, inside a large storage room, and flip open the little metal door that held the alarm system without any trouble, but when I flicked it open with the tip of the wire snips, the wires were already cut. I snapped off the headlight. I pulled out Brett's little revolver and moved along the veranda wall as far away from the lights as possible.

I came to the door lock Vanilla said I'd have to pick, and as I figured, the door was already cracked open.

I slipped in, held the revolver at the ready with two hands. I didn't always shoot with two hands. I had learned to shoot the Wild West way when I was a kid, and I never dropped it completely. It's not as accurate, but I can hit pretty much what I shoot at, provided it's in range and not moving too damn fast.

It was dark inside the house and I couldn't tell where I was going at first, so I just squatted down and let my eyes adjust to the shadows. I didn't turn on the little head-beam light, knowing if I did, all I was doing was giving them a little spot target on my forehead. I squatted there with my back against a wall trying not to breathe too loud. After a few minutes I could see better in the dark, make out shapes. It was all furniture as far as I could tell. Rising up, I moved across the floor with the revolver at the ready.

I stopped when a voice said, "Don't move."

67

"Jesus Christ, Vanilla," I said. "You damn near made me mess myself."

"Better than a bullet in the head," she said. "Be quiet."

She took me by the sleeve and pulled me over to a space behind a stack of boxes.

"Why?" I said.

"Now's not the time," she said. "I decided to go in with you, and right now, that's all you need to know. My take is if they have one dog outside, now dead, there might be one inside. They used to always have two. My other take is the guy in the yard isn't the only one. He was making the perimeter as I arrived. He didn't see me, but I decided it was best he go. It's best they all go."

"How many is all?" I said.

"We'll determine that as we continue. This storage room leads into a large room. The training room. That'll be our first stop. And good luck. You'll need it."

"Thanks for boosting my spirits."

"Put the pistol in your pocket, and use the shotgun. Go for heavy firepower if that's what you got."

We went out from behind the boxes and across the room, Vanilla leading the way. She moved smooth and silent as a ghost, and when we came to the double-wide doors that led into the big room beyond, we could see light through the cracks and at the bottom of it.

Vanilla spoke so that I could hardly hear her: "Ready."

"Yes," I said.

She grabbed the door handle and turned it briskly and threw the door wide. There was a guy in there, a big guy, blond-headed, handsome like a movie star. But unlike a movie star he had a real gun and it was in a shoulder holster. He was sitting at a table with a deck of cards in his hands. When the door popped back, his head snapped around, and when he saw us standing there, he turned in his chair and went for his gun, and while I was still trying to lift mine, Vanilla shot him. Her gun coughed through the silencer, like a patient in a doctor's office with a finger up his ass. The man in the chair fell back and his feet went up and a spray of blood went up with him. In that moment, a man, the dead man's card-playing partner, came out of a small room off to the side, zipping up his pants. He saw us. Vanilla shot him through the chest while he still had hold of his zipper.

She stopped by the man who had been in the chair and looked at him. He wasn't going to wake up and brush himself off. She went over to the other, and I followed after, like a puppy learning from a smarter dog. The man on the floor moaned once, opened one eye, and looked at her. She shot him through the head.

The rest of it was like a bad dream. We cruised quickly across the floor and to the double doors across the way, and Vanilla opened them without hesitation, not loudly, but not like she was still being sneaky. As she opened it, the sounds of popping hit our ears briskly. A moment later, I knew the source of the sounds.

We had stepped into it up to our necks.

It was a large long room, and there were targets at the far end, and there were four shooters taking practice on them. Three men and a woman, all young. When we stepped into the room, they turned.

And so did their guns.

I moved left and Vanilla moved right. I cut down with the shotgun and blasted the girl in her middle. She went back and down and her gun went sliding across the floor. There were two coughs to my right and two men dropped, and I let loose with the twelve-gauge again, and the last man lost his face.

"We've made enough noise," Vanilla said, "so from here on out, it has to happen fast."

There was a hallway, and it oddly split left and right. She went right without saying a word to me, walking very fast in her sensible shoes. I went left, walking less fast in one of the two pairs of shoes I owned.

I walked with the gun before me. The hallway was narrow and the walls were drab olive, or appeared that way in the near dark. There was some light from little runners near the floor. The hall went on for a long time and then it curved ever so slightly. Eventually, the hall opened up into a circular room. The room was dimly lit and there were martial arts mats on the floor. There were more mats stacked to one side, about five feet high, and across the way was an open door.

A young woman, perhaps twenty, came through the door at a rapid walk. Her long hair was tied back and looked orange in the light. She had on a bulky sweatshirt and sweatpants. She had a gun by her side. She was obviously on a mission, and that mission was me. That shotgun of mine had made so much noise I might as well have been a one-man band.

She lifted her gun with calm deliberation and fired. I was already moving, but the hair on the left side of my head fanned a little. The bullet couldn’t have missed me by more than a micro fragment. It made a sound softer than Vanilla’s gun; it too was silenced. I fired twice, quickly, as I dodged, the reverberation of the shotgun loud in the room.

But she was moving too. She moved like Vanilla moved. Both my shots missed, and as she fired again, I rolled, hit the matted floor, and came up behind the high stack of mats, crouching. The stuffing inside them poofed out as the silencer sneezed again.

I scurried on hands and knees farther behind the mats and put my back against the wall, about middle ways, so I could see both ends of the stack and above. The way the light overhead was set, I could see her shadow fanning around on the floor. She was climbing at a crouch over the top of the mats and was going to be above me, shooting down.

I ducked to the left of the mats, so low I was almost duckwalking, moved as quietly and quickly as possible. I glanced back at her shadow as she rose out of her crouch and was near the edge of the mats, where she expected me to be.

I stepped out from the mats in a nice noiseless move that would have impressed a mouse, lifted the shotgun just as she realized she’d been snookered and was turning to find me. I shot up and hit her in the chest. She made a noise like I had punched her and went off the mat and hit the floor with a loud thump. I couldn’t see her, but I knew I had hit her good. I went around the edge of the mats and saw her lying on the floor on her back, her head propped against the wall. She still had the gun. Her face looked odd in the light. She way trying to figure who in the hell I was. Her brow was covered in sweat. Her lips were tightly clenched together. She was leaking blood all over the place. I could see where her sweatshirt had been ripped and riddled by the blast. She had her gun pointed at me. Her legs were spread out in front of her in a loose manner that made them seem as if they belonged to someone else, just borrowed for the occasion. She had a clear shot. I was about to cut down on her again, and then she lowered the gun. It lay across her lap. Her eyes were looking at me. It took me a moment before I realized she wasn't seeing anything. I didn't move for a brief moment, just stood there with my gun pointed at her. She had been an attractive kid.

"Okay," I said. "That's how it tumbles. That's how it goes."

I was startled to discover I was speaking out loud.

68

I went through the open doorway the woman had passed through and slinked along a wide corridor that was drop-dead dark at the end. I felt like I was walking into a gun barrel and someone was about to pull the trigger.

For a moment I thought about turning on my light, but figured I was outlined enough on my end without giving them a bull's-eye. I went along nervous and listening. I wasn't listening well enough, because there was movement to my right, and in that moment I realized there was an open doorway and someone was coming out of it. I turned and a shot flared the darkness, and in the flash of the gun, I saw a face.

It was Kincaid; in the brief flash of the gun he looked like a living mummy.

I swung the shotgun barrel around and caught him up alongside the head, heard his gun hit the floor and slide. But the next instant, he was twisting the barrel of the shotgun up, and it was coming out of my hands.

Moving in quick, I kicked him in the groin, and then we struggled over the shotgun. It came loose of both our hands and flew behind me and hit the wall and clattered to the floor.

Something winked in the dark and then I felt a smooth motion like the page of a book brushing across my hand, and then I felt the sting. I had been there before. A knife. I skipped backward, tried to get the pistol out of my pocket, but he was on me too fast. I made a kind of horseshoe bend as the knife passed in front of me. I felt it tug at my shirt and hit the edge of my coat as it flared wide. There was a noise as something hit the floor.

I was able to see better now, as my eyes had adjusted. I kicked the inside of his leg, and he went down on one knee. I gave him an uppercut to the chin, but he dodged it. The sonofabitch could see like an owl.

I reached in my coat pocket; it was wide open at the bottom. The knife had cut it at some point, and the damn revolver had fallen out, and that's what I had heard hitting the floor. I was scuttling backward as he came, and finally I got the clasp knife out of my pocket and snapped it open.

Seeing well enough now, I slapped a stab aside by hitting his wrist, and cut down across his forearm. Or tried to. He slapped it down and brought his knife up, and I just moved in time to keep from catching it in the throat.

He sliced again, inward, and I parried it and cut down again, this time hitting him across the arm. He let out with a hissing sound, and kicked my feet out from under me. He leaped on top of me, and I caught his knife arm and locked my legs around him. I tried to stab him, but he had hold of my wrist.

I twisted so that my blade cut him. He let go and sprang off me and tried to cut my leg, but I avoided it and he kicked up at me. I felt the knife hit my shoe.

Now we were both on our feet again. He came slashing right and left, but keeping it tight. Filipino knife work was his game, and he was good at it. Better than me. I tried to take him with a straight stab, and he disarmed me, cutting the back of my hand in the process. Weaponless, I stepped back, and my foot came down on something, and I nearly slipped.

I knew what it was. The revolver. He lunged at me. I dropped down and his thrust went where I had been. I snatched up the revolver and tossed myself on my back and fired. The shot lit up the room, but it didn't stop him. He came at me slashing. I scuttled backward. I fired again, and still he kept coming.

He leaped on me. I couldn't get a shot off. His knife made a hard thunking noise, and then he quit moving. I crawled out from under him. His knife was stuck in the floor and he was lying facedown. I turned on my head beam and kicked him over on his back.

He had taken my shots, and I saw too that I had cut him more than I thought. He may have looked like a scarecrow, but he was tough. I kicked him in the ribs a couple of times to make sure he was dead.

He didn't move. I turned to pick up the guns and the knife, and that's when he jumped on my back.

His arm went around my throat and he started choking. It was a good choke. He was shutting off the arteries. I was about to go out. I pressed in on his elbow, pressing his arm tight to my neck, just the opposite of what you might think you should do. It opened enough space on the other side, though, that the blood started to flow and I started to regain my wits. I bent down and then sprang up, and he went over my hip. When he landed, I came down on top of him, straddling his chest, and I crashed my forearm into his throat.

Once.

Twice.

Three times.

I could feel something give in his throat. He stopped struggling.

I still had my head beam on, and was still straddling him. He appeared to be a hundred years old, and at a glance skinny and weak. I knew better than that, though. He had been wiry and strong and skilled. I had been better. Or luckier.

I got up quickly and carefully. This time I wanted to be sure it was done. I found the revolver and put it in my belt, the knife in my pocket, picked up the shotgun without turning my back on Kincaid.

I went over and looked at him again.

In the light, I could see he was still breathing. He was alive still. He was a regular Rasputin.

I felt sorry for him for a moment, then I thought he was maybe the one who shot Leonard. Either him or his partner, the ex-wife.

I lifted up the shotgun and pointed it at his head, and let it go. You couldn't have told much about how he had looked after that. The hallway stank of gunfire and blood.

I moved on through the dark toward the end of the hall, the headlight on, not worrying about it anymore. Whatever came, came.

69

There were lights now, and large rooms, and I turned off the pointless headlight and went through several of the rooms until I came to a half-open door with a man on his knees, his forehead pressed to the wall.

He had fallen there. He was a large man. There was blood all down his shirt and all over the floor in a fresh wet pool. He had never known what had hit him.

There was another hallway. I went down quickly, and when I came to the end of it, there was a door slightly cracked, and there was light coming out of it. I eased over and touched the door gently, moved it aside.

Looking in, I saw Vanilla Ride squatted on her haunches, the silenced automatic in her gloved hand. Across from her, lying on the floor, her head against a couch, a hand held to her blood-gurgling throat, was Clinton. Her eyes darted toward me. She coughed and blood squirted from between her fingers. There was a little automatic lying on the floor not far from her free hand. Her fingers curled toward it, like a dying spider, but nothing more. A Doberman lay on the floor nearby. Dead, of course.

Vanilla turned her head and looked at me. She said, “You can finish her if you want. If you think it’ll make you feel better.”

I shook my head.

I felt empty standing there watching that woman die. Right then, it didn’t matter to me what she had done. Had I come upon her first, I would have shot her myself, no doubt, but now, looking at the life ease out of her, I just felt confused.

Clinton glanced at Vanilla. She tried to say something. It sounded like “why.”

“Why not?” Vanilla said. Her gun hand flicked up and the silenced weapon made a tubercular noise. Clinton’s body jerked a little. A red spot appeared on her forehead, and whatever muscles were holding her head against the couch released and she rolled over on her face. The blood pooled beneath her. A pool of urine soaked out of her and its smell was rich with ammonia.

Vanilla stood. She looked at me. I can’t describe what I was seeing there, but in that moment she looked much older and stranger and dangerous, a visitor from someplace far beyond Mars.

She said, “Done, and done.”

70

We searched through the house, looked in all the rooms, all the nooks and crannies. There was no one left. We went out the way we had come in and stopped on the veranda in sight of the dead man in the yard. It had grown bitter cold and the snow was turning hard.

“You lied to me,” I said. “You said you wouldn’t get involved.”

Vanilla put her gun inside her coat and looked at me. “I didn’t know I was getting involved until I started drawing that map for you. Jimson, like I said, that was personal.”

“I presume the map you gave me isn’t really the easiest way for me to get here, is it?”

“I gave you quite a trial, didn’t I?”

“You think I’d give up and go home?”

“I thought if I gave you the long and hard way here, I’d get here first, in plenty of time. Still, I didn’t want you not to be a part of it. I wanted you to know it was done.”

A part of me wished I had been late. From what I could see, she hadn’t needed me at all.

“What made you do it?” I said.

She looked at me like that was a question that didn’t immediately compute. Finally, she said, “I don’t know. I learned a lot in that big room back there so long ago, the one with the mats. I learned how to fight and use a knife, ice pick, most anything I could lay my hands on. There’s also a gun range farther in. Everything nice and padded and silent. There’s also a bedroom that wasn’t my room and it wasn’t their room. You didn’t see it. It’s a large room, and it’s silent too. I learned a lot there from Mr. Kincaid.”

“I’m sorry, Vanilla.”

“All part of the drill, I suppose. The males got the same.”

“I’m still sorry.”

“I suppose I had to close things out. I believe that’s why I came, more than for you.”

“How do you feel?” I said.

“Just the same.”

“What now?”

“I’ll show you to my car, drive you around to yours, and we go our separate ways.”

“I mean what now for you?”

She shrugged and started walking across the yard. I slung the shotgun strap over my shoulder, followed, our feet crunching on the snow-covered grass. We went out through the open front gate and I swung the shotgun off my shoulder, and we got in her black Volkswagen Beetle. The one I had passed when I drove over to No Enterprise and found Jimson and his goons.

Vanilla had merely driven straight up the drive and gone inside. I don’t know how she had gotten through the gate. Maybe it was open. Maybe she knew a code. After that, it had been easy. Drop the guard and the dog, and then I showed up. I’m sure she had answers to those questions, but at that point in time, I didn’t really care.

As she started up the Volkswagen, I said, “I thought you were like James Bond till I saw this car. Does it have machine guns in the headlights?”

“It’s maneuverable and dependable,” she said. “Just like me. Did I ever tell you how maneuverable I am?”

“It’s best I don’t hear,” I said, and she wheeled us out of there.

71

When we stopped at my car, Vanilla turned slightly in the seat, said, “You could go with me.”

“You know I can’t do that.”

“You can.”

“All right. I can. But I won’t.”

“The redhead?”

“That’s some of it, yes.”

“And Leonard.”

“Yep.”

Vanilla nodded. She smiled. “I don’t know, Hap. I don’t understand it. Why they mean so much to you.”

“I don’t think I can explain it.”

“There’s another thing I don’t understand.”

“What’s that?” I asked.

“Why am I attracted to you?”

“It’s the way I dress.”

“Hardly,” she said.

As I put a foot outside the door, Vanilla said, “You ever been to Europe?”

“No.”

“Italy is a wonderful country,” she said. “Beautiful people. The best food you can imagine. Scenery that has to be seen to be believed.”

“You go there often?”

“I’ve never been to Italy. But I’ve read about it.”

“You believe everything you read?”

“Only when I want to. The money I got, I don’t need to do anything anymore but lie on a beach in a bikini somewhere and soak up the sun. I might just retire there. Maybe you could come see me?”

“All I can say is I owe you one,” I said.

“Oh, that was a freebie. That wasn’t for anybody but myself. I didn’t feel good or bad about it before, but now, sitting here, I’m starting to get the warm fuzzies. I liked the way Ms. Clinton looked when I shot her. Lean over here.”

I did. She kissed me gently and quickly on the lips.

“Our secret,” she said.

I didn’t know what to say to that.

I got out of the car with my shotgun and she backed around and was gone.

72

Vanilla should have been everything I detested in a human being, a stone killer with the conscience of a fly, but there was no denying I felt something for her. I didn't know exactly what it was. But I felt it. And she felt it back. But then again, who was I to hate someone for being a killer?

I drove back to LaBorde through a bad storm mixed with rain and snow and a vision of that young girl's face, the one I had killed in the mat room. She was just a kid. I told myself if I hadn't killed her she would have killed me. I told myself she was being trained to kill others for money. For all I knew she might have been the one who shot Leonard. There wasn't any certainty Devil Red, the two of them, or either of them had done the shooting. And if it wasn't that young woman, someday it would be, for someone.

I arrived drained and exhausted at the hospital. It was way past visiting hours, but when I got upstairs I found Brett and Marvin in the waiting room. Brett had found a blanket and was curled up in a chair asleep. Marvin sat beside her, wide awake. He nodded at me as I came in, put a finger to his lips. We went outside the waiting room to a few chairs along the wall. We sat down.

"How's Leonard?" I said.

"Better."

I sighed with relief.

"Not out of danger yet," Marvin said. "But better."

"Good," I said.

"Did you find them?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Did you take care of them?"

"Vanilla Ride took care of them mostly. I took care of some of it.”

“Vanilla Ride? Our Vanilla Ride?”

“How many of them could there be?” I said.

“I’ll be damned,” Marvin said.

I told him all about it, everything Vanilla had told me, how it had all gone down.

He sat for a while when I finished. “So it was like Brett thought, Devil Red killed all those people for revenge. Twilla too?”

“Maybe. And then Leonard and I fell into their line of fire.”

Marvin considered for a moment. “They most likely arranged the hit on Godzilla in prison, don’t you think?”

“It’s possible,” I said. “They decided to kill us all, symbolically salt the earth. They couldn’t get rid of their grief any other way. And I doubt that did it.”

“What amazes me is to think they actually cared that much for their children, considering what they were, what they did to Vanilla,” Marvin said.

“I think for them it wasn’t child molestation or abuse in the way we think of it. I mean it comes down to the same thing, but I think for them it was just business. They were sharpening the tools of their business by making them willing and moldable. When Kincaid was away from there he was an accountant, a husband to his airhead wife, and a father to his children, who he loved. One life had nothing to do with the other.”

“That’s what you call compartmentalization,” Marvin said.

“Yeah, I suppose it is.”

“How do you feel?” he asked.

“My hand won’t quit shaking. I got a few minor wounds, but that’s what surprises me the most. In all the gunfire and knifing, I didn’t get a serious wound. Worst thing I got was back pain from falling out of a tree. Thing I’m wondering is how we tell Mrs. Christopher that the job is done without telling her how it was done, and without getting our dicks in a crack.”

“That’s my job,” Marvin said. “I’ll find a way to satisfy her without telling her everything. There’s some things she doesn’t need to know. Do you think you’ll see Vanilla again?”

“I don’t want to. She makes me nervous.”

At that moment, Brett came out of the waiting room and came over to me and grabbed me before I could stand and hugged me. I kissed her near her ear. She was crying. She fell into my lap.

“My God, I thought that was you I heard talking,” she said.

She kissed me several times. I wiped away her tears. I hugged her tight. I looked at Marvin, said, “You should go home, friend.”

“Yeah,” he said. “I should. Call me if there’s any news.”

He stood and clapped his hand on my shoulder. I reached up and touched it. “Thanks.”

“Don’t mention it.”

We went back in the waiting room, and I told her all I had told Marvin.

“I don’t know how I feel about Vanilla Ride,” Brett said. “You’re my man.”

“You know it,” I said.

“Really now,” Brett said. “How pretty is she?”

“She’s all right.”

“Hap.”

“Okay. She’s real pretty.”

“Hap.”

“All right, goddamn it,” I said. “She’s stunningly beautiful.”

“Okay,” she said, “that’s enough.”

73

The next morning we got word that Leonard was out of the woods, and though not ready to see visitors, much better. We decided to go home and have breakfast and get some sleep.

About noon we woke up and made love, and when we were finished, we were ravenous. We ate a quick lunch and went to the hospital. We found Rogers, Leonard's surgeon. He took us into the waiting room, where we were the only ones present. He said, "I can't figure Mr. Pine. He not only should have died in that parking lot, he shouldn't be awake and feeling as well as he is. He's not going to jump up and run a marathon or anything, but he's doing miraculously well."

"Can we see him?" Brett asked.

"Shortly," Rogers said.

About an hour later we were allowed into ICU to see him. I had hoped to have his deerstalker to wear, just to pick at him, but I didn't. I guess the cops had it.

We sat in chairs on opposite sides of the bed. We each held one of his hands. He looked rough, but he had his color back, and that wicked look in his eyes.

"So, you're gonna shit in my hat," he said, looking at me.

"You actually heard that?" Brett said.

"Yeah," Leonard said. "I wanted to answer, but couldn't. I was a little under the weather."

"I'll say," I said.

"You know," Leonard said, "bullets hurt."

"Yeah. Well, you know our motto."

"If the dick's intact, we're all right."

"That's the one"

"You're sitting funny, Hap."

"I fell out of a tree."

"Ha," Leonard said, and then licked his dry lips. "Did anyone call John?"

I felt a little ashamed. "No," I said.

"Good. I don't want him to see me like this. I don't want any goddamn sympathy from him. He comes back, I want him to come back because of the right reasons. Not because I got myself shot."

"Your surgeon said it was small caliber, and your muscle tone had a lot to do with your survival," I said. "You know what really surprises me, though?"

"What?"

"That you have any muscle tone."

"Ha, ha," he said. Then: "Brett, could you see if they would let me have a bit of soda pop? I'm craving a little something wet and sweet."

"I can ask," she said.

"Tell them I'll try not to let it squirt out the holes in my chest." Brett got up and went away.

Leonard squeezed my hand really tight. He said, "Do you know who shot me?"

I told him who as quickly as I could. I told him what had happened to them.

"Man," Leonard said, "Vanilla is so cold and mean—"

"—her mean has to wear a hat and tie," we said together.

Leonard laughed, and then winced. "Oh," he said. "I think I shit myself a little."

"What nurses are for," I said. "Ask Brett to tell you how much she loves that part."

He grinned at me, then gradually turned serious. "How do you feel, man?"

"It got done, and Vanilla got whatever it was she needed out of it. I figure eventually we'll read about it in the papers. Someone will find them in time. They won't show to work, and then they'll go out there and find all those bodies. I don't know what the law will think."

"As long as they don't think about you, it'll be okay," Leonard said.

“I think Vanilla and I did it pretty clean. I’m even going to get rid of the shoes and clothes I had on last night. I’m leaving nothing to chance, no footprints, no clothes fibers. And since I didn’t write my name in blood or draw a drawing of a devil head, I think I’ll be all right.”

“Of course you will,” Leonard said.

“I’m going to get rid of the guns tomorrow. Except my automatic. I didn’t use it. It’s still clean.”

“Hate to see them go,” he said.

“Best bet, though. I know a good place to ditch them.” Leonard nodded.

“Vanilla, what she did,” he said, “she didn’t do it for me. It was for you.”

“And herself.”

“What I can’t figure is how you got someone like Brett, and then someone looks like Vanilla, to be attracted to you. As a queer, I got to say, I don’t find you attractive at all.”

“Feeling’s mutual,” I said. “Minus the queer part.”

“But, you know what?”

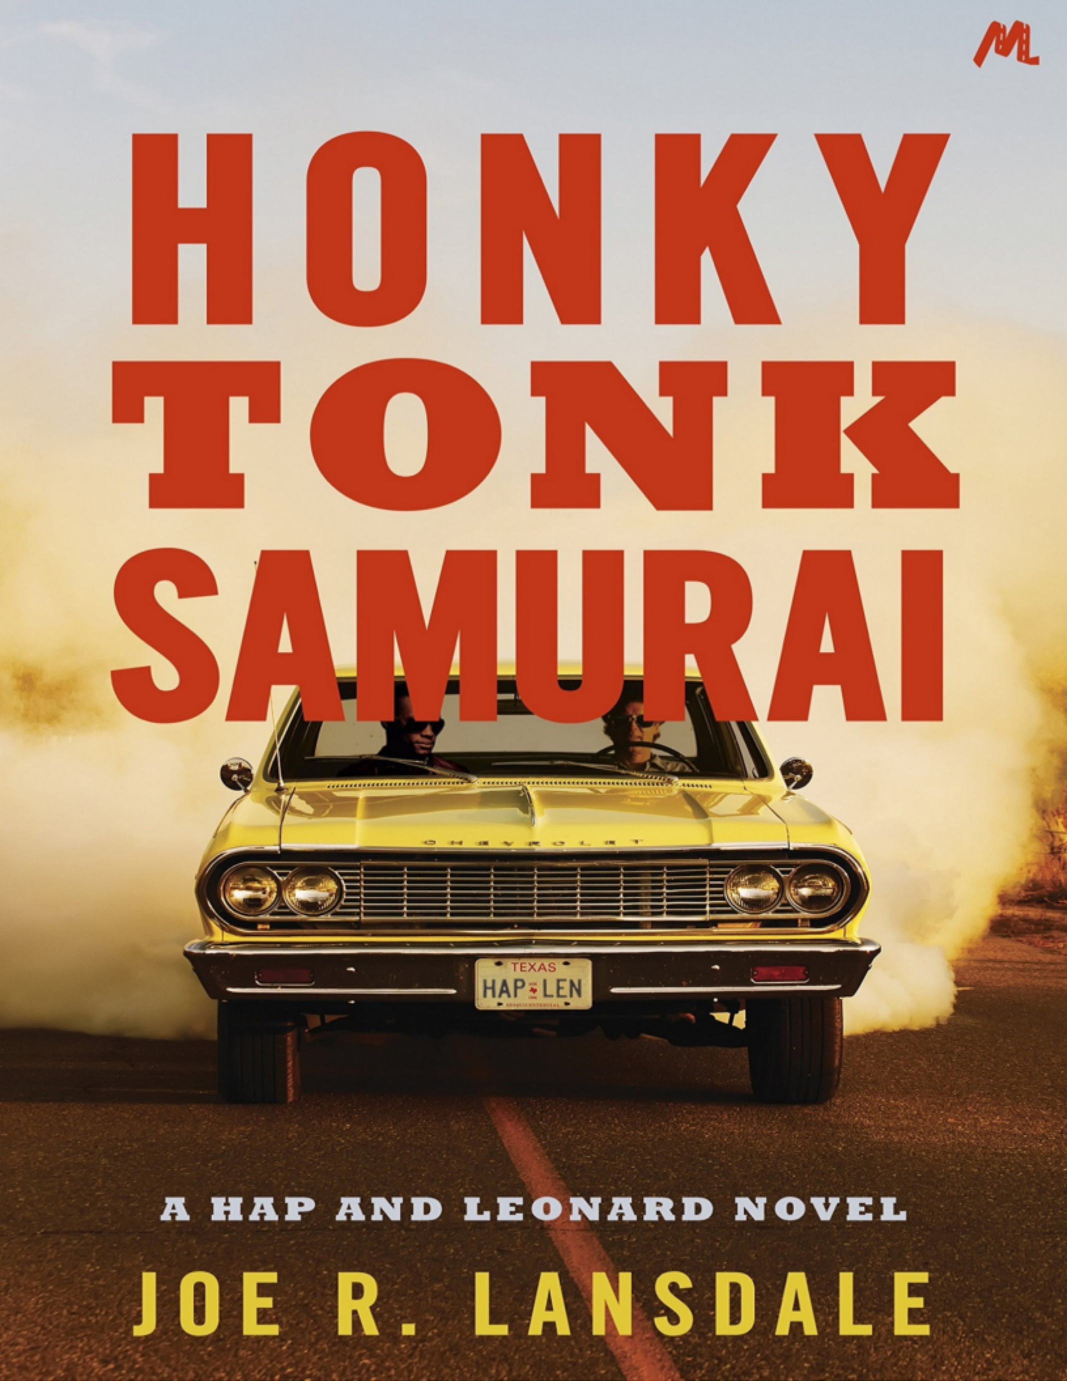
“What,” I said.

“I love you, brother,” he said, without looking right at me. “And you’re the reason I came back from the dead. That, and the fact it’s cold over there. And dark.”

“Still,” I said, squeezing his hand, “I’m not giving you that damn hat back.”

A NOTE ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Joe R. Lansdale has written more than a dozen novels in the suspense, horror, and Western genres. He has also edited several anthologies. He has received the British Fantasy Award, the American Mystery Award, seven Bram Stoker Awards, and the 2001 Edgar Award for best novel from the Mystery Writers of America. In 2007 he won the Grand Master Award at the World Horror Convention. He lives in Nacogdoches, Texas, with his family.



CHEVROLET
TEXAS
HAP LEN

HONKY TONK SAMURAI

A HAP AND LEONARD NOVEL

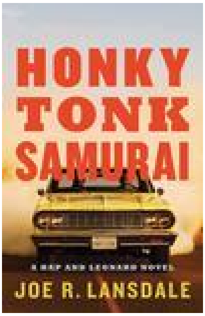
JOE R. LANSDALE

HONKY TONK
SAMURAI

JOE R. LANSDALE

MULHOLLAND BOOKS

Little, Brown and Company
New York Boston London



Begin Reading
Table of Contents
Newsletters
Copyright Page

In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher constitute unlawful piracy and theft of the author’s intellectual property. If you would like to use material from the book (other than for review purposes), prior written permission must be obtained by contacting the publisher at permissions@hbgusa.com. Thank you for your support of the author’s rights.

For the Kelley Boys—Danny and Dennis,
our extended family

Just when you think you got things learned good, and life’s flowing right, a damn Mack truck comes along and runs your highly attractive ass over.

—Jim Bob Luke

1

I don’t think we ask for trouble, me and Leonard. It just finds us. It often starts casually, and then something comes loose and starts to rattle, like an unscrewed bolt on a carnival ride. No big thing at first, just a loose, rattling bolt, then the bolt slips completely free and flies out of place, the carnival ride groans and screeches, and it sags and tumbles into a messy mass of jagged parts and twisted metal and wads of bleeding human flesh.

I’m starting this at the point in the carnival ride when the bolt has started to come loose.

* * *

The truck windows were rolled down and the heat wasn’t quite unbearable yet, but the air had the smell toast gets as it begins to brown and you know the butter will spread clean. In less than a half an hour, about noon, my butt crack would be completely filled with sweat and breathing the air would be like swallowing fishhooks. I was already looking forward to loose clothes, a big glass of ice tea, and lots of air-conditioning.

We were sitting in Leonard’s new-to-him pickup truck. He traded a lot. So did I. I’m not sure why, but we were always getting a different car or truck, usually used. This one was a Dodge and it was silver, and it was only a few years old. We were two blocks down from the house we were watching.

The guy who lived in that house, the fellow we were waiting on, had a wife who thought he was cheating and had hired the Marvin Hanson Agency to find out if he was and who with. She was brokenhearted and wanted everything to be all right, and if it wasn’t she wanted to divorce him in a serious and financially lucrative way that would cause him to have to sell his balls for a place to sleep.

We weren’t full-time employees, but we worked for Marvin quite a bit, a lot more lately. Divorce work, or potential divorce work, however, was not my idea of a good time, but the lady had hired the agency for two weeks of surveillance. We were on the last day of the job, and what we had pretty well determined was her sixty-year-old husband wasn't cheating on her at all, but he was going at odd hours to the gym, and we had a pretty good guess he didn't want to tell her.

Leonard thought it was because the idea embarrassed him, having to work out, or wanting to. That seemed peculiar to me, but Leonard understands that kind of thinking more than I do. For a gay guy he's much more tuned in to machismo than I am, so I guess he could be right. I figured the fellow was just going to surprise her with his new body, hoping one day she'd look up and say how good he looked. Maybe he kept going so much because she hadn't said anything.

Irony was, we had noticed that even in the last two weeks he'd dropped some pounds and muscled up a bit, and she had noticed over the last few months the same thing, but hadn't mentioned it to him because she thought he was dieting and buying new clothes because he had a chippie piece on the side. That's how she said it. "I think he's got a little chippie piece on the side."

I hadn't heard the word chippie used in many a moon, but the sad thing was I was old enough to remember when it was more common. I was starting to feel as if I were getting along in years and the recent ones were angry at me. By the time you're fifty you start to realize just how much of your time on earth you've wasted.

Anyway, we were sitting there watching him come out of the house, ready to follow, knowing full well by this time he didn't have a chippie piece on the side and that this was our last day so we would coast it on out for the dollar and give her our report. She had paid in advance and wanted two weeks, so I didn't feel we were sucking money she didn't want to spend.

I had been on a diet myself. I always exercised, and hard, and was usually in better shape than I looked, but lately I wanted to look it again, because Brett, my red-headed woman looked so good. I wanted to make my body more like the way I felt. But truth was, I had had to change my workout methods. I had dropped lifting heavy weights and gone to doing more reps with light weights. Jogging a little, but doing more walking than before. It seemed to be working. I was never going to be pretty, but I preferred not being able to rest a glass on my stomach when I was sitting down, as if it were an end table.

Even Leonard, who normally looked firm and ready for action all the time, had changed his eating and workout habits a little, because for the first time in a long time fat had crept in around his middle. He claimed it was protecting his gooey chocolate center. But since he was black as rich chocolate all over, I told him that seemed kind of redundant. And on top of that I didn't want to know about his gooey chocolate center.

There we sat, me reflecting on these things and holding in a wheat-bread fart out of courtesy, when Leonard said, "What the hell?"

He was looking at a yard across the street from our car. A man had a dog on a leash and the dog was cowered on its belly and the man was kicking it, and I could hear him screaming at it. The dog yelped a couple of times after the kicks.

Leonard was already out of the car by this time and crossing the street.

I got out and went around and followed, heard Leonard yell, "Hey, motherfucker, how about you try kicking me?"

The man stopped his dog abuse and looked up.

I let the fart ease out. I did it quietly, not wanting to frighten the dog. I left the fart where I had laid it like a rotten egg and moved away from the smell.

"Who the hell are you?" the man said to Leonard.

"I'm the man fixing to put that leash on your neck and kick you all over this goddamn yard like a soccer ball."

"You're trespassing," the man said.

"That's just where I start," Leonard said. "How about I put one of your goddamn eyes out?"

Appeared like a start to a fairly ordinary day for us.

I stayed at the curb while Leonard stood in the yard talking. I was waiting patiently, ready to stop Leonard from the death blow, which I was fairly certain might be coming.

"Take two of you to do it?" said the man, checking us both out. He was a pretty big guy, about Leonard's height, wider than both of us, bigger belly than us put together. He had the air of someone who had once run with a football and thought that gave him an edge for life. Maybe he should get with his neighbor who went to the gym, get some diet and exercise tips. Still, he was big enough to cause problems, even if it was just falling on you.

"No," Leonard said. "Just one of us."

I said, "And you can choose which one. Just for the record, I can hit harder. But I was thinking I'd rather not get all worked up. The heat, you know."

"He can't hit harder," Leonard said. "Faster, but I actually hit a little harder.”

“He’s a braggart,” I said. “We both know I can hit harder, and I’m faster, too.”

“You don’t neither one of you look so tough to me,” he said.

“Why don’t you show us how tough you are?” Leonard said. “You do pretty good with a defenseless dog wants to please you, but we don’t want to please you. Right, Hap?“

“Right,” I said.

“Tell him again.”

“Right. Not in the pleasing mood.”

“Tell you what, ass wipe,” Leonard said. “Give me the dog, let me take it with me, and we’ll call it a day, and you get to keep your face like it is. With a nose on it and everything. Without me punching a fucking hole in it.”

The guy laughed. “You are nuts. Both of you.”

“That’s what I’m trying to warn you about,” Leonard said. “But I don’t think you’re listening.”

By this point I could tell the man was starting to worry a little. That was a good idea. Leonard might truly be nuts. Some people didn’t even think it was open to discussion.

“You want him, or should I go on and beat the shit out of him?” Leonard said to me.

“I’ll just be here to stop you should you go too far.”

“Hey, now,” the man said. “You’re in my yard. I’ll call the cops.”

“I don’t think you’ll make it to the door,” Leonard said. “Got a cell phone in your pocket, you won’t have time to punch in the numbers. I promise you that. And if you call afterward, it ain’t going to help you none. The deed will be done. And they might have a hard time understanding you, as you might be missing some teeth, trying to talk with your nose gone. They might have to read your fucking lips you still got any. Now apologize to the dog and give the poor thing to me.”

“Apologize to the dog?”

“Yeah, apologize.”

“I’m not apologizing to any goddamn dog.”

“I would if I were you,” I said. “He means it.”

“Fuck you. She’s my dog.”

“Not anymore,” I said.

Leonard crossed the yard then. He moved swiftly. It was like those old Dracula movies when the vampire glides over the earth with the ease of a windblown mist. The man let go of the dog’s leash. The dog, a young German shepherd mix, maybe a year old at the most, remained cowed. I hated to see that. I loved dogs. I loved animals. People I'm a little more mixed on, so I didn't hate what was about to happen to the asshole in the yard, though I had to consider the cops might take a different view if the guy lived long enough and was strong enough to call them. Or maybe some neighbor looking out the window had already given them a call. Probably filming the whole thing on a cell phone.

The man put his hands up, clenched his fists in what he thought was a boxing position.

Shit, I could tell from the way he stood this wasn't even going to be a good fight.

Leonard didn't even put his hands up, just walked right up to the guy. The man threw a haymaker so slow and cumbersome we could have damn near driven home, had a cup of coffee, and come back before it landed.

It didn't.

Leonard looped his arm over the strike as he stepped in, most of the guy's force going around Leonard's back, the arm itself trapped to Leonard's side. Leonard lunged forward and shot out a palm that caught the guy in the nose and knocked him to the ground, or as close to that as he could get with Leonard still clutching his arm, partially lifting the guy's side off the ground.

The dog started to slink off on its belly like a soldier crawling in high grass. I went over and took the dog's leash. When I did the dog winced.

"It's okay, doggie," I said. "Uncle Leonard is kicking the bad man's ass."

By this time Leonard had let go of the man's arm and was kicking him sharply in the ribs, way that bastard had done the dog.

"How you like it?" Leonard said. "Enjoying that, asshole? Bark for me, cocksucker."

The guy didn't seem to be enjoying it. He started yelling, not barking. Hell, the dog had only yelped a little, this guy, you'd have thought was taking a real beating. And for him, I guess he was. Leonard actually seemed a little altruistic, I thought, considering it was all about animal mistreatment. Maybe he was getting old. Though actually he hadn't had much breakfast, so it might have just been his blood sugar was down.

After a bit, I guess Leonard got tired, because he quit kicking the guy, bent down, and retied his shoe, the string having come loose. When that was done I thought he'd go back to it, but he didn't.

The man, not learning his lesson, his face covered in blood from his nose to his chin, said, “That’s assault, nigger.”

“Couldn’t leave well enough alone, could you?” I said.

Leonard had already grabbed him by the ears and was picking him up just enough to knee him in the face. Blood went everywhere, and the guy lay on the grass without moving. I hoped he had fallen in dog turds. I thought I saw one of his teeth gleaming wetly in the grass, like a cheap Cracker Jack prize.

Leonard came over to pet the dog. The dog let him. The dog seemed to know we were on her side. Leonard said to the dog, “When he wakes up I’ll get him to apologize and maybe lick your ass.”

“You didn’t kill him, did you?” I asked.

“No, but I wanted to.”

“Well, yeah,” I said. “Me, too. But maybe it’s best not to.”

“Reckon so,” Leonard said. “Still, not nearly as satisfying. Goddamn, what’s that smell?”

“I’m having a little intestinal disturbance going on. My body does not deal well with wheat.”

“Quit eating it. God, man. That’s just foul and wrong. Let’s move to some other spot.”

2

I continued petting the dog, soothing it, and as dogs do, it stood up, wobbled, and licked my face. I think it would even have licked its crummy master's face. It's why I prefer dogs to cats. Cats aren't independent, they're just entitled assholes who want to be fed and do nothing. They're your owners. A dog just loves you. It's not about ownership or anything like that. They are sincere as death and taxes. They're the best creatures on the earth. Still, had it been a cat being mistreated, the bastard would still have gotten his ass kicked. But I would have taken a moment to tell the cat how I felt about his species. Not that it would have been listening or interested in thanking me. It would already be making its plans for the day. Lie around and shit in a box, puke hairballs on the floor, scratch up the furniture, and expect a treat for the effort. All dogs go to heaven. All cats go to hell.

The cops pulled up. One car. We were a little surprised to see Marvin Hanson, our boss, get out of the passenger side and stroll across the yard, look down on the guy, and say, "He doesn't look so bad."

The officer got out of the car. I didn't know his name, but I'd seen him around. Young guy. Leonard and I were no strangers to the police station. I tried not to worry too much about the cops' names, since they came and went faster than a john on holiday in Amsterdam. The young cop came over. He said, "Lady across the street called, said a guy was kicking his dog and we ought to come get him for animal cruelty."

"That's a good thing," I said. "But we thought it might take a little while, so we made a citizen's arrest."

"And trespassed and committed assault," Marvin said. His worn black face creased in a half smile. At least I think it was a smile. He might have been baring his teeth. I couldn't quite tell the difference. Marvin is not what you would call a pretty man.

"If you want to be that technical," Leonard said. "Sheesh."

"What are you doing with the cops?" I said to Marvin.

"He doesn't care what company he keeps," said the officer. He was a little guy, fat-faced, with stubby arms and legs, dark-skinned. He looked like a gingerbread man made with the last of the dough.

“Yeah, if my wife asks who I was with,” Marvin said, turning to look at the cop, “for God’s sake tell her I was buying drugs and was with a male prostitute. Don’t mention the boys in blue.”

“Done,” the cop said.

“But between me and you,” I said, “I still got to ask. What are you doing with the pigs, as we old rebels used to call them?”

“That’s just mean,” said the cop.

I liked this guy. I looked at his name tag. He might be worth remembering. Carroll was his last name.

“I been meaning to tell you,” Marvin said. “ I got my old job back. Police chief.”

You could have knocked me over with a green pea. Before I could ask about the particulars, Marvin, who had recently abandoned his cane, though he had a slight limp if you knew to watch for it, strolled over and looked down at the guy, who was awake now and trying to sit up.

Marvin said, “Can you stand up?”

“I think so,” said the man.

“Why don’t you do that if you can?” Marvin said. “I’m with the cops.”

“He called me a nigger,” Leonard said.

“That’s a tiebreaker in this modern world unless you use it in a rap song,” Marvin said.

“I was just angry,” said the man.

The guy gradually got himself collected enough to get to his feet. Marvin put his left hand on the guy’s right shoulder, said, “Were you kicking this dog?”

“She kept pulling the leash,” the man said. “I was trying to teach her.”

“What were you teaching her?”

“To behave. To quit yanking me.”

“So you kicked her?” Marvin said. “That was your instruction?”

“Had it coming. Hell, it’s a dog. My dog.”

Marvin’s right hand moved then. It was quick, a slap to the guy’s bloody face, a back hand, another slap, a swift knee in the nuts, and the guy was on the ground again. Marvin looked at the officer. “Damn if I wasn’t just angry.”

“You were just trying to teach him,” Leonard said.

“I can’t believe that,” said the officer. “That son of a bitch tried to resist arrest. And to the brand-new police chief.”

“Yeah, ain’t that something?” Marvin said. “No respect for the goddamn law.”

“Sign of the times,” said the officer.

“Next the sun will go cold,” said Leonard.

“I hear you,” said the officer. “Just this morning, my coffee wasn’t quite right.”

“There you are,” Leonard said. “It’s already started. The end of the world as we know it. The goddamn fucking apocalypse.”

3

She's got a busted rib—cracked, really. Nothing major. Used to wrap them up tight. Not the way it's done anymore." The vet, a stocky young lady who had thick shoulder-length blond hair slicked back with mousse, was telling us this as if we were potential interns.

"So she'll be all right?" I asked.

"Long as she takes it easy," she said.

"She will," I said.

"I'd like to have the bastard did this right here on my table," she said. "I'd cut his balls off with a dull scalpel."

"And we'd hold him down," Leonard said.

"When he came around, because he had a kind of accident and was out for a while, he apologized to the dog," I said.

"Apologized?" she said.

"Leonard there actually put the words in his mouth and made him chew on them and like it," I said. "But he had him say: I am sorry, little doggie, I am a shit-eating asshole and am not worthy to wear your dog collar. I have fleas."

The vet smiled a little, nodded at Leonard.

Leonard was sitting in a chair by the wall. He nodded back. Marvin was leaning against the open door frame. Officer Carroll had taken the dog abuser in. The dog was on a table, lying on her side. She was very patient and even cooperative. I liked that dog.

Marvin had let us take the dog to the vet. I guess he would have some paperwork to lie about, about how that bastard had jumped Leonard, who was merely trying to stop animal abuse, and then had turned on Marvin when he came to investigate. It wasn't legal, but it was justice. I could still visualize those slaps from Marvin. Marvin had fast hands.

The vet shaved some of the dog's hair and wrapped her up, but not tight. Just a little something to keep the rib firmly in place. She said it probably didn't need to stay but two or three days, and told us again about how it used to be done and how it wasn't done like that anymore.

I guess she was practicing a lecture she was going to give. I paid the bill out of some of the money we had gotten for watching the guy go to the gym, and we drove Marvin to his car at the cop shop. He said he wanted to talk to us, said he'd follow us back to my place, that he'd come in a little while, had a bit of cop work to do. We went ahead.

Leonard had recently found his own living arrangements, a shabby place downtown in an old building that had once been a candy factory but was later cut up into apartments. Before the apartment, Leonard owned a house, but he had left that to John, then John left it, and Leonard sold it. Leonard actually made a small profit. This was rare for either one of us. A profit. Though for the first time in both our lives we had a bit of money tucked away and were what you might call almost comfortable. Redneck jobs are frequently short on career potential. You do one till you tire or get fired, and then you move on. We had moved on a lot.

Leonard's apartment was a kind of loft with a partition for the bedroom and the bathroom. The landlord was letting him build some new walls for some of the rent. Work he had to have done by a certain time. Leonard decided to hire someone to do it. It was not cheaper than the rent reduction, but it gave him a nicer place to live, and in time it would even out. There was talk of the landlord applying the rent toward a sale. The owner was old and tired of property and renters, and Leonard wanted to buy.

Leonard had been living there for only a short time, staying at our place a lot until some of the work on the place was done. Before that, he lived at our house full-time. We even had a room built onto it. I loved him—dearly—and so did Brett, but I must be honest: I was glad he wasn't there all the time anymore. Brett and I were happy empty nesters. We could have more time to ourselves, and we didn't have to be quiet when we were playing doctor, and my vanilla-cookie-and-Dr-Pepper budget would go down dramatically. This would also help Leonard's waistline. He loved those vanilla cookies and Dr Peppers severely, but he loved them even more when he didn't have to buy them. I think he saw eating my cookies and soft drinks as an accomplishment of great importance and took it as a matter of pride.

It had turned hot by the time we got out of the vet's, and it was only ten thirty or so. The sun lay down on us like a coat of heated chain mail.

When we got to mine and Brett's house and came in with the dog, Brett was home from her nursing job. She had quit nursing several times but was so good at what she did that she always got hired back. She looked tired but pretty, her red hair tied back in a ponytail. She said, nodding at the dog, “So we’re having company for dinner? And I don’t mean Leonard.”

“Hey. I make good company,” Leonard said. “What are we having?”

“Whatever you’re buying,” Brett said.

“Oh,” Leonard said. “That limits things.”

I looked down at the dog. “This is our true guest. This is … well, I don’t know who this is.”

“Follow you home?” she asked.

“Not exactly.”

“Your new dog, Leonard?” she asked.

Leonard roved an eye my way. “Could be,” he said. “Could be yours.”

“Can I have her?” I said. I tried to sound winsome and wistful at the same time. Actually, I’m not sure which part of how I sounded was wistful and which part was winsome. Maybe you can’t do both at the same time. Maybe one sounds a lot like the other.

“Will you throw a hissy if the answer is no?” Brett said.

“Probably.”

“Oh, he can throw a grown-up big-ass cracker-style hissy,” Leonard said. “I’ve seen him do it, and I got to tell you, I was embarrassed. It wasn’t very manly.”

“I can try throwing the hissy in a deep voice,” I said.

“Nope,” Leonard said. “That’s not how a hissy works.”

“First how about telling me how we’ve come by a dog?” Brett asked.

We all ended up around the table, the dog lying at my feet, and I told her while we all had glasses of ice tea.

“I can’t believe people like that,” Brett said. “This dog looks like a lover, not a biter.”

“I don’t think she’s old enough to know what she is,” I said.

“Well, I like dogs,” Brett said.

The doorbell rang. I answered it. It was Marvin Hanson.

“So,” I said as he came in. “Hello to the police chief who didn’t tell us he was the police chief.”

He sat at the table, and I sat down again. He leaned over to give the dog a pat on the head. “Nice dog.”

“Police chief?” Brett said.

“Yep,” Marvin said. “You know, that man might want this dog back, and I’m not sure how that will work out in court. He’s going to get a fine for animal abuse and resisting arrest, but he could still throw some stink around.”

"Give Hap some wheat bread," Leonard said. "He'll match him out, I bet you."

"I'm serious," Marvin said. "Could be some court stuff coming up."

"I don't know about court," Leonard said, "but I know how it worked out on his lawn. Not too well."

"We were bullies," I said.

"No," Marvin said. "We were the Fresh Fists of Vengeance."

"To be precise," Leonard said, "you were the Slap and Backhand of Vengeance."

"Don't forget the knee," I said.

"Yeah, and the knee," Leonard said. "But that lacks a certain ring."

"What's the legal damage?" I asked Marvin.

"For me or for you guys?" Marvin asked.

"Give us the whole package," Leonard said.

"Well, the police officer saw him attack me," Marvin said.

"Yeah, well, all right," I said. "Should we say we saw him attack you, too?"

"That would be handy," Marvin said. "But the lady next door saw it all happen, and she filmed it on her cell-phone camera. Got word of that on the way over. She called it in."

"Of course she did," I said, having expected just that sort of thing.

"But she said she didn't film the part where Leonard knocked cheese dick around, and she didn't film me slapping the poo out of him. She's just got the part where he kicked the dog. Said she thought he looked as if he was going to attack you two, and then me, so she put the blame on him."

"She's such a sweet liar," I said.

"Yeah," Marvin said. "And she's an old lady and looks very trustworthy, I hear. A little crusty, but all right, I think. I just got my description from Officer Curt Carroll, who had to drive back over there. He said the man who owned the dog was out on the lawn on his hands and knees looking for his missing teeth, thought maybe if he put them in ice they could be put back in. He's one of those guys thinks he knows all manner of shit but couldn't tell the difference between shit and wild honey."

"Very convenient the old lady looks trustworthy," Leonard said. "As for ass wipe, I hope he doesn't find his teeth."

"How many was he missing?" I said. "I only saw one."

"Two, I think," Marvin said. "Anyway, Gummy, as I like to think of him, isn't pressing charges. He at first had a different point of view, but I pointed out you guys were just good Samaritans who saw an animal mistreated and went to help. I think he bought that. There's some truth in it, but then there's that whole lying part about how we were attacked."

"He did swing at me," Leonard said.

"We'll let that count for something," Marvin said. "Thing is, he's done, you're safe, so am I, and besides, I'm the police chief."

"You were just trying to frighten us with that stuff about how he might want his dog back, weren't you?"

"Just a little," Marvin said. "I have to get my licks in on you guys somehow. You've certainly given me enough grief."

"There's a little something we're all curious about," I said. "How did that whole police chief thing happen? We work for you, you know—seems that would have come up."

"Does, doesn't it?" he said. "But it didn't. And I'll tell you why. I thought maybe I was being foolish, trying to get back on the cops. But now my leg's healed up and I'm able to work and I had a good record there, and better yet, the city council came to me. Seems they can't keep police chiefs or officers. They change all the time. They got a lot of quitters, one in jail for this or that. By the way, you know they painted the jail pink and make the convicts wear pink jumpsuits now?"

I held up my hand. "Been there, wore a jumpsuit."

"Pink," Hanson said.

"Yep, and a little loose-fitting, I thought, though more attractive than you might think. Comfortable because it was loose, I guess. The pink is supposed to be a deterrent to crime, embarrassing and all that."

"Do you think it works?" Hanson said.

"Not so much."

"Me, either. First thing I do next week is have all the jail cells repainted. They can keep the pink jumpsuits until they wear out. No. You know what? I'm ordering the standard orange ones right away. They can afford that. Can you believe that shit? People raping and murdering, and their conclusion is to paint the jail pink and have the shits wear pink jumpsuits. The goddamn death penalty doesn't stop them, but they think butt-hole pink will."

"It's a mystery," I said. "But I'm still more mystified that you're police chief."

"Yep, me too," Leonard said.

"I like pink," Brett said.

"The conversation has moved on, Brett," I said. "So why you, Hanson?”

“Oh, there’s been some good chiefs, but so far the good ones have left because they can’t stand how things get done in this town or because they got better jobs doing the same thing in places they like better. There’s some good cops here, though. Kid that was with me you met. Some of the detectives like Drake and Kelso, few others. They’ve lasted awhile. But they want someone they think can hold things together better. They heard how I had an agency, was doing good physically now. How I had all that experience in Houston and here, so they came to me, hoping they could lure me away. They could.”

“Don’t they have elections for that sort of thing?” Leonard asked.

“That’s sheriff,” Marvin said. “Here police chief isn’t an elected office, it’s a pick-and-choose on the part of the city council. I got picked. I officially started today, but mostly I just rode from the office out to where you guys were. When I came in first thing, first day at work, first crack out of the box, I hear that a guy who’s been kicking a dog was getting an ass-whipping in a yard near where I sent you guys to scout. I knew who it was, of course.”

“We’re so predictable,” Leonard said.

“In some ways, yes,” Marvin said. “Thing is, well, I can’t keep the agency.”

“There goes about a third of our employment,” Leonard said.

“More like three-quarters,” I said. “We’ve been prosperous these last few months, and now we won’t be prosperous. It’s back to day labor and field work.”

“There’s always bouncing, janitorial work, and sexing chickens,” Leonard said.

“Yeah. I forgot we had so many options.”

“It’s a conflict of interest to have that kind of business and be in the law business, too,” Marvin said. “Besides, I got to go more by the law now. I’ve turned back to being respectable.”

“Clean underwear and all that,” Leonard said.

“That’s right,” Marvin said. “I even change socks daily.”

“You sure gave your first day a swell start,” Brett said.

“Yeah, I know. I could have been back at the agency after one day, but it worked out.”

“This what you want?” I said. “Police chief?”

“I loved my work there as a lieutenant, and I was practically police chief then, so I’m taking the job. I’m back in law enforcement. But thing is, I got to close the agency or sell it. I was thinking you two might want to take it over."

"What's the price?" Leonard said.

"What I was thinking," he said, "is you buy all the office equipment, take up the payments on the place, cause I'm buying the building, and you can start right away. Owner financed."

"Us?" I said. "You're really talking to us about owning a business? I don't know our names and 'business owners' ought to be said in the same breath."

"I know," Marvin said. "It's a scary thought."

"I don't know I want to run a business," I said. "I like the work all right, but that's just getting paid, not running the business—paying property taxes, insurance, and the like. Keeping up with this and that. What if a pipe breaks?"

"Fix it or get it fixed," Marvin said.

"One I don't like to do, the other one costs money," I said.

"Yeah," Leonard said. "That's not for me, either. Fixing pipes or running a business. I tried a lemonade stand once and had to fight two little white boys who called me a black cocksucker. I whipped the shit out of them. Hell, it was ten years after that before I sucked my first cock."

"It's good to be precise on cock sucking," I said.

"Have it your way," Marvin said. "But I'm selling out, and I'm offering you the best deal I'll offer anyone." He looked at Leonard. "Call it my cocksucker discount."

"That's nice of you," Leonard said.

"I don't know," I said.

"I'll do it," Brett said.

We all looked at her.

"I'm nursed out," she said. "I'm tired of the hours, and I'm tired of wiping asses and changing bandages. I'll buy out the equipment and take over the business, pay the bills. Hap and Leonard can work for me."

"You'll be our boss?" I said.

"We can make it work," she said.

"I don't know," I said.

"You know," Marvin said, "that's a good idea. Gets me out from under it, and you can make it work, Brett. You don't even need these two dopes. I can get you a private investigator license easy peasy. I know folks that know folks."

"I was thinking that," she said. "That I didn't need these two guys."

"Wait a minute," Leonard said. "Did I say I was out? I don't think so. I don’t even like Hap.”

“I’ll provide a certain amount of vanilla cookies as part of your payment,” she said.

“Dr Peppers?” Leonard asked.

“That, too,” she said.

“Hell, then, I’m surely in,” Leonard said.

“Hap?” Marvin said.

“Yeah,” I said. “I guess so. We go on like we are? No license for us two, just slave labor?”

“Of course,” Brett said.

“Yeah,” Marvin said. “You work under Brett’s license like you did mine.”

“When does this start?” Leonard asked.

“Right now the business is going to close. I turned in the report to the lady with the gym-conscious husband, and that was the last of it. She owes one more payment. But the business can restart when Brett wants it to start, long as it’s before the next building payment, and of course there’s paperwork to do. Thing is, it’s not going to cost that much to get started. It doesn’t pay like nursing, though, Brett.”

“Trust me,” she said. “Nursing isn’t exactly big money. Good, steady money, but not big money. Besides, like I said, I’m worn out with it. I’ll give my two-week notice when I go in tomorrow. And I think they’ll let me leave right away. They owe me vacation time.”

And that’s how I went to work for my girlfriend at what became the Brett Sawyer Agency.

4

At least Marvin had liked the paint. It wasn't pretty paint, and to be honest, I wasn't sure what color you would call it. Faded rust, perhaps. But it was the paint that had come with the inside walls, and there was nothing about it that bothered me, but Brett, she had other ideas. Leonard and I ended up painting the office a light mint green. It did look better, but I thought of it as a waste of time. It wasn't like we were trying to run a boutique. Next thing you knew there'd be flowers in vases, a bird in a cage, and a painting that looked like a bag of crayons had exploded.

Then again, we did work for Brett, and the boss was the boss. Course, what sucked was that she wasn't paying us for the paint job. Not that I expected her to or wanted her to. I'm just grumpy.

We got it painted, and Brett bought a new desk without coffee-cup circles on it, put out some coasters, and purchased comfortable office chairs and a new, streamlined computer. At least there were no flower arrangements or any of that other stuff I feared. She let me buy a movie-poster reproduction of the Robert Mitchum version of Farewell My Lovely, and I had that nicely framed and put on the wall. It was the only time in my life I actually did something more than buy a picture at a place like Walmart and frame it myself. I had someone who knew what he was doing frame it. It made me feel a little more like a real private eye, having that poster there. Of course, you got right down to it, I'm about as much like a real private eye as a weasel is like a kangaroo, but I like to dream a little.

The bathroom was kept simple. Clean place to do number one and two with plenty of toilet paper. There was a painting on the wall of water lilies. I thought that was silly. Really, did we need a painting in the shitter? And of water lilies?

Brett also got a better coffeepot for our kitchenette, as she called it, bought some gourmet coffee, and put a bag of vanilla wafers in the desk drawer. The vanilla cookies were the same cheap-ass brand we always bought, primarily for Leonard. He had three kinds of vanilla cookies he liked. The plain wafers, the ones with the cream in the middle, and any other kind that were vanilla. The drawer had a key. Two. I had one, Brett had the other. Leonard couldn't help himself. Came to those cookies, he was like a crack addict. We were there to protect him from himself. And the other thing I liked about it was it was kind of funny. He enjoyed tormenting me by wearing goofy hats and such, so I liked to return the favor now and again. It's what brothers do.

There was a little fridge with soft drinks and water in it, including Dr Peppers for Leonard, and there was a couch that could be pulled out into a bed. Brett and I tried it out one night when we were working late. Leonard had gone home to his new digs, and it was just us. We decided to break it in, so to speak. It was only a little more uncomfortable than the rack at the Inquisition. Next morning our backs were out of whack. Brett bought a thin foam mattress that she rolled up and put in the closet. You pulled the couch out, all you had to do was put that mattress on it and it turned the rack into something a little more serviceable and almost comfortable. We thought we might as well be ready. You never knew when you might need sex to bolster your serotonin, or whatever that stuff is that makes you feel happy. I always just thought it was fucking that makes you happy, so there you have it.

Our new dog stayed at the office with us during this time, wrapped in her not-too-tight but tight-enough bandage. While we were making love that time in the office, she watched us with curiosity from her doggie bed. I felt she was a little young for all that information. But I guess since I was taking her back to the vet for an operation that would end that whole having-puppies thing, it was all moot.

Night we were up there trying out the foldout couch, Leonard and John were having a get-back-together dinner. Leonard was making spaghetti with his famous sauce that he bought at the store ready to go. I hoped it worked out for him. He had been trying to put things back together for a while. He had just about thrown in the towel, and then John, who decided he was supposed to like women because he got religion, found out that women didn't really do it for him after all and maybe God would give him a pass on the whole male-on-male thing. Least that's where his head was at. I was beginning to think John, nice guy that he was, was just too confused and messed up to know what he wanted. Frankly, these days I avoided him. There was part of me that wanted to punch him in the mouth.

So the day after the night on the foldout, right after Brett bought the mattress and put it in the closet, it was just me and her, doing this and that to spruce up the new office. Mostly little things that I didn't think needed to be bothered with but that she thought were desperately important. We paused in our work and were both looking at the dog lying on her doggie bed in the corner of the office. Brett said, "You know, we got to quit calling her Her."

"You think?" I said. "It could be like that H. Rider Haggard novel She. That woman knew who she was. She was all the name she needed. Our dog could be Her."

"I don't think our She, or Her, is that confident," Brett said. "And besides, She actually had a name. Ayesha, I think."

"You got a point there."

"But she is starting to feel better, and she's getting fat, like you," Brett said.

"I lost five pounds."

"You need to lose twenty-five, dear boy."

"Yeah, at least."

"What have you been feeding her?"

"Nothing."

"Liar," Brett said.

"All right, now and then we go through the drive-through at Dairy Queen and I buy her an ice cream cone, plain, no chocolate. Chocolate is bad for dogs."

"I used to share chocolate candy bars with my dogs when I was a kid," Brett said. "None of them died."

"So they're all still alive?"

"Of course not," she said.

"See? Chocolate got them. It just took a lifetime."

"Ha," she said. "I think we should call her Spot."

"She doesn't have any spots," I said.

"That's the joke."

"We will not joke about our dog. I say we name her Ace."

"That's a boy dog's name."

"I always wanted to name a dog that because Batman's dog was named Ace."

"No. Not Ace. How about Buffy?"

"Like the vampire-slayer girl?" I asked.

"Yep. I like that name. More for dogs than for girls."

"That fits," I said.

"Let's call her Buffy the Biscuit Slayer. She does like dog biscuits."

I studied on that a moment, said, "Buffy the Biscuit Slayer is for formal occasions, when she has to wear an evening gown or be at a queen's coronation, but for at home and rides to the Dairy Queen, it's Buffy."

Our new dog was christened.

As this christening was going on, I was looking at Brett's legs. She was leaning up against the desk. She was wearing shorts and her legs were shiny and I was wondering if maybe we might try the couch bed again with the new mattress. That thought was destroyed when I heard someone on the stairs. It was a heavy sound, like a elephant loaded down with a raja and his escorts, and there was a clicking with it, like maybe the elephant had a large cricket for a friend or perhaps was wearing a tap shoe on one foot.

That's when the door opened and a lady came in who was older than dirt but cleaner. She had a cane, which explained the cricket, but the elephant walk was a little more confusing, as she wasn't much bigger than a minute. She had more dyed red hair than she had the head for. That hair seemed to be an entity unto itself, mounded and teased and red as blood. You could have shaved her like a sheep and knitted a sweater with all that hair, maybe have enough left over for at least one sock or, if not that, a change purse.

Her face was dry-looking. She had a lot of makeup on it, as if she were trying to fill a ditch, or several. Her clothes were a little too young for her age, which was somewhere near to that of a mastodon that had survived major climate change but was wounded by it. She had on bright red tight jeans and a sleeveless blue shirt that showed hanging flesh like water wings under her arms. Her breasts were too big, or maybe they were too exposed; the tops of them stuck out of her push-up bra. They looked like aging melons with rot spots, which I supposed were moles or early cancer.

She eyed Brett and me, said, "You two weren't about to do the dog, were you?"

"I don't think so," said Brett. "Our dog is a lady."

The lady eyed the recently christened Buffy on her bed in the corner. Buffy had lifted her head to check things out, but she quickly lowered her head again and lay still. I think all that hair bothered her. She probably thought it was a vicious animal ready to pounce.

"I mean screwing," said the woman.

Like Brett, I knew what she had been referring to, but still, she wasn't what I expected, though I suppose when I got that old, if I did, I'd still talk the same way I do now. Actually, the more I looked at the old lady, the more I thought the language suited her. She looked like a retired hooker.

"Why, yes, I was just fixing to drop my shorts and bend over the desk and ask Hap here to drive me home."

"You aren't shocking me, honey," the old woman said.

"Or you us," Brett said.

I was actually thinking I might be a little shocked.

"That was your game, wasn't it?" Brett said. "To shock us."

"Naw," said the old woman, finding a client chair and settling into it as if she were a bag with a bowling ball in it. "I'm just a vulgar old shit." She laid a heavy eye on me, said, "You're Hap Collins, aren't you?"

"I am," I said. "Do we know each other?"

"No, but when I was forty I'd like to have. You and me could have burned a hole in a mattress then. Course, you may not have been born. But you might want to lose a few pounds, honey. You're starting to chub up."

"He's taken," Brett said. "Pounds and all."

The old woman studied Brett. "Aren't you the Southern belle? I bet you could earn a pretty penny on a Louisiana shrimp boat and never have to toss a net."

"Listen, you old bag," Brett said. "Either say what you want or I'm going to stick that cane up your ass and throw you down the stairs so hard the dye will come out of your hair."

The old lady let out with a howl. "You are a pistol, aren't you?"

"And all six chambers are loaded," Brett said.

"Don't get your panties twisted up your ass," said the old lady. "I'm just fucking with you. I want to hire Hap here."

"I charge a little more for the position of male escort," I said. "And just so you know, I don't do anal."

"I might could arrange that—the male escort part," she said. "And I do do anal and use toys. Or used to. These days I'm so dry I have to grease up to pee." She said that and laughed. It was a good laugh and sounded young, right up to the end, where she got choked and suddenly sounded like a boiler about to blow.

When she got her pipes cleaned out, I said, "I don't know you, so how come you know me?"

"I saw you and your colored friend out in the yard the other day. And there's that sweet dog that got kicked. She looks much happier now."

I thought: colored friend? Really? Then again, she was old. Hell, she might have been near ninety. A spry ninety, but at least that age. I guessed she was entitled to the old proper style of identification for black people. Then again, the term black was fairly past its shelf life, too. The new word was African American, a variant of Afro-American, a term used in the sixties and seventies. Leonard always said it was obvious he was American and that the closest he'd been to Africa was a geography map. He thought of himself as black. Then again, me and him are about the same age. We like a lot of the same terminology. I just about always say pussy instead of vagina.

The old lady stirred a hand around in her purse and came up with what I still call an electronic device and everyone else calls a tablet. To me a tablet is writing paper between cardboard covers. I especially liked the old-style Big Chief tablets. I don't even know if they still make them.

She ran a bent finger around on the tablet, then turned it toward me. It was a very nice video of Leonard beating the shit out of the dog abuser. The sound was down. That was okay. I remembered everything that was said, and the machine probably hadn't picked that up anyway.

And then I understood. Of course I did. She wasn't just an old lady who had seen what had happened. She was the one who recorded the dog abuse, said she didn't have Leonard and Marvin recorded—but she did. She had filmed everything from the minute we showed up to the moment everyone left. It was pretty cool to watch, both Leonard and Marvin. I almost asked for a replay.

What kept me from asking for that, however, was I had a sinking feeling that I knew why she had come in.

5

Here's what I expected. She had blackmail material, and though I wasn't involved in the actual ass-whipping, I was there and was part of the deal by proxy, and the way it would come down was all of us on that video, and that included Officer Carroll, were about to get rubbed raw as hamburger meat.

"You think I'm here to blackmail you, don't you?" she said.

"Never crossed my mind. Why would a nice lady like you blackmail anyone?"

"Shit, boy, you're a bad liar. If you were a woman you couldn't fake an orgasm."

"All right," I said. "It crossed my mind. And just for the record, I think I could fake an orgasm."

"Totally," Brett said.

"I want you to take my case," said the lady, "if that's what it's called. Think that's what they say on the TV shows, or maybe it's movies. Are there private eye TV shows anymore?"

"I don't know," I said.

"Those were always kind of fun," she said. She seemed to be thinking about a favorite episode of something before she shifted to: "Here's the way I see it." She patted the tablet. "I want you to find my granddaughter. The cops gave up. For them it's a cold case, and from what I can tell it's not getting any warmer. I'll be honest. I don't have any illusions. I'm too old to have any. She's most likely bones by now, but I want her body found, and I want to know what happened to her."

"You don't need threats," Brett said. "We just need payment. Actually, I own this agency now, so it's me you deal with."

"Well, that's the rest of the problem," she said. "I got some money, but not what it takes to do the deed, cause I presume it'll take awhile, and usually this stuff is by the hour, right? That's why I brought the tablet. What's on it is my down payment. And if you're thinking of pushing me down the stairs, I got a copy of this elsewhere, somewhere where you can't get it. I'm pretty tech-savvy for an old geezer."

"I think you're a lying bitch," Brett said. "How much money you got?"

"How much you need?" the old lady said.

They went back and forth with that for a while until it was determined the old lady had about half of what Brett charged for a couple of weeks, having raised her prices from those Marvin used. I guess she was thinking about paying for the paint and the new furniture and a lot of vanilla cookies and the toilet paper for the snazzy bathroom.

When the money talk was done, and an inferior sum was agreed to, the old lady pulled a manila envelope out of her purse. Inside were some papers and photos of her granddaughter. She was a good-looking girl in a short white dress and those Greek lace-up sandals. She had thick red hair like Brett's and like maybe the old lady's original hair used to be. The girl was striking a model pose, which was appropriate, because her grandmother said, "She wanted to be a model when she was a kid, then she wanted to be a journalist. Her name is Sandy Buckner."

"What's your name?" Brett asked.

"Lilly Buckner."

"We have a painting of lilies on the bathroom wall," I said.

"What?" Lilly said.

"Never mind," I said.

Brett asked her a few questions, and I listened. Five years ago Sandy had gone missing. She had graduated college with a journalism degree and found that the newspapers and magazines that did hard news had gone the way of the dodo bird and drive-in theaters, so she tried being a weather girl, but she was no good at it. She looked wonderful on camera, but she had zip charisma, as her grandmother put it. It's odd how that works. There are people who in life are beautiful, but on film, beautiful or not, they have all the personality of a ham sandwich without the pickles, and then there are those who look all right, nothing special, a little too thin, but the camera loves them, spruces them up, makes them glow. Sandy didn't glow. She was just pretty. She ended up taking a job at a used-car lot that only sold high-end used cars—Mercedes, Lincolns, Cadillacs, muscle cars, that kind of thing—mostly old cars that had become rare and classic.

Sandy worked there six months and was making some money, then one day the boss called Lilly Buckner looking for Sandy. Hers was one of the numbers Sandy had left as a contact. She hadn't come to work, and she never showed up again. She hadn't been seen for five years. Her car, which wasn't up to the level of those she sold but was pretty nice, had been found in the parking lot of the apartment complex where she rented. It was a nice complex, and it and the pretty nice car led Lilly to think Sandy was making money that was a little too good.

The whole missing-person business had gone through cop channels without any solution. Lilly hired a private agency that had taken her money and told her what she already knew, then went out of business. The owner of the agency decided being a private eye lacked some of the excitement he had hoped for and had gone into real estate. Ms. Buckner said it made her happy the bottom fell out of the market right after he made that decision.

Then she saw us and the dog. She talked to the cops and got Marvin's name, and then she researched him, and that led to all of us. She did it, she said, because all she had to do was shit and eat. She discovered Marvin had an agency, and now Brett had it.

She researched us to brag on us saving the dog. She did in fact do that while she was with us, said good things about us, but thought Brett might could use a little less eyeliner, told her she had to watch tight shorts when they got sweaty. "You get a camel toe you're not careful," she said. It sounded like a sincere suggestion. Brett gave me a look that said: What the hell?

Ms. Buckner rambled on. She thought Leonard was good-looking for a colored man. Said she always voted against any politician if he smiled too much. She told us a lot about herself, pretty much everything there was to know except her personal laundry tips.

"This granddaughter," I said. "I take it you two had special feelings about one another."

That reeled her in a little.

"I understood her," she said. "I had been the black sheep of the family years before, and now she was. Modeling and journalism, any plan but marriage and being Suzy Homemaker, wasn't something my daughter Kate understood. Maybe that was my fault. I didn't set a good example for her. I had this stupid idea when I was younger that art trumped all things, including family. I thought I had great talent and great pride, but what I had was hubris. I still have a substantial dose of it."

"Oh, you don't say?" Brett said.

"You are a shit, aren't you?" Ms. Buckner said.

"Takes one to know one," Brett said.

"I was a bad mother, no doubt. I was always worried more about me than her. My daughter wouldn't have anything to do with me. She treated me like gas from a calf's ass after she left home. Not that I blamed her. She wanted things more conventional. Damn if I didn't outlive her. Cancer got her. Self-righteous and proper and all that, praying all the time, and she ended up wired up like a spaceman and easing away in inches and shitting in a bag. I saw her right near the time she died. I thought we might at least close our ledger. Kate didn't even know who I was. Poor thing, she looked then like I look now, and she was middle-aged. That cancer sucked the juice right out of her.

"My granddaughter had done the right things, gone to school, got a degree. Stuff her mother ought to have been proud of. Better than what I'd done by a long shot. But Kate thought Sandy should be going to college not for a BA but instead a MRS. Didn't matter. The degree didn't work out, but Sandy took a job. She was like this one." She nodded at Brett. "A pistol."

"How was her eyeliner?" Brett asked.

"A little heavy, you want to know the truth. I say go big, but don't go giant. Look like you'd like some action, but not like you're ready to pull the train on the local football team."

"So she was a pistol," I said. It was an attempt to get things back on track. I knew Brett. Once she decided she didn't like someone, it was hard to steer her out of a path of hit and run. Or, rather, hit and back over the bleeding corpse.

"Yep. She was indeed a pistol. Had all the chambers loaded, too, just like this one said. I liked her for that. I tried to help her here and there. I think she appreciated it. It was hard to tell. I think somewhere in there she had her own plans and thoughts, and I think she had a hard time expressing love and appreciation. I'm like that. You start showing me affection, I start waiting for the other shoe to drop, the trap to close. I don't know how to deal with it. Enough maudlin shit. I've told you everything but my shoe size."

"Would be about a man's ten, wouldn't it?" Brett said.

"That's just mean, girl," Lilly said to Brett. "Weight and shoe size on women is hitting below the belt."

"I know," Brett said. "I thought you had it coming."

"I may have. It was something I would have said for sure. Look. Enough shit. I want you to find out what happened to her, and bring either her or her bones back if you can. I need to know."

Experience gave me a thought. I said, "Let me ask you something personal. Did you ever loan her any money, give her any money?" I asked.

“Not exactly,” she said.

“Let me put it another way. Did she ever take any of your money without asking?”

“I suppose you could say that. She took some things from my safe. Some of it was money, some of it was securities, things like that.”

“How much money?”

“About fifty thousand dollars.”

“Damn,” Brett said.

“Yeah,” Ms. Buckner said. “Damn.”

“And the securities?” I asked. “She cash them in?”

“Forged my signature, worked her charms, I guess.”

“You didn’t look at that a little askew?” I asked. “That seems to me to not be doing everything right. A common name for someone like that is goddamn thief.”

“She needed the money. Like I said, she had pride. She didn’t know how to ask for it, so she took it. I think she would have paid it back. I think she meant to, anyway. Hoped she could. But then something happened. I’m guessing she got in some kind of trouble and had to have it and was afraid if I didn’t give it to her things could be really bad. Whatever those things were, she didn’t want to tell me.”

“Sounds like to me it’s what Hap was saying,” Brett said. “She’s a thief who stole your money.”

“Maybe,” Ms. Buckner said. “Maybe she did. I don’t care. I loved her, and I don’t love much, other than animals. I’ve had cats and dogs, and I loved them. Now I don’t have any. Outlived everything I ever loved, it appears, and who the hell wants to get up early to take a dog out to shit? At my age I’m not adding anyone or anything new to the mix. The rest of the world can go to hell. Except for Sandy. Maybe she didn’t always show good sense, even if I think she had it. I still want to find her.”

Then she gave Brett a financial retainer and went down the stairs, doing that elephant walk with the one-tap-shoe sound. She had to struggle down the stairs in the way she struggled up. I think Brett would like to have helped her down by kicking her in the ass. I sort of wanted to give her a piggyback ride myself.

She was salty as a bar nut, but I got to tell you, I appreciated that. I like people with a little spice, even if it gives me a bit of heartburn. I looked out the window and saw her work herself into a vanilla Mercedes and glide it out of the lot, not bothering with the exit. She drove right over the curb with a thump, and then she was on the road. The middle of it. She struggled the car along without running over anyone, though she narrowly missed a parked car and a wandering squirrel.

She got to the end of our street, turned in front of brake-grinding and horn-screeching traffic, and maneuvered away slowly, like a blind turtle, until she was out of sight.

6

"For someone who talks tough, I think she was all flatulence and no guts," Brett said. "Letting her granddaughter off the hook like that."

"Flatulence?"

"I was trying to class up our conversations."

"All right," I said. "But you should have said 'all flatulence and no intestines.'"

"It's so rare you're right," Brett said. "But when you are, you are."

We were lying in bed at home and had just finished what Ms. Buckner had called the dirty dog.

"I think she's tough, all right," I said. "I just think her granddaughter, Sandy, is her soft spot."

"Like Leonard is yours?"

"You and Leonard," I said. "Though maybe I'm Leonard's soft spot. If he was any tougher he'd be made out of leather and stuffed with nails. He should have been dead several times over, but he's too tough to die. He's waiting to get old so he can whip death's ass."

"You've survived your share of bad moments," Brett said.

"With Leonard it was toughness, with me it was luck."

"He's not always so tough."

"You mean lately?" I said.

"Yeah, the stuff with John," Brett said. "How does a gay guy stay a conservative, by the way? John's brother is a big-ass Republican, and he's always thumping the Bible and telling John he's going to go to hell for being gay."

"Well, Leonard has been hit in the head a few times," I said. "That could account for something. Frankly, he's been changing his political affiliation as of late. Thinks Republicans have become assholes, so he moved to the Log Cabin Republicans."

"That the gay Republicans?"

"Yep. But then he thought that was too much of 'an elite' club, so he's become a Libertarian."

"Aren't they just mean-spirited I-got-mine-and-fuck-everyone-else Republicans?"

"A lot of them are. But they're more like the old Republicans—least that's the way Leonard aligns himself. Eisenhower without a heart. He fits there."

"Except when he doesn't," she said. "He can have a pretty big heart."

"Yeah," I said. "He can. You vote Republican, don't you?"

"You've never asked before."

"No. But I've wondered."

"I don't really have a party I like," she said.

"Who does?"

"I vote mostly Democrat, though I voted for Reagan, to my regret."

"I don't fit neatly with either side," I said. "We're all like goats if we're honest. We find our pastures but we love to put our heads through the fence and nibble a bit of the grass on the other side. No one fits anywhere perfectly."

"I don't know," Brett said. "I can think of one place you always fit perfectly."

"Oh, you flatterer," I said.

"Yeah, well, I figured I needed to throw in a compliment so you wouldn't worry too much about me faking an orgasm now and again."

"Nice," I said. "The old lady got that on your mind?"

"I guess. Talk about soft spots: now you have a new one. Buffy."

I turned my head, looked at Buffy resting on one of the doggie beds we had bought her. We had one downstairs, one at the office, and one here, upstairs in our bedroom. She had to be coaxed to come upstairs, and then when she did she stayed there until we invited her outside to go to the bathroom. She seemed frightened to ask for the outdoors, the way a dog will do, poking you with its nose, wagging its tail, and barking. We had to take her out at regular planned intervals so she wouldn't hold it in. I felt like she'd do that until she burst.

"Stop overfeeding her," Brett said. "You're acting like a southern mother."

"She seemed a little skinny to me," I said.

"Well, you got her back on track now," Brett said.

I pulled Brett close to me. "Off topic, but have you been wishing you hadn't bought Marvin's business? Nursing was at least regular."

"I did wake up this morning wishing I could pour shit out of a bedpan, but other than that, and the long hours and the yelling doctors and men trying to put their hands on my ass and up my skirt, I'm not missing it as much as you might think. Besides, I got a nest egg for us. I can afford time off."

"I don't want your nest egg," I said.

"I know that. But it's there anyway. It's our nest egg. What's mine is yours."

"I found that out just a short while ago."

"You did, didn't you?"

"You know what I miss?" I said.

"What?"

"Leonard, damn it."

"Yeah. Me, too. He's so cute when he wants his cookies."

"Family couldn't afford a lot of extras. He'd go to his uncle's house, and Uncle Chester always had vanilla cookies and Dr Pepper on hand. I think it's a comfort food."

"That explains things."

"Yeah. You know the hats he likes to wear?"

"Childhood something or other?" she asked.

"No. He's just an asshole. I thought I should remind you of that before we became too nostalgic for him not being here."

"He is at that, but you can sure see the kid in him when he wants those cookies."

"He has eyes like Buffy's," I said.

"You're right. He really does. He was messy, ate all the cookies, drank up all the Dr Peppers, interrupted us during sex by knocking on the door, knowing full well what we were doing in here, and he stayed up and played the TV loud downstairs, left his dirty drawers on the floor between his room and the living room. Left them so I could get them washed."

"You made me do the wash," I said.

"I know, but I had to point the drawers out to you," she said. "Shit, aren't gays supposed to be neat and listen to show tunes?"

"Just the ones who do," I said.

"Still, I miss him."

"Me, too," I said. "Should I see if he wants to come back?"

"Not on your life," she said.

7

The car lot was called Frank's Unique Used Cars. It was off the major highway that ran through the center of town, Highway 59. In the town itself the highway had a street name until it came out on the far side in a wide band of concrete heading north. The car lot was tucked in near a bank and a money-managing firm, a stone's throw from a Burger King. It was a big lot, and the cars were in fact unique.

I had driven by there many times and seen those fine old cars, but it just then registered with me how rare and fine they actually were and how often I had looked at them. It seemed odd for our town to have that kind of business. Most guys I knew drove pickup trucks with dogs riding in the back, tobacco spit sprayed along the side of the truck, splattered like some kind of poorly executed racing stripe. Those trucks were frequently festooned with stickers about how proud the owners were to be rednecks and how they were going to cling to their guns until they were pried from their cold dead fingers. They often had stickers with beer and whiskey labels on the trucks as well. I guess they kept a dog in back in case they needed a designated driver.

The fancy cars were all parked out front on the lot, but you could bet they went into the huge building behind the office at night. It was a three-story building, and it looked like anything but a car lot. It had once been a fancy hotel. The bottom-floor wall had been knocked out and fixed with big aluminum doors, but the top floors were still the same, with broad windows and white shades over them. Not enough people came, so it closed down. Few years back it got a sweep-out and paint job, and its parking space became the car lot. A modern single-story office building had been built out front of the hotel, behind the display of cars, the glass reflecting the lot and anyone on it.

Leonard and I cruised by a couple times in a beige BMW we had rented from a place in Tyler so as to look prosperous. We were checking things out. Finally Leonard pulled us into the lot. Before we went inside, Leonard said, "I've driven by this place often in the last few years. The cars are still the same cars."

"Guess it's possible they are different cars that look like the same old cars," I said, "but I was thinking exactly the same thing."

We went inside, out of the intense summer heat. The office was large, a kind of showroom, mostly glass, but with no cars on display inside. It had the kind of glass that was hard to see through from the outside, appeared dark, but inside the glass had a different effect—you could see the outside clearly. A large part of the ceiling was made of glass. You could see clouds rolling by. It was bright inside and very air-conditioned, cool as a penguin's ass on an ice block. The sweat began to cool-dry against my skin.

"You'd think they were selling igloos instead of cars," Leonard said.

In the center of the room was a big clear plastic desk. At the desk sat a golden-haired beauty of a woman with two large, round tits from the tit store, firm as rocks. She had a nose by someone other than genetics and a lot of experience looking at her own reflection in the mirror, knew how to tilt her head just right, when to let go of her smile, like she was holding back a bomb until it was right on target. She let that bomb drop when she saw me looking at her. She was a lady who knew her chickens. Leonard, of course, was not going to be impressed. He was already scouting his eyes around for a male salesman that would be the lovely lady's equivalent, but none was visible. In fact, no one else was around but us and the blonde.

Just for the record, when it comes to tits and noses, I'm not one of those who worry about if they're real or not. If it doesn't appear to have been glued on, nothing falls off during sudden moves, and the smile doesn't look like a Great White gliding down on a tuna, it's okay by me. I'm true to my baby, Brett, but I have never lied about the fact that I got this whole biology thing going on, and I like to look, and this lady was well worth looking at. I imagined Brett looked at men, too. She could appreciate a nice shape, which is what makes me wonder why she stays with me. I like to think it's my massive pecker.

When the blonde stood up she looked even better. The surgery work had been mostly subtle. She wore a blue western-style shirt and a dark brown cowgirl skirt that was cut short, a little longer in back than in the front. I couldn't see her rear, but I had a feeling that dress was pressed against a butt firm as a fresh-picked apple. She had long, spray-tan legs that were lightly oiled and inviting. She wore red-and-blue cowboy boots with shiny white moons on the toes. The heels were high, even for boots, and when she walked, she knew how to do it. Had that runway-model approach. As she got closer I saw she was older than she looked from a distance. Not all her face had been sculpted. She had some corner-of-the-mouth creases, a few lines around her eyes, and a crimp on her forehead like she was about to make a decision. The lips were nice, and the cheekbones were high. I like to believe those were natural.

Me and Leonard were dressed in our most expensive casual duds, which were so seldom worn both of us had to send a posse into our closets to find them. Our outfits smelled a little dry, like old wallpaper in a damp room. The boots she was wearing were worth more than what both of us had on, right down to socks and shoes and all that was in our wallets, including the change in my piggy bank back home. I actually have one. A pink pig. I think it's precious.

It was a goodly walk to where we were. As she strolled, Leonard said, "She looks like your type, and I'm going to tell Brett if you smile too much."

Within a few seconds she was in front of us, standing in a way she knew was killer, one leg slightly in front of the other to accentuate her legs and hips. Of course, why anyone would stand like that normally is impossible to figure, but like I said, it had the desired effect.

"Can I help you gentlemen?" she said. She had the sort of southern voice that's a little bourbon-soaked and so smooth you'd think butter wouldn't melt in her mouth but a lie could happily live there. She let loose that bomb of a smile again.

I turned on what charm I had left, showed her my smile. At least I had all my own teeth. Except for the wisdom teeth. They were long gone, top and bottom. I have suggested many times that what was wrong with my life might be just that. No wisdom teeth.

"We'd love to talk to you for a moment," I said. I was so friendly and cheerful I wanted to pull up a chair and listen to me.

"Would you like to go out on the lot?" She posed that like it was a question up there with a possible discussion of string theory, and that the two of us might really have something profound to add.

"Actually, we're not here to buy one of those cars," I said.

"Oh," she said. "We do sell cars, you know."

"Yes, but I'm assuming you have others, ones not on the lot," I said.

"Of course. Come sit at the desk and we'll chat."

We followed her over. I watched her buttocks wrestle in the tight skirt. Both sides of her ass seemed to be holding their own. She indeed had a firm-apple butt, and the skirt fit tight, as if it and the ass were one and the same.

She took her chair, and Leonard and I took the two chairs in front of the desk. Those chairs were like settling down on a cloud. I felt sleepy the minute I got situated. I could feel the sweat freeze-drying at the small of my back.

“I’m Frank,” she said.

“Hap,” I said. And Leonard gave his real first name, too. We didn’t offer last names. If it came to that we had already worked up some lies—Wilson and Smatter. He was Wilson, I was Smatter.

“Hap. That’s an odd name,” she said.

“It’s rare,” I said. “You don’t look like a Frank.”

“Actually it’s Frankie,” she said and shifted her legs so that I could be certain she was all woman, let her foot hang so she could dangle one of those fine boots. “But everyone calls me Frank. I thought it sounded better for the business.”

I doubted that. She didn’t seem old-fashioned to me, like she was trying to convince anyone a man ran the business. Maybe she was just trying to appeal to who she thought we were, a couple of male chauvinist pigs she could sell a car to.

I noticed her turning her head to the lot, checking what we drove up in.

“Would your car be a trade, if we were able to put you in a new ride? I must be honest. We don’t give substantial trade credit. It’s not our way.”

“He drove his car,” I said, indicating Leonard, “but I’m the one who’s come to buy a car. I wanted him to check them out with me.”

“He values my opinion,” Leonard said. “Him being my sidekick and all.”

She nodded. “That is so nice, to have a friend that dear.”

“Isn’t it?” Leonard said. “I get loose bowels thinking about it.”

Frank gave him a look that showed she was trying to appreciate his humor.

Easy, Leonard. Pull it back. There were some days when you just didn’t know which Leonard you would get. The sarcastically playful one, the deadly avenger with a heart of ice, or the snot-nosed little brother who wants his cookies and Dr Pepper and was easily bored. All the personalities that make up his overall personality were quirky at best.

“The cars on the lot, interestingly, are not for sale. They are showpieces, but we have others like them, and some even rarer. I mean, people can look at the ones on the lot if they want, but only to buy a car like it, not those cars.”

"It's like when you get shown the dessert tray at a restaurant," Leonard said. "They look good, but they're shellacked over and not for sale."

"Sort of like that, yes," she said. "But you said you were looking for something different from what was on the lot."

"I did indeed," I said.

"Well, we have them."

"Good deals?" I said.

"I suppose that depends on how one looks at it," Frank said.

"How would one look at it?" I asked.

"Well," she said, "that depends on your bank account, to be honest."

"Or to be frank," I said.

"Yes, that's a good one, Hap," she said. "A good one." She made it sound like I was the smartest man who ever squatted to shit over a pair of shoes. She was already starting to irritate me.

"Our cars are reconditioned with all original parts, which we have to go well out of our way to find, and that's expensive. We don't use substitute parts or any modern part that might fit, and that is a rarer situation every year. Therefore, each year there is a rise in expense. Hard to find those parts. But for what we have to offer with the cars, and how unique our services are, it's worth it. You can look at one of our catalogs if you like. Not only pictures, but lots of explanation there."

She gave me and Leonard the catalogs. I studied them. Lots of nice classic cars with some very nice classic women leaning against them while wearing only enough to keep from being arrested. In fact, the girls were more prominent than the cars. Redheads and blondes and brunettes, white-skinned, dark-skinned, short, and tall, but each of them so good-looking they nearly brought tears to my eyes.

"There are a lot of side benefits to buying a car from us," Frank said. "If you want them. Were you recommended by anyone? Someone who might have told you about us, recommended our special services?"

I think it was the way she looked, the way she sat, the way she laid out the questions, that made me think what she was asking wasn't exactly what she was saying. I began to get some idea of what we had actually walked into.

I avoided her questions, and asked her one.

"Say we want to buy something to go along with a car."

She didn't even blink. "You don't mind expense?"

"I'm in a good financial position," I said. "Inheritance. Some patents. I'm well-off, to put it bluntly."

Leonard coughed a little.

"Are you all right?" Frank asked Leonard.

"Yeah," he said. "I think I swallowed a moth or something coming in."

"Really?" she said.

"I'm all right," Leonard said. "It was a little moth."

"Goodness," she said.

Her concern for Leonard dying of moth inhalation was brief.

She leaned forward, showing me her cleavage, which I should note was deep enough you might need mining equipment, a good light on your helmet, and some serious camping supplies to go down there and look around.

"What if I wanted something from your catalog?" I said.

"What kind of model are you looking for?" she said, leaned back and arched her back slightly. It was enough to give me a new and exciting view of the Grand Tetons.

"Something in your caliber," I said, and I was surprised to find there was a catch in my voice. I, too, must have swallowed a moth. "The sort of car you would drive, I mean."

"Of course," she said. "A nice, clean, serviceable model." She smiled to show me there was a joke in there somewhere.

Leonard cut his eyes at me. Buffy did that the same way. They really did have the same eyes. I put my attention on Frank. "Exactly," I said. "A nice, clean, serviceable model."

Now Frank laid it on thicker. She lowered her eyes slightly, gave me a sleepy kind of look, the sort she thought I might like to wake up to. Her voice dropped slightly, and you could almost hear panties drop and bedsheets being pulled back in that voice.

"Something sleek and fine-tuned. Something that could make you feel fine-tuned yourself."

"That sounds good," I said. "I mean, who doesn't want to be fine-tuned?"

She looked at Leonard, lowered her eyelashes, and gave him that sleepy kind of look.

"How about you?" she said. "You think you might decide you want a fine-tuned car, too?"

"Absolutely. Something that would just tune the shit out of me would be nice," he said.

She acted mildly shocked at such language, but in a pleasant way, as if she were a preacher's wife who now and then liked to have a beer and have her ass pinched.

“So we’re talking a car for both of you?” she said.

“Oh, yeah,” Leonard said. “I just came as his backup, but now that you mention it, hell, I might as well get one. Whatever he gets, I want one better. Fact is, make it bigger and longer than his.”

“We’ve known each other a long time,” I said. “We’re a tad competitive.”

“I suppose it’s friendly competition,” she said.

“Friendly as shit,” Leonard said.

She smiled that killer smile again, settled back in her chair, and let her gaze hang somewhere in between us.

“Tell me how you heard of us,” she said.

I had dodged that question earlier.

“I drive by here all the time,” I said.

She gave me a stony look. That wasn’t the right answer, but I was still trying to see how much of what I thought was going on was real and how much was my imagination.

I laughed. “Of course, as I pointed out, the merchandise I want isn’t on the lot. I think I’m making myself clear, am I not?”

“I’ve explained about the catalog,” she said. She was beginning to lose some of her giddy sweetness. She was definitely wanting an answer to her question. And the right answer.

“I’ve been told there are some things that come with the cars that aren’t in the catalog,” I said. “Or at least it can be that way.”

She didn’t bite. Just smiled. Not a very good one this time, just enough to show her teeth and wet her lipstick.

“I had a friend tell me about the place,” I said. “He knew a lady named Sandy, and Sandy put him into a good ride at a fair but certainly upscale price.”

The woman narrowed her eyes. “Oh,” she said. “When was this?”

“Maybe five years ago,” I said.

“Who was this man?” she asked.

“Fellow I met in passing,” I said. “At a party. A party Ms. Lilly Buckner arranged. I met him there. Sandy was her granddaughter, and this fellow, the one at the party, he knew her a little. Actually he said ‘a little but well,’ if you catch my drift. Said she worked here. He told me a bit about what you offer.”

“A little but well?” she said. “Kind of a contradictory statement, isn’t it?”

“Not the way he meant it,” I said.

"Of course," she said, but she had grown as cold as the air-conditioning unit since I mentioned Sandy. "We did have a Sandy, but she quit. Stopped coming in, actually. And this wasn't her work station. She was assigned to another office, another division of the business."

"Another division?" Leonard said.

"Another city, but she was here for a while, then she was gone. The other division, in Fort Worth, she just quit showing up there. Can't say I remember her that well. Well, right now inventory is small, Hap, but I'll keep you in mind."

"What about the catalog?" I asked.

"I think I misspoke," she said. "I realize I might not have what you want at all. The other services. Road check. Free tire rotation. That may not be available right now."

"It wasn't my tires I was hoping to get rotated," I said.

"I have no idea what you mean, but I made a mistake. We won't have any cars for a while."

"Not a good way to sell product," I said. "Not having it available after you say you do."

"We don't need to sell many of what we sell to make good money. We're expensive."

"I can afford the expense," I said.

"He can," Leonard said. "He's got patents on sex toys. Nice stuff—he ought to show you the line sometime. What's in his catalog is for sale. There's this one—a big purple rubber dick with metal studs on it—that will make you scream like there's a man with a chain saw after you. And me, I got some serious-ass money. A white couple left me their estate. I was their gardener for about ten years. They didn't know that secretly I hated them for their whiteness and called them ugly names behind their backs. Cracker, honky, and such. That old, wrinkly lady, and her having me stud her. Jesus. That was some tough work, I got to tell you. I'd rather have had a job wiping asses in hell. Dropped her drawers, lay down on the bed, that thing of hers looked like a taco rolled in hair rotting on a blanket. Paid all right, though. Still, you had to get past the smell and imagine it was a goddamn donkey to get a hard-on."

I thought: Gardener? White couple? Stud to a wrinkly old lady? Get past the smell? What the fuck?

"Is that so?" Frank said to Leonard. Under her green-eyed gaze I felt like we had gone from two wealthy buyers to a couple of yokels in mud-splashed overalls with cow shit on our shoes and the intellectual level of a bag of busted bricks.

"He's a joker," I said. "He's just not too funny."

"Oh, I'm not kidding. The old man knew how to keep an erection. Viagra. That's the drug for the aged; that's what I'm trying to tell you. I think for everyone over sixty they ought to pass it out for free. Put it in their fucking oatmeal and mashed peas. By the way, do you have a hat to go with that outfit? I think it needs one."

Frank stared at Leonard. I think she wasn't certain what she had just heard. When she was certain, she said, "I do have a hat. It matches the skirt." Then to me: "You have a card? Maybe I can let you know when we have new inventory. I can make my mistake up to you if something comes in."

"That sounds good," I said. "But I'm out of cards. I'll just write down a phone number you can call."

"Very well," she said.

I wrote my number down on a pad with a pen she handed me. I didn't put my last name, just Hap. Leonard didn't bother writing his number or name, just told her to call and make it two, but to make his more expensive and better. The competition thing. But by then Frank was like someone waiting for a train to pass.

I finished the writing, did it carefully, remembering where she had touched the pen. I didn't touch that spot. I looked at the pen when I finished. It was one of a handful in a small, decorative jar on her desk.

"Are these to spare?" I said, holding up my signing pen.

"Handouts," she said.

"Good," I said. "You'll call right away if something comes up?"

"Of course," she said.

Maybe saying there was a party at Ms. Buckner's was my mistake. Maybe she knew the old bat, realized she wasn't exactly a party animal. Then or five years ago. And, of course, Leonard had fucked up any chance I had of rescuing the deal.

We stood up.

Frank said to Leonard, "You must have been some gardener to inherit their money."

"Well, I was plowing a couple of fields in the house, not to mention the garden. I was good, though. I could make an old man scream and an old woman shit herself. I could grow a rose that would kiss your ass every morning and sing you to sleep at night. And petunias—oh, hell, they were so goddamn fine we had a paying tour come by once a year every winter."

"Petunias grow in the winter?" Frank said. She wanted us gone, but she just couldn't help herself. Maybe she was wondering if there was really something to it. A gardener gigolo.

"Mine grew in the winter, and that's why there was a tour," Leonard said. "Nuns. Boy Scouts. Mostly civic people. They were happy as hell to be there and see those petunias. Hybrids. Very special."

"I'm sure they were," Frank said.

We left. I made sure my grip stayed exactly the same on the pen. When we were back in the car, Leonard said, "Talk about going from hot to cold."

"Oh, really? I have patents on sex toys? A white couple left you money for being a gardener? And you secretly hated them and were plowing their fields, making them scream and shit themselves, and to fuck the old woman you had to imagine a donkey? Roses that could kiss your ass and petunia tours in the winter for nuns and Boy Scouts? What the hell, Leonard?"

"We were already burned," Leonard said, starting up the car, easing it off the lot. "I thought I might as well mess with her. I didn't like her."

"I guess you have a point, brother. It was over before we came in the door. I mean, she nibbled at the bait a little but didn't like the taste."

"Yep. She's not going to call," Leonard said. "Our pony stumbled into the ditch when you mentioned Sandy. And I think mentioning Ms. Buckner broke its leg."

"And you shot the pony in the head with that gigolo-gardener crap," I said.

"Someone had to put our bullshit pony out of its misery," he said. "It was kind of funny, though, wasn't it?"

"No."

"Hap?"

"It wasn't."

"Hap, come on, man."

"It was amusing to some degree. The old woman shitting herself was a nice touch."

"Told you. And I don't believe she had a hat to go with that outfit. I would have a hat with something like that. I like a good hat. She had a hat, she'd have had it on."

"You see her keep looking out at our car?" I said.

"I think she was memorizing the license number."

"If she's got the contacts, and I bet she does, she'll find someone who can trace it to a car rental."

"Yep. We're fucked on the secret-agent front," he said. "We were better at sexing chickens back at the chicken plant."

"Oh, I don't know," I said. "I couldn't tell a chicken wee-wee from a dee-dee. I could make a good aluminum chair, though."

"And I was a good bouncer."

"Until you got fired for kicking that guy's ass and peeing on his head."

"Yeah," Leonard said. "They thought that was excessive. Bunch of weenies. You know what we did do well? Rose-field work."

"We did. But it was hot in the summer and cold in the winter."

"Seasons work like that, Hap. It's not uncommon. Sometimes it rains, too."

"We're not actually too good at anything, are we?"

"Sadly, I was just thinking that," he said.

Leonard drove us to the office. I never let go of that pen. We pulled up in the lot. The sign for our office had changed, of course. It said BRETT SAWYER INVESTIGATIONS. That was done right away, and Marvin did it. He had to make sure no one thought he was working both sides of the street.

Just for luck, I checked for the bicycle lady and the shorts she likes to wear. She has a very successful store downstairs. You wouldn't think you could sell and repair that many bicycles, but then again, you got to see her in those shorts so much of the time. They make men and some women want to buy a bicycle or a hippopotamus, and catching sight of her in those sweet little things is as fine and satisfying as a tour of petunias in the dead of winter.

Neither she nor her shorts were on display. There were no petunias, either. Not that I'd recognize one if I saw it.

8

When we came into the office the air-conditioning hit us in a pleasing way. It wasn't as savage as the air in the car-lot office, but it was showing summer some anger. The couch was pulled out, and Brett and Buffy were asleep on it. Brett woke up when we closed the door but only moved a bit and didn't open her eyes.

Buffy raised her head in a tentative manner, like she was expecting a beating. When she looked like that I wanted to drive over to that fellow's house and pull him out of it and kick him around the way Leonard and Marvin had. I wanted to see him on a daily basis and do just what he had done to a helpless, loving dog. I wanted to see him flinch every time he saw me. I guess that made me the same as him. Naw. He's a grown-ass man. A dog expects to be loved. And deserves to. Any man that would kick a dog like that ought to have a knot jerked in his dick, the kind that could only be untied with a butcher knife.

"Been a tough day, huh?" Leonard said to Brett.

Brett cocked one eye open and left it open. The other eye finally followed.

"I didn't have a pillow, and the mattress is a tad lumpy," she said, "but I'm tough. I can handle it." Brett rolled over and put her feet on the floor, smacked her lips, and yawned. She had on jeans and a loose T-shirt. Her red hair had been pinned back, but part of it had come loose and hung across one shoulder. "Girl has to keep up her strength. Besides, I wanted Buffy to learn how to snuggle."

"How'd that work out?" I asked.

"It's a little like hugging a mahogany end table. Her legs stick straight out and go stiff. But she was sort of getting into it when you two interrupted us. How'd your morning go?"

"Not sure," I said.

"It does seem as if there's more than the car business going on there, though," Leonard said. "Fact is, I don't think the car business is going on in as big a way as monkey business."

"I'm not a fan of monkeys," Brett said. "Apes I like. Monkeys not so much. I think it's the screeching."

"Both monkeys and apes throw shit," I said. "I think we had some thrown at us today."

"Why are you holding that pen like that?" she asked.

I went to the desk drawer, where I knew there was a box of plastic bags we had bought for a variety of reasons, evidence being one. I unlocked the drawer with my key, which Leonard did not have a copy of, and put the pen in a plastic bag and left it in the drawer. I said, "I'm going to take advantage of our friendship with Marvin and see if I can get him to run the prints of a certain well-turned-out lady ape who I think may be selling more than cars and is the one who flung a lot of shit on us."

"Oh," Brett said. "How well turned out?"

"Nothing you have to worry about," Leonard said.

"No offense," Brett said, "but you aren't exactly the best judge of female flesh."

"You got a point there," he said.

"She was all right, but not my type," I said.

"I'll accept that," she said.

"On the other hand, maybe she thought me and Leonard were boyfriends," I said.

"If she did," Leonard said, "and I find out, I will personally set fire to that place, then shoot you."

I got comfortable in one of our nifty new chairs, said to Brett, "I think it's a place that gets a lot of people walking through the lot, but very few people ask about buying. I think they sell some cars but reckon they are mostly taking recommended clients, and it has to do with something besides automobiles. I got the vibe they were selling prostitution, but for all I know they got a big cookie-baking deal on the side, and that's what they're selling. I tried to make Frank—that was her name—believe I was a potential prostitute user or cookie buyer. Being with Leonard messed that up. He's like bringing a wolf to a butcher shop. He just can't help himself. He was all up in the pork chops."

"Oh, now you're blaming me," he said.

"I tried to sell us both, but I wasn't having any luck. Leonard was a bump on a log. He had nothing worthwhile to offer except claiming to have gotten an inheritance from rich white folks for his gardening expertise and bedroom prowess. Said he gave tours of his petunias. In the winter. He said I had patents for sex toys."

“I wish you did,” Brett said.

“He’s just pissed his charm didn’t do it,” Leonard said. “That he didn’t have any.”

“A little of that, yeah,” I said.

Brett said, “No one should really let you guys out without a leash. And really, Leonard? Petunias?”

“I thought it made me sound sweet,” he said.

“That’ll be the day,” I said. “And his story was a lot worse than that, but I’ll spare you the details.”

I got up and plucked us bottled waters from the little fridge. We all sat down and sipped water while me and Leonard told Brett more about what we may have found out. It all seemed less likely by that point. Frank hadn’t really said anything incriminating, not actually. I began to think I had imagined a connection between cars and prostitution and Sandy’s disappearance. I might as well have thrown in a Bigfoot sighting.

“It sounds way too precious,” Brett said. “A car lot that sells poontang to rich people. Why bother? Why not just set up a simple escort service?”

“The cars are the lure, and the word gets around through satisfied customers. Expensive cars and expensive women. It could be a gold mine for them.”

Brett shook her head. “I don’t know. It may be monkey business, but it may be a totally different monkey than the one you’re suggesting.”

“Could be,” I said. “But high-end clientele do things in different ways. No dimly lit massage parlors with stained towels or street-corner hookers with more germs than the Centers for Disease Control. That’s too raw for them. This is elevated business for people who are willing to spend serious money. It may be hard to believe, but not only can they attract people from other places for the service, there are lots of people right here in town with money. Some of it is even legal. Lilly Buckner said Sandy came into some good money working for the car company, and then all of a sudden she wasn’t in good money at all, or didn’t seem to be, since she lifted her grandmother’s goods. The good money could have been for the services that came with the car—sex, drugs, a party. I don’t know. Maybe something happened, and she found out something else about the business she didn’t like. Could be she was actually researching what was going on there to do an exposé—going undercover, trying to use that journalism degree.”

“But she got caught?” Brett said.

"And she needed money to run," Leonard said.

"What I'm thinking," I said.

"I'm still skeptical," Brett said. "I mean, a car you can use every day, but this call-girl thing, paying that much money for a car and a one-time hump. No ass is worth that much."

"Except for yours, of course," I said.

"Oh, you are in for so much loving, Hap Collins," she said.

"What I'm saying is it could be like an exclusive membership. Now that you're in the club, the ass is there when you want it. You still pay, but not as much as the first time, because you were buying a car with it."

"Yeah, all right," Brett said. "I hear you. Still skeptical."

"I just want a cookie," Leonard said. "I know they're in that drawer and you have the key."

"What do you think about all this, Leonard?" Brett asked.

"I want the key to that drawer," he said.

"About the car lot and the prostitution business," she said.

"Oh. I think it's what Hap says, and I'd still like a cookie."

"Maybe tomorrow." I said.

"Don't be mean, Hap," Brett said.

"He needs to learn delayed gratification," I said.

Brett opened the drawer with her key and gave Leonard a cookie. He ate it slowly and happily. But he watched carefully as she relocked the drawer and put the key away.

"Dang it," I said. "You broke down, baby."

"Okay, laying the Sandy Buckner problem aside," Brett said, "there has been some good news. The lady who had you snooping on her husband came by and paid her last check and said she was happy with the results, though curiously she's divorcing her husband anyway."

"What?" I said.

"Said she didn't like him keeping secrets from her. But you know what I think? I think the marriage just played out, and she was looking for a way to end it."

"You figured all that because she gave you a check?" Leonard asked.

"No, actually she told me that," Brett said. "Said she was happy for twenty years, or thought she was, and then one morning she got up thinking he was cheating, and he wasn't, but she hoped he was. Said he's devastated and she feels a little bad about it, but she's moving on anyway."

"People are strange," I said.

"I called Marvin to offer him his part of the payment," Brett said, "but he doesn't want it. He says all of it is ours to have. He's keeping himself clear of the old business so there won't be any misunderstandings."

"Does this mean dinner out for me and you and John and Leonard?" I asked.

"Buffy would be alone," she said. "I don't think she's ready for that."

"Good point," I said.

"We could order something and have it here or at the house," Brett said.

Leonard shook his head. "John and I are going to pass. We're working on things. I think I need to sort of hang close. He's like your new dog right now. Vulnerable and confused. And me, I'm not too good at dealing with vulnerable. I kind of see it as a weakness. John comes and he goes. He's on about things. He's off about things. All that shit just makes my ass tired. I'm sick of talking about it, but I want a decision."

"He's vulnerable, like Buffy," I said, "but he acts like a cat."

"Tell me about it," Leonard said. "Just get over it or get on with something else and let me know where you stand. I hate all this back-and-forth bullshit about our feelings and such. My feelings are I care about him and I want to go to bed with him and I want to watch television with him, and now and again I want him to just leave me the fuck alone."

"That's part of the problem," Brett said. "You wanting him to just leave you the fuck alone now and again. Maybe you ought to at least pretend to be understanding."

"I suppose," Leonard said, shifting his butt onto the edge of the desk, crossing his well-muscled arms. "But you know what? Just pull your pants up and get on with it. I get so tired of all the whining. Do what it takes or shut up."

"Oh, that has got to be good pillow talk," I said.

"Pretty understanding and romantic," Brett said.

"Yeah, John don't care for it much," Leonard said.

"Sometimes a little white lie never hurts anybody," Brett said. "Tell him you feel his pain and understand his feelings, and that it's something the two of you will get through together. It might even come true."

"But it isn't like that," Leonard said. "I can't listen to that 'I'm a homo sinner' shit and not want to start tearing up the place."

"I bet that homo thing really goes down tight with the gay community," I said.

"I wouldn't know," he said. "I don't much like any community. I don't want to be part of anyone's goddamn club other than my own. I don't have problems with who I am. I don't want to tell a little white lie about how I understand where he's coming from, because I don't."

"Sometimes you have to lie a little," I said.

"So you lie to Brett?" Leonard said.

Brett was looking right at me.

"I didn't say that," I said.

"You just told me it was a good idea," Leonard said.

"Actually, she did."

"You just said the same thing," Leonard said.

"I was just saying who said what."

"And I'm just saying you were one of those who said what," Leonard said.

Brett was watching this like a Ping-Pong match.

Another five minutes and I had extricated myself from the mess with a few white lies, and Leonard and I left to return the BMW.

Leonard chuckled as we rode along. "Got you, didn't I, brother?"

"That stuff about lying was because of the cookies, wasn't it?"

"Most definitely was. John's not the only one on the fade right now. I am feeling quite vulnerable myself. For cookies."

"At least you're simple," I said.

9

That night I invited Marvin and his wife over after Leonard and I returned the car to the Tyler rental and I got mine back. Marvin said he would come, but not Rachel. I expected that. She hates me and Leonard. We saved her daughter once, and she's appreciative of that, but spending an evening with me would for her be like having her asshole worked over with a plumbing snake.

We ordered from a barbecue joint by phone. I drove over and picked it up about twenty minutes before Marvin showed up. I got Buffy a sandwich as well. Later, I'd take her to the drive-through at Dairy Queen and get her a vanilla cone, a double.

It was a good meal. The sandwiches. Ice tea. We also had some potato chips and a bit of pecan pie that had been frozen since last Thanksgiving. It tasted all right, though. Nobody died. All in all I was off my diet for one night, and I loved it. I felt good enough to give Leonard his cookies had he been there. Back at the office it had been a joke, but now I was thinking about his face and how he had looked. You had to know him well to know the difference, but there was despair there, as much as he knew how to show. Of course, John was the real problem, but a cookie wouldn't have hurt him. Or I could take him to the drive-through and get him a vanilla ice cream cone, too. He'd like that. Maybe tomorrow. I could even roll the window down and let him hang his head out the way Buffy likes to do. Of course, if he knew I was thinking like that, comparing him to a dog, he'd have my ass on a stick.

When we were done eating I went out of the room and came back with the bag with the pen in it. I told Marvin how I had come by it, told him what I suspected, told him about our visit with Frank. What we had said, what she had said.

"Seems pretty elaborate for a call-girl setup," Marvin said.

"What I thought," Brett said. "Ridiculous, really."

"Leonard agrees with me," I said.

"There you have it," Marvin said. "If Leonard thinks so, then we should consider no more. Where is that jackass?”

“Home with John.”

“They’re back together?”

“I think it’s on the fence. One of those with twists of barbed wire along the top. John is feeling gay again and some of his religion and his brother’s influence have faded and in the meantime his pecker has gotten hard, but Leonard doesn’t like it.”

“The pecker?”

“The situation,” I said. “Doesn’t like having to coax John along. Thinks he should just get over it.”

“That time me and my wife had the troubles, I paid for that for years. Sometimes I still pay for it. Not that I didn’t deserve it. Rachel took care of me through my accident, but we were split in a way, even then, because of me messing around. We were together, but we weren’t. I was there. She was there, but we weren’t there together.”

“As a woman,” Brett said, “I can see her position.”

“As a man I can see it,” I said.

“It was stupid on my part,” Marvin said. “One of many stupid things I did. I’m glad we’re back together, but there’s times when Rachel’s giving me the hairy eyeball, and I sort of get the wish we weren’t together, that I’d moved on. And then I think of being without Rachel and I get sick. I’m sure Leonard is going through all that kind of thinking. And I got to admit, he may be on to something. You got to think there’s a point where you either say high five or drown the son of a bitch.”

“So how are things at home?” I asked.

Marvin laughed.

“Don’t ask that,” Brett said, slapping me on the shoulder.

“It’s all right,” Marvin said. “I’m not sleeping on the living room couch anymore. Being back in bed with Rachel feels funny. Like I’m sleeping in a bear’s den and she’s the bear and she’s going to wake up and claw me to death and eat me and shit me out behind the house.”

“Must make for some restless nights,” Brett said.

“It does,” Marvin said. He picked up the bag with the pen in it, turned it around in the light as if he might actually see her prints with his naked eye. “So you want me to run the prints? You believe there’s something to it?”

“I do,” I said. “See if there’s anything on Frank, or Frankie.” I placed her card on the table. “Note there’s no last name on the card, either. Just Frank. The name of the business and a phone number. I left my name and cell number, but like Frank I didn’t leave a last name. I don’t think it matters, I said. I think she made me pretty quick, knew I wasn't legitimately rich. And then Leonard clinched it all with the sex-toy patents and the petunias."

"It's hard to know how to act rich when you've never been," Marvin said.

"Yep," I said. "Anyway, she made me and Leonard and that was it: we were given our traveling papers, and we were out the door."

"All right," Marvin said. "I'll look into it. Might be enough to reopen the cold case on Sandy."

"Do you know anything about that case?" I asked.

Marvin shook his head. "Been gone too long. But I'll look into it this week. My guess is she's growing grass somewhere."

"That's what her grandmother thinks, but she still wants her back," I said. "Even if it's just her bones or a hank of hair."

"I understand."

We had another cup of coffee, and then after an hour or so, Marvin said he had to go. Brett popped some popcorn while I drove Buffy to the drive-through for that ice cream cone. When we got back the dog consented to lying on the couch between us, but she was nervous every time we reached out to pet her. That, of course, made me mad at her previous owner all over again.

Other than that, it was a nice night. The popcorn was a little greasy, and it gave me a feeling of having a knotted rope in my stomach. But hey—compared to stuff that was going to happen, it wasn't so bad.

10

It seemed like forever before I fell asleep, and it seemed a shorter time before I awoke to Brett saying, “We got to go to the office.”

“Didn’t we just lay down?” I said.

“Nope.”

“I feel like I just laid down.”

“Was it night when you laid down?”

“Yes.”

“It’s day now, so you didn’t just lay down.”

“It’s early,” I said. “You own the place. I’m just part-time hired help. I been thinking about calling in a sick day.”

“You’re full-time. And when I go, you go. And you don’t get sick days. Come on, lazybones.”

“But why would I go to the office? I’m not a receptionist.”

“Because I want you there. Either that or you and Leonard can get on the job and find out something about Sandy.”

“We’ll do that,” I said and tried to cover back up.

“And you’ll still get up,” she said.

“What if I offered savage sex?”

“Would it have to be with you?”

“Yes,” I said. “I think it would.”

“Then get up.”

While Brett made coffee, I put the leash on Buffy and took her out, and damn near jumped a foot. Leonard was sitting on our porch swing. He was pushing gently with his foot, back and forth. His skin, normally black as night, looked ashen. He had lines around his eyes and mouth and appeared to have shrunk into himself.

“What the hell, man?” I said.

“John went home last night. I didn’t want to stay in the apartment.”

“So you sat out here and sniffed under our door?”

“Yeah. Did you have barbecue?”

“We did,” I said. “What happened, man? Did John leave angry?”

"I think so. I told him to go fuck himself, because I wasn't going to."

"I'm going to vote he was angry."

"Sounds right. He kicked one of my shoes on the way out and slammed the door."

"More evidence," I said. "What happened to get you in the 'go fuck yourself' department?"

"One whine too many. And then just before we got down to the business, he got on his knees by the bed and prayed to God to forgive him. That set a tone I didn't like. If he had been praying for strength, I could have got behind that, so to speak. But forgiveness? Hell, we hadn't even done anything yet. That wilted my pecker something furious, let me tell you."

"How long have you been here?"

"Since sometime last night. I dozed a little. I woke up, and a raccoon was in the yard. He looked at me like this was his swing."

"It is. He comes here at night. Likes to make it move by swaying from side to side. You're here tomorrow night, he might not be as accommodating. And he has friends. Come in. Have some coffee."

We went inside, me leading Buffy and Leonard. Brett glanced at Leonard.

"Look what turned up," I said. "And I still need to walk the dog."

Me and Buffy went back outside. The heat moved across the morning like an invisible truck, heavy and crushing, and with a hotter engine than the day before. It was the kind of heat that made me feel short and fat and close to the ground. It made me thirsty and made my stomach heavy as lead. I wished for rain, but knew if it came, even if it cooled things, when it passed it would be hot again and, worse yet, humid. Nothing helped but the arrival of winter.

Buffy sniffed where the raccoon had been, then did her business near the edge of the road under one of our trees on a patch of grass. I walked her down the sidewalk for about twenty minutes, then put her in the house, got the shovel from the garage, and cleaned up the dog crap, bagged it and trashed it. Time I got through doing that I felt even shorter and heavier and was sweated up and almost sick from the heat.

Inside we all had coffee, and I had a lot of cool water to boot, hydrating myself and thinking maybe I might move to Maine. I said that once to Leonard, and he said, "If it isn't the heat, it's the Yankees, and I prefer the heat."

You'd have thought he fought for the Confederacy.

Leonard and Buffy rode with us to the office. I suggested we get Buffy an ice cream, but Brett was against it. “She’s been indulged enough. And besides, it’s not good for her, and she shouldn’t have something like that so early.”

“Its not like drinking,” I said. “It’s okay to have a cone before ten. And she’s not driving.”

“It’s important to set a good example,” Brett said.

At the office we gave Leonard some cookies, primarily because he had a shitty night. I gave Buffy one when Brett was in the bathroom. I said to Leonard, “Don’t tell.”

“Only if the key to the drawer is mine when I want it,” he said.

“You are an evil bastard,” I said.

That’s when the phone rang.

It was Marvin. He had some news on the fingerprints.

He drove over and we made more coffee, decaf this time, and got comfortable. Buffy climbed on the couch. She was starting to be bolder. I liked that.

“How’s the new job?” I said.

“Fits me like a G-string,” he said. “Nice and snug.”

“You had to go there,” I said. “Now I’ve got that in my head all day.”

“If you can’t stop thinking about it, call me later,” Marvin said.

Brett came out of the bathroom then. When she saw Marvin, she said, “I was only in there to powder my nose.”

“Of course,” he said.

“I thought I heard the toilet flush,” Leonard said.

“Hey,” she said. “Who gave you cookies?”

“I may have heard the flush below, in the bicycle shop,” he said.

“That fingerprint you gave me,” Marvin said. “You’ll like this. It belongs to a man.”

“Interesting, to put it mildly,” I said. “Frank didn’t look like a man, in spite of the name. Maybe you ought to run them again.”

“Frank, or Frankie, is really one Frank Chesterville from the old days, but she had the tree cut and the stump split.”

“A surprise, but not a crime,” I said.

“It depends on how big the dick was,” Leonard said. “Some things, from my viewpoint, are a criminal waste.”

“You’re going there again,” Brett said. “Lady present, goddamn it.”

“The measurements were not in the report,” Marvin said. “She does have a record, though. I guess that’s right. She? Hormones and operations now put her in the female department. That’s right, isn’t it?”

“Why you looking at me?” Leonard said. “I’m queer, not an expert on every kind of sexual orientation in the world. I look at it simple. You got your good folks and your bad folks. They can be nudists, gays, trans doodads and no doodads, albinos, midgets and giants, black, white, brown, all the colors in between. I keep it simple. I think Frank might be a bad folk."

"I think you meant little people," I said.

"What?"

"You said 'midgets.' I think they like to be called little people."

"Fuck you," Leonard said. "And fuck the little people, too, right down to the ground. And piss on their little hats."

"Little hats?" Brett said.

"Oh, he is fussy today," I said.

"I just thought you might know what was what," Marvin said, shrugging his shoulders, looking at Leonard.

"So what's the past crime Frank committed?" Brett said. "You didn't wind up with her fingerprints in the system for nothing."

"You'll love this," Marvin said. "When she was a he, she was a pimp in Fort Worth. High-class, but a pimp nonetheless. Ran a tip-top joint, had people who took care of bad company, throwing them out, giving them an attitude adjustment now and then. No leg breaking, stuff like that, just kind of rearranging them for a moment. Keeping it all clean and calm and profitable. But Frank got nailed for pimping, did a little time and paid a fine, got out, had the sex change, and maybe changed her life. She may have gone on to better things and is a fine example of humankind and only works at the car place to finance her research into the elimination of cancer. Or maybe not."

Marvin paused.

"You want someone to ask, 'What do you mean "maybe not"?' don't you?" Leonard said.

"Thank you," Marvin said. "Frank did have a minor problem later with a man who said she was trying to blackmail him. That got swept under the rug, though. I think the guy got over being mad and started worrying about what his wife would think about some film that may or may not have been taken of him doing the sweaty-sheet wallow. He decided not to press the issue."

I thought on that a moment. "I don't know for sure she's still pimping, but it sounded like it to me. She was talking in a way where I could keep asking until I got the answer I needed. But I spooked her. I wasn't a guy with money, and she smelled a rat."

"Well, this isn't my problem just yet," Marvin said. "No crime is known. I'm just giving you a little information on the sly. If it comes to something, let me know. Frankly, I don't really give a shit if she's selling ass, as long as no one is underage or forced and they're keeping clean and not spreading disease. But you know, the law is the law, so if I should know it for a fact, I got to act. Blackmail is involved, that's a different matter. That one bothers me, and I damn sure need to know about it should you find out."

"Our business is finding Sandy," I said. "That's it. Wherever it leads."

"From what you've told me," Marvin said, "if Sandy went to work for them peddling tail, it's possible she moved on. Maybe she just didn't want anything to do with Grandma, and Grandma thinks she's dead, but she's moved on to be a hairdresser in Fort Lauderdale."

"That's possible," Brett said. "But I bet Grandma, who is, at least by her own admission, tech-savvy, has searched for her. It's harder to hide these days than it used to be."

"But not impossible," Marvin said. "People do it every day."

"We'll find her," Brett said.

"I love my girl because she's an optimist," I said.

"One week on the job and she's Sam Spade," Marvin said.

"Sammy Spade now," she said. Then looked at me, said, "You and me, baby, we need to talk."

"Honey, even if you were a horse in a past life, I'm satisfied," I said.

"I'm not sure what to think about that," Brett said. Then she whinnied.

11

We have this friend named Cason Statler. He works for a dying newspaper in Camp Rapture, which isn't far from LaBorde. He's one of those dark-haired guys that looks like an underwear model but is tough as sandpaper. Been in the military. Been to war. I don't know all the details, but he's done some things that have given him hard bark, even if it doesn't show right away. I like him.

Brett, on the other hand, thinks Cason's a little too free with the ladies, plays the field too much, but my take is if he's not making any promises to anyone, then so be it. Make it clear, and everyone knows the lay of the land, then it's all good if everyone is in agreement. Doesn't matter in whose garage he's parking the car.

We drove over to Camp Rapture and caught him at the newspaper. He didn't even ask for time off, just came with us. We wheeled over to a coffee shop downtown, where a very nice-looking, bouncy blond waitress wearing a short dress with barber-pole-striped stockings up to her knees put the hustle on Cason. Me and Leonard might as well have been extra chairs. Cason was polite with his smile, gave it to her freely, then ordered all of us coffee, and when she went for it, he said, "So you want me to be an operative of sorts?"

We had explained a bit of it to him as we drove him from the paper to the coffee shop.

"That's about the size of it," Leonard said. "Thing is, man, we don't know what's going on. It might be a legitimate car lot that sells expensive cars and we just looked like old biscuits, not new bread, so she was willing to let us pass. Then again, maybe Frankie was hiding something."

"Here's the thing," I said. "Frankie used to be Frank, but now she looks like a retired movie star planning a comeback. I don't know which way she swings. Men, women, zebras, or moose. But we think if you put on some nice duds, you got the look that says money, and you got the look she'd like if she likes men. I can't tell you which end of the farm she works. I don't know if she's hoeing potatoes or corn."

"What am I getting out of this?" he asked.

"The satisfaction of finding out if the place is actually a front for a call-girl service or something else nefarious. It's got a stink all over it. You could write a damn good article or two or three on that. We think that's what Sandy was trying to do—write an article."

Cason thought that over. He sipped his coffee, thought it over some more. "I could use a good article. I could make a series out of it if it's any good. Last piece I wrote was about the blueberry festival. Bad year. Lots of rot."

"There's always the cabbage festival next year," Leonard said.

Cason nodded. "Might be something there, except we don't have a cabbage festival."

"You could write like there's one," Leonard said. "Like it was a huge event, and everyone reading will think, shit, I missed the goddamn cabbage festival."

"No," Cason said. "I don't think so."

The waitress came with the coffee. She made some small talk, and we tried to make some with her, Leonard and I being witty and all, but she didn't think so. On the other hand, there wasn't anything Cason said that wasn't interesting to her. He asked for some Sweet'N Low. She went away and got it and was back faster than I could pour cream in my coffee.

Cason managed to end their conversation politely. When she left we noticed one of the artificial-sweetener packs had her name and phone number on it. This did not seem to take Cason by surprise. He stuck the packet in his shirt pocket without so much as blinking.

Okay. Maybe Brett was right, and he was a little bit too much of a player. Or maybe I was jealous he was so attractive to women. Leonard, of course, just thought it was funny. Hell, I think he had a mild crush on the guy.

"What we'll do is set you up with a rental," Leonard said. "Nice car, a bit of spending money. But please don't spend it."

"I may have to," he said.

"Only if you have to." I said. "Brett's money."

I took a moment to tell him that we weren't working for Marvin, how things had changed.

"How much money?" he said.

"A thousand," I said. "Plus the rental. You may have to get that in Tyler. That's what we did. But she might check the license plate."

He nodded. “I won’t need a rental. I know a brunette lady who has a very nice old Jag. She’ll loan it to me.”

“All you have to do is wash it when you finish,” I said.

“Maybe a little more than that,” he said. “Still something that will get me wet, but nothing that hurts my feelings.”

12

Cason told us he would start the next day, as he had a loose rein at the newspaper, could pretty much come and go as he pleased. He was the only one who worked there who at one point had been short-listed for the Pulitzer, so he was kind of their pet.

Since there was nothing for us to do but wait, we drove over to see Ms. Buckner. I had a few questions for her. It was a simple house with the grass grown up and a mailbox at the curb on a post that leaned a little. The garage was closed up tight where the Mercedes would be resting, ready to threaten cars and dogs and people on bicycles.

Once upon a time there had been a flower bed next to the house. Now it was weeds, and even they looked as if they were hoping for death. There was a stone Negro lawn jockey between the flower bed and the door. I thought he looked very hot and a lot insulted.

“Nice,” Leonard said, studying the jockey.

I laughed at him and rang the bell.

It was hot outside, and it took her about the time it took for a roast to cook in a slow oven before she answered the door. She was wearing a loose white shirt with food stains on it and some yellow stretch pants that fit her a little too well, causing the bones in her hips to stand out. She had on fluffy brown house shoes. She studied us for a long moment.

“Found her?” she asked.

“No,” I said.

“Then what the hell are you here for?”

“She is so endearing,” Leonard said.

“Go fuck yourself,” Ms. Buckner said, glaring at Leonard with two watery eyeballs.

“And her verbal skills are delightful,” he said.

“Kiss my ass,” she said.

“We just need to ask a few questions,” I said.

“I hired you to find my granddaughter, not ask me a bunch of questions,” she said to me. “What’s he doing here, anyway?”

“She liked you better when you kicked the dog abuser,” I said.

“I still like that part,” she said. “But why is he here?”

“Just to be clear, Leonard works with me and the lady you met at the office.”

“She’s kind of a bitch,” the old lady said.

“Wow, that is something,” Leonard said. “If you weren’t old and a woman, I’d punch you in the mouth. Brett’s like my sister.”

“Don’t let the age stop you,” she said. “I can still bounce a little.”

Leonard actually laughed.

“Tell you something,” she said. “I can use a cell phone, take photos with it, work a computer, and I can research on it. I don’t need to call someone to change my TV channels, neither.”

“No one asked you about your technical ability,” Leonard said.

“Just thought I’d throw it out there,” she said. “I wouldn’t want you to think I’m past it.”

“You know, I actually have trouble with the TV-channel part,” I said.

“Of course you do,” she said. “The trick is to actually read and study the goddamn instructions.”

“That’s true. I should do that. The questions I want to ask have to do with your granddaughter. I might get some tips on the remote later, but for now, it’s her I want to talk about.”

“I told you what I know.”

“Okay,” I said. “But would it be okay to ask just a few questions? There’s some things you said that have got me to thinking.”

“Don’t hurt yourself, child.”

“It does strain me a bit now and then, but if I lie down I get all perky again.”

“All right, bring your happy asses inside.”

We escorted our happy asses inside. The place smelled like old people. Or, in this case, an old person. I guess it comes with the territory. The room was way too warm for this time of year, at least for anyone with any skin on them. It was dark except for a crack of light from a split in the curtains, and in that light dust motes were spinning.

She poked a skeletal finger at the couch, and we sat down there. It was a couch so seldom used it was hard. Maybe we were the first ones to ever sit on it. I wouldn’t think Ms. Buckner was the sort that attracted a lot of social visits. Any kind of visits, for that matter. So if Frank did know her, it was no surprise she knew she wasn’t the party kind and that’s why my cover was blown. And then Leonard had that whole servicing-the-old-folks bit going. Sometimes I really did want to throttle him. A lot of people wanted to do that. Only thing was, you had to bring reinforcements if you wanted to make that happen.

"You boys want something to drink?" she said.

"No, thanks," I said. "We're fine."

"Look, I'm trying to be a hostess. I'm going to have something."

"Sure," Leonard said. "Anything."

"You people like orange pop, don't you?" She said this to Leonard.

"We people sho' do likes us an orange, and you got some peanuts to po' in them, that makes it right special."

"Oh, go to hell. I drink them. Good enough for me, good enough for you. What about you, dipshit?"

"Dipshit will have an orange," I said.

She shuffled out of the room, the friction from her house shoes building up enough static electricity on the carpet she might be able to light her stove with nothing more than a touch of her finger.

"Goddamn," Leonard said. "She is just one big ole double-sweet sugar tit."

"Ain't she?"

We waited there in the smelly room with the slit of light and the spinning dust motes for a long time. This would be the crack of light at the window where she looked out and saw what was going on across the street, where she used her cell phone and transferred the video to her tablet with her high level of technical skill. She was probably drinking an orange soda while she did it, like Leonard's "people."

Finally she came back. She had three orange sodas in bottles on a tray she was holding with wobbly hands. When she came over, Leonard and I rescued our drinks, and she took hold of hers with one hand and just let the tray drop to the floor with a clang and a clatter.

"They make those damn bottles too heavy," she said.

She collapsed in a chair. She was breathing hard, and gradually she started breathing slower. Damn if I didn't think she was going to quit on us right there. But she finally came to herself, took a swig of the orange, said, "What's the questions?"

"You said Sandy had done good, gone to school, all that, but then you said something that kind of stuck with me. About her maybe living too high on the hog and having too much money. Did you let something out you didn't mean to?"

"I don't know I meant to or not," she said. "I say most anything comes to my mind these days. I thought I was pretty clear I suspected shenanigans. Damn. This orange is tangy, isn't it?"

“Quite tangy,” Leonard said.

“So was there something?” I asked again.

“I know she was doing a bit of leg spreading for someone, making some money from it. You know, had a sugar daddy.” She paused. “Maybe more than one. I’m not judging her. When I was younger I could do more tricks with a good long dick than a cowboy could with a waxed lasso.”

I was feeling a little ill.

She saw it on my face. “Oh, hell, don’t be such a prude. Look here.” She got up and took her sweet time picking up a thick photo album on one of the end tables by a stuffed chair. She brought it over as if she were carrying the Ten Commandments down from the mountain, put it in my lap, went back to her seat, and did the whole breathing thing again. While she regrouped, I opened it.

After I had been looking a few minutes, Leonard leaned over to look, too. She said, “That’s me. Nearly all those photos. I did some modeling. All we were showing back then in public was some leg and shoulders. In private men got to see a little more if I was in the mood. I was in the mood a lot. I liked pecker the way a chicken likes corn. When you get my age, look back, you got to wonder what that was all about. When the juices dry up the brain works better, at least in some ways. You know, I was actually in Hollywood. Believe that shit? In the old days. It was too vulgar for me, and I gave it up.”

“That must have been some seriously nasty shit out there, then,” Leonard said.

“What I’m trying to tell you.”

I flipped through the photos. My God, even with the fashions then, the hairdos, she was one hot number. Considering the level of the photography at that time, she probably looked even better. She actually did look like a movie star, though a little short for a model. Still, she was the kind back then who would stop a man in his tracks the way a brick schoolhouse will stop a semi.

“I was in some movies,” she said, as if she were reading my mind. “Some of those photos I’m a teenager. Some of the other shots, my twenties, then my thirties. I tried to settle down later, when the bit parts in the pictures played out for me. I was mostly the girl second to the left in a film with a couch audition on Sunday afternoons. I couldn’t act my way out of a paper bag, but I was hell on that couch. That kept me working, if not in any big way.”

“And settling down didn’t work?” I asked.

“Couldn’t keep my legs crossed. I was with every Tom, Dick, and Harry that had pants, and I would have been fine with a man in a kilt. Couldn’t help myself. I liked the men. Now not so much. Nobody too much. Except Sandy.”

“So you’re saying Sandy couldn’t keep her legs crossed, either?” Leonard asked.

“I couldn’t because I greatly loved sex, and I think Sandy did, too. But unlike her, I didn’t do it for money. Oh, I got a coat and some diamonds now and then, a dinner, a play or a movie. A job. But hell. I was going to screw them anyway, so no big deal. By the time I did settle down and get married and had a child, I was almost too tired to fuck.”

“I think that’s a very modern way to look at things,” I said, because I didn’t know what else to say.

“Dontcha know it,” she said, pushing her false teeth forward with her tongue. When she relaxed they jumped back into her mouth like a free throw. “Sandy, though, she might have been doing a little of the other, fucking for the buck. I got that impression. Then suddenly she didn’t have money, and then my money went missing. I know she got it.”

“You think this had to do with the car lot?” I asked.

“Expensive cars like those don’t bring the cheapies around. So I figure that’s how she started selling the old hairy triangle for the big bucks, and then somewhere along the way she either got greedy or got broke, because she played it stupid, took money from me. I like to think she didn’t mean to take it forever, that she would have paid me back.”

I could see the old woman thinking about that. I believe she decided it was too sentimental. She added, “I don’t really give a damn. I can’t spend money in hell.”

“Did you ever meet someone named Frank?” I asked. “A woman?”

“Named Frank?”

“She goes by Frank or Frankie.”

“No,” she said. “I never met her, but I think Sandy mentioned her once or twice. The name Frank rings a bell. But then at my age everything seems slightly familiar and at the same time unfamiliar.”

I looked back at the book of photos, closed it up, looked up to say something but didn’t. Leonard looked at me. I looked at him. I placed the book on the couch beside me.

I drank the orange pop. I was hot, and it was good. Leonard swigged his. We wouldn’t want to walk out and leave the bottles full—didn’t want her to think we didn’t appreciate it, the old witch. The clock on the wall beat out the minutes. We got up to leave and went out quietly, because she had gone to sleep in her chair.

13

"Do you think while she was asleep we should have just gone on and smothered her and set her house on fire?" Leonard said.

"You are not a nice man, Leonard."

"How about I steal the jockey while she's sleeping?"

"It would look very nice in your new apartment," I said.

"Better at the dump."

I drove Leonard to our house so he could get his car. He surprised me by just going home. I guess that business with John had worn him down a bit. Not to mention the unpleasant old lady. He said he was going to see if he could stand to watch Road House again, as that usually cheered him up.

Of course he could. It was his favorite movie. I think he had a crush on Patrick Swayze.

I drove to the office. The lady who owned the bicycle shop was outside working on a bicycle chain. She had on those great blue-jean shorts, bless her little heart. Her legs were long and brown, and her hair was long and blond. I studied her as I walked to the stairway. She gave me a smile. It was one of those that said, "You're such a nice old guy."

It was chilly inside. Brett liked to keep it almost as cold as the office at the car lot. First few days she had it turned down to save money, but East Texas summer heat can make you less thrifty. Sometimes someone from up north will come down to East Texas and say, "It's so hot, but living here all your life, I guess you get used to it."

No. You don't. You live in an air-conditioned house, dart from it to an air-conditioned car, then drive to an air-conditioned place. You spend time outside only when necessary. Some summers it's so hot dog crap fries on the ground. I used to work a lot of field work, but not anymore, and I hope never again. It was hard to believe that I had grown up with only a window fan.

Brett was at the desk chair, and Buffy was on the couch. Buffy raised her head to make sure I wasn't that other guy, the asshole who had kicked her.

Brett said, “Hey, we got a couple other jobs. Seem easy to me. Checking on a few things people want to hire us to do they could do themselves but are too lazy to do.”

“That’s good. I guess.”

“Honey, it’s good. We can always use the money.”

“Sure. I was just thinking this current job might be a bit more demanding than expected.”

“You thought it would be easy?”

“I thought the old lady would want to give up when we didn’t find her granddaughter right away. I don’t think so now.”

“You talk to Cason?”

“I did. We’re set.”

“And your talk with Lilly Buckner—I bet that was a soul-enriching experience.”

“Not exactly,” I said. “But I like her. I can’t help myself. I like her because she’s got spirit and spunk and hasn’t lived a life she feels a need to apologize for. I think she lived a tough life and was tough enough to live it and not care what anyone thought about it. Besides, she drinks orange soda. I like orange soda.”

“I didn’t know that.”

“Me, either. I forgot. I had one today at her house.”

“How did she and Leonard do together?”

“Like mother and son.”

“That’s a lie.”

“Yes, it is.”

I opened the refrigerator, took out a bottled water. We emptied a bottle, we filled it up in the sink, and cooled it in the fridge. It was the cool we liked. The water is the same, far as I’m concerned. Water that comes bottled—hell, fish shit in it. Ducks shit in it. Birds flying over shit in it. This way I can buy one bottle of water and use the bottle for a while without the payment.

I had marked the bottles with a marker. One mark for my bottle, two for Brett’s, three for Leonard’s, and sometimes I drew a smiley face on his. The dog drank straight tap water we ran into her bowl.

“There’s something else,” Brett said as I sat down in a client chair to nurse my water.

“Oh?”

Brett’s face had a look on it like maybe she had been sitting on a tack and had just decided to pull it out.

“A girl came by,” she said.

“Okay,” I said.

“She wanted to see you.”

“One of the cases?”

“No. But she knows a lot about you and us and that you were working for Marvin before I took over. She said I was pretty.”

“You are.”

“I told her you would be back, but I wasn’t sure when, and it was best to either call or come by. Call would be best. I gave her the office number.”

“Not the home or cell?”

“No. I didn’t like that idea.”

“Why not?”

“I don’t know.”

“You think this has to do with the car-lot business?”

Brett shook her head.

“Do I know her?”

“I doubt it.”

“You’re being very mysterious.”

“Am I?” Brett said.

“You are.”

“I guess I just don’t know what to think about it. She wouldn’t tell me anything other than she had to see you.”

“What did she look like?”

Brett hesitated on that one. “She was young. I’m not sure how young. Twenty-five at the oldest, maybe a year or two on either side of that. She’s well taken care of, but a little too thin, I thought. Like maybe she’s missing some meals.”

“On purpose?”

“I don’t think so. She was maybe five nine, though she had on these wedge shoes with big heels, so I’m not sure. She was dressed nice, but nothing fancy. Older clothes well taken care of. Has jet-black hair and is dark-skinned, kind of Hispanic or Indian-looking, American Indian. I think maybe she dyed her hair, though my guess is it’s pretty dark to begin with. She had that brunette look about her.”

“If you say so. Whatever that is.”

“She also had very nice teeth.”

“That’s good,” I said. “If we need her to bite off a bottle cap, she’s ready.”

Brett said, “She had pretty gray eyes.”

"Okay. I still don't know who she is. Did she leave a name?"

"She said she was called Chance, but she'd rather talk to you. So I didn't get a last name. She left, and I watched out the window. She talked to the lady at the bicycle shop a moment, then went out to a bicycle and rode away."

"She bought a bicycle while she was here?"

"I didn't say that," Brett said. "I said she rode away on one. I assume she rode up on it as well. Do you know anyone called Chance?"

I shook my head. "Can't say that I do. Mysterious, no doubt."

"I thought so, too," Brett said. "Buffy liked her. Actually got off the couch, came over, and licked her hand."

"Did she seem to know the dog?"

"I didn't get that impression. I don't think it was anyone working for the dog kicker, if that's what you mean. A daughter. A wife."

"I thought it might have been," I said.

"Didn't seem that way at all. I think she just liked dogs, and the dog liked her. Some people are like that."

I nodded.

"Besides," Brett said, "had she tried to take our Buffy, I'd have kicked her scrawny little ass."

Brett tried to smile after that, but the smile dissolved, like ice melting. I could see she was bothered by something. I went over and put my arm around her. "Here, now. You act like she's death come to visit."

"I know. I can't explain it. But somehow I think in some way she might be in trouble. That she might need us."

"She should have said something."

"I think for whatever reason she's waiting for you."

I didn't know what to do with that remark, and I let it lie.

We hung around for a while, me sort of hoping the dark-haired, gray-eyed girl on the bicycle would come around and solve the puzzle.

She didn't.

Leonard came over a couple hours later. He said Road House was as wonderfully bad as he remembered it. That was his way of saying he actually liked it a whole lot. I also knew that sometimes watching that movie was how he got his center back. It may be a hokey movie about a bouncer who has raised bouncing to a high art and reads Jim Harrison, but to tell the truth, in a way, Leonard was just that kind of guy. Only more dangerous. He made the characters in the movie look like the masters of the slap fight.

I had my jogging clothes and shoes at the office, and Leonard had his in the truck, so we changed and took a run along the street, on out to the edge of town and across to the park. It was a pretty place. Filled with pecan trees and a creek. We ran along the path that was by the creek. The late afternoon was still hot, but the shadows from the trees gave us shade. Our shadows piston-pumped along beside us.

There were women in shorts with dogs and Frisbees. Three college jocks were running along ahead of us. We passed them, and one of them said something about how he'd hate to see us die of exhaustion, old guys like we were, or some such thing. Leonard made a kind of circle while he was running, went straight to the guy, and only quit running long enough to punch him in the face, almost right between the eyes. It was a quick punch, a kind of half jab, and coming from Leonard that was still a lick, but it was a lick with a governor on it. Nothing full-bore. But it's all it took for the jock to hit the ground like a lawn dart.

The other jocks stopped running. They checked their man on the ground. He was way down in the deep siesta.

Leonard said, "All right, mice. You can squeak to the police or act like men. He can take it and live with it, and you can let him take it and live with it, or I punch you in the head, too. Which is it?"

No squeaking occurred. Leonard had appealed to their basic manhood. Don't be a squealer. Always a good weapon to attack the male ego; that's where great weakness lies. They were helping their dazed friend up as we jogged away. I think the guy they were picking up was trying to remember if his mom was picking him up from school, or if he had gym class and had remembered to bring his jockstrap.

"Kind of rowdy, aren't you?" I said as we continued to run.

"I just watched Road House."

"It's got you pumped?"

"I didn't tear his throat out like Patrick did to the bad guy in the movie."

"Yeah, after that guy Gazzara just looked like some goof stumbling around. See him rip the throat out of a truly bad guy, and then he fights an old man, a geriatric, and that's supposed to be tense?"

"Wasn't he about our age?"

"Maybe."

"That's what those boys back there thought we were. A couple of geriatrics."

"We're not that old, buddy," I said.

"To them we are. To them, anyone over thirty is ready for the boneyard. Irritates me. How about you?"

"Not today."

"But some days?"

"Some days. But I wouldn't have punched him in the face for that."

"No—I get to do the fun stuff. You have that thing about turning the other cheek."

"What did punching that asshole prove?"

"That I could knock him down," Leonard said.

I took a deep breath and blew it out my nose, picked up my pace. "Could John actually have something to do with your ill temper?"

"He could. He has made me an unpleasant man."

"More unpleasant than usual, you mean."

"True," Leonard said.

We ran for about an hour, then lightly jogged and walked back to the office. When we got there we were sweaty and we stank, but we were breathing fine. Our extra and revised workouts were starting to do us good. It was our plan to do some boxing later, some kickboxing, some shen chuan, then light weights. It's what we called the Master Fucking Plan.

Brett was wearing black workout shorts and a oversize orange T-shirt. She was on a roll-out rubber mat on the floor. She was doing some kind of stretchy thing. Yoga. Zumba. A version of the Elongated Man. I don't know. I kind of liked watching her do it, though. That girl was flexible. I knew that already, but it was nice to be reminded.

That went on for a while, and I enjoyed the view while Leonard fucked up his workout with some vanilla wafers and a Dr Pepper, which, according to our previous discussion, I had to let him have. I didn't even wait for him to ask for the key. I just unlocked the drawer.

Brett saw us. She narrowed her eyes, but I gave them to him anyway. I knew when it got right down to it, Brett was more of a softie than I was when it came to Leonard. She would never actually deny him a cookie. She was the one that always caved first.

I gave Buffy one of the cookies, too.

"Damn it," Brett said.

"She likes cookies," I said.

I reached down and gave Brett one of the cookies in the same way, as she was still on the floor stretching. She laughed and took it in her mouth like the dog. I decided to have one, and she fed it to me.

Leonard, wanting more, held up his hands like paws, but I put the bag of cookies in the drawer and locked it.

"Aw, come on," Leonard said.

“Nope,” I said. “If you sit up only when you get a cookie, that’s not good. You have to do it because it’s the right thing to do now and then.”

I insisted we call Jalapeno Tree for food. I made a phone order. We took turns in the bathroom changing back into our day-to-day clothes, washing our faces and hands. Leonard drove to Kroger to get some large diet sodas for us and some Dr Peppers for himself while we drove to the restaurant and picked up the food.

After that we drove to the Dairy Queen drive-through and bought a vanilla ice cream for Buffy, two scoops. By the time we arrived home, I had forgotten all about the girl Brett told me about. The one who said her name was Chance.

14

Leonard wasn't much for talk that night. After dinner he hung around for a short while, but I could tell he wanted to go home. He couldn't be comfortable away from home, because he wanted to be there if John showed up, but if he did show up, he wasn't comfortable with him there. That's love for you. When it's good, it's magic. When it isn't, it just pees all in your soup.

Leonard had pretty much decided John wasn't worth it, and then John came back and gave Leonard hope again, and then he was gone again. Leonard felt miserable. I didn't like John for that, but then again, you hurt Leonard and I'm not always reasonable.

Leonard went home, and while Brett showered for bed, I opened up the envelope Ms. Buckner had given us that day in the office. I had sort of forgotten we had it, which says something for my budding detective skills. I thought about the photos she had shown me at her house, and then I looked at the photos of Sandy in the envelope. I could see how much she favored her grandmother. They were both small and pretty, or at least Ms. Buckner had been pretty many moons ago. I moved the photos around and looked at the police reports that Ms. Buckner had gotten hold of. I wasn't sure how she came by them, but it might have been money that had helped that happen. Some of the last of her real money, back in the days when she had it and thought she'd have it forever.

There were some newspaper clippings about Sandy's disappearance there as well, but none of it meant a thing to me. I moved the photos around again, hoping something would jump out at me. There was a graduation photo. A couple shots that might have been taken in the mall with Sandy in front of one of the stores, one that was surely taken out front of Ms. Buckner's house before it went sad and dark, dusty and old, a tired, paint-chipped Negro jockey looking grim and lonesome by the flower bed. There was even one photo of Sandy with Ms. Buckner. Lilly Buckner still looked older than death in that picture, but she had a smile on her face.

My cell phone hummed. It was Cason.

"You up for some information?"

"Yep. Been waiting. Is it worth anything?"

"I think so."

"Let's have it," I said.

"Okay if I give it in person?"

"Should I put coffee on?"

"Probably won't take that long, but if you have decaf, that would be nice. I don't want to be up all night wrestling with caffeine."

"Milk and sugar?"

"I prefer Sweet'N Low."

"Would you like cookies and for me to wax your ass? Maybe a little hand job?"

"That would be nice, but you have to wear a blond wig and use baby oil."

"Well, you're shit out of luck on that."

"The hand job or the wig?" he said.

I rang off, warned Brett he was coming. She was in her pajamas by then. They were blue and loose and fell down on the tops of her feet. She went up to bed, and Buffy padded upstairs behind her. The dog was looking bigger, bolder, happier.

Like I said, there was something about Cason that Brett doesn't like. I knew I should pay attention to that, but right then, I needed him and his information.

I called Leonard and asked if he'd come over.

"Didn't I just leave?"

"You've had time to watch Road House again."

"Not quite," he said.

"John show up?"

"Fuck him."

"Sure. Fuck him. Cason's got some news for us."

"I'm coming over," he said.

It took Cason about twenty minutes. I had the coffeemaker churning in the kitchen. I was outside on the porch in the sweet dark, sitting on the swing listening to the crickets make their racket in the recently mowed grass of the front yard. I used to mow it. Now I hire it done. I guess for someone like me you could call that prosperous. Money got shy, I'd be pushing the mower again.

As I waited for Cason to cross the yard from the curb where he was parked, I could smell that unique smell that pines have when they've been heated all day by Texas summer, then slightly cooled by night, a kind of biting turpentine taste in the air and then in the nostrils and on the tongue. That smell was being carried a long way. I had an oak in the front yard and some sweet gums out to the side. No pines.

"Brett's gone to bed," I said as he came out from under the streetlights and up on the porch. "I'll bring our coffee out here so our talking won't disturb her."

This was a bit of a lie. She wouldn't hear us downstairs as long as we talked in an even voice, but I liked it out there. I liked that pine smell. It reminded me of when I was a kid growing up in the East Texas woods. Smells like that, along with honeysuckle, took me back to when I was young, sitting under a tree reading a book. The world seemed shiny and bright then. I wasn't thinking about trying to keep my life together, about living with failure. I was too young to consider anything but success. The world was my oyster. Since then I felt the shell had closed around me for the most part.

"Suits me," Cason said. "It's a pretty nice night."

Inside I got us two cups prepared, fixed his how he asked, went back out on the porch. He was sitting on the top step, and he turned in my direction. I gave him his coffee and sat on the swing, put my cup on the little metal table in front of me. Brett had bought it at a yard sale.

"This news I have, it's interesting," Cason said. "I don't know what to make of it, exactly, but there's some things in it that float, some others that might float to the surface if we stir them a bit."

"Then we'll stir," I said.

About that time Leonard pulled up in his truck. Unlike Cason, he pulled in the driveway next to our cars. He got out and strolled onto the porch and sat down on the swing with me. The pine smell was going away, and so was the wind that carried it.

"I like coffee," he said.

"Do you?" I said.

"I do. I'm smarter with coffee."

"Not that I've noticed."

"Well, I feel smarter."

I was too tired to jack with him as usual, so I cut it short, went inside, and fixed him a cup the way I knew he liked it, though I decided not to tell him it was decaf. I doubted he'd know the difference, nor would he be any smarter with caffeine. I brought out a bag of vanilla cookies with the coffee. I put the cookies on my side of the swing. There was enough glow from the streetlights for Leonard to see what I had.

"Manna from heaven, encased in a bag," Leonard said. "To me you are like a god."

"Thanks."

"Oh, no," Leonard said, smiling toward the cookies. "Thank you."

I turned to Cason. "You think you fooled Frank?"

Cason hesitated a moment. "At first. We got into a little more business than you did. I think she thought I really was a guy looking for a good car and a good escort and a trip overseas."

"Overseas?" Leonard said.

"Yep," Cason said. "That's connected to it. You can stay in the US, but they like this whole overseas thing. I think it makes what they have in mind easier to pull off."

"All right," I said. "How about you tell us what they have in mind?"

"Still a bit of guesswork," he said.

"That's all right," Leonard said. "So far we haven't got much but guesswork."

"I warn you, though, I didn't find out anything about Sandy," Cason said.

"Like you said. Let's stir it and see what floats."

"Cookies first," Leonard said.

I picked up the cookie bag, pulled it open, and shook it at him. Leonard took a handful. I poked the bag at Cason. He held up his hand like a traffic cop. "Don't care for vanilla cookies."

Leonard turned and looked at him but said nothing. I knew Cason had gone down a notch in Leonard's estimation. I was hoping the conversation wouldn't turn to Dr Peppers. If Cason didn't like those, no telling where things might lead, especially since Leonard had watched Road House earlier and had already punched a smart-mouth college jock in the face.

"I went in for a little visit," Cason said, "like I wanted a car. Some of this is going to be familiar, but I'll try to hit the spots you know lightly and move on. I don't think you played it quite right when you were there, you and Leonard. They smelled shit in the air, and with me they were sniffing pretty hard. I started out with I had been recommended, saying I heard they sold very nice cars and there were a number of services that went with it. I even gave them a name. Before I went, I looked through the newspaper files stored in the computer until I found some reference to a car bought there, a black Rolls-Royce. Guy bought the Rolls was named Terrence Milden, had oil money out of Beaumont.

He bought a car there, and in this article—some fluff piece about the guy's car collection—his newest purchase was referred to in passing and where he got it. This guy was not so old, but he was retired. He came from Beaumont to here to live. I looked up more about him, asked around, did the reporter snoop, found out he was proud of that money and wanted people to know he had it.

"There were rumors about sketchy deals and such. Liked the ladies, drugs, and so on. Again, rumors, but he struck me as someone might have made a special deal at the car lot. So I talked to Frank like I knew this guy, like he recommended me. You see, he died of some disease or another—cancer, I think. Heart attack, maybe; not sure. I just know he's dead, so it's not like he can be questioned. It was a shot in the dark, but I hit the target. Frank got out the book of cars, all of them way overpriced, and sitting in each or leaning against each of those cars was a woman. Each of them looks so hot it's like the car will burst into flames. She starts talking around it, you know. So I say, 'Too bad the girls don't come with the cars,' and I looked at her and winked.

"She said they might. They could. Making it kind of a joke at first. We eased forward from there, and pretty soon I'm told how there are some nice women who work for their company that love to show buyers how the cars work. I asked what if the buyer was a woman. And Frank, she says there are some nice men who work for the company, too. Said they, too, like to show how things work, make sure everyone understands the product, inside and out. Like maybe I need help finding the clutch. It's like you guys thought. They sell a car, they sell you a girl. If you want to go that far. If they think that's your urge. Otherwise you can just pay too much for a fancy used automobile. They think you got serious money, and you take the car and the girl, you can get that foreign trip as well. I think it's a setup for filming."

"I was in the ballpark," I said.

Cason nodded, sipped his coffee.

"I don't think they're happy with selling just motors and snatcheroo. They want you to keep paying for it for a long time. They're not looking for repeat customers. They're looking for customers they can repeatedly blackmail."

"But what if someone doesn't care?" Leonard said.

"They still get money for the car and the girl, the trip overseas. They can let the blackmail go, they have to. Or they can wreck someone's life for the hell of it."

"What if someone turns them in?"

"Still has to be proved," Cason said. "Or maybe they know exactly how to set someone up they think is trouble, even if that person isn't really doing anything wrong. I don't know all the working parts yet."

"You're overseas, in some foreign country," Leonard said. "Makes you more vulnerable, more at their mercy."

"I got hints from Frank you could go places in the States, too. I think it's wide open. But the main thing is the blackmail. They asked me about my job. How I liked it. I played it up, about how important it was to me."

"To set yourself up for blackmail," I said.

"Exactly. Showed them I had something I liked and didn't want to lose it."

"That fits Frank's past MO," I said. "At least according to Marvin. Once a scammer, pretty much always a scammer."

Cason nodded. "But this scam is delicious, if that's the deal. I mean, I'm filling a lot in here based on a sideways conversation—all the things Frank said as well as the things she didn't say. Once they nail you good the first time, get you on camera, all they need is the blackmail. Though now that I think about it, they figure you're someone doesn't care if you get filmed, then they can keep selling you the girl if you want her. They think you repeat enough, there may be adequate money in that. Those gals in those photos, they don't get backstreet money. We're talking about high-dollar escorts."

"You got a lot from a mild conversation," Leonard said.

"As I was saying, I got some things, and the rest is reporter intuition."

"So you could be wrong," Leonard said.

"About some of it, but I think I read between the lines pretty well. The blackmail idea, that's all speculation, of course. I mean, shit, she's not going to tell me they're going to sell me a ride and some ass, and then add, 'Oh, by the way, we're going to blackmail you so hard you'll be constipated.'"

"But you're in?" I said.

"I thought so. She pulled me up on a laptop right there, saw the job I had. I had to give her my name, you see. Got cornered. Could have given her a false name, but I wouldn't have had the cover. I tried to make out the Pulitzer nomination had led to a big publishing contract on a book I was writing on my time in Afghanistan. But she started pedaling backwards then. That was all stuff in the bush, not in the hand. She knew better. I think she believed I really had been given a recommendation for the place and that I had a job I loved, blackmail material, but she also figured if I worked at the Camp Rapture paper I wasn't making much. Not enough to be driving the car I was in and own it. Not enough to buy their kind of car and whatever else they were selling. She wasn't going to wait for me to finish a book. Frank's smart. She gets you right up to the door, cracks it a little, shows you some light, lets you hear a little music on the other side, but she doesn't let you in if you don't fit all the categories. I could tell she was clicking in that license number on the car I parked outside. I hadn't parked so she could see it, but some guy came out of nowhere, out there on the lot, looked at the car, and walked away. You can bet the license number came up on her computer."

"So you were fucked like us?"

"No. Lady owns it shifted it into my name, and we messed with the dates of purchase. You're not the only one who knows people. It'll only be that way for a few hours, then it goes back to the way it really is, so we don't get caught, but I was hoping that was enough."

"Does this lady of yours work at Motor Vehicles?" I asked.

"Yep," he said. "But she's got some inherited money. We take vacations now and again, on her dime."

Figures, I thought.

"But it doesn't matter," Cason said. "Frank has contacts, too, I figure. Some blackmail victims, perhaps, or someone on their payroll. Might be dropping a few dollars at places where she can get things done, including the DMV. She figured it out pretty quick. She didn't say anything, but I could see it in her eyes. I had been squealed out, or something or other had gone wrong, because she knew from whatever she saw on the computer—whatever that guy in the lot saw and posted when he went back inside. She's getting information in real time while you sit there. Next thing I knew the catalog was closed, I had her card and a promise to call, and I was out the door. It was done so smooth I hardly realized it until I was standing on the lot."

"How it worked for us, too," I said.

"Actually," Leonard said, "our exit was less smooth."

"Thanks to you and the goddamn petunias," I said.

"I fucked it up," Cason said. "I should have spent a few days building a backstory, setting some things up with friends, contacts. I could have made it work better, but I was thinking it might all just be bullshit. It wasn't. Now I've got my radar up, and I want to find out more about the place. It's quite the scam, and it wouldn't surprise me if there's a lot more to it than what we think. I've got the nose for this kind of stuff, and I smell a big story here." He tapped his nose to assure us he did indeed have the equipment with which to smell a story. "I don't know what's making it smell, but I want to find out. None of that helps you with Sandy, but maybe she's in the mix somewhere."

"She was a journalist," I said. "Graduate in that profession without a job. What if she got wind of what was going on there and, being a looker herself, she thought she'd slip in, get a job as a car accessory, and find out the true story? She got past all the hurdles for what she wanted to do, slipped in and planned to write about it, and got caught."

"Maybe she just liked the idea of money from high-class hooking," Leonard said.

"Also a possibility," I said. "And some journalists go the whole hog, invest right down to the skin."

"That would be me," Cason said. "At least it has been me."

"All that is interesting," Leonard said, "but what we got to think about is Sandy, even if her grandmother ought to be run over by a truck."

"And after she gave you an orange soda," I said.

"I'm ungrateful sometimes," Leonard said.

I looked at Cason. "We owe you one."

"Oh, no, you don't," he said. "I'm still on this. You promised me the story if there was a story. I said I smelled one. I plan on keeping the nostrils wide open. I got contacts all over East Texas and elsewhere. There's this guy here in town called Weasel. He might be able to find me something. He's into everything, here and within two or three hundred miles of here. For all he's done he's only spent five years in the slammer. So he's pretty connected and pretty sneaky. Weasel may be our guy."

"Weasel?" Leonard said. "Now, that sounds trustworthy."

"I don't know his mother actually named him that," Cason said. "He's about five feet tall and slippery without being wet. He doesn't act dangerous, but I suspect he is, at least to some degree. He'll do most anything for a buck, and probably has."

"Can you trust him?" I asked.

"Not entirely, but enough to get what I want if I pay him a little. Out of the money you gave me, of course."

"So you're hanging on to that?"

"I'll give you half back now, but the rest I'm keeping for expenses and Weasel money."

"All right," I said. "For now, keep it all."

We talked a bit more about things, but it was just the same thing we had discussed recycled, and so we quickly called it a night. Cason walked across the yard and drove away.

Leonard said, “Is it a problem I sleep in my old room?”

“Of course not,” I said.

Inside, Leonard headed to his room, the one we had built onto the house for him, and I went upstairs. Brett was lying in bed with the lamp on, reading a book. Buffy was lying beside her with her head in Brett’s lap. I told her Leonard was staying the night in his old room.

“Okay,” she said. “How’d it go with Mr. Slick?”

“A little of something and a lot of nothing,” I said and told her some of what he told us, because as the owner of the business she needed to know.

“So Weasel’s our next step.”

“Unless we can find more steps,” I said.

“This is turning out to be harder than I thought,” Brett said. “This private-eye crap.”

“Sorry you quit the nursing job now?” I said.

“Still not missing wiping asses,” she said, “though now and again I long to change a colostomy bag. As for the detective business, what I’m feeling is I’ve bitten off more than I can chew with two sets of teeth. Now I’m worrying about paying the building payment, the lights, water, Internet.”

“I always feel like I’ve bitten off more than I can chew,” I said. “And usually I have.”

“But it works out?”

“Mostly. I have to chew some of it for a long time, though. Sometimes a little of it slops out of my mouth.”

I took off my clothes and put on my pajamas and crawled under the covers. Brett turned out the light. “No alarm tomorrow,” she said.

“Suits me,” I said, and we held one another. Buffy started pushing in between us, trying to find her spot.

It was very nice, very homey, and very comfortable. Why can’t things stay comfy like that?

15

Me and Brett got to the office about ten. It beat going into the chicken-processing plant at 6:00 a.m. or working in the fields from daylight to dark, but the idea of being an office man hadn't quite taken hold of me. I had also given Cason our advance from Ms. Buckner, and that made me a poor office man and might require a bit of explanation to Brett later.

When Leonard came we went to the house to exercise. Out in the carport we lifted light free weights, then worked on a score of self-defense techniques, sparred lightly with boxing for a while, then switched to kickboxing. There was no way to do ground work comfortably, which is one reason it can be overrated. You fall down on cement or the hard ground, it's different than if you're working a mat or fighting someone whose basic approach you know, someone who doesn't have a knife or pistol in their pocket or a buddy around the corner, or doesn't have ring rules about gouging out your eyes. Going to the ground is not a choice I'd make on purpose. Still, it was a weakness in our game, because you don't always get to choose if you stand or go down.

Leonard and I went at it for a while, making light contact, not anything brutal, just keeping ourselves loose, but it was hot already and nearly lunchtime, and we weren't kids anymore, so we gave it up, went in the house. Leonard took a shower downstairs, and I took one upstairs. Leonard still had some clothes in a drawer in his room, and he had those on when I came down. I had changed into something loose and comfortable. I decided to make sandwiches for all of us to have at the office. While I was opening a can of tuna and putting it into a bowl to mix, Leonard said, "Seems we're on to something, way Cason talked."

"Yeah," I said, spooning the right amount of mayonnaise into the bowl. "They're careful. Once they get their hooks in someone, they've got them in deep, and the cash cow just keeps supplying the milk until it can't anymore. Or they sense their victim is worn out enough to say, ‘Get me some popcorn and I’ll show the film myself.’ Maybe then they back off. It could become a standoff. You don’t care anymore, but now neither do they. So you don’t speak up about it, and they don’t show it to anyone. Everything stays even. I think it’s a careful con. They’ve done it enough to know when they can’t do it anymore, and I figure there’s some law involvement.”

“Some palms greased?”

“Yep. That way, say it’s a guy, he keeps his mouth shut because he can’t get any relief from either side, the law or the blackmailers. By just taking it in the ass, he keeps the wife, job, or both, or his civic pride, and they’ve made a healthy amount of money before whoever being blackmailed gets to the point where he, or she, doesn’t give a flying fuck anymore.”

“Thing is, our job isn’t to worry about the whores or the blackmail, it’s to find Sandy.”

“But can we actually leave the blackmail part alone?”

“Probably not,” Leonard said. “And they are most likely entwined.”

We wrapped the sandwiches in plastic, put them in a paper bag, got some cans of diet soda out of the refrigerator, including a Diet Dr Pepper, which Leonard cursed but would still drink in spite of the lack of sugar, and headed out to Leonard’s truck.

As he drove us over there, I said, “I’ll just mention this once, and then you can do with it what you want. How is it with you and John? Done?”

“I hope so, but then when it gets late, I hope not. I miss him then. I keep thinking if I had said this or that, or done this or that, it might be different. But I know deep down I wouldn’t do those things. I’m not going to ask a god I don’t believe in for forgiveness before I suck John’s dick or he sucks mine. But sometimes, when it’s late, I think I can do it for him. But a minute passes, and I know I can’t do it for anyone. I guess I’m selfish.”

“Just honest with yourself. After midnight everything is important, until about three or four in the morning, and then it’s still important, but less so. And then when you wake up in the morning most of it isn’t important at all.”

“I appreciate your letting me stay with you and Brett again.”

“You’re my brother. You’re always welcome, even when I don’t want you around.”

“It makes me feel better to know someone else is in the house, even if it’s not my house. That I’m not all alone.”

“And if John was at your apartment? How would that feel?”

“That wouldn’t feel so good, either. I think I’d try again, long as I didn’t have to play the games. I’d try until I pissed him off or threw him out. I’m actually thinking of buying a blow-up fuck doll. They have some very nice male ones.”

“Please promise me you will keep it clean,” I said.

“You have my word,” Leonard said.

“And that you will keep it at your place. For all that is holy, I do not want to wake up in the middle of the night and hear you making plastic squeak in our house.”

16

Weasel came by the office the next day with Cason. He was well named. He was small with a large nose and no chin and quick eyes and a wiry muscularity. He looked like he could squeeze through a hole smaller than he was. He was dark-skinned and maybe Hispanic, maybe black, maybe a whole gumbo of all kinds of folks. He wore a black shirt way too big for him. You could have housed two of him in it.

Even coming out of the heat and wearing black, he didn't seem to sweat much. He was as cool a customer as a corpse. He came in ahead of Cason, gave the room a sweep. He moved like a guy who was used to checking his surroundings, watching for predators or prey.

Cason looked his usual dapper self, though he had a sweaty glow about him, and the front of his blue shirt and the underarms of it were wet with sweat. No deodorant in existence could defeat the onslaught of East Texas heat and humidity. Unless you were Weasel.

Cason nodded at Brett. Brett nodded back. Neither seemed comfortable with the other.

Weasel's eyes continued to drift over all of us, then held on Buffy, who was holding down the couch. His eyes moved again, finally settled on Brett, who was sitting on the edge of the desk wearing white shorts and a loose green top.

Weasel said in a kind of Yankee voice with vowels so hard you could have used them to crack ice, "Oh, hell, lady, you are one sleek model."

"Yes, I am," Brett said. "Thanks for noticing."

Introductions were made. Weasel had a last name. Rolf.

Cason said, "Weasel's got some information. It's sweeter than we thought; not as sweet as we'd like. And I'm going to say it right up front. Maybe questionable."

"That hurts," Weasel said. "After all we've meant to each other you got to go on and say something like that."

"I can live with it," Cason said.

Weasel grinned, took a client chair, and crossed his legs carefully, as if he were a girl in a short skirt and had to be careful about giving a free show. “You let people smoke in here?”

“Only if they’re on fire,” Brett said.

“Fair enough. I got some chew. You got a bottle I can spit in?”

“I can give you a bottle, and you can take it home with you to spit in,” Brett said. “There’ll be no spitting in anything in here.”

“You’re a ballbreaker, lady,” Weasel said.

“Just sanitary,” Brett said.

“Tell them, Weasel,” Cason said.

“I know a little about all this, cause there’s lots of us off the grid, so to speak, who do know some stuff. Know what I’m saying?”

We didn’t respond. He wasn’t waiting for us to. It was just his way of talking.

“I ask around, and I say, what’s the deal here, you know? Not that blunt, but that’s what it finally got to, cause I know some people know Frank, and they think she’s hot, but they don’t know what I know, that she’s an ex-con, a man that got his goober trimmed.”

“So far,” Leonard said, “you haven’t told us anything we don’t already know.”

“All right, then,” he said. “I’m coming to the good part, part worth the money Statler here is paying me. Some of this stuff I asked about, to my contacts, see, some I already knew. Intimately, you might say.”

“By the way,” Cason said to me. “When he says ‘money’ he means your money.”

Brett looked at me.

“Takes money to make money,” I said.

“Or it just takes money to lose money,” she said.

“Hey, you going to let me say my say here or what?” Weasel said. “You paid for it, so let me give it to you. Otherwise I got things I can do.”

“Go on,” I said.

“There’s a fellow I know, said he knows a fellow named Ron Bantor, and Bantor bought a car from Frank’s place. This was, I guess, five years ago. In fact, this information is five years old, and the fella told me about it, he can’t tell me anything now. But I remember the story.”

“And how did this fellow know about Bantor?” I asked. “And why can’t he tell you anything? Though I have an idea.”

“Coming to that. So this Ron Bantor, he finds out with the car comes some A-one hole. Sorry, lady.”

“Tell it however you will,” she said. “There’s nothing you can say that will cause me to like you less than I already do.”

“So the snatch comes with the car, and the car costs more than it ought to, even with the snatch that comes with it, cause, hell, ain’t none of that snatch made of platinum. And at some point, way I see it, a car is just a car. But more to the point, rumor was the snatch was named Sandy.”

“You know that for a fact?” Brett said. “That her name was Sandy?”

“Heard this whole story from a guy what knew, and I’ve checked with some outside sources, got pretty much the same story.”

“Pretty much?” Brett said.

“Not like this stuff gets written down, lady. It’s a kind of story might grow some hair as it rolls downhill. I can only tell you what I know, hair and all. So Ron, he’s got the car and the girl, this Sandy, but then he finds out it’s got a trip goes with it to Italy, and he wants to take it. Nice trip. Nice tail. Figures then he can come home and ride around in a nice car.”

“So far, so good,” Cason said.

Weasel sucked on his teeth, continued. “He does the trio. Car, girl, and trip to Italy. Hear what I’m saying? Then he finds there’s a fourth thing. They set him up in some nice Italian hotel, and they got a hidden camera and they got a movie, minus previews, of him putting the sausage in the grinder, you know. He finds this out when he gets home with the wife and the kids. Gets the bad news there’s a film of his shiny, dimpled ass filmed by his automobile-and-poontang dealers. You following me?”

“Quite easily,” Brett said.

“This Ron cat, he works for a big law firm here in town. Got a trophy wife and a lot of good connections. Plays golf with the right people. He’s pulled the right dicks and pinched the right tits, if you know what I’m saying.”

“Yeah,” Leonard said. “We’re with you.”

“They start stretching those car payments, this car company,” Weasel said. “He paid in cash, he was that flush, but now it’s not enough. There’s some side money they want for not showing the nice little film of him to the wife, film of him lowering the helicopter into the canyon with this Sandy bimbo in Italy. He was supposed to be on a business trip, and there he is on film, bare-ass, in living color. They send it to him on an e-mail, take a chance, see. Something to really scare him. He checks that e-mail, opens that video, sees himself swinging his pecker, shits enough bricks to build a cathedral, e-mails back with a what-the-fuck's-up comment. That's when the serious contact starts. Frank—she, he, it, whatever the fuck she is—starts having him come by and drop off little packages with sizable money in it. He don't even go home with coupons. Ron goes to this fellow I know, cause being a lawyer in a big law firm he knows some guys not quite on the straight and narrow."

"Like yourself?" Leonard said.

"Like me, and my guess is like you two," Weasel said, nodding at me and Leonard. "I hear some things here and there. You seem like a couple guys been around the block, and not walking around all of it on a direct path. Taking a few alleys here and there, climbing through a few windows."

"Go on," Leonard said.

"Ron goes to this guy he knows, one he got off a prison sentence for murder. He knows the guy was as guilty as O. J. Simpson, asks if he can help him out cause he don't want to keep paying. He don't want his naked skin on his wife's or boss's e-mail, spread around town, then on the Facebook thing, twittered or twatted or some such shit. I don't know how all that crap works."

I had a feeling he knew exactly how that stuff worked.

"Bring it back on topic," Cason said. "You're starting to break gravitational pull, getting way out there."

"So Ron asks this old client of his who is not a straight citizen, asks does he know a guy can whack someone, and he'll pay some serious jack to get it done so that he won't have to keep paying serious jack for the rest of his life, and, too, he's just mad, you know. This guy I know tells him no, cause he thinks the money, good as it is, is light in the pants for killing folks, but says he might know someone, and he puts me on it, asks me to see if I can find someone, cause I know the kind of crowd he needs. And Ron, because he has a big mouth, lays out to me exactly why he wants Frank dead. Here he is dealing with blackmail, worried about people knowing his business, and him a lying piece-of-shit lawyer, but he don't know enough to keep his trap shut. What he's doing is telling people he shouldn't all his business he's worried about keeping secret. I guess he figures he tells the slum crowd, he's all right, but when you get right down to it, that's not the crowd to tell. But hey, saying something and having a film of it is not the same thing. I mean, he knows that film gets shown, that's more than talk. That's the shine on the baby's ass. You with me still?"

"In the neighborhood," Leonard said.

"Got to be honest. Thought I could whack Frank for the dough Bantor was paying. I don't know why he decided on Frank, cause I figure Frank is just the figurehead, not the top of the heap, but hell, who knows? And money is money, and who is who in all this is not important when that stuff is being waved under your nose. Pussy and money can get a man to do most anything but clean a sink after shaving.

"Sandy was on his list, too, cause she set him up, least that's how he figures it. Don't matter. It was some serious jack he was slinging around. Even thought I might could find this Sandy and do her, too, you know, if all expenses are paid and there's a good fee for the final job. Thought I did good on Frank, I'd be willing to do Sandy, you see. Pop. She's gone. That's how I was thinking when the offer was laid out there. Gave it some serious goddamn consideration. Stayed up a night or two thinking on it, decided maybe it's not my line of work. So I tell this other guy I know might like the job, and finally Ron has his man. Thing is, the man, this hired killer, ends up whacked himself."

"Frank got on to the game?" I asked. "Beat him to the killing?"

Weasel shrugged. "Can't say. Could have been like that. I doubt it, though. Frank's not that tough, with a dick or without. Not a pushover or nothing, but killing like that, I don't think so. Like I said, I don't think Frank is the top of the heap. Bottom line is someone finds the would-be assassin Ron hired, this fellow I know and put him on to, finds him some miles from here in the Sabine River, or maybe it was the Trinity—shit, I don't remember. Finds him with no shoes and an engine block tied around his ankles. He's got a cut throat and no balls, and word around is the cuts on his throat and balls are from a sharp wire, not a knife. Imagine that. Snapping off a man's goodies with a wire. That's the rumor, anyhow."

"Lots of rumors around," Brett said.

"I'm going to believe it, myself," Weasel said. "You should, too. Guy did this knew what he was doing. You might call him a throat-cutting goddamn deballing expert. Cut the balls off cause maybe that was just part of the fun. Maybe he took them back to lay on the doorstep of whoever wanted it done, like a cat will bring you a mouse. I don't know. But the balls weren't found. I guess they could be in the river, eat up by a catfish someone caught later and deep-fried, but I don't think so. The shoes. I think they just come off in the water, the current, you know?"

"This guy that was murdered," Leonard said. "He got a name?"

"Slide is what I knew him as. Black guy. Tough guy with muscles like you, had a shaved head, had that kind of look you got, except he was missing a light in his eyes. Kind of motherfucker makes a man nervous.

Looked like he could spank a cougar and send it to bed without its supper. What he caught was meaner than a cougar. He put up a fight. I got word from a guy I know at the hospital that he had broken fingers, scratches, and one eye near torn out. So he fought back. They scraped under his nails, all that shit, but they didn't find anything but more of him. And he had been in the water and all, maybe a week. Fucks with the DNA, that water does."

"You sure know a lot of guys," Leonard said. "On the street, in the hospital. Lawyers."

"That's what ole slick-ass Cason likes about me. I'm connected with the shit on the shoes. That's why he came to me and how I've ended up here brightening your otherwise dreary day."

"Slide have a last name?" I asked.

"Don't know it," Weasel said. "Me and him knew each other pretty good, but last names didn't come up. We didn't discuss pork-belly futures none, either."

"You know all this and you don't know the guy's last name?" Leonard said.

"You just got to have it, I can find out, but who cares? This guy's deader than dirt. Now what happens is the guy Ron asked first, guy told me about it…and you need a name I got it. Thurgood Small. White dude. He'd have made about four of me, some of it fat. Everyone called him Red Mop on account of this toupee he wore and didn't think anyone knew it wasn't real hair. Looked like someone froze a fucking flame on his head is what it looked like. Whatever it was made out of, it wasn't hair. He done a little time, and it was rumored he'd done some murders for hire and got away with it. But Ron, he asks Red Mop again, and this time he puts some blocks under the money, adds in some more stuff with zeros, and Red Mop decides this time he'll do it. He'll go in and kill Frank, and then he'll put the pop on Sandy for another slice of the pie, and anyone else Ron needs killing long as the money keeps climbing. Shit, them two killings was probably more than the first two or three blackmail checks ole Ron paid, but Ron, he's mad now, feels like he got his asshole reamed, and he don't like it. Matter of pride, I figure, not so much the money.

"So Ron's guy, Red Mop, goes after Frank, and then next thing I hear, he's not doing so hot, either. Died same kind of way. Second smile under his chin, propped him up down by a railroad track somewhere in our small world, pants down around his knees, dick hanging out of his shirt pocket, balls whacked off and gone, along with his toupee. Now two of the guys I knew was in on the deal were whacked. That got the hair on my balls to stand up, so me, I went quiet as a mute mouse in house shoes. Looked over my shoulder for a while. Two, three years go by, and no one comes to kill me. So I'm thinking I'm sliding. They, being whoever hired this deballing fellow, don't know it was me that was the middle guy, or so it seems. I fell through the cracks. Two more years or so slip on, and I'm still here because I kept my big mouth shut."

"Until now," I said. "Five hundred dollars and you're singing."

"Cason told me a thousand," Weasel said.

I looked at Cason. He grimaced. "I did."

"All right," I said. "A thousand. But still, why now?"

"Haunts me some, you know. It's on my head. Never even seen the bodies, but I can imagine them cause I know people who know people who know the cops, and they got the news, the specifics from them, the cut throat and balls and all."

"You told us that part," I said.

"Did, didn't I? Man, I just thought I could do something like kill Frank and maybe Sandy. Just thought it. I see this dead dog got hit the other day, you know, on the highway, and I pull over and throw up. I know now I couldn't have done no such thing. Think I'm even more puny now than I was then. I can step on roaches and I can rat out people, but killing for money, I can't go there. That's some kind of house I don't want to live in."

"Aren't you scared to tell us all this after keeping quiet for so long?" Brett asked. "Even for the money?"

"A little," Weasel said. "You got big mouths, I'm scared a lot."

"They don't have," Cason said.

"That's some partial comfort, brother. It's bothering me, this thing I considered doing, and had I done it, I'd have that shit heavy on my head. I didn't, but I led to the hit men getting hit, and they could just have easily have done the job they were hired to do. That would have been on my head, too. That's why I'm laying it all out to you. And there's the money Statler here is offering, too, so I'm not claiming just to be a good fucking Samaritan. But my conscience, and the money…well, I think, why not? Next day or two I'll be out of town for good. Going back up north. I've been down here, let me see…seven, eight…no, nine years, and I don't get it here. I'm going back where plain old bad people are just that. They don't come with a side of 'honey chile' and grits, then a blackjack or a pipe upside the head and a soda bottle jammed up the ass, or throats and balls cut off with sharp wire. Now I get my money?"

Cason looked at me.

"What about Sandy?" I said. "She doesn't show up in this story a lot."

"Not a major player is my guess," Weasel said. "Think she did her part, and it was over. Could be Red Mop got to her before he got his balls lifted, and that's why she isn't around to spend Christmas. I'm going to guess she quit stinking about five years ago. But hell, I don't know. I know he didn't get Frank, so that means he may not have got this Sandy, either.

"Frank's company could have done this Sandy in for some reason or another. I don't really know Sandy, just of her. Couldn't pick her out of a fuck movie if her name was tattooed on her naked ass in neon. Never met her. All I know is the name Sandy, and I got that from the guy Ron talked to, Red Mop, one they found down by the railroad tracks."

"And Ron?" Leonard asked.

"He turned quiet, like me. Decided he wasn't such a manipulator. Quit trying to hire killers. He's still alive. I figure they figure he gives up on trying to be a gangster they'll let him keep living. Guy like that, he goes dead, it might be bad for Frank, or whoever he…she…is connected with, so they might think it's better to let Ron live. And maybe Ron's still paying the blackmail. I don't know. I know this. Me and him are alive, and my balls are still swinging, and whatever happens to him is on his head, and the same goes for me, and he ain't my goddamn worry. I'm taking the thousand, and couple days from now, I'm gone. I won't even leave any body odor."

"Oh, I don't know," Cason said.

"All right, look down on me you want, but you won't be looking long, cause I'm going to be out of here like a goddamn winter goose. I had to talk to people, ask about this shit Cason wanted, and one of them, well, they might see a dollar in it for them, and there's guys out there that would eat a pile of shit and call it a chocolate soufflé if they were getting paid. I figure they would spring it all loose on me first chance they got. Way I figure, on down the road, this Ron, he might turn up dead after all. You know, enough time goes by. Some kind of accident, you see. I don't want the same for me. Neither me nor Ron are talking, not about that, and not to each other, but could be at some point Frank, his bunch, his boss, they could be thinking they want to make sure that never happens, the us-talking part. So when we think we're safe and they got enough distance between what went on, they hit us. That's my thinking. About that money? Going to need that for traveling."

"You said Frank's bunch," I said. "Who does Frank work for?"

"You see, it's just that kind of thing made Ron quit. He realized he hits Frank, maybe this Sandy, that's just the tip of the spear. Ain't you been listening? I done said that more than once, that I don't think Frank is the brains behind all this. I know her a little, enough to know she's smart, but she ain't that damn smart. Ron figured out he would have had to hire someone to kill every goddamn body, and he wasn't even sure who was holding the cards."

"So who can you name?" I said. "Come on—toss us something for our thousand smackers."

"Well, a guy that's got a finger in the pie is Doug Creese. His father, James, was just a bare-ass redneck that got lucky because he could make good barbecue. Said James used to find dead animals on the highway, fix them up good with sweet barbecue sauce and a long time in the smoker. Not unusual for old backwoods barbecue stands, using highway meat. People like that could barbecue a turd and make you think it was a sausage link. But his son, Doug, one you got to worry about, took it over, got prime meat and no more roadkill. He opened a string of barbecue houses. Played like they was upscale, charged more for a chopped beef than a filet mignon, and there was folks willing to pay the dough for it cause they thought they was, like, getting more for their money, it being on a fancy bun with seeds in it and shit. It was an all-right sandwich, but price like that, you could raise and kill a cow yourself and butcher it out cheaper. Well, all right, that's an exaggeration."

"Oh, really?" Brett said.

"Oh, hell, lady, you are so hot-looking I can take insults off you all day."

"Why, thank you, Weasel," Brett said.

"Creese's Barbecue," Leonard said. "Shit, I heard of that. Hell, I've eaten it. Good barbecue. But like you say, the prices are stiff. They're damn proud of it."

"Yep," Weasel said. "Creese's Barbecue. Doug wasn't really interested in barbecuing meat, though. He wasn't interested in having pocket money and a car didn't smoke oil. He wanted more. Wanted to fart half-dollars and shit thousands. He's that kind of guy. Hell, I'm that kind of guy, but I'm starting to know that isn't going to be how it is for me. It's always going to be pecking shit with the chickens, as you boys say. I come to that conclusion one long night after I looked in the refrigerator and realized I had a head of black lettuce and a bottle of water about half drank up."

“Actually,” Cason said, “it’s not your good or ill fortune we’re interested in.”

“Not that I was thinking it was,” Weasel said. “Doug uses the barbecue success to finance some other businesses, ones not so on the up-and-up. Finally, the barbecue gets famous, and he sells the joints, and for big money. That sets him up high and tight, but it’s still not enough. He was already running some low-level hookers in New Orleans. Had some meth labs cooking and all manner of shit going on. But now he has big money, and though he sold the barbecue places, he still gets a cut, so he’s got that dough pouring in, so he starts running higher-class whores, ones who can walk on stiletto heels without wobbling and can cross their legs with a happy promise. He starts setting up more businesses for fronts, finds ways to make big money in a lot of ways, some of them legal, some of them not so legal.”

“Like car lots and blackmail,” I said.

“That would be it,” Weasel said. “People don’t really know the businesses he owns because of the way he hides them. Some he’s up front with, but others he dresses down so it isn’t so out front. He’s the tail that wags the fucking dog.”

“So it’s really the former barbecue guy owns the car lot?” I said.

“That’s how I hear it, and all that comes the fuck with it, but I tell you, that’s just what I heard. All I got is what I heard. I heard most of it lately, when I was asking around, stuff I hadn’t heard before, or stuff that didn’t quite have a shape to it. Barbecue Doug may just be another cog in the wheel, which could be a really, really big wheel. One thing for sure, he lays low. Don’t see him around much. He’s tight to the house. Goddamn, I need a smoke or a chew. You know, I didn’t chew until I got around all these goddamn cracker motherfuckers here in East Texas.”

“Casting your nicotine habits aside,” I said, “anything else?”

“Rest of what I got is old news. But the new news, it could get me whacked, so like I said, I’m traveling. When I get the money.”

“You really just told us a lot of what we already knew,” I said.

“Don’t play me. There was some you didn’t know, right?”

Leonard reached out and thumped a finger on Weasel’s chest, causing him to wince.

“Better be telling the truth, Mr. Weasel, or you may never get to go up north, won’t have to worry about Frank or Barbecue Doug catching up with you. Being lied to makes me itchy, and I don’t like to itch, cause that makes me mad.”

"Cason, he's used me before," Weasel said. "My information is good. I mean, I'm not saying some of it might not be rumor, but rumor is what I got. There's some stuff in there I think is real. Tell them I'm reliable, Cason."

"So far you have been," Cason said. "But there's been a time or two where your information has lived on the border."

"This is smack-dab in the middle of the territories with rumor on the edges," Weasel said. "I keep bringing up the money, but nobody moves."

Cason took out his wallet and pulled out the money for Weasel. Our money.

"Nice doing business with you, kind of," Weasel said. "And keep me out of it. I don't want to end up with that wire-cut smile and my balls buried in some nut's backyard."

"You're out of it," I said.

"Good," Weasel said. "I was you people, I'd be out of it, too. Messing with Doug or Frank could be bad for you. One of them, someone connected to them, knows the guy with the wire, and money gets waved at him, the right money, he'll pick up that wire again."

"We'll keep that in mind," I said.

"So you're not hanging it up?" Weasel said. "Even after what I've told you?"

"Nope," Brett said.

"Have it your way, honey," Weasel said. "Remember I warned you people."

"We got that sweet thought right up against our hearts," Leonard said.

Weasel shrugged. "Listen here. I got one more thing for you. I wasn't going to expand on this, go the whole hog, but I got to get right with myself—know I told you not only what I know is fact, but I got to tell you what might be rumor. Wasn't going to say, cause it sounds maybe too odd, but that don't mean it's not coming from a solid place. Word is this deballer guy, he's a company man carries their freight. Let me say it different. They got a man sometimes works for the company, whoever it is that owns the company, and he's a free agent kind of guy."

"The car company?" Brett said.

"The company. Doug's businesses. It's like a fucking octopus. There's more than cars and women and blackmail in all this. Shit, I done told you that."

"It's nice to know your story doesn't change up," Cason said. "So we can stand some repetition."

"Only a little," Leonard said.

"Keeping in mind I'm still saying it's rumor, and yeah, I know, I say it a lot, but it's said by some that this wire-using motherfucker has connections with all the Dixie-flag-waving jackasses and southern assholes you can imagine."

"Dixie Mafia?" I asked.

"Call it what you like," Weasel said. "Doug and his bunch may be the saltiest crackers you can imagine, a bunch of good old boys. They're shit-cracker tough guys with sweaty pits and bent noses and swastikas on their necks. They got women in that group, too, just as bad and mean as the men. Some got three teeth and two are in their pocket, but they also got sweet women with butter skin and a smile that looks like something you'd see under a magnolia tree with a picnic basket, but when you get close, those are shark teeth, and the basket is a fucking coffin."

"How poetic," Brett said.

"Make fun if you want," Weasel said. "But they got those folks all over, some in businesses that you wouldn't suspect. Some in back alleys, and some in stylish apartments in downtown Houston. They got gangs to do their work, and more than that, they got them a hitter more dangerous than all of them. Some think he's just a story. The Canceler, they call him, on account of he cancels your fucking ticket, erases your plans. He's the guy with the wire is what I hear. He's got other methods, but when they hire him it's because they want it done fast and smooth, otherwise they let the tattoo-necks do it. Those guys, offer them some cocaine, a twelve-pack, and a rubber pocket pussy, they're ready to rock. But this guy, he's not someone I want looking for me, and neither do you. He gets the big bucks, and he don't get them by fucking up. What he gets paid is serious finance. The redneck Dixie-flag-waving cretins come and go, but this guy, he stays around. He hasn't got any agenda about the South, about family, or any such shit. He's got the ability if you got the money, and that's the name of that game."

"Have you seen him?" Leonard asked.

"I told you I don't even know if he's real. But someone is sure killing folks with a wire."

"Description?" Cason asked.

"If I had a description of him, way I hear it, I'd be dead before I could describe him. Ain't no one describing him, cause the ones might know him know better than to give that description. Just me giving out what I know, even if it turns out to be rumor, not fact, could be bad for me.

Thus my exit plans, and I advise you folks to do the same."

"Thanks for the tip," I said.

"You think you're tough," Weasel said. "Word about you guys is you are. That you've seen some shit and thrown some shit around yourself. That you're like the brothers Death and Doom. Maybe you can handle the rednecks. You might do that all right. But this guy, let me tell you, whoever he is, he whacked two badasses I knew, maybe bad as you two, so whoever this guy is, this Canceler, he's a special-ass hired killer. Hell. He's the very devil."

"If he exists?" Leonard said.

"Somebody killed them bad boys I know. That's no rumor. The question is, how bad is the bad guy who done it? Rumors about him are true, then he's the baddest of the bad, and you don't want that hellhound set on your trail."

"We might have another couple of questions before you leave town," I said.

"I might can find out the name of the guy whose last name I can't remember, you just got to have it, but let me tell you, I'm not going out of my way to do it. I told you my plans, and right before I make with the runaway, I'm going to score me some cheap trim and some expensive whiskey, then I am gone. You might not think so, but you got your thousand worth and some change."

"Have a nice trip," I said.

"You know that's right," Weasel said.

"I'll run him home," Cason said.

"Drive fast," I said.

17

After Cason and Weasel left, Brett said, “This has gone from a missing-person case to blackmail and murder. Now we’re talking an invisible hit man who cuts off balls. Anyone believe any of what Weasel said?”

“Some of it,” Leonard said. “He kind of gets wrapped up in his own story, and it grows. He mentions the hit man and what he did, then at the end he tells us stuff about him he didn’t seem to know at first, that he’s part of a syndicate or some such, and he’s just waiting for a phone call, carrier pigeon, whatever, to get his orders for another hit. I don’t know what to think.”

“A while back I didn’t believe there was a guy and a woman who took in orphans and turned them into killers, but I was wrong,” I said. “I should have believed it. Vanilla Ride is pretty badass, and this could be someone just as badass.”

“Or it could be Vanilla herself,” Brett said. “She might fit the time line, and she’d be a pro they might hire.”

Brett did not have a soft spot for Vanilla, because Vanilla had one for me.

I said, “I don’t think this is her style—the wire and the balls cut off—though a woman might think that way, cutting off the balls. It could be a comment on how she was treated when younger, and Vanilla wasn’t treated too well. Still, I don’t think it’s her. She goes for efficiency, not statement.”

“You have a blind spot for her,” Brett said.

“He has a blind spot for just about everyone, you give him time to consider,” Leonard said. “But I’m with him. I don’t think it’s her. Can’t say why, but I don’t. If this killer always does it this way, using the wire, maybe that’s an MO he can’t change, least not comfortably. It could be like a serial killer thing, a signature, except he gets hired to do it. He gets the pleasure and the money both.”

“Other side is,” I said, “maybe he does change up. Could be the employer is the one collecting nut sacks, way Weasel suggested. Hell, I don't know. Maybe he makes change purses out of them. But if he does a lot of hits, he may not do them all the same way, only does them that way because that goes with the payment."

"Good point," Brett said. "So see? It could have been Vanilla who did it, just fulfilling her boss's request."

"If it was, it wouldn't matter now," I said. "That's in the past. She's in Italy somewhere. Not here as a threat."

"So she told you," Brett said.

"I believe her," I said.

"Because she's beautiful?" Brett said. "That's why you believe her?"

"Her looks have nothing to do with me believing her."

"But she is beautiful, right?" Brett said.

"Some say so."

"Oh, Hap. Really."

"All right," I said. "There's nothing about her that makes you want to look away. Well, on second thought, she does carry a gun and will point it at you. She will shoot to kill, and we know she's blown a man up."

"Okay," Brett said. "That might make you look away. But you'd look as long as you could."

"You are putting words in my mouth. She's not my type."

"Damn, Hap," Leonard said. "That's one of them little white lies we were talking about."

"Whose side are you on, anyway?"

"Brett's."

"Thanks," I said. "Brett. She is not my type, because you are my type."

"And if I wasn't around?" Brett asked. "Honest answer."

"She might be my type. Except for that murderous assassin part. That would put me off."

Brett said, "Maybe it would be best if it was Vanilla did it—killed those two men, I mean. I don't think she'd bother you, and by extension, us. But if it wasn't her, and there is a Canceler, isn't that a bit scary?"

"I admit, it's a bit scary," I said.

She looked at Leonard.

"If he's out there I'd like a run at him," he said. "I think I can fuck him up."

Brett thought for a while. "Do we continue?"

"You're the boss," Leonard said. "I wouldn't trust Weasel to give me a cold. Hell, Cason brought him here, and he doesn't trust him. Not completely. Guy like that, he works like psychics. They listen around, figure out what it is we're interested in, then feed it back to us. He may have picked up clues from Cason when they first talked. I mean, Cason, he can be clever, but a guy like Weasel, fucking people around is what he does for a living. He takes a cold reading, swirls it around in his head a little, and by the time he comes to us he may have gotten enough from Cason to weave a story that fits the way we wanted it to fit. It's like making someone believe in flying saucers. You do the whole thing on a person's head, about how conceited it is to think we are the only thinking creatures in the universe, as if we think all that much. The flying saucers are a jump in logic. We are conceited, therefore extraterrestrial life is likely, therefore aliens have arrived on earth in flying saucers. But if that's logical, why do they always land somewhere weird with some two-toothed ignoramus standing on a stump with his dick up a cow's ass? The aliens cut the cow's udder out, haul Two Tooth off to some place high in space, spread his ass with salad spoons, play with his pecker, and send him home. Why is that? That makes no sense. They're so damn space handy why the fuck don't they just let everyone know they're here, hold a conference at the White House? Might be some folks out there that'll come in for a landing some day, but so far, not so much, and I'm not holding my breath. But you talk shit right, and people believe it."

Brett and I stared at him for a moment.

"What the fuck are you talking about?" I said.

"I'm using a comparison, you two. Surely you get it. Bullshit can be given a solid platform so anyone that's willing to believe it can. It makes sense if you think about it," Leonard said.

"You think?" I said.

"It doesn't matter," Brett said.

"Don't wave me off. The flying saucer story really has to do with what we're talking about."

"No, it doesn't," I said.

"Does too."

"You had that hobbyhorse in your mental garage and pulled it out. You been looking for some spot to put that in a conversation."

"Have not."

"Have too."

"Boys," Brett said. "That will be quite enough."

We gave each other a wicked look, and then we looked at the floor.

"Thing is, unless she was abducted by aliens, as far as Sandy goes, we still don't know dick," I said.

"He hasn't quit," Leonard said. "He's picking at me."

"Boys. I mean it. That's enough. Look, we got a missing girl. We got dead folks connected to the missing girl. There are no cow udders and no aliens."

"What I'm saying," Leonard said. "I'm not saying there are. I'm saying it's easy to believe in incredible assassins and all manner of bullshit if it's presented to you right. That's all I'm saying."

"And now you're done," Brett said. "Right?"

"Right," Leonard said.

"Here's some hard, cold truths," Brett said. "There's no more money coming to us on this, and I don't like the old bitch that hired us. Stay on this we go in the hole as far as money is concerned. It's all gratis. And by the way, it's a deep hole. Everyone got that?"

"Got you," I said.

"Just so you know," she said.

"We know," I said.

"Story of our life," Leonard said.

Brett was quiet for some time, but I could sense she was arranging thoughts in her head like a bricklayer laying bricks. She said, "I say we stick. See how this comes out. It's about a missing woman, and I have a daughter, such as she is, and I know how I'd feel, cause I been there."

I nodded. Leonard and I knew, of course. We had sort of rescued her daughter, Tillie, twice.

"Seeing it through, that's all right by me, but sometimes it's not a pretty picture," Leonard said.

"I been around you two long enough to know that," Brett said. "It's not like I haven't had my tit in the wringer a few times."

"You've shown you've got what it takes more than once," Leonard said.

"I think so," Brett said.

"No doubt about it," I said. "You got tough tits."

"You can say that again," Brett said.

"All right, then," I said. "We're in to the end. As for the Canceler, finding out about him, there's another person I can think of has an ear to the ground. Better than Cason, I think. Maybe better than Weasel. We need someone wades through shit on a regular basis and can turn it into tapioca."

"Ain't that us?" Leonard said.

"I think this is deeper than our usual crap."

"Oh, hell," Leonard said. "You don't mean that cornpone motherfucker—”

“Jim Bob Luke,” I said.

18

Of course I can figure it out," Jim Bob Luke said. He smiled like an alligator and moved a well-chewed toothpick from one corner of his mouth to the other with his tongue. "You do know who you're talking to, don't you?"

"We know, all right," Leonard said. "But ego alone won't solve what we're up against."

"Oh, I don't know," Jim Bob Luke said. "That's only true if I'm a blowhard. And I'm not. I can do what I say. It has never occurred to me but once—and I was feeling kind of sick that day—that there might be something I couldn't figure, couldn't solve. And by the way, that day I had my doubts, I solved it anyway. That cured me from doubting me. I always say: I want someone smart to talk to, I go out back of the house and talk to myself. I am fucking sterling company."

We were at our office, and Jim Bob, who lived in Pasadena, just on the other side of Houston, had driven down that morning after a phone call the night before, and he'd even brought doughnuts. They weren't on my diet, but damn it, I had two of the chocolate-coated kind. Brett had three, and Leonard asked for his cookies and we gave them to him. I have no idea how many he ate. Now, if I could only remember how many doughnuts Jim Bob ate, I'd be one happy man. I think he also brought apple fritters.

Jim Bob wasn't a young man, but he wasn't exactly old, either. He looked younger than he was. He was long and lean with a quick smile and eyes that sometimes looked green and sometimes blue and I suppose were actually a shape-shifting gray; they changed with the light or the clothes he was wearing. Today they looked blue in his tanned face. He wore a black shirt with snap pockets, what we used to call a cowboy shirt. He had on crisp blue jeans and black boots with red explosions on the toes, like he had kicked something dead and bloody. He had a white straw cowboy hat with a wide paisley band and a big green feather in it. He had taken it off and had rested it on his knee. He always looked wrong without the hat on. Looked like the kind of guy that had been born with it on his head. His hair was a little sweaty and hat-shaped.

As always, Jim Bob appeared happy and in a good mood, though I knew behind that friendliness was a granite-hard reserve and a dark streak. He seemed like the biggest redneck that ever walked the earth until you spent time with him. Then you realized that behind that rawness, that laid-back coolness, was a sharp mind and quick reflexes and street-fighting skills. I had seen them in action. Woe to the man that thought Jim Bob was a simple Texas goober. He could not only fight, he could also think, and he was as brave as they come without being foolish. He had depth that he kept hidden, but you could sense it was there, the way the smell of ozone alerts you to the approach of lightning.

Brett told him everything we knew, even her thoughts about Vanilla Ride, whom he knew. He knew damn near everyone who had ever done an illicit deed, and he had done a few himself here and there, but in his mind, and my own, it was for the greater good. Still, knowing that, and sometimes being a part of such myself, didn't help me sleep all that well at night. I think Jim Bob, like Leonard and Brett, snoozed just fine.

Jim Bob listened quietly, looking like he always does, like he's already got the answers before you get through explaining.

"Weasel tells a good story," Jim Bob said. "Some of it might have the whiff of bullshit about it, but I'm thinking it isn't all fairy tale. I've heard word of this Canceler. He supposedly wiped out an entire Mexican drug gang that was bringing dope into Houston, not because he was trying to do a humanitarian thing but because he got hired to whack them. And he kept on whacking them until what was left of them decided to stay down below the Rio Grande and sell tacos. They were bumping into the drug business in Houston, hurting some of the local boys' revenue. This Mexican gang, the Canceler took them out one by one, and though he didn't use a wire on all of them, it was mostly that. He isolated the ones he could, wired them, cut off their balls, and in the end I think there were four left, and like I said, they ran back to Mexico. Canceler followed them somehow, broke into their stronghold in Mexico, and killed all four. Took their nut sacks and left."

"That part sounds like some of Weasel's rumors," Leonard said.

"Wouldn't sound like that if you knew better," Jim Bob said. "Some of that gang was seriously bad and mean as a snake in a latrine. I knew folks dealt with them. Bought drugs. Not saying they're friends of mine, saying through my underworld contacts I came up against them, and one of them was an American beaner who did enough business with them he thought he might be next on the list."

"Beaner," I said. "Nice."

"Oh, hell, Hap. I got friends that are beaners, real friends."

This was the kind of stuff that made Jim Bob confusing, but I didn't say anything else. I had long ago given up on trying to sort out who was who by what they said. It was as Leonard said, "It's not what you say, it's what you do."

Jim Bob continued.

"So, as I was saying, this beaner named Miguel, who is not a friend but comes to me for protection, wants to hire me for it. Tells me this Canceler is real, and Miguel knows he's on the list, cause he's been doing drug business in a heavy way with the boys from Mexico, and now those boys are missing their balls, not to mention their lives, and he wants to hire me. I don't have nothing for that shithead, so I tell him no, and a week later they find him in a storage container out by the docks with his pants off and his balls gone, his throat cut. Maybe with a wire. No one knows what's true and what's myth about the guy, but this Canceler fella is real. My bet is he doesn't take the balls to prove he's done his job but takes them as a souvenir."

"I guess they don't give out awards for best serial killer," I said. "So he has to provide his own trophies."

"Unless you count the prize the press gives him. And this guy, he doesn't get treated like a serial killer. He's a hit man. He gets paid. For him, those men's nuts, it's like a little boy stealing girls' panties. He likes to take them out, look at them from time to time, maybe sniff them and bat them around with a tennis racket or some such, no telling what all, but he gets more respect than the dime-store serial killer, least among those who pay for his services."

"Does the Canceler kill women?" Brett asked. "I'm thinking I might get a pass if he comes after us."

"I think he'd kill anyone," Jim Bob said. "Maybe he's got some vaginas in his collection, too. I don't know. Stretches them over his head like a horse collar. How this all fits in with the car business and the blackmail I don't know. That's a lot of working parts, and some of those parts grind together a little. Think what we ought to do, since you two took a run at this Frank, and then your friend Cason did the same, is I take a run at her. I am one charming motherfucker when I want to be."

"Really?" Brett said.

"Really," he said. "Girl with a dick or no dick, I can make them smile."

"Or feel ill," Brett said.

"You good-looking little darling, you are so right. I can do that, too. But sometimes you got to play a different card in a different situation. I can smooth out when I want to."

"Cason is as charming as they come," Leonard said. "He kind of charms me. But you, charming? I don't know, man."

"All right, let's talk straight," Jim Bob said. "Am I good-looking?"

"Oh, hell, man," I said.

"Really," Jim Bob said. "Brett? What do you think?"

"You are a handsome man," she said. "And to tell you true, if I didn't already have my man, you'd butter my biscuit, no doubt. I mean I'd probably kill you in a week, but as much as you're arrogant, you are somehow appealing, like whipped cream, which also makes me sick. I think calling people beaners and such would wear on me, and that toothpick annoys me, and I don't like the hat, unless it's to shit in, but as long as we didn't talk all that much, I can see you being appealing enough. I'd think of you as someone who could hit the high spots."

"I think I'm wounded to the bone," I said. And I was a little.

"All is well," Brett said. "I'm just giving my honest opinion as a beautiful and highly appealing woman."

"There you have it," Jim Bob said and winked at Brett. "Thank you, you fine-looking honeypot, cause your opinion really matters to me. Hell, Leonard there, even he's thinking—and tell me if I'm wrong, Lenny—you're thinking: that is one fine-looking man, and I'd like to do him. Aren't you, Leonard?"

"Hardly," Leonard said, but I thought there was a bit of a catch in his voice.

"Well, we need not worry about that. I don't throw the saddle on homos, just women."

"You are going to get hurt," Leonard said.

Jim Bob laughed. Unlike most people, Leonard didn't faze Jim Bob in the least. He liked messing with people, pulling their strings. Life was his oyster, and you were living outside the shell as far as he was concerned.

"Here's the thing," Jim Bob said. "I got me a date with a barrel racer tonight, a twenty-nine-year-old big-tittied blond home wrecker if you ever saw one. Fortunately for me I don't have a wife, so there's nothing to wreck. I don't even have a hog farm anymore. Sold it. But I do have that date."

“This might be a little more important than dating a barrel racer,” I said.

“You haven’t seen the barrel racer, Hap. She’s got legs so long you want to climb her like a tree. Least up to where it forks. I mean, yeah, she’s younger than me by some years, but shit, way I see it, if she dies she dies. But here’s the other thing. I don’t want to go into this car place looking to buy a car close to when all you numb nuts went in. I say we give it a week or so, let this Frank get your visit off her mind. She’s bound to have her flag up and ready to tussle. So I don’t want to make her think I’m part of the problem. I want her to see me as a mark.”

“Makes sense,” Leonard said.

“Also, I got to tell you, since you went in there and pulled on Frank’s string pretty hard, I figure she went to her boss and pulled on his string. People like that, they don’t like their strings pulled. If they’re connected like this Weasel says, they may not like it so much you might even get a visit from them, and they won’t be bringing flowers and a bottle of wine. On the other hand, they may just figure you guys aren’t really on to shit and are no threat.”

“Good,” Leonard said. “Then we get to meet the Canceler sooner than later.”

“I don’t think so. Guy like the Canceler, they don’t pull him out for just any old hit on a peckerwood and bop-a-nigger job.”

“Hey,” Leonard said.

“I’m telling you how they think, Leonard. First rule of becoming a good detective—not something I think is in your immediate future—is you got to think like they do, and sometimes you got to be them, at least in spirit.”

“Call me a nigger again and you’ll have my spirit up your ass.”

“Trying to say watch your backs, cause they might send problem solvers, one of those that’s on the low end of the totem pole. Not some hot-dog professional but a crowd of dick draggers that come cheap. Eyes and ears open, and keep your left up. And by the way, since you didn’t mention pay, I suppose this is one of them jobs where I’m doing this for you to have the pleasure of my company.”

“Looks that way,” I said. “Maybe something comes along later that we can’t do, don’t want to do, we can throw it your way, something has money in it, I mean.”

“Thoughtful. I figure it’s most things you three can’t do when it comes to real detective work, so I might have a long line of referrals coming my way. No offense, Brett, you can learn, these two, I’m not so sure. They are blunderers. How they have lived as long as they have and managed to have all their legs and arms is beyond me. Deal is, I'm going back to Houston."

Jim Bob looked at his watch.

"I got time to get there and shower up, put on some smell-good, buy a couple packs of rubbers, and meet my barrel racer."

"Couple packs of rubbers," Brett said. "Very romantic."

"Ah, honey, I'm taking her to dinner first, and I always let the woman put the rubber on, and I think two packs is enough. And don't worry. I need an extra pack, I can send her to the drugstore. I got a bicycle in the garage."

"You can leave now," Brett said. "Wouldn't want you to miss your barrel racer."

"And she wouldn't want me to miss, either, in more ways than one. But as you know, I'm a straight shooter."

He stood up, put on his hat, and went out.

As we listened to him going down the stairs, I said, "He can rub a dildo wrong when he wants to."

19

I won’t lie to you, next few days I was jumpy. I had a snub-nosed .38 revolver that I gave to Brett to keep in her purse, and I kept the same kind of gun in my glove box, and in the house I had a twelve-gauge Remington handy. I had another stashed in the attic. There were shotguns tucked into the closet at the office. Leonard was armed as well. I always felt like a hypocrite with all those guns, and I was. I hated them, but once you felt their power, they owned you to some extent. I disliked being owned by machinery.

Frank, if she had checked the car I rented as a decoy, and had a few contacts, it wouldn’t have taken her long to figure out who rented it and connect me to it, which connected Brett to it, if just peripherally. And Frank probably figured out who Leonard was, too, being as how there was no winter petunia tour, and the Internet probably revealed everything but our shoe sizes. If the car lot people were as sneaky at business as they seemed to be, as wealthy as they appeared, they could get things done, not only in finding us, but hurting us, if they were willing to go that far. When it came to bad criminal business, a few dollars and a hard piece of wood upside the head or a loaded gun works a lot better than a smile and a kind word most any day.

Few early mornings later, a weekend, I was in the kitchen reading the newspaper and drinking a cup of coffee. Our local paper was now about the size of a grocery pamphlet. It had an online presence as well, but I missed holding a heft of news sheets in my hand. I loved newspapers, and they seemed to be a near-lost business. News had become primarily a bunch of folks quarreling on TV and giving opinions about the news even before it happened. The actual news itself was hard to seek out.

I was thinking on all this because I was reading the newspaper for my entertainment, but the last few mornings Cason let me come over to his newspaper office and see the papers in the morgue—those that had been copied to their computer. Camp Rapture, where he worked, had as much news about LaBorde as LaBorde did, and I thought it might be wise to get their take on our news.

Leonard had taken the mission to look through the records at our local newspaper, telling them he was doing some research for something or other, which in a way he was. But we thought saying we were looking for clues of a prostitution-and-blackmail ring and a serial killer who cuts off balls might not be something to spread around. He did this while I was at Camp Rapture. What we were specifically looking for were articles, bits and pieces here and there about certain murders, that would substantiate what Weasel told us. Other murders of a similar nature, that sort of thing.

So far Leonard hadn't found anything in our local papers that I hadn't seen, and none of what I had seen seemed to matter. I had burned out looking through the Camp Rapture records and was, as I said, home that day, having my coffee and contemplating if driving over to Camp Rapture again was even worth it. Seemed to me I would have heard of those murders Weasel told us about, and if I hadn't, there would at least be some reference to them in the newspapers five years back.

Nada.

Could something like that be kept secret?

I called Marvin and left him a message, was waiting for him to call back. I was trying to keep him and the police out of it as much as possible, at least at this point, but I figured desperate as we were, it might be time to drag him in, if only for information he might have available to him that we didn't.

I called Cason next. He told me where Weasel lived, and after I had finished the paper and was sipping another cup of coffee, I decided not to go to Camp Rapture. I called Leonard, and he came over.

Me and him drove over to Weasel's joint for a closer talk. He was most likely long gone, but if he wasn't, Leonard suggested we start breaking his fingers off in his ass until we got some real answers. Leonard had the frame of mind now that Weasel wasn't giving us rumors but was in fact shining our ass a little. Giving us some real information but holding back things we needed, things he knew but wasn't saying. I didn't have an opinion on the matter. Truth was, going to see where Weasel lived, hoping he might not have gone north yet, was something to do other than look futilely through old newspapers. I liked my fresh morning paper, but those made my nose itch.

Weasel's place was a duplex. There were some standard box houses on both sides of the street. His apartment was upstairs. The bottom apartment seemed uninhabited. Windows were knocked out of that one, and there were no curtains and no sign of occupation. The duplex was the only one on the short block divided from the box houses by tall untrimmed hedges on either side, and there was a car parked out front. It was an old Ford that looked to have been bullied by other cars on the highway. There were dents, and the windshield was cracked in a spiderweb pattern, and it was plastered green and yellow with bugs that had chosen the wrong flight pattern. The tires were a little low. The trunk had been closed poorly, and a black rag dangled out of it.

We climbed to the top floor of the duplex and knocked on the door. No one answered. We gave it a good banging with our fists and worked the doorbell, which didn't work at all. That brought us back to more door banging with the same lack of results.

As we came down the stairs a black cat came out of one of the lower duplex's missing windows, jumped to the ground, then eyed us like we might be trespassing on his property.

Leonard said to the cat, "Get your goddamn windows fixed."

It was late morning by then, but no one seemed around in the yards or looking out windows. The area struck me as the sort where people minded their own business in case your business might be bad business they didn't want to know about.

Driving away, I called Cason and described the car we saw. He was the one who introduced us to Weasel, so I hoped he knew a little about him and the wreck he drove. When I described the car, he said it indeed was Weasel's wreck, but he thought it might have been something he'd leave behind. It was about twenty years old, and besides needing an oil change, probably had a lot of miles on it.

We went back to my place. Leonard dropped me off and headed for the LaBorde newspaper. He figured he had to take advantage while they were still friendly enough to let him sit in a chair in their morgue room and read the papers on computer and microfiche.

I went straight back to the kitchen table and resumed drinking coffee, decaf now, because I had swigged so much pure black coffee over the last few days I was almost dancing everywhere I went.

Sitting there at the table, thinking on these matters again, I came up with nothing. Brett, who had been sleeping in while Leonard and I had been out, came into the kitchen. She was wearing one of my long shirts, an old paint-stained one that she sometimes slept in. It wasn't pretty, but she made it look good, way her legs showed.

Pouring herself a cup of coffee, she said, "What you thinking?"

"Weasel's full of shit."

“Jim Bob verified some of what Weasel said.”

“I know. But still, though there may have been some truth in there, nothing he told us shakes out. Not in the papers; no word of it anywhere.”

“You may not be thinking this through,” Brett said.

“How’s that?”

“He said one body was down at the Sabine, or the Trinity, and one near a railroad track. He wasn’t specific, didn’t seem sure about any of it, not even sure which river was involved. I got the idea he knew the stories, but none of it first-or even secondhand. That could be the rumor part he was referring to.”

I let that sink in.

“Could be,” I said. “But I’d have thought something as bold as a killer taking someone’s balls and cutting their throat and leaving them out to be found would have shown up in the papers, even if it didn’t happen right around here.”

“Maybe, and maybe not,” she said. “Still, doesn’t mean it didn’t happen. Weasel is oily, but I don’t think even he is that good a bullshitter. He seemed legitimately scared of this guy.”

“Lying is his stock-in-trade, dear,” I said.

Brett nodded. “Yeah. I guess at this point we’re just circling the airport. So maybe we ought to get on with it, see if we can land this baby.”

Someone knocked on the door. Since what Jim Bob had told us was more than a little fresh on our minds, I was cautious about answering it. I went to the kitchen cabinet and opened the drawer and took out a little flat automatic I had put there since Jim Bob and Weasel had warned us. It was small-caliber and didn’t have that much stopping power, but it was something. I still had the revolver, but I liked to keep it in my glove box.

I eased to the window by the side of the door, edged back the curtain, and looked out. A young woman I judged to be in her twenties was standing there. She was very pretty, with black hair and dark skin, long-legged in blue-jean shorts, wearing red tennis shoes. She had on a loose shirt, black with red and blue parrots on it. She didn’t look like a Jehovah’s Witness.

I put the automatic at the base of my spine and pulled my shirt over it and walked over to the door. Buffy, who had been on the couch, got off of it and strolled over. Even she was curious.

I opened the door.

The girl stared at me. She reminded me of someone. A battered old brown Cadillac was parked at the curb.

She said, “Are you Hap Collins?”

“Yes.”

“Funny. I thought you’d be taller.”

“Okay. Do I know you?”

“Not exactly. What a pretty dog.”

“She is, yes.”

Buffy had eased out the door and was sitting now, looking up at her. The girl patted the dog, and Buffy liked it.

She looked up and studied my face. The way she looked at me, I don’t know if I can describe it. Wistful. Hopeful. Scared. Nervous. All of the above.

“Do you remember May Lynn Gomez?”

I did. We had dated awhile after the divorce from my first wife. She had been divorced, too. We pleasured each other, mostly, and it wasn’t exactly much of a relationship. She had been a fine-looking woman with a lot of problems. Other than her beauty and those problems, I didn’t really remember all that much about her.

“Yes,” I said.

“She has died,” the girl said.

“I’m sorry to hear it. Are you Chance?”

Brett came to the door, said, “Hello, dear.”

“Miss Sawyer.”

“Call me Brett. Dealing with getting older is not working out as well as I thought it would.”

We stood there in the doorway looking at Chance. Nobody spoke. Nobody barked. Buffy slowly wagged her tail.

“Mom thought I should look you up.”

“And why is that?” I asked.

“Mr. Collins…Hap. You’re my dad.”

20

You could have pushed me down with a hummingbird fart.

Almost. I actually remained on my feet, though a bit stunned and confused.

Brett said, “Come in, Chance.”

Chance came in. She looked so much like her mother, though taller, and with a different sort of movement.

When Chance was inside and Buffy had followed, I found enough of my brain to remember the door needed closing. I did that, then wandered along with her and Brett into the kitchen, where Brett asked her to sit down at the table. Buffy trotted into the kitchen with them, lay down near her food bowl by the stove.

Chance sat and folded her hands together on top of the table.

I sat down across from her.

Brett said, “Have you had breakfast, hon?”

“No, ma’am. But I’m okay.”

“No problem to fix you something,” Brett said.

“It’s all right,” Chance said.

“No, really. No problem. Right, Hap?”

“No problem.”

“Okay, then. I guess I am a little hungry.”

“Hap, fix her something,” Brett said.

I looked up at Brett and smiled at her. Then I looked at Chance.

“What would you like?” I said and gave her some offerings.

She decided on toast and coffee and scrambled eggs. While I fixed those, Brett talked to her in a general way, things like where are you staying, simple stuff. I listened as I cooked. Chance said she had been living out of her car. I liked the way she talked. She sounded East Texas, but there was a kind of smoothness to her manner and movements, and I could sense a wounded confidence, like a tiger that had survived a gunshot wound.

I put breakfast in front of her, said, “Eat first, then we’ll talk some more.”

I poured Brett and myself coffee, then sat down at the table. I glanced at Brett. She glanced at me. I felt shell-shocked. Could it be true?

I studied Chance. She was about the right age, midtwenties. And she sure looked like May Lynn. Had beautiful coffee-colored skin. I remembered May Lynn saying something about being Hispanic, and what was it? Choctaw? I didn’t remember exactly. Frankly, we hadn’t been that close, except in bed. But the question wasn’t if May Lynn was her mother. The question was, was I her dad?

Chance finished eating and sipped at her coffee. She had been polite and careful as she ate, but it was clear she was hungry.

“Me and your mom, we only dated a little while.”

“I understand when it comes to sex,” Chance said. “It only takes the one time.”

“True enough,” I said. “But it’s been years. Why now? Why didn’t she come to me earlier? What did she die of?”

“Lot of questions pretty fast,” Brett said.

“Sorry,” I said.

“She didn’t blame you for anything,” Chance said. “She had sex, she got pregnant, the two of you moved on, and she never told you. She said the two of you hadn’t been that close.”

“Except for at least one time,” Brett said.

“Yes, ma’am,” Chance said. “There was that one time.”

“It wasn’t quite that simple,” I said.

“The drinking. She said that’s what did it. You liked her, but she drank, bad.”

“She had problems with the liquor,” I said. “Nice lady. Except when she drank. We never truly became an item.”

“She always loved me and treated me well.”

“I’m glad for that,” I said.

“She quit drinking for a while. I had a passel of unofficial stepdads. Not legally, but she lived with different men. She wasn’t strong. She drank a lot, and so did the men, but they came and went. It was really just me and her, and then she drank so much it ate her up inside and she died. She left me what she had. Five hundred dollars in the bank, her lifetime of savings, and then there was the car and a bicycle. Thank goodness the Cadillac is big enough to sleep in, though it hardly runs. A 1975 model. She bought it used, and it got really used after that. I also got a box of belongings in the trunk of the car. I pawned the bicycle.”

“So May thought you were my daughter?”

“She didn’t think, she knew.”

I nodded, not really knowing what else to do. I looked at Chance even more carefully. She looked like May Lynn, but I was starting to see myself in her face—little things, like the mouth and nose. Or maybe I was just reading that into place because I thought she might in fact be my daughter.

I sipped some coffee I didn’t want, searched for words, and didn’t find any.

Brett said, “Honey, here’s the thing. If you are Hap’s daughter—and I’m not saying I doubt you; you look a little like him, but you know, to be sure—we need to take a paternity test. It’s the right thing to do, just to prove what you and your mother believe to be true. Because if it isn’t, then you need to know that, too.”

“Mother was certain,” Chance said. “She said there was only Hap, and then she was pregnant, so it was him unless it was immaculate conception.”

“Of course, but she may not have judged everything correctly,” I said. “I mean, at some point there were others, your stepdads. There could have been someone else. And besides, she said she was on the Pill.”

“She was. It was that rare, rare chance when something that shouldn’t happen does, in spite of the Pill. It’s nearly one hundred percent, but not quite. Mr. Collins, I’m not asking you to be a dad, not asking you for money. I just wanted to see you. Have some idea what you look like, how you are. I researched on you for the last year. Asking around, finding out this and that. Mom only told me about you a year ago. By the way, a lot of people don’t like you.”

“And maybe with good reason,” I said. “Understand I didn’t mean what I said to sound like, well, that—”

“That you were saying my mom was a tramp?”

“Yeah. I didn’t mean that.”

“What did you mean?”

“What he meant is this is new for all of us,” Brett said. “It’ll take a bit of time, but a paternity check would figure it out for us. I think that’s only fair, to be sure. Your mom told it the way she remembered it, but say she was off by a little, forgot a few details?”

“That’s a big detail,” Chance said, and she turned her head slightly, and when she did I could see her mother quite clearly. She had a habit of doing just that, kind of turning her head to one side, as if it gave her greater perspective on an idea. Her mouth trembled ever so slightly. “She had a number of boyfriends later, but she wasn’t a slut. She wasn't."

"No one is saying that," Brett said. "Not even close. I'm not Hap's first, nor is he mine. It's the way life works. It's just if your mother was mistaken. If. Then you wouldn't want to miss out and not find your real dad, if you haven't already found him."

"If you're my daughter, Chance, then I'm more than fine with that. Completely fine. It's like Brett says, though. We need to be sure. For all our sakes. Before we invest hearts, we need to invest DNA and be sure. That's fair, isn't it?"

Chance looked into her coffee cup. She stared at it so intently you would have thought a small shark might be circling in there.

She lifted her head, settled her eyes on me. "Sure. That makes sense. But I haven't got money for that kind of test."

"We do," Brett said.

* * *

That night Brett and I lay in bed together in the dark while Chance was sleeping downstairs in what had been Leonard's room. Buffy was in her basket near the bathroom door, asleep. She made little growling noises as she slept. I think she was thinking vengeful thoughts about her former master. Or maybe she was just being beaten up by a rabbit.

I had made a move on Brett to make love, but Brett said, "Not with Chance downstairs."

"As you say, she's downstairs, not under the bed."

"It just doesn't feel right. Your daughter…possible daughter…right under us, and us, you know…"

"You know?"

"Making love."

"You're the one invited her to stay. I also want her to, but…hell, I don't know what I think. I like her, I know that, and I wouldn't mind her being my daughter."

"What if she's not your daughter?"

"She still doesn't need to sleep in a car."

"Why I asked her to stay. I want us to help her."

"But on the other hand, I sensed hesitation from you, a fear she could be down there putting the silverware in a pillowcase."

"I didn't say anything like that."

"Didn't you?" I said.

"No. I said I didn't want to make love because it makes me uncomfortable that she's down there."

"How about taking a pee? Will that make you uncomfortable knowing she's down there?"

"Don't be cute," she said.

"It wasn't that cute."

"No, it wasn't. It's just that if she is your daughter, what do we do? If she isn't your daughter, what do we do?"

"I really just wanted to make love and go to sleep," I said.

"We have to do something for her."

"We fed her. We gave her a bed. And if she's not my daughter, we'll see what we can do to help her get started. Until then, we let her stay, have her take a paternity test, and take it from there."

"My daughter doesn't come visit," Brett said.

"She hasn't asked to come visit."

"You don't like her."

"I think her nearly getting me and Leonard killed twice and her going back to being a drunk and a druggie on a regular basis is part of that."

"She has problems, too, Hap. Is it one daughter over another?"

"I don't even know Chance is my daughter."

"But if she is?"

"I said already. We help her out."

"My point. Your daughter we help, my daughter we don't."

"Would you consider me and Leonard, and even you, nearly getting killed one time, and then me and Leonard nearly getting killed a second time, helping her out?"

"You said that already."

"I think it has a certain significance."

"If my daughter had a home to come to, then it might be different. She might do better."

"Tillie has her own house. What she does there and who she brings there is her problem. And sometimes ours. And she's in her thirties now. This girl is young."

"I handled myself then."

"So did I, but that's not the point."

"I'm not trying to be a bitch, Hap."

"You're doing a pretty good imitation."

She turned the light on.

"Are we going to go there?" Brett said.

"You're the one that said you're a bitch."

"I said no such thing. I said I'm not trying to be one, and you said I was one."

“An imitation of one.”

“Don’t start splitting hairs with me, buster. You not only aren’t getting any pussy tonight, you might prepare yourself for what certainly could be a long drought.”

“Baby, come on.”

“So now I’m your baby, not your bitch.”

I could see this was going downhill fast. I said, “Sorry, Brett. I’m as confused, surprised, and startled as anyone. I go from one end of the spectrum to the other on this. I’m happy about it in an odd way, confused in another. I hope she is my daughter, and I hope she isn’t. But she’s a person.”

Brett turned off the light.

In the dark, she said, “I know. I’m sorry. But I don’t think you’ve given Tillie a chance.”

“Well, speaking of Chance, let’s see if this girl deserves a chance. Even if she doesn’t I still want to help her. And it’s not like I haven’t tried to help your daughter, but Tillie—”

“I know. It’s different.”

“I was going to say difficult.”

“You wanted a family. And now you just may have one. But I won’t lie to you: I’m uncomfortable about it. Maybe I’m jealous of one daughter over another, or at least that’s how I’m seeing it.”

“If she is my daughter,” I said. “Seems to me we have to let this lay and see how it plays out for now.”

I could hear Brett breathing gently in the dark.

After a long while she spoke.

“I guess. And Hap?”

“What?”

“We don’t actually have any real silverware.”

By the time we quit talking things had smoothed over pretty well, but I still didn’t get any.

* * *

I finally got up and slipped out of the bed silently and went downstairs. In the living room I picked up a book on the coffee table, an old Bill Crider western, and started reading it. I had read it some years before, but now and again I have to read or reread a western.

I had just started when I heard the door to Leonard’s old room open. Turning, I saw Chance, dressed in a pair of Brett’s footy pajamas that were too long for her, come into the room.

She came to the edge of the couch where I sat, smiled at me. “Brett is tall,” she said. She lifted one foot, and I could see the footy was dangling.

“She is at that.”

“She’s so different from my mom.”

“Yes,” I said. “She is. What you doing up? You look tired.”

“I am. I thought I might have some warm milk. What are you doing up? You look tired, too.”

“Wanted to read.”

“At three in the morning?”

“I thought two was too early and four was too late.”

She chuckled slightly.

“Come on,” I said. “I’ll warm us both some milk.”

We went into the kitchen, and I poured milk in cups and placed them one at a time in the microwave. When we both had our warm milk we sat at the table. We looked at each other. I think we both had a lot to say but had no idea how to say it.

“I have something special,” I said. “Well, I find it special. I hide it so Leonard doesn’t get it.”

“I know he’s your friend, but nothing else.”

I got up and opened a cabinet, and from behind a box of rice and a can of whole jalapenos I pulled out a box of animal crackers. It was one of those small boxes that has a zoo on the front and animals behind bars. Never liked zoos or circuses, really. Felt sorry for the animals. But I liked animal crackers.

“Oh, I love those,” Chance said.

“So does Leonard,” I said. “Vanilla cookies of any kind, animal crackers, Dr Peppers. Why I hide these.”

“That’s mean.”

“He’s a cookie-eating machine and kind of a bastard about it.”

She showed a lot of pretty teeth. “You two sound like kids.”

“In some ways we are. You end up staying around us, you’ll find we’re very juvenile and pretty crass.”

“Mom said she thought you were a fine man.”

I didn’t know how to respond to that, so I merely opened the box of animal crackers, divided them up between us. When that was done we both had a small pile of them in front of us, along with our warm milk.

“I guess I should have got a plate,” I said.

“No, this is fine.”

“Sure?”

"Yeah."

"I could get a plate—a saucer, or something."

"No, really. This is fine."

"Not a great host," I said.

"We don't need the good china for animal crackers," she said and popped one in her mouth. "Oh, wow, these are good. When I was little Mom would get me animal crackers and a carton of milk, put me in front of the TV, and let me watch cartoons. She used that time to drink. Still, it's one of my fondest memories—eating animal crackers, drinking milk, and watching Ren and Stimpy, whatever she recorded for me. I had stacks of those VHS tapes, and out in the car I have a box of DVDs I've used to replace them. I still like cartoons."

"I like the Road Runner in those old Warner Brothers cartoons."

"Oh, yeah, he's great. And Wile E. Coyote always going off a cliff, and there's that slow drop and the big pow and the cloud of dust that floats up."

"You bet. What kind of music do you like?" I asked.

"I'm eclectic. I like some rap, but not much. Sounds alike pretty quick. Liked more of it when I was younger."

"You're pretty young now."

"I don't feel all that young," she said.

There was a slight darkening of tone, so I said, "What else do you like?"

"Country, some. Kasey Lansdale."

"Oh, hell," I said. "Leonard adores her stuff. I like it, too, but he's a fanatic. He likes to sit around and be moody to country music, usually the older stuff. Hank Williams, Johnny Cash. I like all that, too. Patsy Cline. Loretta Lynn. And have you heard Johnny Cash's son's music? John Carter Cash. Man, he is different. I have a CD of his that I've about worn a groove in."

"I don't know Hank Williams's music much," she said. "I kind of like Hank the Third, some of it. I know who his dad is, and know songs of his sung by other people, but not him."

"Real deal, Williams."

That line of talk ran out, and we sat for a while drinking milk and eating cookies. I was glad I had the milk and cookies so I wouldn't just sit there and stare at her, still trying to see myself in her.

"I have a degree in journalism," she said.

"That's good," I said.

"Did I already say that?"

"I don't think so."

"I worked at a paper for a while. I had a short story published in a literary magazine."

"Really?'

"Yeah. REAL, out of Stephen F. Austin University. I didn't get paid."

"Still, it was accepted."

"Yeah."

We minced around for more conversation, but by this time the animal crackers had run out.

"I feel better now," she said. "Sleepy."

"Me, too," I said.

"Thanks for the milk and the animal crackers."

"No sweat."

She stood up from the table.

"I guess I'll go to bed."

"Me, too."

"Should I put the glasses in the dishwasher?"

"I'll do that. You go on and get some sleep. Wake up when you want."

I think we were both trying to decide if hugging was appropriate. We decided without a word that it wasn't. She lingered, standing by the table for a moment, then said, "Good night," and went away.

I got up and rinsed out the milk glasses and put them in the dishwasher. I threw the box that had contained the animal crackers away. I dampened a sponge and wiped the table clean, pushing crumbs into my palm and dropping them in the trash.

I climbed the stairs, and by the time I got to the bedroom and slipped under the covers my eyes were wet with tears that I couldn't entirely explain.

21

We still hadn't heard from Jim Bob and Marvin.

On Sunday me and Leonard went fishing. I'm not really much of a fisherman, but now and again I enjoyed casting a line in the water. If I caught fish I sometimes ate them, but more often than not threw them back.

The main reason I went was to get my mind off things, both the case we were working on and my possible fatherhood.

It was a private lake we had access to, thanks to a friend of Marvin's. More of a big pond, actually. We had borrowed a small boat with a motor, and the lake was infested with fish and alligators, not to mention ducks and all manner of swampy growth poking up through the water. The sunlight hit the water with a vengeance, and where the greenery was tall in the water, it made a lot of little shadows. Out in the center it was clear and deep-looking, and there was a sheen that made it look more like oil than water. On the banks birches grew, alongside a scattering of willows and elms, their roots spreading into the water where the shore had broken away.

Leonard was sitting at the bow, and I was at the stern. We both had on wide-brimmed straw hats to keep from cooking, and the brims made shadows on our bent knees. The air was stiff and hot. We were drifting near the middle of the pond, casting our rods. I always loved the moment when the cast happened and the line whizzed out and sometimes you would get a flick of silver from the sunlight falling on the business end of the line.

We had brought along a lunch in a big cooler, and besides thinking about Chance, I was thinking about food. I liked lunch. I checked my watch. Damn. Still two hours away.

"Where is the girl today?" Leonard asked.

"She and Brett went to Tyler for lunch and clothes shopping. They'll spend the day. Why I thought it was okay for us to go fishing. Course, Chance doesn't know about the business we're into. I mean, she knows what we do, private investigations, but she doesn't know exactly what it is we're working on, and I don't see any reason to tell her there might be danger in our lives."

"If someone were going to hit us, wouldn't they have already done it?"

"We have some reputation, Leonard. They might be waiting for when we least expect it."

"Good point. About the daughter thing, though. How's Brett dealing with this?"

"Truth is she was a little shitty about having Chance there, even if she invited her, but she isn't shitty to Chance. I think she kind of likes her."

"She's being shitty because of her own daughter. That's it, isn't it?"

"Damn, Leonard. You are alert and tuned in."

"I read a book once. It had lots of pictures, but it led to me thinking a little."

"Oh, did I tell you? Chance has your room now."

"I have things in that room."

"No," I said. "Your shit is in a cardboard box under the stairs now."

"That's my room."

"You sound like a teenager come home from college to find his room is now a home library."

"Well, it is my room."

"Was."

Leonard pouted for a few minutes, then said, "So you don't know for sure she's your daughter?"

"And if she isn't, you want your room back?"

"That would be nice. If she is your daughter, I guess she can keep it."

"Big of you."

"If she is your daughter, it will change some of my thoughts about you."

"How's that?" I asked.

"I thought you were lying to me about having sex. I though you were just masturbating and pretending to have sex. You have a daughter, that means you really did have sex. Yuck."

"What do you think Brett and I do?"

"I don't like to think about it. I don't think Brett would do something like that."

"Yes, Leonard. I may have a daughter. Fruit of my loins."

"I was sort of hoping you were the end of your bloodline."

That stopped the talk for a while, and we drifted in the boat and fished. We ate our lunch. When we finished eating, Leonard pulled the previous conversation out of the bag again.

"Do you want it to be your daughter?"

"Been thinking about family a lot in the last few years, like maybe I want one that's bigger than the one I got, which is pretty much you and Brett. I even in a moment of odd weakness tried to talk Brett into us having a child."

"Well, she looks fine, and I want to put that on record, and though it's coming from a queer, I think I can safely say Brett has held age off better than just about anyone I know, but a little old for child rearing, don't you think?"

"Like I said, it was a kind of irrational thought, not much weight behind it."

"She's got a cool name," Leonard said. "Chance. I like that."

"Chance told me this morning her mother had quit drinking when she was pregnant. That it meant that much to her. And that May Lynn talked about me all the time, like we had been together forever. Told Chance she thought I was the one and she had missed the boat, and that she didn't want to disrupt my life, because except for when she was pregnant, she knew she couldn't stop drinking."

"You're one of those that thinks alcohol is a disease, aren't you?"

"Don't you?" I asked.

"I don't think all alcoholics are that way because their body reacts to liquor in a different way than someone who can take a drink. I think it's true of some, but I think a lot of people just find something for a crutch, take hold of it, and support themselves with it. They can quit but won't. I don't think it's always about disease. It's like me being gay. I had no choice, it was in the DNA, but I think it can be a choice, too. I think you can just decide you want to suck dick, out of adventure or the fact that you think, hey, I'm bringing up my average of having sex with a warm body."

"I believe they call that bisexuality," I said.

"I don't know if that exists or not. I don't care. I say you want to suck dick or mess with the other, no matter what your DNA, that's up to you. Me, I don't get any urge to do the other. I like men, and it's that simple. But I think for some it's choice. Hell, prisoners fuck each other all the time, get out of prison, and never fuck someone of their own sex again. Provided they don't end up back in prison. Everyone is looking for a warm hole, Hap."

"Don't go changing, Leonard. Stay the fine and romantic person you are.”

“I’m just saying how I see it. Some things are more habit than disease. And I’m not saying being gay is a disease. I’m just saying a lot of things can be by choice. Might be a bad analogy, since I don’t have any problems with sexual choice, but I’ve known some drunks who I think just liked to wallow in self-pity.”

“I don’t know,” I said. “Bottom line, May Lynn was a drunk, by choice or disease or DNA or whatever.”

“When do I meet Chance?”

“Whenever you like. I guess I didn’t want to put her in with all the family until I was sure she was family. It’s a dumb thought, but there you have it. We’ve already had swabs done to check for DNA. It takes some time, though. We have a wait of a month or longer. Private business that does those tests, they’re pretty backed up. Rest of the time, well, me and Chance, we’ve been talking. I’m getting to know her, and she’s very sharp and likable. It’s like finding a puppy that has a collar and is well cared for and you put an ad in the paper, flyers, and any day you expect someone to call or knock on your door looking for that puppy. And there you are, having invested all your heart into them, and someone shows up with a leash and a dog treat.”

“Speaking of pups, how is Buffy?”

“Tip-top. Brett actually boarded her for today. Picks her up tomorrow. Vet is giving her the once-over, checking that rib.”

“I hate to veer from all your boring personal matters, Hap, but this stuff with Frank, the car lot. Jim Bob might ought to have his tree shook.”

“We do that, a barrel racer might fall out.”

“Maybe the horse, too. But we will shake his tree. Right?”

“Right.”

“Wait a moment. Think I have a bite.”

He started reeling it in. It was a bicycle tire and wheel.

“Ah,” he said, releasing the wheel from his hook, tossing it in the boat for us to dispose of. “The rare bicycle fish.”

22

We fished, and the day slipped away comfortably. For a pond full of fish, we weren't having a lot of luck. We threw back three fish and kept the bicycle tire. Mosquitoes were becoming a real problem.

Running the boat back to shore, we packed up and loaded the boat on the trailer. As we were driving out of there my cell rang. It was Jim Bob.

"We got to talk, Hoss."

"You saw Frank?"

"Yep. We need to talk."

"We're talking now."

"In person. Your house?"

I hung up and looked at Leonard. "Guess who?"

* * *

By the time we dropped the boat and trailer off and got rid of the bicycle tire, it was close to dark. Leonard drove us down back roads of red clay and sometimes gravel and blacktop.

Once East Texas had been the land of bears and honey and even parakeets. These days the bears and parakeets were all shot out, and the bees weren't doing all that well, either. There were cows, though. We spotted them when we came to gaps in the trees and saw pastures. The cows looked happy and content. They didn't know they were waiting to be hamburgers.

The dwindling sunlight wrapped through the trees and darkened into black ribbons of shadow, and by the time we broke out onto the main highway it was full dark. With the night having arrived, the air was cooler than before. We turned off the air conditioner and rolled down the windows and let the night air in. We passed houses with lights on inside them. A few cars zipped by, headlights shining bright and then gone.

Twenty minutes later we were in town and came to my street, arrived at the house. I noted there were no lights on, not even a porch light. I glimpsed flashlight flares in the yard. We cruised by, down to the church parking lot below the house. Leonard parked on the far side of the lot behind the church. You couldn't see the car from my house.

Leonard said, "You saw them, too?"

"Yep."

"Jim Bob?"

"Did you see his Caddy at the curb? Anywhere?"

"Nope."

"Lot of flashlights," I said.

"Yep. Maybe Jim Bob brought friends. The barrel racer?"

"Not unless she brought her horse and he has a flashlight, too."

"I judge there were three lights, so at least three guys, wouldn't you say?"

"Shall we surprise them?"

"Ain't nothing like a surprise," Leonard said.

"One thing first." I dialed Brett on my cell.

She answered with, "Hap. Sorry, hon. We been shopping, got caught up. We're going to have dinner then be home. You ought to get with Leonard and eat something."

"I will. So you're still in Tyler, then?"

"Like I said, we're going to have a late dinner."

"Okay. Well, take your time. Love you."

"You sound a little funny."

"Tired. Long day fishing. Talk later."

I turned off the phone and put it away.

"So?" Leonard asked.

"She and Chance are still in Tyler."

"That's good," Leonard said.

"Didn't see any reason to alarm her."

"Shall we see if we can give the people in your yard reason to be alarmed?"

"They could be folks looking for a lost dog."

"They could."

"Or kids prowling the neighborhood."

"Also possible."

"Termite exterminators at the wrong house."

"Less likely," Leonard said. "They could also be assholes out to do you and your bunch harm, too. And that would include me."

Leonard cranked the truck, drove out of the lot by the back way. This led to a road that ran behind our house. There was a two-acre pasture of overgrown grass directly behind our house to the road. There were houses elsewhere, but whoever owned this property had never developed it. I hoped they never would.

We parked at the curb by the pasture. Leonard leaned across me and got my revolver out of the glove box.

“That’s my gun,” I said.

“You pick up a stick or something.”

“You have my gun.”

“Very observant.”

“How’d you end up with my gun?”

“Do you really want to talk about that right now?”

“What if we’re not being that sneaky and they’re in my backyard?”

“Then the surprise will be on us,” Leonard said.

Crossing the pasture, I half expected to be shot. I’ve been shot at a few times. It makes a memorable impression. There were streetlights behind us and some from houses back there, and that framed us nicely for a shot if anyone was looking in our direction.

No one shot at us. I did have some grass burrs sticking through my pants, but other than that, so far so good.

There’s a chain-link fence at the back of our property, but on the right side there’s a tall redwood fence. Someone started building it years before we bought the place but never finished. Maybe they ran out of money.

There’s no gate directly at the back. It’s on the far side, where the redwood fence dies. The gate opens between the fence and the back wall of the house. To get to the gate from the direction we were coming from, we had to cross our next door neighbor’s property. A few dogs barked, but none of them were going crazy. Maybe our intruders would think nothing of it.

We eased through my neighbor’s yard along the redwood fence. I saw lights in one of the windows of the neighbor’s house, and I could faintly hear the television. I was sweating more than the temperature demanded. My hair was dripping with it. When we got to the gate I used a key to unlock it, and we eased it open and slipped into the backyard. For once I was glad the automatic light we had above the back door was out. I had been meaning to replace it.

There was a shed out there, and it was locked. I got out my key and unlocked it and got a crowbar off the workbench. So far the only work I had done on that bench was lay the crowbar there. I had arranged some tools on the wall, none of which, except for the hammer, I knew how to use. If I couldn't fix it with a hammer, it would remain unfixed.

I felt the heft of the crowbar in my hand. It slipped against my sweaty palm.

Gently as possible, I unlocked the back door and cracked it open. I could hear someone jacking with the front door, picking the lock, most likely.

"I'll surprise the folks at the door," Leonard said. "You want to check out the garage?"

"Try not to shoot anyone if you don't have to."

"You're no fun," Leonard said. He slipped inside and gently closed the door. I went back through the gate and along the grassy path between our house and the neighbors, came up alongside the garage. I guess it's more of a carport than a garage. It's open in the front, and there's no garage door.

I crept and sweated along past the neighbor's window with the glow and the television sounds coming out of it. I got out of the path of that light as quick as I could manage. I slipped forward until I got to the front edge of the garage.

I took a deep breath. There was a time when I kind of looked forward to this sort of thing. These days I just wanted dinner, a comfy bed, and Brett. I could hear someone in the garage, trying to walk softly but not managing too well. I heard someone say, "Shall we jimmy the door?"

That would be the door from the carport into the house. It led directly into a hallway that led to Leonard's room. Chance's room now.

I took another deep breath and let it out slow and easy and quiet. I thought about hitting someone with the crowbar and didn't like that idea, unless they had a gun. If they had a gun a crowbar might not be enough.

Soon the one who was picking the front door lock would be in, and when he came in, there would be Leonard. It would be like expecting the lady and getting the tiger.

I heard a loud noise, like someone slapping water with their palm. It came from the front of the house, and I knew that would be Leonard. He hadn't shot anyone, but he certainly had hit someone. Maybe they hit him, but I didn't think so. I knew in that instant, the same instant I thought all these thoughts, that my time wouldn't get any better than right then.

I rounded the corner and stepped into the garage as two men ran out of it and headed toward the sound. They didn't see me, as their backs were to me. They had heavy flashlights, and they were big men. That's all I could tell from the glow of their lights. The streetlight out front of the house was out and there was no moon and they were mostly just shapes with a light going before them.

I heard another sound, scuffling, then that smacking sound again. I saw someone fall backwards off the porch. His flashlight went flying, and I saw a beam from one of the flashlights gleam against a shaved head of one of the men in the yard. I could make out Leonard standing on the porch.

I was right behind the two men with flashlights. One of them raised the light onto Leonard, who was leaping off the porch. The man had a gun in his hand, and he was lifting it when I came up beside him and struck his gun hand with the crowbar as hard as I could swing it.

I knew from the way the crowbar felt in my hand I had broken bones. The gun dropped, the man went to his knees, sick with pain, and now the other man was turning toward me. I stepped right into the middle of him and twisted my body and hit him alongside the knee with the crowbar. He let out a scream, staggered back on an uncertain leg. I dropped the crowbar and stepped in so close we were almost in the same pair of pants. I hit him with a straight right that I knew was a good shot because I hardly felt it. He went down and tried to get up. I kicked him in the head, and he rolled over like a doodlebug, the flashlight flying from his hand and rolling across the grass where it came to rest on the concrete driveway.

I picked up the crowbar and gave it to Leonard, searched for guns, found a very large automatic on the unconscious man by the porch. The guy I had hit on the knee was unarmed except for a blackjack. I gave it to Leonard. He stepped forward and hit the man holding his knee with the blackjack, a short, sharp blow to the back of the head.

“Goddamn,” said the man, shifting his hands to his head. “My leg is done broke; wasn’t no need for that.”

“I felt there was,” Leonard said.

“You broke my arm,” said the man I had hit on the arm with the crowbar.

“I would be disappointed if I hadn’t,” I said. “And you, asshole. How’s your leg?”

“Broke, I done told you,” said the man.

“Good,” I said.

I went over and collected his gun from the driveway while the man with the broken arm bent over and threw up in the grass.

That’s when a car glided up at the curb.

23

Jim Bob parked near a big tree and got out. I could see someone else was in the Caddy, but couldn't make them out. Just a shadowy shape. Jim Bob came strolling up with a big revolver dangling from one hand and a flashlight in the other.

"Y'all having a yard party?" he said.

"You could call it that," Leonard said. "Though I think me and Hap had the party and they mostly just rolled around on the yard."

"You got you quite a few little souvenirs there, don't you?" Jim Bob said, looking at the guns in my hands.

"They weren't offering T-shirts," I said.

Jim Bob walked around, looked at all three on the ground, one completely out, two others moaning. He put his flashlight on them. One of them, the unconscious one, wore leather pants and a jean vest, was bare-chested under it. He had a belly like a hairy boulder. The other two wore jeans and dark T-shirts. White guys, all three. All with shaved heads and scraggly beards, faces that looked to have been boiled before they were arranged over the skull.

"Man, they are indeed the warehouse for ugly," Jim Bob said. "Might want to drag these fuckers inside or somewhere before the neighbors wonder what you're doing."

We didn't ask who was in Jim Bob's car. We knew he would tell us in good time, and we didn't want to share any knowledge with whoever it was lying on our lawn.

Leonard turned off the flashlights in the yard except the one that I took to use. He tossed the crowbar and the blackjack in the grass by the driveway and dragged the unconscious man into the carport, the man's boot heels scraped along the concrete.

I put two pistols away in my waistband and one in my front pocket. Me and Jim Bob took hold of the other two guys. I clutched the one with the injured leg under the shoulders and slid him along on his ass, managing to stick the flashlight under my arm and clutch it there while

I did. Jim Bob pulled the other one to his feet, and we got them inside the carport.

They were too weak to fight. We got them in there easy. It was dark inside the carport, and we didn't turn on the light. What light there was came from Jim Bob's flashlight and the light I had. There were steps leading from inside the carport into the house. We sat our catch on the top steps, except for the unconscious guy. Leonard left him lying in front of the steps.

I said, "Who the hell sent you and why?"

"Fuck you," said the one with the broken arm.

Jim Bob strolled over and slapped the man twice, grabbed his injured arm, and cranked it. The man squealed, and I winced.

Jim Bob slapped him again. "That's for yelling."

"This is brutality," said the man.

"I know," said Jim Bob.

"Easy, man," I said.

Jim Bob looked at me. "You talking to me?"

"Yeah."

Jim Bob waved the revolver at the thugs, said, "All my life, doing what I do, I have dealt with the scum of the earth, the shit on the bottom of my boots, boots into which I stick my highly attractive feet, and tonight I'm fed up with it. Got no pity left for creeps. I don't know why they're here, who they are, if God or genetics made them ugly, but I know you guys are not the problem without even knowing how this got started. They are the problem. I know a place when we're done here we can bury them. Only way they'll be found is if the earth cracks open on the Day of Judgment."

"There's a shovel in the storage shed," Leonard said. "I don't believe in God, so I'm not expecting that big Day of Judgment other than what we dole out. So I reckon they'll stay hidden for good."

"Guys," I said. "Let's don't let this get out of hand."

I couldn't clearly see the expressions of the two that were sitting on the steps, but their body language told me they were scared. The man lying on the floor of the carport I was starting to wonder about. He hadn't so much as groaned. Leonard can hit pretty damn hard when he wants to.

"Who are you?" I said. "And understand that in this carport, I'm as close as you got to a friend, and I don't like you at all."

"That don't give me any confidence," said the man with the broken arm.

“Nor should it,” Leonard said. “Come to my brother’s house carrying guns and badly shaved heads, you got to understand how much I’d like to just blow a hole in your meat and dump you in a ditch and piss on you.”

“I wasn’t even here when it came down,” Jim Bob said to the man, “and I don’t like you.”

“You’ve made that clear,” said the man with the broken arm.

“I can make it clearer,” Jim Bob said.

“It’s now or never,” I said to the men, hoping Leonard and Jim Bob were just playing roles, but with those two, you could never be sure. I knew Leonard better than anyone in the world, but there was a place he could go I couldn’t. Jim Bob was even more unpredictable. We could be standing there one moment, next moment all three of those men could be dead and in the trunk of a car on their way to someplace dark and wet.

The man with the broken arm looked so much like the other two, the only way I could tell the difference was in tattoos. He had a tattoo at the center of his throat, like a wishbone. It was not attractive. It looked to be made with a ballpoint pen. Jailhouse tattoo was my guess. I thought of him as Wishbone. I moved the light off of him and pooled it at the base of the steps.

“We was sent by the boss,” said Wishbone.

“Narrows it right down,” Jim Bob said. “Shall I come over and yank on your arm some more?”

“The Big Dog.”

“Who’s the Big Dog?” Leonard said.

“Boss we don’t never see. We just been told Big Dog has money to pay for certain things being done, and one of those things was you guys, and the ones was told to do it was us. Big Dog ain’t really our boss all the time, but he hires us from time to time. You might call us freelance.”

“I might call you stupid,” Jim Bob said.

“I think you ought to consider a career in macramé if your arm heals,” Leonard said. “You damn sure aren’t any good at this business.”

“So you guys are some kind of crew?” I said.

“Bike club,” he said. “Apocalypse on Wheels.”

“I heard of them,” Jim Bob said. “I think they ride tricycles.”

“You ought not talk too mean,” said the man with the banged knee. “You might write a check with your mouth your ass can’t cash.”

“You boys are any example of the badass Apocalypse on Wheels,” I said, “then you ain’t so much. We can write as many checks as we want.”

“We got taken by surprise,” Wishbone said.

“Yes,” I said. “You did.”

Wishbone wanted to say something mean, but instead he was wise enough to sit and smolder. There was an air about him like the school bully who had been beaten up by the ninety-eight-pound math nerd.

Apocalypse on Wheels were known to be dangerous. Drug dealers, primarily meth. They were also known for dog-fighting rings, which in my view should have been punishable by a death sentence.

“Where’s your bikes?” Leonard said. “You boys come by stick horse instead?”

“I said tricycles,” Jim Bob said.

“Yes,” Leonard said, “you did. But I just graded them down another notch. Next Hap can say roller skates.”

“Oh, I got you,” Jim Bob said. “But wouldn’t skates be better than a stick horse?”

“You have a point there,” Leonard said.

“Car,” said Wishbone. “We parked on a backstreet and walked over.”

“Car?” Leonard said. “What kind of self-respecting biker gang comes by car?”

“Easier,” Wishbone said.

“Yeah, well, let’s get back to what you were saying,” I said. “Hired by Big Dog, who you claim you don’t know, to come over here and do what? Sort my shit?”

Wishbone held his arm, winced a little, said, “Pretty much. Supposed to be a warning. Give you a good ass-whipping.”

“You know where I live,” I said, “so you know who lives here with me, don’t you?”

“A woman.”

“You come here in the middle of the night with guns and flashlights, and you were just going to sort me out? What about her?”

“I guess we would have put some smoke on her, too.”

“All right,” I said. “Officially, I’m no longer even a faint resemblance to a friend.”

“Nothing happened,” he said. “We got hurt. You didn’t.”

“And man, that saddens us,” Leonard said.

“You were going to whip my ass for what?” I said.

“You know,” he said.

“Why don’t you define it for me?” I said.

“Well, we don’t get no details much, just the job and some street cred.

We was told you was meddling where you shouldn't be meddling, and that we was to whack you around a little, say stay out of business where you don't belong."

"But they didn't tell you the business?" Jim Bob asked.

"No. Didn't matter. It was a job."

"What were you getting paid?" I asked.

"It was to kind of go on our credit."

"Credit."

"We're acolytes," he said.

"Goddamn, that's a strange word to come out of your mouth," Jim Bob said. "I think you even pronounced it right. What you mean is you're trying to get into the gang as a full member and not just a wannabe. Right?"

"I suppose you could say that," Wishbone said. "I like acolyte better."

"So who came to you and said Big Dog wanted me worked over a bit?" I asked.

"They wanted the nigger popped around, too," Wishbone said, avoiding my question. "We thought we'd catch him at his place. He, like you, was easy to find. They gave us your names, and we went straight to the Internet. Wonderful thing that is."

"Ain't it?" Jim Bob said.

"Who is this cowboy fuck?" Wishbone said, nodding at Jim Bob.

"Hell in a cowboy hat," I said. "That's all you need to know."

"No," Jim Bob said. "I want you to know who I am, so you can maybe take a run at me if you survive, and I can fuck you up. I'm Jim Bob Luke. I live in Houston. I love a good enchilada and a medium-rare steak, a good-looking woman with a free spirit, and you couldn't hurt me if you was three people apiece and had three friends just like you. Fuck, you couldn't roll me over with a pry bar if I was dead."

"You just fucked up," said the one with the injured leg. "We'll damn sure remember you."

Jim Bob said, "Most people do." He stepped forward and popped the man with the bad leg in the nose with a sharp left jab. "That's for talking out of turn." Then Jim Bob hit him again. "That's for flinching." Jim Bob slapped him once across the cheek. "And that's for calling Midnight a nigger."

"Oh, thanks," Leonard said.

"My pleasure," Jim Bob said.

"Midnight?" Leonard said.

"I thought it made me seem less politically correct," Jim Bob said. "I got to keep up an image to work with the people I work with."

Bad Leg held his hand to his nose. In the beam of my flashlight I could see blood running between his fingers and down his face.

I said, "You haven't given us a lot of information."

"It's all we got," said Bad Leg.

I thought it might well be.

"You said you were hired by Big Dog and someone else," I said. "Who is this someone else?"

"Our club chairman. Samson House."

"Ah, hell," Jim Bob said. "I know that son of a bitch."

"You do?" I said.

"Nice guy, ain't he?" said Wishbone.

"A peach," Jim Bob said. "Same as his brother, Moses."

"Moses is dead," Wishbone said.

"I know," Jim Bob said. "Why don't you boys take us to Samson? I'd love to see him. I'm only pretending to ask, by the way."

"You know," said Bad Leg. "My leg ain't broke like I thought. I think it's going to be okay."

"You'll never know how that has made our day," Jim Bob said.

"Still hurts, though," Bad Leg said.

24

I soon found out who was in Jim Bob's car. To say I was baffled is to put it mildly.

It was Frank. She was wearing jeans, a T-shirt, and red running shoes. She had her hair tied back in a ponytail and wasn't wearing makeup. She looked good. That she had once been a man was hard to figure on my end. I guess it shouldn't matter, but the idea of her being male before she was female didn't exactly evaporate from my mind.

I walked out to the car with Jim Bob to see her while Leonard kept the three in the garage occupied by pointing one of the guns at them. Sleeping Beauty had finally stirred and was sitting on the steps with the other two.

Frank nodded at me as she got out of the car, but nothing was said. Jim Bob guided her into the house, and when he came back out, we got the bad guys out of the carport. None of them had seen Frank. Jim Bob made it clear we didn't want her seen and took Leonard aside to explain that she was in the house.

We tied up and gagged all but Wishbone, put the gagged ones in the trunk of Jim Bob's Caddy. Bad Leg was right. His leg wasn't broken. He managed to limp out to the car without assistance, moving the way you might if someone had taped your dick to one leg.

After they were tucked nicely inside the trunk, I noted there was plenty of room for them and the spare and maybe we could stuff Wishbone in there, too, if we needed to. But he was our pathfinder, so we placed him in the front passenger seat. Leonard sat behind him with a pistol. I stayed at the house.

Jim Bob drove away slowly. I drove Frank to our office, arriving well ahead of him. He was taking the long way around so Wishbone wouldn't get a chance to see her.

I put Frank inside the office, made the bed for her, showed her where the bottled water was, the coffee and such. We didn't discuss anything, nor did she offer any explanation for why she was with Jim Bob. I got three twelve-gauge pump shotguns out of the closet and a box of shells, told her to make herself comfortable, that I wasn't sure when we'd be back, and to stay inside and not answer the desk phone, then I left out of there.

In the parking lot Jim Bob was standing outside the Red Bitch, as his Cadillac was known, and Leonard was sitting in the backseat with the revolver. Wishbone was in the front seat, being very cooperative. Jim Bob walked over and helped me with the shotguns, taking two of them off my hands, leaving me holding one in one hand, the box of shells in the other.

Jim Bob said, "Got her set?"

"Yep. But I don't get it."

"You will."

"What if she runs away?"

"She won't."

"She might."

"She'll stay until we get back."

I looked at the biker dude in the Red Bitch.

"Considering where I think we're going, what happens if we don't make it back?" I asked.

"I always come back."

"But if we don't?"

Jim Bob shrugged. "Eventually she'll get bored and leave."

I could tell Jim Bob wasn't going to explain shit, least not right then.

"Was it like we thought?" I asked him.

"You mean the cars and the women and the blackmail?"

"No. I wanted to know if without her original elongated wee-wee can she piss up a rope. Of course I'm asking about the cars and such."

Jim Bob was unfazed.

"More to it than we thought. Not exactly like you figured. Think you and your buddy have opened up one big-ass can of worms, and these worms have some serious teeth. But we'll start with these assholes. We finish that, I'll explain about Frank. She can help explain. We don't get these honky tonk samurai sorted out, we might not need an explanation. What we're going to do is nip them in the bud."

"Frankly, I don't see how three of us can sort out a biker gang."

"No doubt it will be precarious," Jim Bob said and raised an eyebrow at me. "You scared?"

"Yeah."

"Not me."

“Liar.”

“Okay,” Jim Bob said. “I’m slightly nervous. I’ll own up to that much. But I got a plan. I’m not sure it’s a plan makes any sense until we get where we’re going. It doesn’t, well, we change plans. We shoot these three in the head and leave them in the woods.”

“I don’t like that plan,” I said.

“Then you better hope plan A works,” Jim Bob said. “Look. I know something about these bike-club sucks. They are part of the Dixie Mafia. You might even say they are actually a wing of it. They are connected to just about everything that smells bad in Texas except a little roadkill. Not just East Texas but the whole goddamn state. These biker fucks are mostly muscle for people with more brains and bigger plans then these guys got. Guys in your yard tonight, they are the lowest of the low. They were probably going to get their bones for putting you and Leonard and Brett out of the way. They were there to kill all three of you, not sort you out, but it didn’t work out for them. Their boss figured you guys weren’t much, so he sent some hitters who weren’t much, but don’t think there isn’t some serious trouble with these boys, and you want to nip it in the bud, and quick, or they will keep on coming until one of them gets lucky. Bottom line is, instead of talking to these three lame-ass soldiers, I say we talk to their main man. That doesn’t work out, then we shoot everybody.”

“How many is everybody?”

“How would I know? More than ten, twelve? Enough to make a biblical epic? I don’t know.”

“Not comforting.”

“True, but I think it’s best to confront them. You want them to at least think they got to consider twice they throw down on you. You can’t show weakness with them. Some of the Dixie Mafia head guys, you might even reason with them they see a profit in it. But these biker goobers, not so much.”

“And I’m saying you don’t crawl down a hole full of rattlers and expect to come out unbit.”

Jim Bob nodded slightly. “I hear you. Like I said, I’ve dealt with them before. They kind of lump up together like dog turds out Etoile way. We were in Houston, thereabouts, I’d know exactly where they are. Here, I just know the general location.”

“You know a lot of shit, Jim Bob.”

“That’s because I walk through it every day. Someday soon I’m thinking I’m going to throw in the rope and take up pig farming again full-time.”

“I didn’t even know there was a biker gang around here.”

“Did you know there are some Amish here in East Texas, north of town? The men use power tools and have cell phones and drive cars, but the women live on the farm, wear bonnets pulled down around their faces, and, unlike the men, only use hand tools.”

“I don’t know from Amish,” I said. “How did we get on the Amish?”

“It seemed like a natural segue. Bottom line is we need someone knows more than the bikers’ general whereabouts.”

“Meaning the young gentleman with the fucked-up tattoo in your front seat is going to be our guide?”

“Bingo.”

“You know, one thing we ought to take into serious fucking consideration is we got shotguns and revolvers and everyone else has automatics and rifles that can spray bullets faster than we can.”

“Yeah, I know,” Jim Bob said. “But I do so hate change. I haven’t got over that whole business about Pluto. I think Pluto got fucked, you know. One day it’s a planet, and the next day it’s not. I hate change, Hap. I’m the same with guns. Like to keep it old-school.”

“Well, when we get back, if we get back, we’ll draft a stiff note to Congress about that business with Pluto.”

25

Inside the Caddy I laid a shotgun across my lap. Leonard placed one across his, the other I put on the floorboard at my feet. Leonard was still holding the pistol pointed at the back of Wishbone's head. I hoped we didn't hit a bump.

"Well," Leonard said. "You guys certainly took long enough. I hope you got some shit sorted out and it's nothing I need to know."

"We had some serious things to discuss," Jim Bob said. "We didn't need you for it. It would have been over your head."

"Nice," Leonard said.

"The guys, they do that to me all the time," Wishbone said. "I always feel like they're talking behind my back, like maybe the ass is ripped out of my pants and I don't know it."

"You shut up," Leonard said.

Outside of LaBorde, the trees grew thick and even thicker as we headed eastward.

I sent Brett a text that said I might be home late, maybe even tomorrow morning, and I'd explain later, and not to be surprised if she found a strange woman sleeping on the sleeper sofa at the office. I didn't tell her it was Frank. I thought about it some more and sent another text. RENT A MOTEL TONIGHT FOR YOU AND CHANCE. DO THIS. TRUST ME. DON'T GO HOME TONIGHT. NO EXCEPTIONS. NO EXCUSES. IN FACT, NOW THAT I THINK ABOUT IT, DON'T GO TO THE OFFICE UNTIL I SAY IT'S OKAY. LOVE, HAP.

I wondered what Brett would think if I didn't come back. Where is he? What the hell is he doing? What the hell was that text about? Will there be coupons this Sunday in the newspaper for granola bars and panty liners?

And then there was Chance. If she was my daughter I damn sure hadn't gotten to know her very well. She didn't know me well enough to miss me when I was gone. I really should just try to get a regular day job that didn't involve getting hit or shot at and that maybe came with health benefits and a retirement plan.

I glanced at Leonard. He was just a dark shape in the car, but he turned his face toward me. He sensed what I was thinking. He often knew what I was thinking. He said softly, “It’s cool, man.”

He’d say that with the hot wind of hell blowing in his face.

We passed very few cars, and in fact the presence of their headlights out there in that lonesome country was almost alien, like spaceships cruising close to the ground, zipping by so fast even the big Cadillac vibrated.

Wishbone sat stiff, giving directions, mostly saying, “Keep going.”

Finally we came to what had once, in the 1950s, been a prominent highway. Now it seemed narrow, and the old yellow stripe down the center of it was worn so dim you could hardly see it in the headlights.

It was two lanes, and we didn’t pass a single car as we went along. We traveled down it for a goodly stretch. The trees closed in on both sides and limbs came together overhead and made a kind of canopy. We had to dodge some rotten limbs that had fallen in the road, and once we had to stop so I could get out and drag a big limb away so we could continue. Finally we came to an asphalt road, the sides of which bled off into deep bar ditches on either side. Wishbone had us turn down it. In the woods I saw fireflies glowing in spots, winking out, then winking back into view. The headlights caught the glint of standing water in scattered spots. A mosquito paradise.

“All right, fuckhead,” Jim Bob said to Wishbone. “You better not be leading me on a wild goose chase, or you will be a cooked goose.”

“We’re down here on purpose,” he said. “It keeps prying eyes out, and the club owns the land.”

“How close are we?” I asked.

“I don’t know,” Wishbone said. “A mile. Maybe two.”

“Tell me well before we get there, and don’t be cute about it,” Jim Bob said. “We show up in the midst of your comrades before we know it, you get it first. Comprende?”

We came to what was nothing more than a deer trail. Wishbone told us to turn down it. Jim Bob pulled off the road and onto the trail and stopped, turned off the headlights. He turned in his seat and looked at Wishbone.

“What?” Wishbone said.

“How close now?”

“Real close. You go down here a piece, then it widens out. It’s been logged down there. You’ll see a patch of trees beyond the bare spots, though, and on the other side of them is another bare spot, and you can see some mobile homes we got there, a big shed. That's where they cook the meth. And there are a bunch of dog pens where they keep the fighting dogs, though there ain't none there now."

"Tell you what we're going to do," Jim Bob said to Wishbone. "I'm going to get out of the car, and then you are going to get out. You are going to walk around to the rear of the car. My boys here will follow out after you."

That was just like Jim Bob. My boys. He had taken over. Thing was, right then, that was fine with me.

"Are you going to shoot me when I get out?" Wishbone asked.

"That's up to you," Jim Bob said.

Wishbone and Jim Bob went to the back, and me and Leonard followed. The air outside of the air-conditioned car was as stiff as wire and uncomfortably warm. Jim Bob opened the trunk and shined his flashlight into it. The two thugs hadn't evaporated or died of a carbon monoxide leak. They had been trying to work the ropes loose, you could tell that much. They were both still gagged.

"All right," Jim Bob said, and without being asked, Leonard readjusted the wrist and ankle ties on the two in the trunk. There was more nylon cord back there, and Jim Bob got that out and tossed it to Leonard, nodded at Wishbone, said, "You don't mind, tie his ass up and gag him and put him on the back seat floorboard. I just wanted to see how these guys were riding back here."

He reached down and pulled the gag from Bad Leg. "How's the ride?"

"Bumpy. And my leg hurts."

"I can live with that," Jim Bob said and readjusted the gag.

When Wishbone was well tied up by Leonard and lying on the ground, Jim Bob stood with his hand on the trunk lid, looked down at Bad Leg and Sleeping Beauty, and said, "Good night, sweet assholes. Better hope we don't get killed. It's going to be real hot tomorrow, and then you're going to get thirsty, and then, well, it's not a nice way to go."

There was mumbling behind the gags and a lot of squirming. Jim Bob closed the trunk. I got hold of Wishbone's head, and Leonard got his feet. We lugged him around and put him on the floorboard in the back of the Caddy.

Jim Bob said, "Let's go."

Leonard got in the front passenger seat, and I sat in the back with all the shotguns in my lap and my feet on Wishbone's head. I found it was a little uncomfortable. I don't know how Wishbone felt.

Jim Bob backed us out of the narrow trail and drove the Cadillac slowly and without lights down to where there was an indention in the woods. He pulled in there. There was a small trail off that. He drove down it a few yards, stopped at a dead end, and me and him and Leonard got out. Wishbone was thrashing around on the floorboard like a beached whale, but I had seen how Leonard had tied those knots that held him; he wasn't coming out of that without assistance.

I sorted the shotguns out. We walked away from the car and then stopped underneath a black willow tree that was growing near a little runoff of water that trickled down through the brush and trees.

"Thing we don't want to do is get surprised," Jim Bob said. "We'll do the surprising."

"How surprising are we going to be?" Leonard asked.

"The surprise is they'll never know we were here. But we'll get a lay of the land this way. This Samson fellow, like I said, I kind of know him. We find Samson, he can give us a more direct note on who hired him to hire the numb-nut squad, and that can lead us more directly to the problem you boys got. That and Frank. She had plenty to say, and I think she's got more."

"And you know Samson on sight?" I asked.

"You might say I knew his brother, Moses, better, but yeah, I know Samson on sight. Probably can smell him."

"What about Moses?" I said.

"He met with an unfortunate accident."

"What kind of accident?"

"Well, I had some run-ins with the Apocalypse bunch in Houston," Jim Bob said. "It don't matter what for, as it was a complicated mixture of events that involved a variety of nasty happenings. It ended with me getting outsmarted, which is a goddamn rarity in this universe. But it happened. I think I'd been a little sick that week."

"You mess up, you always say that?" Leonard said.

"I wouldn't want you thinking it's my fault. Thing was, it was a temporary lapse, but at the moment I'm telling about, they had me by the nut sack. I was caught up in something that got me taken out to their compound outside of Houston. Kind of like what's out here. They moved here not long after that. I didn't know exactly where, but knew it was in this area. You can bet I've kept an ear to the ground. They made a few runs at me afterward, but it didn't turn out well for them, and in time they quit. At least for a while. So knowing this location, and if Samson's here, I can also make sure I don't get run at again. They aren't known to be smart, but they aren't known to give up.

"Thing is, I killed a few of them, and that was their main point of contention. They were mad at me over some things I had done for a client that didn't do them any good, so they started sending these guys to hit me. I had three runs at me and was successful each time. But this time I'm talking about, I turned left when I should have turned right. To put it in a nutshell, they nabbed me, kicked me around a little, but didn't kill me. They had other plans, had me dead to rights, and they hauled me out to their compound so I could meet their head asshole, and he's talking about chopping off my head and doing some nasty things to it. I says to the brother, Moses, I says, 'You're pretty tough with me handcuffed, but for all your tough-ass talk, you couldn't pull a cotton wad out of a dead man's ass. What you got is muscle all around you. Those men of yours I killed, they came for me, and I took them on face-to-face and killed them.'

"Anyway, they've got me. I'm handcuffed, and I got some knots they knocked on my head growing larger by the moment, and one of my eyes is starting to close a little. Moses is going on about how he's going to cut my head off, pull out my intestines, stick a hot poker up my ass, pull my dick off with pliers—none of this laid out in any particular order—and it all sounded quite convincing. You can bet my asshole was puckering wind about then.

"I says to him again: 'You talk big with all these swinging dicks around you. How about it's just me and you, and that decides it?'

"Let me tell you, conditions I was under, I was throwing some serious pecker around. They wanted me to grovel, but I wasn't going to give them that. I was playing with pure shit talk and ball sweat out there, let me tell you. Had it been some of the other criminals I know, they would have just laughed and shot me in the head. But I knew how those suckers thought. Moses says, 'All right. Let's do it. How about a duel, pistols with two loads at thirty feet?'

"Now, that is my meat, boys, and I thought, I could do that and have as good a chance as most anybody. No use lying. I knew I'd win that way. Course, I did win, I wasn't certain they'd actually let me go. But right then the choices were shoot it out or have my dick pulled off with pliers. Dick like mine ought to be bronzed, not mistreated. But then Samson, he says, 'Do it the old bowie fight way.' He says he's done that and come out on top, and he lifted up his shirt and showed us some scars that looked like he'd been caught up in a very large electric fan. Samson says his brother, Moses, ought to do that, show me and anyone that would find my corpse that you don't mess with the Apocalypse fuckers, and so on and so on. He went on for some time. Another few minutes and I would have died from boredom."

"I know what you mean," Leonard said.

"Fuck you," Jim Bob said. "You love this and you know it. Well, now, this knife-fight idea was far less appealing to me. A knife fight, even one you win, usually ends up with you cut, and maybe you only win because the other guy dies first. I don't like knives. But that's not to say I don't know a thing or two about them. I been in a knife ruckus or two, but not like they were suggesting. You see, turns out these guys are fans of Jim Bowie, and not just the knife. There's this old story that back in his time Bowie fought a knife duel in a dark room. Story being Jim had a bowie and the other guy had a common butcher knife. Bowie won, though a lot of people don't know the part about how he was laid up with knife wounds and such for a long while. Add to this, Samson and Moses aren't little folk, and it seems when they aren't killing people, doing meth, they're lifting weights. They got so many muscles, they move and it looks like gophers running under their skin.

"Still, it was a chance to walk out with my head on or go down fighting. So I'm watching Moses, looking confident and just a little bit contemptuous, using my Elvis smile on them. I have practiced that motherfucker a thousand times in front of a mirror. I know how powerful it is.

"Thing is, this hat I'm wearing, with its high crown, same kind I had then. I got a little automatic pistol clipped in there, then and now. It's just a little homemade thing with a little silencer on it and it shoots two twenty-two rounds, and for it to do any good you got to be close and accurate. It's what we used to call a Saturday Night Special. So this crack team of bikers that searched me and took my larger artillery didn't no more see the gun in my hat than they noticed I got a couple of dark spots on my nuts. I mean, they searched me and left my hat on. Their stupidity that day worked in my favor. And before you worry about those dots on my nuts, it's not cancer, just some natural markings, like a spotted pup."

"Now we can sleep with comfort," I said.

"So the brother, Moses, agrees, and they give us both big ole bowie knives. These were like swords, man. I think they was over twenty inches and wide as my hand, sharp enough to shave with. And into this shed we go. It was about twenty by thirty, which is small to begin with, but when you get in there and the other guy has a knife, it's smaller yet.

He got one corner, and I got the other, and as soon as they turned out the light from outside and locked the door, I took off my hat and got the gun out of the little holster in the crown, tossed the hat in his direction. I hear him yell, thinking I touched him, and I could hear him grunting and the knife slashing the air. I got down on my hands and knees, stayed against the wall, and started crawling. His grunting and such had pinpointed him for me. I was close. I tried to see if my eyes would adjust, but it was so dark in there you couldn't find your ass with both hands.

"I bided my time, worried he'd walk up on me, bump into me, and stick that big knife in me. I had my bowie, of course, but I had stuck it in my belt at the back. What I had that gave me the edge was that tiny silenced pistol."

"Didn't know they could put silencers on little guns like that," Leonard said.

"Silencer is built in," Jim Bob said. "It don't come off, and it doesn't really work that well, but then again, it's not a gun makes a lot of noise to begin with. Anyway, I'm creeping around on the floor like a cockroach with a little pistol that feels small in my hand, something I hadn't never used on a human being and feared might not stop a mouse that had had a good breakfast. This guy is going nuts. Screaming at me, saying, 'Say something, cocksucker. Show me how tough you are.'

"I crawled along, and damn if I didn't run up against his legs. I might near blew a turd that was such a surprise. I had figured on where he was, but of course by the time I got that figured he had moved. I grabbed his legs, still clinging to my pistol, pushed my head forward into his knee, and took him down. He sat up, and that knife come around and I heard it whistle just over my head.

"I ran my gun up along his chest so I could put it right up close to his head, cause that little gun has to be right on you to do much good. When I had it under what I figured was his chin, I pulled the trigger. The gun coughed, and it was louder than I counted on, but it didn't sound like gunfire. It sounded like someone letting out his breath real hard. I felt Moses stiffen and fall backwards from where he was sitting, and his head cracked on the concrete floor. I dropped the pistol and got on him and pulled the bowie and went to work. I got hold of his head, pushed it back, and cut his throat, then stabbed the living dog shit out of him. When he was still and not breathing and I was wet with his blood, I felt around till I found where that twenty-two shot went in under his chin, up and into his brain, which I figure was a lucky shot there, that dude's brain having to be about pea size. I felt and cut around his chin with that bowie, so there wasn't no bullet hole visible. I wiped my hands on him, felt around until I found my gun, put it back in my hat, which I also had to hunt around for.

"It was then I realized I had been cut. I don't know how I got cut. I guess Moses still had some juice in him when I took him down and was trying to work that pistol under his chin. Anyway, I was cut in a few places, all of it superficial stuff, my manly beauty not being seriously marred. I figure the scars I got, they just give me a kind of rugged charm."

"You are one of the most delusional fuckers I've ever known," Leonard said.

Jim Bob laughed. "But there I was. Bloody and cut, and Moses lying there leaking in the dark, and I'm thinking, okay, I won."

"You cheated," I said.

"Wouldn't you have?"

"Yep," I said.

"Oh, yeah," Leonard said. "Big-time."

"Thing was, I had won, and they didn't know how I won. I'm thinking, all right, when I open that door they're going to be on me like bears on honey, and it won't matter I won. But there was one door in that shed, and one way out, so I didn't have no choice but to go out of it. I decide, all right, if I'm going to go out that door, I'm going to go out of it with the knife in one hand and have that dead fucking Moses by the collar with the other. And that's what I done. I knocked on the door with the butt of the bowie. They opened it, and I come out with the knife in one hand, dragging Moses with the other. There were a few steps leading up and into that shed, and I bumped Moses's big dead ass on every one of them, dropped him on the ground.

"I said, 'Next.'"

"Always a step too far," I said.

"Can't help myself. But you know what? They let me go. Samson insisted."

"Honor among thieves and murderers," I said. "How refreshing."

"Uh-huh," Jim Bob said. "But he regretted it. One of his boys took a run at me not so long ago, and, well, as you can note by my presence, standing here upright before you, I came out all right. Since then, no trouble. But I don't like him, and like I said, they got long memories, and that honor-among-thieves shit is only if they're in the mood to be honorable or feel they have to appear that way at the moment. But in the middle of the night, when they're considering on things, they frequently have a change of heart."

"What I figure," I said, "by the time we quit listening to you and get around to doing something, it'll be full morning."

"Believe me," Jim Bob said. "There will come a time, if we don't get killed, when you will in memory cherish moments with me like this."

26

We came out of the trees and started down the road then, being watchful, and finally we could hear noise. Men and women laughing and cutting up. We had been using a little penlight Jim Bob was carrying to make our way, but now he shut that off. We stopped and stood in the black night awhile, not talking. We were letting our eyes adjust to the dark as much as possible.

After a few minutes we started traveling again, but it was so dark we had to stay on the road and not go back into the trees. You could hardly see a thing down there in the woods, and the road was only slightly better. The air was full of the stench of something that had died and was decaying, and it was intense. The sound of voices swelled.

In short time we put most of the stink behind us, kept on keeping on. Then we began to hear music, faint at first, but growing louder as we moved forward, loud enough to damn near make your ears bleed. Acid rock from ages gone.

Finally the road emptied itself into a field, and in the field we could see a huge bonfire. It was so large and so bright it was as if the shadows were on fire.

There were about twelve men and twice that number of women around the fire, which appeared to be fed by railroad ties, dead wood, old car and truck tires. The group was all white. Not exactly folks known for diversity was my guess. The music was coming from some device with real power inside a mobile home near the fire, and not far off were three other mobile homes. There was plywood over spots where windows had once been.

There was a horde of bikes parked out front of the mobile home where the music was coming from, and the door to the home was open. Now and again men and women staggered out or staggered in. As I said, I had counted twelve men in the yard, and twice that many women, but with people going in and out of the home, it was hard to say how many were actually there and how many, if any, were in the other homes. Out to the left was a long row of doghouses inside metal pens. There were ten pens. I didn't see any dogs.

Bright as it was, we decided we could enter back into the tree line that connected with the field and see quite well because of the bonfire. We slipped in among the trees—oaks, pines, and sweet gums. The air was rich with the stink of that fire, the mix of creosote and burning rubber, as well as the sweet smell of the gums and the turpentine-like bite of the pines swaying in the wind.

There was great light from the fire, but as the wind whipped it, it grew greater and flicked and flowed like levitating lava, rose up high against the sky. There were shadows and shapes of people dancing around the fire. I was reminded of the old Tarzan books—where they had dum-dums, which was a kind of wild party of apes with Tarzan himself, dancing and whirling, working themselves into a frenzy.

"Jim Bob," I said, "I don't know if you have enough fingers and toes to keep up with the number of folks out there, but you have enough to know there are only three of us."

"Yeah, that puts them at a disadvantage," Jim Bob said.

Leonard sighed. "Got to agree with Hap, Jim Bob. Those numbers bite the moose."

"Boys, I never had in mind we were going to ride in there with guns blazing. I thought we might catch them at low tide, so to speak. Maybe only a few around, and we could sneak in there like bandits and nab Samson, get his firsthand take on the dealership, folks he's working for. The Big Dog. That don't look like such a good plan now, way things are set up. We can go back, get Marvin in on this, have the three back at the car tell him what they told us, and he can send some cops out here to break this shit up. I bet they find drugs and all manner of illegal stuff. I think these are the kind of boys would steal, don't you?"

"Oh, no, I can't imagine a nice, clean-cut group of folks like that stealing," Leonard said.

Jim Bob said, "Yeah. You're right. Hard to imagine."

"We go to the law, how's it going to go down with us riding around with our friends in the trunk and floorboard?" I asked.

"We made a citizen's arrest. We get all these other biker turds arrested, we can get them off your backs, maybe permanently. If not, we may have to find a way to mess their shit up big-time."

"Weren't you the one that said we couldn't get them all and that we had to worry about them showing up later?" I said.

"I did say that," Jim Bob said. "But I'm feeling more optimistic now, and besides, I don't know what else to do. There's just no easy way to slide in there like I hoped."

About then we heard motorcycles humming, saw headlights from them. We got down low and stayed behind the trees, saw three bikes pass on the road. They were heading toward the compound; I guess you could call it that.

Guy on the lead bike was so big he looked like a bear riding a motorized tricycle with the seat stuffed up his ass. Bearded, broad-shouldered, hulking, knees bunched up high because of his size, wearing what looked to be a leather cap. Under the cap his long, dark hair snapped in the wind. He probably weighed three hundred pounds and was at least six feet seven without the cap. I noted he had a very large scabbard on his hip in which was placed a very large knife—a bowie, most likely. Behind the bikes came an El Camino, one of those car-truck combinations, this one being one of the last in the model run, made in the eighties. A man was driving. A woman sat in the middle. Another man was on the passenger side. I was already feeling nervous, but now I felt really uncomfortable, like something with a beak and tentacles had parked itself inside my head.

When the truck passed, a couple other bikes behind that, Jim Bob said what I expected: "Big dude on the lead bike, that's Samson."

"You say his brother was the same size?" Leonard said.

"Moses was the baby brother. Not quite as big as Samson. But it would have been a difference mostly of who had the most change in his pocket."

"Good thing you had that pistol," Leonard said.

"Why I always carry it now. Experience. But a guy size of Samson and Moses, you got to place the shot just right, otherwise the bullet might bounce off."

27

Having found out where the base camp was, all we had to do was go back to the car, take the boys in the car back to Marvin, and have the law descend on the place. That was the plan. But, as is the usual situation with anything that has to do with me and Leonard, things went wrong.

Creeping back on the road, staying close to the trees, ears cocked for bikes or cars, we were hustling along pretty good, and then those cocked ears of ours got filled with sounds.

More bikes.

We edged off the road again and hunkered down behind some trees. That dead smell was strong now, strong enough to gag a vulture. The bikes, two this time, went by on the road. When they were past, Jim Bob said, “I think we can use the penlight if we flash close to the ground. Think the Red Bitch is over there.”

Jim Bob pointed.

That was about where I thought it was, too. Me and Leonard were both pretty damn good in the woods. We had grown up living in the country and knew our way among the trees and bees, as they used to say. It was towns and cities I had the most trouble navigating.

Going along, the stench growing stronger and stronger, my gag reflex causing me to heave a little, we came to a large ditch, cut there naturally by time and runoff water. There was a little scummy water in the ditch. We could see that when Jim Bob flashed his light down there. But there was plenty of something else.

The decaying bodies of dogs. Dozens of them. Flies, startled by the light, rose up in a nauseating buzz, and the dim moonlight between the trees filled with their collected darkness, and then the flies split and the dull light came through again.

Most of the dogs were of the pit bull persuasion, full-blood or mixed. Some of the bodies were fresh, but most were not. The less fresh ones were terribly ripe, bony, and decayed.

“The motherfuckers,” Leonard said. “They fight them, then toss the dead ones in this ditch.”

“They don’t always die from the fight,” Jim Bob said. “A dog loses, they figure it’ll never be good in a fight again, so they shoot it in the head to get rid of it or just to show it who’s boss.”

“I’d like to show them who’s boss,” Leonard said. “Jesus. How can those pieces of shit think of themselves as human?”

“A monkey thinks more profoundly than those hunks of crap do,” Jim Bob said.

While we stood there, looking down on that sorry sight, our noses plugged with that dead smell, I felt the uncomfortable thought I had felt earlier when I saw the El Camino go by with its passengers. The thought started to float to the surface like a corpse floating up from the depths of the sea. I thought again about the woman I had seen in the pickup. I had a sudden flash. At first it was just a passing flash, and then it came back and swelled into a thought that was more substantial. I said, “Goddamn it. Woman in the El Camino. It was Frank.”

“You sure?” Leonard said.

“I think so. I mean, now that I think about it, it looked like her. I saw her right off, but it didn’t register. She shouldn’t have been in the truck. She should be tucked tight at our office.”

“They found her somehow,” Jim Bob said.

“I can’t be sure,” I said.

Leonard said, “I say we get in the Bitch, roll down the windows, and drive that motherfucker right into the midst of them, shooting the shit out of the place and packing Frank up and taking her out of there.”

“Need I add it would turn out bad and not in our favor, and we might end up shooting her,” Jim Bob said. “Remember it was you guys telling me about the finger count. They are many. We are three.”

“Here’s a little something I just thought of,” I said. “What if she called them? What if she’s in cahoots? What if she’s the Big Dog?”

“There’s a thought,” Jim Bob said. “I don’t like that thought, but it’s something. She got on my side of the game pretty quick. I’ll tell you about that later.”

That’s when a roar went up from back at the camp. We were a goodly distance away, but the sound of that roar was heard clearly.

None of us said a word, didn’t discuss it, but we automatically started easing back toward the sound, which had been replaced by hooting and yelling and laughing.

When we got back where we were before, the trees near the clearing, the fire was blazing higher and it lit the place up almost as bright as day.

Like ants, the bikers were moving into a wad around something, and since the pickup was parked near where they were gathering, I had an idea what it was.

“That doesn’t look like a welcome-home committee,” Leonard said.

“Thinking on it,” Jim Bob said, “I can’t see Frank coming out here to party. She’s a little too high-class.”

I had my palm against a sweet gum. I looked up. The bottom limb was well above my head. I put my shotgun on the ground, said to Leonard, “Brother, give me a boost.”

Leonard put his shotgun down, cupped his hands. I put my foot in them, and he lifted me up. I grabbed the lowest limb and pulled myself higher into the tree. I could damn sure feel those extra pounds on me. Normally I’d have been up that tree like a young squirrel. That night I was a plump old squirrel, and less spry.

I climbed up higher, going slow. When I found a limb high enough and big enough for me to stand on, I did that and put my hand against the tree for support. It wasn’t a great view, but I could see who was who.

It was Frank. She was in the middle of a circle made up of the biker gang, men and women. For her, things didn’t look so good.

28

The circle closed around Frank. She was being shoved, felt, and snatched from all sides. Even the women were giving her hell. Pack mentality, wolves with a single lamb, and the wolves were hungry.

I started down. Leonard grabbed my legs when I dangled from the lowest limb, helped me onto the ground.

“It’s her,” I said. “And she’s not here for a hootenanny. She’s meat. Someone gave her to this bunch for whatever reason, and I think they are planning a series of festivities that she won’t enjoy.”

“How many of them did you see?” Jim Bob asked.

“I didn’t count them,” I said. “But it’s more than before, and not just the ones who rode in a while ago. Trailers must have been full. I think every man in that group has plans to wet his wick in Frank’s handmade doohickey, and the women might have something special in mind as well. There will be no get-well-soon cards.”

“That clears up our plan,” Leonard said. “We go in.”

“It’s already too late to help her,” Jim Bob said.

“I think it’s only going to get later,” Leonard said.

We gathered our weapons and started hurrying back to the Cadillac. It took a full fifteen to twenty minutes, tearing through the brush. The roar of those beasts back at the compound filled the night.

* * *

In the car, Jim Bob driving, me riding shotgun, Leonard in the back, we took off.

“We have the element of surprise,” Jim Bob said as he drove the Red Bitch onto the road and gunned it. He had yet to turn on the headlights.

“More like the elephant of surprise,” I said. “I think they’re going to hear us coming.”

“Then we’ll give them plenty of noise,” Jim Bob said. He had laid his shotgun on the floorboard, at my feet. He had his revolver in his lap.

“Can you shoot left-handed?” I said.

"Hell, I had to, I could shoot left-footed and reload with my dick."

No wane in confidence there. I had to say that for him.

"You think the boys in the trunk are enjoying the ride?" I said.

"I hope not," Leonard said. "The boy here on the floorboard is a little wiggly."

"They should all go 'Whee,' " Jim Bob said.

"They're gagged," Leonard said.

"Oh, yeah," Jim Bob said.

"Hap," Leonard said.

"Yeah."

"Brother, in case things go wrong, it has been quite a ride."

"Oh, yeah," I said. I jacked a load into the twelve-gauge and prepared to hang my body out the window. My hands were shaking.

"Can you actually see the road?" I asked Jim Bob.

"Not really," Jim Bob said. "I'm guesstimating."

Jim Bob let out with a cackle and floored the Red Bitch.

Man, that motor did howl.

29

Situations like that, it's like you and time are frozen in amber.

And then the amber breaks, and you're not frozen, but everything moves for a time in slow motion. If it's your first time or two doing something like that, going into the midst of danger and uncertainty, you have tunnel vision. You see what's in front of you as if looking down the length of a tunnel. Everything to the right and left of you is a black wall. But if you've been there before, it's not that way. On some level, like the samurai of old, you have accepted your death. You are neither there to win or to lose. You are there to be in the moment. Things may be slow, but they are viewed wider with experience, not inside that fearful tunnel of the neophyte. That's how it was with me. I could see clearly. I could feel clearly.

I might add right here that I say fuck the samurai. I planned to win. I planned to go home. And I knew that plan had about as much chance as a slug in a salt block. I knew, too, I had survived worse situations. And as that thought galloped through my head, another less pleasant thought showed up.

Sometimes your luck runs out.

So on we went, the car seemingly hanging in time, moving slowly in my mind's eye, but in actuality barreling down on that crew at a rate of at least sixty miles an hour. We came off the road and hit the pasture with a bumping motion that jarred my teeth. The Red Bitch went hopping over that rough ground like a metallic rabbit, and then everyone in the camp turned to look at us just as Jim Bob hit the headlights and put the pedal to the floor. The pasture in front of us was flooded with gold light. I glanced at the speedometer. I could see it because Jim Bob had turned on the lights and the dash light had lit up. The Bitch jumped to seventy and was growling as the needle on the speedometer swung wide to the right.

Jim Bob hit the horn and didn't let it go, guided the car by using his other hand to precariously hang on to the suicide knob. If that thing snapped we'd end up in a ball of hot metal and shredded tires rolling along the countryside.

I was partly out the window now, and Leonard was hanging out in the same way from the back driver's side window.

Now, let me tell you, a big red Cadillac bearing down on your ass will do one of two things. It will cause you to stick to your spot like a tree, or you will attempt to spring away like a deer. The ones who stick to the ground like a tree are not going to turn out well, and the ones who spring away like a deer, well, truth is, a deer is quick, but a big red Cadillac going over seventy miles an hour is far quicker.

When the Red Bitch hit into them we discovered that the old adage is wrong. Men can fly. So can women and motorcycles. Jim Bob hit the brakes as we came up on them, but not completely; just a firm tap and a turn of the wheel. We slid into that circle and hit three or four of those fuckers and knocked them into the air, slammed a bike so that it went skidding past Frank as close as a foot. Had our luck been off by a hair, had the bike hit her, we could have just backed out and yelled a polite "Sorry" and gone home.

Way we hit caused a stocky woman with short ragged hair to do a sort of cartwheel that whirled her past Frank and a big man in the middle who was clutching Frank's shoulder. Frank was wearing only a bra and fragments of blue jeans, which had been cut or ripped off of her.

Frank and the man, the mighty Samson himself, watched the biker bitch twirl by, performing a dynamic cartwheel. Samson seemed calm, like a paying customer observing a circus trick. I hung out the window, fired the shotgun, and blew a tire out on the El Camino. Leonard slithered out the window on his side and blew the leg out from under a big blue-jean-wearing guy with no shirt and a belly big enough to have contained a few cases of beer and a Thanksgiving turkey. The man's kneecap went flying out of his torn pants, and then he was on the ground. Those blue jeans were ruined.

"Oh, goddamn it," the man said. I could hear him clearly as I hung out the window, and then his forehead went to the ground and his shot-up leg extended behind him. He had passed out from pain and shock. The air smelled of burning rubber, and it made my eyes water. I wondered how they stood it, standing near that fire. Besides, the night was too warm for a fire. It was too warm for a cup of coffee. I guess devils like those don't mind a little heat.

All of a sudden I was out of the car and into the crowd, which was no longer a circle but instead a clashing mass of flesh. A big woman next to me, wearing a bandanna with bits of hair hanging out from under it, reached for a little gun that was hanging out of her baggy pants pocket. I hit her with the stock of the shotgun hard enough to see teeth fly. I was all out of chivalry. I would have gunned down Minnie Mouse had she pulled a pistol, a pocket knife, or a too-large comb.

I heard one of the shotguns go off behind me and didn't realize until later it had been a warning shot by Leonard, a blast over the crowd's head.

I had the shotgun to my shoulder, and I knew there were people closing in behind me. A shotgun barked again and I heard someone scream and then there was a rustling as people ran for it, knowing now we weren't fucking around. I walked right up and took Frank by the elbow, said, "Come with me."

Samson let her go. I turned with her then, knowing Jim Bob and Leonard had my back going in and had it as I walked out. I pushed through a few bikers who wanted to be tough but were a little weak in the knees from our arrival; I could smell shit where some of them had crapped themselves.

Directing Frank to the car, I noticed that the Bitch's front tires were pretty deep in grooves of dirt they had plowed. I was hoping in the back of my mind the Bitch would back out of there without a snag, because if she didn't, our moment of shock and awe was over with, and all that was left was us being thrown in that ditch with those poor dead dogs. Our elephant of surprise was near over.

Frank got in on the backseat passenger side of the Bitch faster than the snap of a whip. "There's a man here," she said.

"Put your feet on him." I said.

Jim Bob, who was holding a shotgun, tossed it through the window onto the front seat, got in behind the wheel. He had left the motor running. In the car lights the crowd had begun to clutter up like moths before a porch light. Leonard and I stood with our shotguns, pointing them, moving them from side to side, trying to take it all in, hoping no one moved. It was so quiet you could have heard houseflies fucking.

Leonard got in the backseat, closed the door, and dangled himself out the open window with the shotgun. I stayed where I was for the moment. If we lived through this, I would tell Leonard later that with him hanging out the back window he reminded me of a black Labrador with a shotgun.

Samson moved forward, close to the car. He yelled out, "Jim Bob, I'll get you, you son of a bitch. You are mine."

Jim Bob stuck his head and arm out the window, pistol in his left hand. He said, “Samson, it is so nice to see you.”

He shot Samson in the throat. Samson dropped to his knees as if in need of sudden prayer, then rocked forward on his face.

Jim Bob said. “Hap. Get in the fucking car.”

I swung the shotgun from side to side, but no one asked for a load of buckshot. I got in, and before I could close the door, the Red Bitch was in reverse and we were flying out of there backwards, spinning dirt so hard it flew up and over the front of the car. By then the biker assholes had their brains back and had found guns. Bullets popped around us. One, a rifle shot, I’m sure, hit the windshield and went through it like a hot knife through butter. It zipped between Frank and Leonard and took out the back windshield. The front windshield merely had a hole in it, but even as we bounced along that pasture in reverse, Jim Bob looking over the backseat, eyes squinted, trying to see what was behind us in the red taillights, the front windshield collapsed like a Baptist deacon’s morals at a strip club.

We were really being fired at now. One of the headlights went out as we backed up, and I could hear little impacts as shots popped the Caddy, but it didn’t slow us and we didn’t lose a tire, and none of us gathered up a bullet.

Jim Bob, soon as those tires hit the road, jabbed the brake and whirled the wheel, still holding on to that stupid suicide knob, and all of a sudden we were turned completely around and roaring down the blacktop, shots snapping in the air and some of them still hitting the Red Bitch. But she kept running, and away we went, our visibility based on one headlight. There was a kind of rumbling from the back of the car. Something was rolling around in the trunk.

Oh, yeah. Now I remembered.

30

The Red Bitch was rocking along, that one remaining headlight punching the night like a Cyclops with a heat beam. Through the busted-out windshield the air was smashing into us like a fist. The little hula girl and the plastic Jesus stuck on the dashboard of the car did the shimmy-shimmy-shake in overdrive. I think even Jesus was worried how all this was going to come out. My hands were trembling.

Jim Bob saw a little cutoff into the woods, about bicycle wide, shot past it, braked hard, burned rubber, backed into it, and kept going in reverse. Limbs scratched the Caddy, bent the aerial. Jim Bob bounced the Bitch along quite a ways until the limbs grew closer and began to brush over the car as thick as shadows. He turned off the one remaining headlight.

"Let's get out of the car," Jim Bob said.

We all had shotguns with us when we got out, except Frank, of course, who paused long enough before getting out to wipe her feet on Wishbone. Got to stay tidy, even if you're barely wearing pants.

Outside the car we'd at least have a fighting chance. We moved to the back of the Caddy, pushing through the tight mesh of limbs and brush. There was tapping going on in the trunk. There was a bullet hole in the trunk.

Jim Bob snapped the stock of his shotgun down on the trunk, said, "Quiet in there."

The tapping ceased.

"At least one of them is alive," Jim Bob said.

"I'm sorry," Frank said. "This is all my fault."

She stood there shaking in fear, dressed only in the fragments of her jeans, bra, and shoes.

"I was thinking it might be," Leonard said. "I was thinking that a lot."

"Save it for now," Jim Bob said. "I'm pissed off enough right now without having to hear something stupid. We'll hear stupid over a cup of coffee or some such later."

I don't know exactly how long we stood there at the back of the Bitch, but finally we heard the roaring of motorcycle motors. I wondered if the burned-rubber smoke and smell was still in the air, that they'd notice there was probably half the Caddy's tires on the road out there.

"They come down this way," Jim Bob said, "is it every man for himself?"

"Nope. Musketeer way," Leonard said. "All for one and one for all."

"Suits me," I said.

"Done," Jim Bob said.

"I'm out," Frank said. "They show up, I'm into the woods like a goddamn rabbit."

The roar of the motorcycle engines grew louder, and then we saw headlights from the bikes striking the road. The bikes came flying by. One, two, three. After a bit I lost count. But a lot of bikes shot along that road and past us.

We stayed there for a while, not moving. Then Jim Bob took his keys, found the right one by lighting a match, and opened the trunk. He held the match in such a way we could see inside. No one had turned to smoke and slipped through the cracks. A bullet that had gone through the trunk had passed above them. Later, Jim Bob would tell us he found that it had passed through the trunk, split the backseat between Leonard and Frank, and had killed the radio on the dash. As for the two in the trunk and the one lying on the floorboard, they were all alive but uncomfortable.

We waited a bit. No one came back for us. We pulled Wishbone out, dragged him to the back of the car, and laid him out on the ground.

Jim Bob reached in the trunk and pulled a little bag out. Leonard and I picked up Wishbone and put him in the trunk with them. Tight fit. We bumped some heads pushing the trunk lid down.

"I figure they're all right for a few more hours," Jim Bob said.

"They'll get pee-pee in the trunk of your car," Leonard said. "May have already done it."

Jim Bob opened the bag from the trunk and got a dark western shirt out of it. He gave it to Frank. "Put that on."

She did. It fell down over her thighs, giving her a little more dignity than before.

Another twenty minutes passed, and it was a good thing we waited, for during that time a couple more bikes roared along, having gotten into the mix late. After a while, though, we decided we'd pull out. We did that and went along in the direction the bikes had taken, and then when we got off the back roads and onto the main highway, we tooled right on into town. No police pulled us over for having one headlight, a broken aerial, and three thugs in the trunk.

“They could be waiting at your place,” Jim Bob said. “The three in the trunk know where you live; so may the rest of them.”

“Good point,” I said. “And since Frank is with us, I’m going to guess they know where the office is.”

“They do,” Frank said. “I fucked up.”

Frank started to cry. I wondered if she cried like that when she was a man. I was her right then, I would have cried. Hell, I wanted to cry, and I wasn’t her.

31

Well," I said, "at least one of the bikers out there is dead for sure, unless he has been resurrected. Maybe more. Depends on how hard the car hit them and if the guy without the kneecap died. The one I know is dead is named Samson. Jim Bob said his last name is House. Like in Son House, the blues guy. Jim Bob shot him in the throat."

"Ah, shit," Marvin said. "Is there anything you didn't do? I mean, you might as well add you got through shooting folks, you dug up a corpse, fucked it, and named it Dixie."

"I can honestly say we didn't do that. We named it Ethel."

I was sitting on the bed in a motel room talking to Marvin on my cell phone. We were all in that room, us and the biker shits.

We were lucky that night. Lucky to have pulled through and lucky the motel was mostly empty. The only gun we decided to take with us inside the motel was Jim Bob's pistol. Jim Bob had plunked down in a chair by a desk that was under a TV screen mounted on the wall and laid his gun hand across his knee. Leonard stretched out on the bed, his back against the headboard. There was a table with chairs, and Frank sat there. I found myself checking her out. I felt funny about that. An old East Texas boy studying her curves, trying to imagine what she had looked like as a man. We sat all three thugs on the floor with their backs against the wall. Wishbone and Bad Leg complained, the third man had still yet to say a word.

When I finished up with Marvin, he said, "I hate you guys. See you in thirty. Hey, you aren't going to shoot anyone else or burn anything down in the next thirty minutes, are you?"

"We have plans for a time of solitude," I said.

"Good. I need to shower and have some coffee and eat a bite. Make it forty-five minutes to an hour. Again, can you stay out of trouble that long?"

"I think so," I said.

When we were through talking, I told them Marvin was on his way.

“Oh, good,” Jim Bob said. “I’m sure he’ll be thrilled to see us and get more details.”

“Who the fuck is Marvin?” Wishbone said. We had removed their gags but left their hands tied, though we had only fastened down Wishbone’s unbroken arm by tying it to his belt. The broken one we put in a sling we made with a bath towel. They were all three at a point where they couldn’t have outwrestled a dying frog in a best two out of three, but we kept their hands tied anyway.

“Someone you won’t like,” Leonard said.

I said, “I was pretty thorough with Marvin, don’t you think? I didn’t tell him about the dead dogs because I didn’t want him to be really mad. He thinks we should just take these dudes off in the woods somewhere and shoot them in the head and let the buzzards sort them out. Oh, yeah, he said if we decide to do that, we got to get rid of the gun.”

The thugs sitting against the wall gave me a look and shifted on their asses.

“Nah, he didn’t say that,” I said. “Just fucking with you.”

“It’s an idea, though,” Leonard said.

“Oh, man,” Frank said. “I really messed up.”

“Hold that thought,” Jim Bob said. “We’ll come back to it in short order. Right now I’m still as mad as I want to be.”

We allowed them to go to the toilet one at a time with the door open and Jim Bob standing there with the revolver. “Jesus,” Jim Bob said to Wishbone. “Do you have to shit now? I don’t want to see that.”

“Think I like doing this? I’m modest.”

“Just get it done,” Jim Bob said. “Oh, man. I’m going to have to light some matches for sure. Maybe get a fucking blowtorch. Have you been eating something dead off the highway?”

“How am I going to wipe my ass with my hand tied and one arm broke?” Wishbone said. “You doing it for me?”

“Not likely,” Jim Bob said.

He ended up untying Wishbone’s hand. Wishbone took his time in there. He had really been saving up. The other two, thank goodness, were quite content with number ones.

When everyone had their bathroom trip finished, and all had washed their hands, using soap, as Jim Bob instructed, and when Wishbone was tied up again, we lined them up against the wall and had them sit as before. We let them keep the gags off. They promised to be good boys.

The one with the injured leg was starting to look bad. He had beads of sweat on his forehead, and his lips had grown pale. His leg was outstretched and had swollen bad enough Jim Bob had to cut the fellow's pants open to accommodate the swelling.

"Can we order a pizza?" Wishbone said. "I'm hungry enough to suck shit out a pig's ass."

"Eeew," Frank said.

"Would you like us to rent you a movie, too?" I said.

"That would be nice," Wishbone said. "But nothing violent."

"You're showing your spine, ain't you?" Jim Bob said.

Wishbone shrugged. You'd have thought we were all old buddies, way he acted.

"Can I bum a cigarette, then?" he said.

"Nobody here smokes," I said. "Jim Bob just carries matches."

"I wouldn't mind taking you outside and setting you on fire, though," Leonard said.

We ended up ordering a couple of large pizzas anyway. Hold the pig shit.

Forty-five minutes passed, then an hour, and still no Marvin.

About an hour later there was a light knock at the door. It could have been Marvin, the pizza, or the bikers having figured out where we were.

I glanced through the peephole.

Marvin.

I let him in. He looked around the room, settled his eyes on Frank for a moment, trying to figure who she was and what the hell she was doing there. He looked at the three men sitting on the floor. He grinned at Wishbone, said, "Jared Fonteneau. My man. How's the old hammer dangling?"

"It's waiting in the toolbox until needed," Wishbone, a.k.a. Jared, said.

"And Thomas Peers. Or should I call you Hopalong Dumbass? Man, you don't look so good."

"Leg's fucked up," Thomas said. "I could walk a little an hour ago, now I can't."

"I can see that."

"I need a fucking doctor. A nurse. A goddamn big-ass dog with a barrel of brandy hung under its neck. Something, man. I'm in pain here. I'm starting to get way past not feeling so good."

"You do in fact look as if you might be moving past your expiration date," Marvin said.

Marvin moved his gaze to the man who was yet to speak. "And Mute Boy Gavin. Tongue hasn't grown back, has it?" Then to us: "Mute Boy there. He don’t say much because he can’t. He was five his mother decided he talked too much, and it was screwing up her crack high, so she used a pair of pliers and some pruning shears and took to his tongue.”

Mute Boy gave Marvin the finger.

“He has, however,” Marvin said, “acquired some ability with sign language.”

32

The pizza came. The pizza boy looked like he just got his driver's license.

Leonard gave the pizza boy money, said, "You took long enough. You have to go to Italy to get it?"

"It's a busy night," the pizza boy said.

"I'm so busy you're not getting a tip," Leonard said, taking the pizza and closing the door with his foot.

I got up and went out and gave the pizza boy a tip. I said, "It's all right. He found out today that his penile implant isn't going to work."

"Oh," the pizza boy said and went away.

Wishbone said, "I told you no onions."

"Shut up," Leonard said.

Everyone ate, onions or no onions, though Bad Leg was good for only one piece. He really was starting to fade. Wishbone was actually starting to be jovial, even cracked a few jokes. I think he was a little delirious from the injured arm and all that had happened to him. He told us a limerick—not that we asked for it:

There was an old hermit named Dave
Who kept a dead whore in a cave.
He said, I'll admit
She does smell a bit,
But look at the money I save.

On that note, me and Marvin went out of the motel and took a ride in his car. I got picked because Leonard didn't want to do it, and that was that. As we cruised, I told Marvin what I had already told him. I explained about Frank. At least all the stuff I knew, which was pretty much that she had showed up with Jim Bob, been nabbed, been rescued, had enjoyed pizza with us in the room, and had said little to nothing since we pulled her away from the bikers and the party in her honor.

“Frank was a man?” he said. “That’s hard to believe.”

“I try to be cool about it,” I said. “You know, moving with the times, but the whole thing jacks me around some. Odd thing is she looks damn good. I mean, now that he’s a she she does. Am I saying that right? Shit. You know what I mean.”

“She’s got good legs, and I like the way that shirt hung on her, minidress-style. I saw her, I felt my dick wiggle. Don’t tell anyone.”

“Lips are sealed. By the way, you took long enough to show up.”

“The missus felt friendly. She doesn’t always feel friendly. I thought I ought to take what was offered.”

“That explains a couple of minutes,” I said. “What about the rest?”

“You are not nice,” Marvin said.

“I will say this, you don’t need any outside dick wiggling if there’s wiggling at home.”

“I agree,” he said.

No use denying it. Men, even honorable ones, can think like dogs. There’s an old joke about a guy that’s been without loving so long, a friend takes him into the woods and suggests he fuck a knothole in a tree. The other guy says, “Does it have to be just that tree?”

I told Marvin how those motorcycle shits were most likely out there looking for us and that if they found us it wouldn’t be good, us no longer having the elephant of surprise on them.

“Don’t know how you two do it,” Marvin said. “You could start trouble at a kid’s birthday party. And Jim Bob, too. You two and him, that’s a disaster in the making. It’s the Hindenburg and the Titanic and the Great Hurricane of 1900 on Galveston Island all rolled into one big mess. Look here, Hap. Seems to me this is some bad poo-poo. Getting you out of it, I’m not sure it’s worth anything to me.”

“I can understand that. New job and all.”

“Guys came and attacked you in your yard, that’s easy to make self-defense. But you put them in the trunk of a car, took them for a ride while you went out there after the others, shot and killed one, at least. Blew a kneecap off another and knocked some folks around with the car. That shit there, that’s hard to explain.”

“Knowing their location was a self-defense move, way we saw it.”

“Making that play so anyone believes it, that’ll take some work, buddy.”

“I know. But that’s all we intended. The other, rescuing Frank—that just happened. We had to do it. No red-blooded American would have done any less. I think we could ride the hero horse with a jury, it came to it."

"We might have to dress it up a little, buy it some new shoes, but it might work."

We rode up North Street and on out of town, along the highway, where the trees were thicker. Marvin turned around in the driveway of a liquor store that was oddly placed out in the middle of nowhere, then we started back south, driving slow. We didn't talk for a while. Marvin was considering.

"Tell you what," Marvin said. "I can go in and talk around things a little, see how things hang, so to speak. But if it doesn't hang so well, I got to throw you boys to the dogs. Maybe I can do it so you only spend most of the rest of your life in prison, and I'll have them put you in with some nice man won't hurt you too much if you call him Mama."

"That's not much relief."

"What the fuck you expect? Jesus, Hap. Look here, what we'll do is we'll take those three in, get that one with the messed-up leg to the hospital, get a cast for the one with the broken arm. In the meantime, I'm going to call the sheriff, see if he can get his men out there in the county. I can probably have a few of our local cops go out there, too, without there being some big jurisdiction battle. Thing is, we'll check the place out. We'll check your house and Leonard's place. Where the hell is he staying now?"

I told him.

"Shit," Marvin said. "Brett. Where is she?"

"A motel somewhere," I said.

"Good."

I decided to tell him about Chance.

"Man, that would be something. A grown daughter. Think of all the money on formula and diapers you saved. And there's that prom-dress thing."

"Leonard said pretty much the same thing."

"That's because he's a thinker, Hap. He's the thinker of you two. That prom-dress thing, by the way. Wouldn't believe what something like that costs, and for one night. There's also weddings and such, and you have to deal with son-in-laws, and ex-son-in-laws if they divorce, and they got kids, it's a real fucking stinker. Worse, you get other in-laws, and some of them are no treat. I know. I been through it."

"If she is my daughter, maybe I can still catch the marriage part, the grandkids, the angry ex-son-in-laws, and the shitty in-laws."

"Being a father is very rewarding, except when it isn't. And then there's being a grandparent—same thing. That can be great, and it can suck. But then you remember Gadget and how that went?"

I did. She was Marvin's granddaughter. Real name Julia. Nickname Gadget. Me and Leonard had once rescued her from some drug dealers. As well as from herself. She seemed to be doing much better these days. Had married to what I understood was a pretty good guy with a handful of college degrees and some family money. They had moved off to Wyoming, where they both ended up working in real estate.

Marvin drove us back to the motel, having called some law on our way back. When we got there a city cop had already arrived, and right behind him came an ambulance. People were poking out of doors and standing on the landing watching Jared and Mute Boy being loaded in the cop car. Bad Leg was fading, so he got placed in an ambulance and driven away fast with lights and sirens.

When the cops and ambulance had gone away, Marvin stood out in the lot by his car talking to me and Leonard and Jim Bob. Frank was in the room.

"You could have had the cops come without lights and sirens," I said. "It makes us stand out like sore thumbs."

"Truth is, I wanted for it to be a big to-do. That way it looks like we mean business and that we've brought in some real desperadoes. That part could be good for you, being involved with bringing in these three. Truth is, these guys aren't so tough, and I think if I put the screws to them a little, they'll speak in tongues I ask them to."

"You sound a bit more optimistic about our chances than you did earlier," I said.

"I've been thinking on it," Marvin said. "And I got an idea or two. I'll put a couple of cops at your place for a few days, Hap, until I can sort things out. You might want to stay away from the office, and Leonard, you shouldn't go home. I hate to bring it up, don't know how things are between you and John, but he shouldn't show up there, either."

"Don't worry about John," Leonard said. "I changed the locks with extreme prejudice. May that motherfucker go with Jesus and Mary and the Holy Ghost and the young Casper."

"Just stick with Hap," Marvin said. "And Jim Bob, no use talking to you, as you'll do what you want. In the long run, so will these two. I could have made friends with quieter, more agreeable people, I guess."

"But you wouldn't have all the excitement we bring to your life," Jim Bob said.

"That's sort of what I meant," Marvin said.

“I can tell you this,” Jim Bob said. “I leave here, I’m going to take my now wreck of a car back to Houston and have it fixed up so that it shines like a newborn fawn. You need me for something else, I’ll come back. Give me a call. Hell, I got my sneak-around cars and my old wrecks at home, so I’ll come back a little quieter and a little less shiny.”

“All right, we got one last thing before we call it a night and I find out if you boys are going to jail. Explain to me about Frank. Got the general business already, but I got a feeling there has been a new portfolio added. Hap only knew so much.”

“Tell you what,” Jim Bob said. “Let’s the four of us retire to the fine living arrangements of this cheap-ass motel, sit with Frank, and me and her will sort you out on that new portfolio. It’s a doozy.”

33

I don’t have a comb, makeup, or anything,” Frank said.

We were all in the motel room. I was starting to come down off my action buzz, beginning to feel tired. The pizza had not settled well with me. I needed an antacid. It felt like a dogfight was going on in my belly.

“You look fine,” I said.

“Thank you,” she said.

“Yeah, you’re all right,” Marvin said. “Way you look isn’t what I’m concerned with here.”

He looked at me, remembering full well his comment about the shirt she was wearing.

I smiled at him.

Marvin cleared his throat. “I got some of the story, what Hap and Leonard know, not what you and Jim Bob know. What I want to know is why Apocalypse on Wheels put the nab on you. How do you figure in this story, front to back? Tell it straight. It might mean the difference in you having to wear an orange jumpsuit and share a cell with Big Bertha, or spending lazy weekends at home with a beer and a vibrator.”

“That’s just vulgar,” Frank said.

“I’m up when I should be sleeping, and I’m going to guess you are involved in what I like to refer to as nefarious fucking shit, so don’t get holy on me.”

Frank nodded. “Jim Bob came to see me, lying about wanting to buy a car. Almost fooled me. But I have a kind of radar, like with you two and Cason, who, though a dreamy piece of meat, I figured was in with you guys, me being able to radar things, which is why I have the job. Though I got to tell you, that stuff about the petunias and screwing the old folks sort of had me going for a moment, and I almost thought Hap here might have patents on sex toys. Bigger the lie, easier it is to believe. Well, truth is, that was too big a lie.”

“Get to the backbone of it,” Marvin said.

“Jim Bob came to the dealership, told me his name was something or other—”

“Tommy Jasons,” Jim Bob said. “It’s a name I use now and again, even have an identity established online, a past, whole shooting match, right down to my shoe size.”

“Jim Bob was very convincing, but I had some small doubts, an itch at the back of my mind, and after he left, after I told him I could put him in a car and a vagina, I looked him up—or, rather, I looked up Tommy Jasons—on the Internet. Did that, I knew I was being scammed. Never scam a scammer. Guy Jim Bob hired to build his past has a certain method for building those sites, a certain look. He changed them up, of course, and he was good. But I saw plenty of things he did for our own business. Pasts he had built. I recognized his style. No matter how differently he approached those sites, constructed those pasts for certain people, he had signatures that I recognized, same as a fingerprint. I knew him personally, too. Called him up, got it confirmed, found out Tommy Jasons was Jim Bob Luke. That’s when I looked up Jim Bob, read about him and his agency. He didn’t have a photo there, but as I said, I knew it was him. Saw what he did, private investigator. I did a bit more research, decided he was exactly what I needed to get my ass out of a crack. I called him on the Tommy Jasons number, told him my situation.”

“Which I’m still guessing at,” Marvin said. “And this guy creates false identities. Going to need to know more about him. Sounds big-time illegal.”

“Here’s something cute,” Jim Bob said. “He is better known as Weasel.”

“Oh, shit,” Leonard said.

“Yep,” Jim Bob said, pulling a toothpick from the band of his hat, sticking it in his mouth. “He is in fact a weasel. I didn’t know he was your man until Frank told me. That makes some things fit together, don’t it?”

“Like fingers in a glove,” I said.

“There’s a lot of lawbreaking going on among friends here,” Marvin said. “I can’t like that too much, you know. And I’m a cop. Not a game-show participant. I’m not here to guess what the fuck is going on. Tell me straight out and avoid taking the long path to the rabbit hole.”

“I’ll get there,” Frank said.

“Yes, but will you arrive by Shetland pony?” Marvin said.

“When I saw that site, I called Weasel and asked him about it, about Jim Bob’s connection. He didn’t know Jim Bob was connected, but he figured it all pretty quick, told me he had to lay some bad words down about me to you boys, but nothing that really got me in trouble, just some smoke-screen stuff."

"Was any of what he told us true?" Leonard asked. "Like that stuff about the Canceler?"

"The Canceler is true, though I haven't heard anything about the company using him in a while. I never had anything to do with that. I've never seen him, only heard of him. I was a figurehead at the dealership. I do the front-end work. When a deal is set, others take it from there. I know cars and peddling ass, but the blackmail stuff, that came from on high. I didn't have anything to do with it."

"But you knew what was going on."

"Got set up by someone else. Not me."

"Who?" Marvin asked.

"Never met them. Didn't want to. Car company is just one head of the hydra. It's hard to know which head is in charge. I went with the blackmail because I was getting paid extra, but to tell the truth, I didn't see any harm in it. Men they blackmailed were mostly entitled shits cheating on their wives, talking false about family values at community meetings and political rallies. They had money. Plenty of it. It wouldn't hurt them to let go of some of it, but then things started changing. They got tougher. A mark didn't go for the blackmail, or someone got too far out of line in some way or another, they brought in the Canceler. It wasn't like that when I started; that kind of too-tough business wasn't the way then. Things shifted. First a little, then a lot. It got grittier. Not just the blackmail but money laundering. They'd go to one of the rich guys, one of the girls would, or one of the men who was servicing some rich woman, and say, 'Hey, I got this money, couple hundred thousand, and I need it to sort of find its way into the system without going through normal banking channels.' Rich folks always knew someone who knew someone, and they'd get the deed done. Next thing you knew, FBI was on them."

"FBI?" Marvin said. "Damn, call me a fart and paint me green."

"Top of the game, someone giving information to the FBI as confidential informers. That made them paid informants, and it gave them a lot of liberty as well as a lot of money when it was a high-profile case. FBI wanted to close cases more than they wanted someone running a prostitution ring. They wanted it bad enough to turn their backs on the prostitution, blackmail, and even a lot of the thug work. That included the Canceler. They just greased the CI with olive oil and let him slip through the cracks. The feds were protecting the Canceler and the rest of the car-lot owners as government informants, and they were getting paid serious money, too. Way the feds saw it, the Canceler's killings weren't nearly as important as the info they were getting, and it was an easy way to solve cases. Saved legwork and having to deal with killers that might kill them."

"Law enforcement isn't quite like I thought it was when I was a kid watching The FBI Story," Leonard said.

"I been here before," Jim Bob said.

"What's that mean?" Marvin asked.

"Means I've been in on a bad deal once where the FBI were protecting someone they shouldn't have been protecting."

"How'd that turn out?" Marvin asked.

"Messy," Jim Bob said. "Thing is, FBI gets concentrated on one thing, they can't see the forest for the trees. They focus on what they're trying to accomplish, and if they are using people, so be it. Sometimes guys they got as informants are doing just as bad or worse than the ones the FBI is concentrating on. FBI gets focused, they're willing to give themselves a hand job and call it pussy if it meets their needs."

"Not much justice in that," I said.

"That's where we come in," Leonard said.

"I didn't hear that," Marvin said.

"Just because you're a cop doesn't mean you're out of it clear and free," Jim Bob said. "You show up too big and tall, they might want a big ole piece out of your ass."

"Puts me where it puts me," Marvin said. "But I don't need to be supporting you guys on vigilante missions."

"What about Sandy?" I asked Frank. "That's what we're really after, though it has sort of morphed into something else."

"I don't know any more about her than I've told you. I'm being honest with you. I just want out of this mess."

"Want a deal," Marvin said, "got to tell this to the DA, and it's got to pan out. Though I'm going to tell you, I think you might have had your finger in the pie a little more than you're letting on."

"If I can give you most of the pie and most of the fingers in it, that would help me, wouldn't it?"

Marvin creased his brows. "Might. Time you and me went to the station, Frank."

"Can I have a private cell?" Frank asked.

"We have one cell we call the suite. Just like all the other cells but only has one bed. We'll start there. In the morning the DA will take your statement. Got to tell you, though, I still don't think you grew a conscience, and I want you to know where I stand. I think you'd feed shit to children and tell them it's chocolate."

Frank looked hurt, but when Marvin's expression didn't change, she said, "I had a feeling they wanted to replace me. I had been borrowing a bit of money from the dealership, and I hadn't been paying it back. They take things like that seriously, and their severance package doesn't contain a golden parachute, just a hole in the ground, or maybe they grind you up for sausage. I don't know. But it wouldn't have been good."

"Why tease the tiger?" Marvin asked.

Frank gave that beautiful smile. "Once a con, pretty much always a con. Doing it the wrong way always seems right to me."

"And you ended up in the woods with a bunch of bikers how?" Leonard asked.

"Started having second thoughts," she said. "Thought maybe it wouldn't be so smart to go to the police after all. Decided since the FBI was in on this, they and my employers might find a way to seriously get me messed up or killed. I called a friend in the business with me. I thought she and I were close. Thought for sure she would be sympathetic. I decided I'd get out altogether and not tell the police anything. That I'd run for it. You know, got cold feet. It was stupid. She told someone at the top, and they sent someone at the bottom to collect me. By the way, I think you'll have to replace your door. It got kicked in and is still standing wide open, far as I know."

34

When we came out of the motel it was cool for a change, and there was the smell of rain in the air. A pink glow rose in the east and expanded and turned gold. Some dark clouds floated overhead.

As we stood there by Jim Bob's busted Chevy with Marvin's unmarked car parked next to it, Marvin said, "I'm going to make some calls, and then maybe you can go by your house just for a moment, because I'm going to have a few cops there, though it'll take me a bit to line them up. I can't afford to post a long-term guard. Go there and get some things you need, and then leave. I'll have a place for you to go. We have a couple of safe houses that the city owns, and we can put you up in one of those for a while."

"How safe is a safe house the city owns?" I said.

"Safer than being home," Marvin said. "In the meantime, I'm raising a posse and we're going to try and go out to where you said the bikers are. They are bound to have given up on you guys by now. And if not, we can toss their place because we have cause. The dead dogs you told us about. A suspicion of dogfighting is a good way in. Now draw me a map to the place."

"Shit," Leonard said. "We'll just go with you. We might as well."

Marvin thought on that awhile. We all stood there while he considered, watching the morning grow older. Frank was leaning against Marvin's car. In the light she looked older and more tired and considerably less full of beans than when we first met her.

"All right," Marvin said. "Here's the thing. I'm not going out there with just us. We got our own little SWAT team here, and since mostly they don't do much, and the equipment they use is going to waste, I'll rally them, and off we'll go. I got to get Frank squared away first. Meet me at the station in, say…oh, how about two hours? That will give the bikers time to drift back. And they will. We're not talking brain surgeons here. They won't figure you guys going to the cops, not after what you've done, Jim Bob. From what I'm understanding, you killed a man, and that is eventually going to at least bring you downtown for a cup of our bad coffee."

"I'll pick up some creamer," Jim Bob said.

"Tell me he was armed."

"He might have been, but he was threatening me, and there were a lot of folks around him that had guns, and he was their leader, so to speak."

"Not as good as I had hoped for," Marvin said. "And Hap, if there are others dead, and one of them is missing a kneecap, like you told me, you might have to have that cup of coffee, too. Right now, do what I've told you, and we maybe can get things to shake out how we want them. Even Frank might end up with the FBI giving her a nice little retirement fund. They're on the other side now, but this is going to put their reputation in a blender we let it out. They may be willing to make a lot of concessions for all you guys. Frank, too, though that irks me a bit."

"I haven't hurt anyone," Frank said.

"That's a matter of angle," Marvin said. "I want you to get in my car and sit and close the door and be quiet."

Frank got in Marvin's unmarked car and sat quietly.

Marvin said, "Hap, you asked me about the stuff Weasel told you. Why it's not in local papers."

"Yeah."

"That's because it didn't happen here. It happened on the outskirts of Houston."

"You're saying he had the murders right, not the location?" I said.

"Exactly. Why he didn't tell you the exact spot I don't know. Maybe he didn't really have as much contact with what went on as he wanted you to think, and maybe he didn't want to be too specific. Figured you didn't find mention of it locally, places he said, you'd give up, figure he was bullshitting. He'd have your money and be on his way up north. Want more, check the Houston Chronicle. I'll send you some special links you can check out. It fits with what he said happened."

"Thanks," I said.

"See you in a couple hours at the cop shop," Marvin said.

* * *

Jim Bob drove us to Walmart in the Bitch. It was just then solid daylight, and when we parked and got out, he looked at his car and moaned. "Goddamn them," he said.

"Man, there are lot of holes," Leonard said.

“Good thing is, none of them is in us,” I said.

As Walmart was open all hours, we went in, and I bought a hammer and nails, and Jim Bob drove us over to the office. Upstairs we found the door kicked in, as Frank said. We closed it and used the hammer and nails to sort of jury-rig it shut until we could call someone to fix it.

After that we went straight to my house. The cops hadn’t been put on duty yet. No motorcycles were in the yard. No bikers had built a bonfire with our furniture. No machine-gun nest. No meanies had soaped our windows.

We drove past. Jim Bob wheeled us to Leonard’s ride on the backstreet where we had left it, and Leonard drove me and him around to the house. Jim Bob followed.

Leonard parked in the driveway, Jim Bob at the curb. We got out with shotguns and stalked over to the front door. I hoped no neighbors were up early to see us carrying heat. I went through the carport, unlocked the door, went inside. Leonard came through the back door, Jim Bob through the front.

We looked through the house. Leonard went to check on the cookies. They were intact. No one appeared to have been there beyond the three we had nabbed, and they had never made it beyond the front porch, the yard, and the carport. So far so good.

I relaxed and gathered up a few clothes and toiletries, simple stuff, and put them in a suitcase. I went into the closet and stepped up on the stool there and opened up the little trap to the attic, reached around until I found the two revolvers I had there. I always had a scattering of guns around due to the fact that Leonard and I had made a few enemies over the years. The ones in the attic were clean guns, not traceable, and if we used them, they would be tossed. There was ammunition up there, too.

I pulled a pillowcase off a pillow and slipped the guns inside of it. They would leave an oil stain on the pillowcase, and Brett would give me hell, but right then I couldn’t worry about that. I gathered a couple books off my nightstand, a Bill Crider Sheriff Rhodes mystery I was halfway through and a book by Lewis Shiner I had been meaning to read. I went to Brett’s side of the bed, and out of the nightstand I got her Kindle and charger. I gathered up some DVDs and stuck those in the bag. I could just have gotten the porch swing in my suitcase I could have a home away from home.

Downstairs I found Leonard brewing coffee. I sat the suitcase and the pillowcase full of guns by the couch. Jim Bob was helping himself to eggs and bacon in the refrigerator. I showed him where the frying pan was, and he went about frying us up breakfast.

I tossed some bread in the toaster, then went upstairs again, sat on the bed, and called Brett on my cell.

When she answered she sounded like a sleepy bear. I realized then just how early it was. “Sorry to wake you,” I said. I gave her a quick rundown on things, asked that she and Chance hang tight where they were, because we’d all be moving to a safer place late morning or early afternoon. I told her she might as well tell Chance what was going on but to keep details down to a minimum. She deserved to know what kind of mud she was in just by possibly being my daughter. That alone might send her packing. If she was my daughter I didn’t want that to happen, though it might actually be a hell of a good choice, blood kin or not.

“I might wait awhile on that,” she said.

“You be the judge, hon.”

“Being in love with you certainly never gets boring,” Brett said.

“I could actually use a little boring,” I said. “Chance?”

“I think I love her and wish she was my daughter,” Brett said. “Though she knows more than I ever wanted to know about James Joyce.”

“I’ll have a stern talk with her and give her some Steinbeck.”

Finished with the call, I went downstairs and ate breakfast with the guys. Every now and then I got up and looked out the window. Still no bikers. It was beginning to rain lightly.

Jim Bob said, “If they come, my thought is they’ll show up in the dead of night. They like to do that. Cover of darkness; unsuspecting, sleeping prey. I once heard there’s an hour of night when even watchdogs aren’t very alert. I think it’s something like three or four in the morning. I doubt that’s true, but I’ve heard that.”

“Me and Leonard won’t be here for them to sneak up on.”

“Thing to do is let them sneak, but be prepared,” Leonard said.

“Too many of them,” Jim Bob said.

After eating, I wanted to sleep, but that wasn’t in the cards right away. I had two cups of coffee, went upstairs, showered, and put on clean clothes while Leonard did the same in the downstairs bathroom. Jim Bob was sitting with his revolver on the table when I came back down.

“No ninjas showed up?” I asked.

“Nope.”

I looked out the kitchen window. Still raining. It was a light and simple rain, but steady. I liked a rain like that. I liked to sleep to the sound of it. No thunder and lightning, just rain. Right then I so badly wanted to go upstairs and go to bed.

"I'm heading home now," Jim Bob said. "Putting the Red Bitch in the shop. Then I'm going to nap and find that barrel racer and show her a few tricks that don't involve barrels. I'm a phone call away."

"You've already done a lot," I said.

"I have, haven't I?"

Leonard came around the corner then. He wasn't wearing a shirt or shoes. Just blue jeans. He may have gained a few pounds, but he still looked like he could turn over a truck, fuck it in the gas tank, and make it raise his gassy children.

Jim Bob shook hands with us and left.

35

We drove over to Leonard's place. I waited outside in the car in case any baddies appeared. After a while Leonard came downstairs carrying a small canvas bag with clothes and such in it.

At the cop shop we met up with Marvin, and then we led him out to the bikers' lair. I like to think of it that way. A lair. I've read far too many Doc Savage books.

Behind Marvin came a few unmarked vehicles and some guys in a couple of Humvees and a green pickup truck, probably army surplus. German Shepherds were in the truck bed. The dogs, with their tongues hanging out, looked like they were going to the dog park.

The lair was easier to find in the day. When we got near it, Marvin pulled over, and the Humvee pulled up on the passenger side. Leonard rolled down his window.

"Go in and check it out, Billy, and don't get shot," Marvin said to the Humvee driver, who had gotten out and was leaning on Leonard's door, looking in through the rolled-down window.

"Yes, sir," Billy said. He was a stout man, probably in his forties, who had kept himself in shape. He had a series of small moles along the side of his nose that resembled stair steps leading to his forehead. He had the air of someone who could take care of himself. My guess was he had actually been a soldier and had probably seen some action. Then again, maybe he was just constipated and wanted to go home.

Leonard explained where the place was and how to finish getting there. He told him where the dog bodies were as well. Billy got back in the Humvee, and away they went. We let the two Humvees move ahead, the pickup truck following. The dogs looked happy. They didn't know they could be shot.

We waited where we were until we got a radio message from Billy.

There wasn't much to it. Happily, it was anticlimactic. They found most of the bikers sleeping around the remains of the tire fire and in the trailers like a bunch of kindergarteners who had played too hard and had gone back home and were taking their naps. There wasn't any resistance. They had used their energy chasing us.

Cops had a warrant, so they searched the place good, found meth and meth-making supplies. They found a lot of weapons and ammunition. When they went out to the place in the woods where the dead dogs were, they found Samson on the pile. Regime change had taken about one evening and possibly part of an early morning. Sentimentality was not strong among that biker club. In that crowd you're the head badass until you aren't.

At some point, whoever took over decided they had chased us enough and it was time to start fresh. They hadn't even so much as thrown Samson in the ditch before they got high on their own product. As an old gray-haired addict called Two-Toe George told me and Leonard once, "When you start wanting meth more than you want pussy or a rib-eye steak, then you know you got, like, a serious fucking drug problem."

Two-Toe George was a philosopher. He was, as you might expect, short in the toe department, having cut off a chunk of his right foot with an ax while trying to smash a snail with it. He said he did that when he was high. Was certain right then that the snail was actually a spy machine made to look like a snail, that it had cameras and was watching him.

Turned out it was just a snail. But the loss of those toes put Two-Toe on the clean-and-sober chart for three days, and then he went back on the meth as soon as he could. Couple years later, in a scummy motel outside of Lufkin, Texas, he put a cheap automatic he had used the day before to rob a gas station of sixty-five dollars and a Peanut Pattie to his head, told the whore he was with he could bounce a bullet off his skull, and said he'd like to show her. He proved in a split second he could in fact not bounce a bullet off his head. It blew his brains all over the motel wall. The whore stole his meth and was caught four days later by the cops trying to sell her three-year-old child for a fix.

Fortunately, the addicts the whore tried to sell the child to weren't as far gone as she was, and they turned her in. The child went to Texas Child Protective Services, and she went into the system, was probably making license plates or such somewhere in a big concrete compound with guards all around.

More cops arrived. Two of their vehicles were large vans. They put their captives in that and drove them to the police station. The guy with the missing kneecap was still alive, and nobody else had died from the car collision, though the woman who had done the nice cartwheel had a broken arm and a broken ankle. She was so high she was feeling no pain. Billy said she tried to get up and dance a step or two to show she hadn't been using. Her ankle cracked, and down she went. She and a few others got a ride to the hospital.

When we were back at the cop shop we didn't go inside. Marvin thought it best we not see any of the bikers who might have seen us.

"Doing what I can to slide you two out of this," Marvin said. "Here's the address where you're going to be. Bring Brett and Chance there as well."

"What about Frank?" Leonard asked.

"We decided no cell for now. We got her tucked away in a nice little apartment with a twenty-four-hour guard. Next thing is to figure how much of her story is true and how much is bullshit."

"Quite a coincidence that Weasel, who helps people create new identities, is also the guy who helped Jim Bob create one."

Marvin nodded. "As I've said before, coincidences do happen. I can live with that if the rest of Frank's story checks out."

As we drove away, I called Brett, told her to stay where she was for a while and that I'd get back to her and tell her where to meet us before too long. I gave her a bit of the rundown. She took it in stride, switched the subject.

"You know what?" she said.

"What?"

"Me and Chance, we've had a lot of fun."

"That's good. What's she up to?"

"She's showering, and I'm making motel-room coffee. It smells a little like the dirty-clothes hamper. Chance and me, we just been talking, almost nonstop. It's like a mother talking to a daughter, for real. My daughter I mostly yell at and try to tell her how to screw her head on straight. Chance, she's got some emotional wounds, but overall, she's okay. Shit, Hap. If she isn't your daughter I'm going to be disappointed. I think there may be a real monkey wrench somewhere in her path."

"You explain to her about what me and Leonard were doing?"

"I decided not to even play with that idea. Not just yet, anyway. I'm working up to it. Thing is, it's hard to explain what you do."

"She doesn't need to know all the gory details," I said.

"Sandy? Anything?"

"Nothing, really. That girl disappeared off the face of the earth."

"More likely she is in the face of the earth," Brett said.

"Looking more and more that way."

"Shower has quit running. I'm going to let you go. Call me when you're ready for us to come home. I think I can keep us busy for a while. I like spending money."

I rang off.

"You're already starting to look like a concerned parent," Leonard said.

"Think so?"

"Oh, yeah. You want that girl to be your daughter, don't you, brother?"

"I think I do."

"Family isn't always about blood. We prove that."

"Yeah, we do. But it would be cool if she was. I think she may be someone special."

"You can help her, kin or not," Leonard said. "Shit, man, that's what you do, help people."

"So do you."

"Yeah, but except for a chosen few, I don't really like them."

"There is that," I said.

The phone rang. I looked. It was Brett again.

I answered it, but it was Chance, not Brett.

"Hey," she said.

"Hey yourself."

"Last night we bought some animal crackers out of the motel vending machine, a carton of milk. It made me think of you. I enjoyed our talk."

"Me, too. I don't remember what we talked about, except animal crackers, but I enjoyed it, too."

"We talked about music and warm milk," she said.

"We did at that."

"I just wanted to tell you about the animal crackers."

"Yeah, well, that's good. I'm glad you had some more. Watch Brett, though. She'll eat them up."

Chance laughed softly. "She is so cool."

"Tell me about it," I said.

"You go on and take care," she said. "I'll see you soon."

"Sure," I said, and she rang off.

Leonard looked at me. "I think I detect a mist over the eyeballs."

"Fuck you."

"A tremble of the lips."

"You heard me."

"She's your daughter, can she call me Uncle Leonard?"

"She can call you Uncle Asshole. That would be more accurate."

"I like it," Leonard said.

"Listen," I said, changing the subject. "Maybe we ought to go back and see if Weasel really left town. He might be still hanging around."

"Why would he?"

"Because he may never have been under threat like he wanted us to believe. He and Frank may both be in on this deeper than they admit. Weasel wanted that thousand, told us enough to make us happy to let him have it, but maybe he knows a lot more. Like who this Canceler actually is."

"All right, then. Let's saddle up."

36

Weasel's place hadn't been urban-renewed since last we saw it, and no volunteers had dropped by to brighten it up with fresh paint. The bottom part of the duplex still had the windows knocked out. Weasel's car was still parked where it had been before. It hadn't been detailed. It looked like the same piece of shit.

We put on cloth gloves we kept in the glove box, which was a swell place for them, went up the stairs again, and leaned on the door. It was still locked. There were windows on either side of the door. We tried them—Leonard one, me the other. They both slid up.

I looked around. There didn't seem to be anyone watching. In fact, there didn't seem to be anyone around at all. It was like it had been last time. The whole area looked abused and then forgotten. The morning light didn't freshen it any.

I climbed through the window I had opened, and Leonard went in through the other. We both had handguns.

The house smelled stale from having been closed up, and it was hot because there was no air-conditioning—no electricity, in fact. It had that odd feel you get from an empty house. Then again, that didn't mean it was really empty. We went through the house with our guns and looked around. There was one very nice room with a bed in it and a computer on a desk, and there was a laptop in a case by the closet. I opened the case up and looked at the laptop. The closet was full of clothes. The desk drawer had a number of flash drives in it.

I joined Leonard in the kitchen. We looked in the refrigerator. There was food in there, lots of it. Of course, he decided to leave, he could have abandoned the food. But his clothes and the laptop? The place wasn't much, but it was clean. I hadn't expected Weasel to be a good housekeeper.

We sat at the kitchen table, having helped ourselves to cold diet colas from the fridge, our guns on the table.

"Could be the computer is here because he's coming back," Leonard

said.

“Maybe it’s like I thought. He isn’t really on the run. But then again, I get a feeling he hasn’t been here in a while, so I’m starting to shoot down my own theory. But if he did run, would he leave the computers? They’re the tools of his trade. Or at least part of it, creating identities. He’d make a false one for himself and not leave anything behind that might incriminate him if the cops came looking.”

“And maybe he writes letters to the editor on one, watches porn on the other.”

We drank the diet colas and took the cans with us, trying not to leave any DNA around that might come back and bite us on the butts in the future.

Outside on the landing, our pistols tucked under our shirts, we pushed the windows closed, went downstairs. We were about to get in the car when something struck me. I turned and looked at Weasel’s junker and that black piece of cloth hanging out of the trunk. I was thinking I knew what that cloth belonged to.

I pointed it out to Leonard, said, “I got a shitty feeling.”

In the back of my car is a tool case with tools I mostly don’t know how to use, but there was one thing in it I could handle. A crowbar. I could break an arm and I could jimmy a lock with it. After the hammer, it was my tool of choice. I got the crowbar and Leonard looked up one side of the street and I looked up the other.

Nothing but a black cat crossing the road. I thought it might be the same cat that Leonard had told to clean up the bottom of the duplex the first time out.

At Weasel’s car I stuck the crowbar under the edge of the trunk and tried to pry it. Leonard said, “You’re being so goddamned delicate you’re making me nervous. Give me that.”

He took the crowbar and rammed it into the crack of the trunk near where the black cloth dangled and sort of squatted as he pulled down on the bar like a handle. There was a snapping sound and the trunk popped open and out of the trunk there came a smell that once you smell it you never forget it.

There was the rest of the black cloth. It was part of what Weasel had been wearing the day we saw him. A loose black shirt. Weasel didn’t really look much like Weasel now. The heat and time had done some work. He was lying on his side away from us, but his head was turned as if he were trying to look over his shoulder, and his mouth was open. There were teeth missing. One of his ears had been cut off. I could see that his throat had been cut. His pants were pulled down to his ankles, and one knee was lifted slightly. I had an idea that if we were to roll him over and look he'd be missing a set of balls.

"Well," Leonard said. "He's had a bad day."

"Yep."

"Seems he wasn't making that stuff up about the guy who cuts throats with a wire and takes balls away with him. He really should have left town sooner."

We closed the trunk and put the crowbar back in my car and looked around. Still nobody. Even the cat was long gone.

We rode away.

37

The address Marvin had given us for the safe house was on the edge of town, and just five years back would have been in the country, but the town had spread out and almost met it. Few more years and it would be part of LaBorde. But for now the little yellow house was off the highway and down an asphalt road, set back off that by a long gravel drive that ran straight up to the house.

There was a faded gray garage separate and near the house, and the garage door slid up to let cars in and had to be opened by hand. Inside there was room for two cars. We opened it and parked the car inside but left the garage door up. Across the asphalt road was a large pasture with a big barn on it. It was worn and made of logs and the logs had began to rot; it was for the most part a full structure, though there were gaps in its side and you could see hay stored in there in bales.

The house was small and untidy. The living room had a saggy paisley-covered couch and one fat matching armchair and a coffee table with so many coffee rings stained into it it almost appeared to have been designed that way. There was a small TV on a stand. It was an old-style TV. The face of it was about the size of a microwave oven. There was a DVD player stacked on top of it. A wire ran from it through a gap in the wall. Apparently we had cable.

The kitchen smelled of old grease, and the floor was covered in cheap yellow linoleum with blue flowers and some long-ago stepped-on cockroaches. When we walked, something sticky on the floor grabbed at our shoes. The linoleum was curling where it met the kitchen cabinets. The cabinets were stocked with quite a few canned goods, and that was swell if you wanted to eat beets or green beans, because that's all there was, except for a can of cranberry sauce with the berries in it. There were blue plastic plates and jelly jars to drink out of, and the kitchen drawers were stuffed with utensils, including a few plastic forks and spoons. There was a kitchen table with a series of mismatched chairs drawn up around it.

I sat on the couch, and the cushion sagged. I called Marvin, told him what we had found at Weasel's place and that he ought to get over there while there was evidence to get.

Marvin sounded worn-out and anxious and was in no way pleasant.

"I told you to go to the safe house," he said.

"We're here."

"Now you are. You had suspicions, you should have called and told me. I could have checked out Weasel's digs myself. What the fuck, Hap?"

"No one knows we were there," I said. "Though we did pry the trunk with a crowbar."

"Damn it. Don't mention you were there or that you pried anything open. That part will be marked down to a worn-out trunk that popped open. You wipe prints?"

"Duh. We wore gloves."

"Actually, that was pretty good detective work. Don't tell Leonard I said that."

"Leonard, he said we did some good detective work."

Leonard saluted.

"Funny," Marvin said. "Go to bed. We'll discover Weasel on our own."

There were two bedrooms. Leonard was quick to choose the larger one and make camp. I slung my overnight bag into the other one, pulled the blinds to keep out the morning light. I climbed out of my clothes and into bed in my underwear. I lay there and listened to Leonard snoring across the hall. I had meant to close the door but had been too tired to do it. I thought I really ought to get up and do that. That was going to be my next move, but to do that I first had to open my eyes and will myself out of bed. I was seriously planning that when I fell asleep.

Late afternoon we were up and dressed. We split the can of cranberry sauce, said to hell with all this sneaking around, and drove to town. We do not follow directions well. I remember my kindergarten teacher telling my mother, "Hap would do very well if he could just learn to follow directions."

And I remember my mother sighing and saying, "Tell me about it."

We bought a large cardboard container of coffee at Starbucks as well as a quickie breakfast of eggs and bacon inside what might have been an English muffin and drove back to the safe house and ate and sipped our coffee. When we finished, I called Brett. She answered on the first ring.

"How are you?"

“Peachy,” I said and gave her a rundown.

“You had quite a night. I can tell by your voice that you’re not quite right.”

“I saw a person shot, some people hit by a car, blew a man’s kneecap off, was shot at, a lot, was chased by thugs, scolded by Marvin—unfairly, I think—and me and Leonard found Weasel dead in the trunk of his car stinking to high heaven. And the toilet here is small and rocks when you sit on it. So the usual.”

“Sorry, Hap.”

“My own fault, getting into shit like this.”

“So nothing on Sandy?”

“Zip,” I said. “I get to thinking she might be out there, alive, hiding somewhere, or maybe just a stack of bones and rotting clothes under a rock, and mostly what we do is ride around and shoot at people and take a regular shit.”

“There’s not much else you can do, Hap. It’s been some years since she disappeared. And if she’s dead, and I don’t mean to sound cold, but what’s the hurry?”

“If she’s dead,” I said.

“What do you think?”

“That she’s been fertilizing the soil for some time, but I don’t want to think that. What if I’m wrong, and she’s in some hellhole being forced to whore out? Maybe they’re doping her, hurting her. I think about it too long I feel sick to my stomach.”

“I know how you take things to heart,” she said, “even when it’s not your fault and there’s nothing you can do about it. You can only take it a day at a time, love.”

“Look,” I said, “I think you should stay where you are. There’s not enough room here, really. And I think it’s best we just stay separate for now. Can we afford for you to stay where you are or someplace similar?”

“For a while,” she said. “Then we’re going to have to make new plans. And Chance, she doesn’t know about all this, not the real inside scoop, anyway. But she’s no idiot. I can’t find my way into ‘Daddy is back home shooting the kneecaps off bad guys and breaking legs with crowbars, so we have to stay away right now.’”

“I assume she is not in the room with you.”

“Downstairs having breakfast. She thinks we’re just spending time at the hotel because you’re having the house sprayed for termites.”

“That was your story?”

“I thought about telling her you and Leonard had been quarantined for bubonic plague, but that seemed a little extreme.”

“You told the right lie. You know this means we are no longer empty nesters. We have a dog and maybe a daughter.”

“At least it isn’t Leonard. I say that with love.”

“Damn. I didn’t even think to ask I’ve been so preoccupied. What about Buffy?”

“Right here beside me. We got her from the boarder, brought her back here this morning. We couldn’t leave her, Hap. She is really doing well. I think hotel life agrees with her. They not only allow dogs here, they have dog treats and doggie beds and a place outside for them to poop, provided you clean up afterward. This is a life Buffy could become accustomed to. She seems to like watching cartoons.”

“Sounds fun.”

“It is, but what I’m thinking is maybe we should get out of East Texas for a while. I’m thinking up a big lie to justify that, and I may be getting one cornered. I’m going to lay it on Chance when I get it worked out. I have to tell her something. Say I was planning a vacation and she ought to go with me, all expenses paid as long as they aren’t large expenses. I think I can talk her into that, justify it with some bullshit. But Hap, she isn’t stupid. The girl is smart. She’s going to know I’m telling her shit don’t smell when it does. It might take a little time, but she’ll come to it.”

“If anyone can sell her on a line of shit, it’s you.”

“I’m not sure that was a compliment. You know, Hap? I really, really like her.”

“I don’t actually know anything about her. I want to like her.”

“You can’t help but,” Brett said. “I’ll be devastated if she isn’t your daughter. She’s a buddy. We have so much in common, and she’s so young to be such an old soul.”

“Or you’re a young soul,” I said.

“Aw, how sweet. I like that. Baby, I feel like I’m running out on you. Taking a sabbatical during a time when you need me there with a shotgun and some face paint. I just don’t know what to do with Chance under the circumstances. I don’t mind putting my ass on the line, but not hers.”

“You’re making the right choice. Let her have some time when she’s not scuttling to survive. Daughter or not. You like her, that’s enough. And there’s really nothing you can do here. To be honest, I’m not sure there’s much further we can go as far as Sandy is concerned. She dead-ends at the dealership.”

“So you want to throw in the towel?”

“Just because I don’t think there’s much further we can go doesn’t mean I’m smart enough to quit.”

“You’re a terrier, and Leonard is a pit bull.”

“Technically, I think pit bulls are terriers, too. Leonard is waving hello.”

“Wave back. And let him have his cookies, and don’t get killed, okay?”

“Not in my plans,” I said.

“Tell Leonard I said to watch after you.”

“He always does.”

38

I guess we had been at the safe house about a week when things changed. Brett was traveling with Chance and Buffy on some of our money stash, and I had been keeping in contact with her on a daily basis. She said Chance had never been out of East Texas, except for Louisiana, and was having the time of her life. She said this as if she and I were great world travelers.

They did a tour of Sun Records in Memphis, went to Nashville for a few days, and were uncertain where they were going from there. Thing was, they had to come home sometime because the money would run out. It might not be so bad now. The bikers were still in the can. Frank was stashed away somewhere, and if she were able to give a bit more insider information than she already had, she might do a lot less time, not that she deserved less. Jim Bob wasn't off the hook altogether, and neither were we, but so far we were still footloose and fancy-free.

I called and had our mail and newspapers held until we were ready to pick them up. I wondered if Chance's DNA test was in the mail. I was almost afraid to find out. The door at the office had been fixed, but except for the workmen who had been out to do the job and our dropping by quickly to check on the door, we had mostly laid low at the safe house. As for leads on Sandy, we were out of ideas.

We were sitting on the porch in lawn chairs, letting the hot air settle on us, trying to figure what we were going to do next, when Jim Bob showed up. He wasn't driving the Bitch. He came in a late-model black pickup truck. It looked like a lot of trucks. Nothing fancy. No dice hanging from the window. No plastic Jesus. No curb feelers. He parked in the drive in front of the garage.

He got out and came across the yard. "Qué pasa, motherfuckers?"

"How'd you find us?" Leonard asked.

"I'm a detective. Don't be silly."

"Marvin told you, didn't he?"

"I was smart enough to ask, wasn't I?"

“For a moment I thought the safe house wasn’t so safe,” Leonard said.

“I’m sure it isn’t,” Jim Bob said. He came up on the porch and sat on it with his feet on the steps. The gray boots he wore had blue stars sprinkled over the toes. His snap-pocket cowboy shirt was blue as well. He took off his hat and placed it on his knee.

“So far no trouble,” I said. “And we’re ready to go home.”

“You might want to hold up on that one,” he said. “Unlike you, I haven’t been hanging out on the front porch of a supposed safe house eating cookies and drinking coffee and playing with my pecker.”

“We have neither coffee nor cookies,” Leonard said.

“Guess not,” I said. “Leonard ate all the cookies and drank all the coffee.”

“I drank coffee because we are out of Dr Peppers.”

“Well, we do have peckers,” I said.

“You got some news?” Leonard asked.

“Well, me and the barrel racer broke up. I had too much stamina.”

“That’s your news?” I said.

“No. I been researching our hired killer with the comic-book name—the Canceler—and I been looking deep into the car company where Frank worked. I have friends in the FBI, some others on the edges of organized crime, and a few snitches I wouldn’t call friends but I would call reasonably reliable. I been putting together quite a résumé.”

“Where is it?” Leonard asked.

Jim Bob tapped his head with a finger. “Right’cheer. That car company has its main hub in Fort Worth, but its tentacles stretch all over the place. Houston. Austin. Dallas. There’s one in Tyler and one in El Paso. There’s one in Denver, Chicago, Los Angeles, and a number of other places. LaBorde must have been a long shot for them, but then again, they’ve been here for a while, so they are doing well enough. Most people here don’t have money, but the ones who have it really have it, and some of the ones who have it really want cool cars and women and long trips to Italy. Course, they didn’t know being blackmailed came with the deal.

“As for the Canceler, well, he’s supposed to have killed a lot of folks in a lot of places, people who seem to have something to do with the car company. Clients turn up dead, maybe because they wouldn’t pay or got sideways with the companies. Maybe they threatened to go to the police or were going to testify. I don’t know the reasons, but that’s fair-enough guessing. Also others that may or may not have bought cars but were internal problems or external problems—snoops. Weasel would be a prime example. I heard about him, by the way. He sure could build a good website."

"Marvin told you?" I said.

"Yep."

"Sandy could have been one of those snoops," Leonard said. "And she might have paid for it."

"A cog in the wheel that didn't quite fit. Don't know yet. But the thing that doesn't add up, when I started looking at all the similar killings my FBI buddy let me in on, is the timing. Too many killings too close together, happening in too wide a range to be one person. There's a crew. Have guns, will travel. They operate to create this idea that it's one deadly bastard, but it's several mean-ass bastards. They get paid well to do what they do and to make it scary. That way, word gets around, especially to the underworld: you don't fuck with the dealership, because if you do, you get whacked and lose your balls. It's all been men they've whacked that I know of, but maybe they just aren't as theatrical with women. Sandy, for example. Which may be why she hasn't turned up. Thing is, they fucked up by being too generous with their killings. That way, cause of times and locations, we know it's not one killer, it's several. And from what my friend at the FBI says, sometimes it's several of them on one job. Inside sources think it's eight people, and they think they know who the eight people are, but they won't get nailed because the FBI has contacts in the organization that are helping them out."

"It's like Frank was saying," Leonard said. "They let some bad people go to nail other bad people."

"Yeah," Jim Bob said. "It's fucked-up, man. I always say when the law breaks the law, there isn't any goddamn law. I don't care who they're nailing: if there's stuff going on as bad as what they're focused on, it's still bad. For them it gets down to closing high-profile cases. At the moment, bunch of dead rich guys, or a bunch of dead thugs that were going to challenge the company, are no skin off their asses if they can nail some others more easily. That fake money-laundry business, for one. That's just folks being set up by the bad folks so they can turn them in and get paid, and paid a lot. I told my friend this, the fed, and he says, 'We know. But it's easier to nail the money-laundry folks, even if they're innocent, than a bunch of bad motherfuckers that will kill you.' "

"Damn," I said.

"Our friends in the government," Jim Bob said. "Tomorrow the worm may turn, but right now the feds are getting what they want out of the deal. In the long run, even if they turn on these guys, they'll end up letting most of them go, giving them new identities and hiding them in the witness protection program. That could mean the Cancelers, too. It's less embarrassing for the FBI that way. They don't have to admit they been ignoring crime to catch crime. Of course, these guys, they get new identities, and pretty soon most if not all are back at their original business, and it becomes even more embarrassing for the feds, so they got to continue keeping it under wraps. Deeper they get into this, the more desperate they are to hide it."

"That is fucking wrong," Leonard said.

Jim Bob nodded.

"Knowing that and changing it are two different things. Thing is, the car company is vengeful, and since their cheap biker help blew the job, well, they'll send someone from the crew, or all the crew. The Cancelers, if you will. Local law enforcement will suddenly find their hands are tied, at least where it would matter to us. The feds will put the pressure on them. The bikers will get tossed into the deal as patsies and serve time, but the real big wheels, they'll keep on turning, and so will their hit men, ones who grease the wheels for the real owner, who seems to be our Barbecue King."

"So it's just a matter of time before the Cancelers know where we are," I said.

Jim Bob made a clicking sound with his tongue.

"It's possible we might negotiate our way out, say we're going to hang up investigating Sandy. We could be put with the right people to have that meeting. Kind of a catch-and-release program, but then again, you have to know they might catch and not release."

"You know us better than that," I said.

"I do. You're not smart enough to quit."

"And besides," I said, "we slither out of the deal for now, who's to say they won't come back later and whack us just to make sure?"

"My thoughts exactly," Leonard said.

"And mine," Jim Bob said.

"So what do we do?" I said. "Wait until they decide to hit us?"

"That could be an idea," Jim Bob said. "Thing is, it could be any time. Now. Tomorrow. A month from now. What we got to do is prepare, and then we got to annoy the shit out of them until they come out of the dark. Or find a way to take the fight to them."

"The Barbecue King?" Leonard said. "We brace him."

"That's a good idea," Jim Bob said. "Go to the top."

“That will get the shit stirred, no doubt,” I said. “But we do that, and there really are eight of those guys, then we got to consider all eight might come after us at once.”

“Three into eight goes how many times?” Leonard said.

“It goes badly,” I said.

“We need a crew,” Jim Bob said. “I’m sure we would do just fine, the three of us, but I don’t know about you guys, lately I get a little more tired than I used to.”

“Me, too,” I said.

“Not me,” Leonard said. “I can fight all day and fuck all night.”

“Sure you can,” Jim Bob said. “But maybe we ought to put this crew together anyway.”

“I have an idea or two,” I said.

“Good,” Jim Bob said, standing up, talking as he walked toward his truck. “Me, I’m going to venture out into the wilds, fearless and handsome. Strong and noble. One man alone against the elements.”

“So what’s that mean?” Leonard said.

“Figure we’re in for a long haul, so I’m going to go buy some groceries and such. I’m not back in a couple, three hours, you fuckers start looking for my balls. If you find them, find me next. I’ll need them back.”

39

I gave Cason a call.

“Hey,” he said. “I been researching the shit out of things. Or, rather, I got a friend here at the paper who has. He’s like a computer wizard. You know what he figured out?”

“That there is more than one killer?”

“There goes my news.”

“Weasel’s dead,” I said.

“No shit? Damn. I didn’t like him and can’t say I miss him, but I got some good information from him. I had already sort of cut him loose, though, knowing he was planning to move. Guess he didn’t do it soon enough.”

I told him what we knew about Weasel. “That’s not for public consumption, but in time it can go into your article, leaving me and Leonard out of it.”

“Who’s going to believe an article about a league of assassins?”

“I don’t think they’re quite that impressive. Eight guys who kill people is all they are.”

“That’s pretty impressive.”

“It’s presumptuous, but me and Leonard want to set things right.”

“No way that can ever be done,” Cason said.

“Not completely,” I said. “But in increments. I’m tired of not sleeping in my own bed. I’m tired of being nervous. I’m tired of Brett being gone on a permanent vacation until this is over. I want my life back. We need to put together a crew to help us get things straight.”

“That won’t be me. I did a thing not long back for an old army buddy, and it wasn’t a thing I wanted to do, but I went against the grain and did it. I’ve had enough. But I know a guy who lives for this stuff. He throws in with you, long as you don’t fuck him over, he’ll stay until things are done. Someone else comes along next week, hires him to whack you, well, he might just sign up. You can never tell about Booger.”

"Booger?"

"What he prefers to be called. And believe me, he is a booger."

"I can't promise money."

"Can you promise bloodshed?"

"Most likely, but if I find a way to do it without killing, that's the route I'll take."

"Just so you know, he's violent, efficient, but hard to manage. Kind of guy you don't know much about, because there's not much for him beyond the moment. He only likes a few people, and who knows? One day he might get out of bed, have a tough bowel movement, and decide to kill everyone in the house. With him it's like playing Russian roulette with a one-shot revolver."

"Don't sugarcoat him so much."

"Oh, actually I am sugarcoating him."

"Well, we're not looking to have someone to do the dishes and macramé sweaters."

"Good thing. You want me to call him?"

"Yeah. I'll chance it."

"Let me know where you're staying, and he'll come. I'll be with him, but I won't stay. Later, don't say I didn't warn you."

When we rang off, I turned to Leonard, said, "We got one more."

"I know of another," Leonard said.

40

Couple years back I started getting cards from places in Italy. I knew who was sending them. I only knew one person in Italy. The cards were random kinds of cards. Christmas, birthday, get well, Halloween, all manner of things. There was a stack of them. There were no notes in them. Only a single number. Except the last card, which read: IF EVER.

Me and Leonard drove to my house and parked boldly in the drive and went inside. Leonard stood near the front door while I went upstairs and climbed on a footstool in the bedroom closet and removed the little door there that led up into the crawl space. I still had a few cold guns and some ammunition up there. There was also a small metal box. It had those cards in it with the random numbers. I carried it to the bed. I removed the cards from it. I looked at the envelopes and laid them out by date. Then I took each card out of its envelope and lined up the numbers by dates. I had figured out months ago what they were. If you arranged them in order, then put Italy's country code in front of it, it was a phone number. Plus the card that said: IF EVER.

Brett knew about them and knew what they were. She didn't like it, and I said I would throw the cards away, but I didn't.

I used a pad and pen by the bed and wrote out the complete number and put it on the night table by the bed, sat on the bed, and used the home phone to call the number. It rang for a long time. A machine picked up. The words were first in Italian. I had no idea what was said. I kept listening. Then in English. "Dry cleaner's. Leave a message." It was one of those mechanical female voices, robotic and clear.

I said, "It's if ever," and hung up.

I tore up the number I had written out and tossed it in the trash can, put the cards back together, placed them back into the metal box, and put it back where it belonged. I went down, said to Leonard, "Now we'll see."

"All right, then," he said, and we left.

41

When we got back to the safe house Jim Bob was inside making lunch. He had cooked steaks and baked potatoes and had bought all the goods that go with them. He had bought a six-pack of Dr Peppers for Leonard, two jugs of unsweet ice tea, and a six-pack of Lone Star for himself. He had bought an apron and was wearing it. It had writing on it where it draped over his chest. The writing read: KISS THE COOK.

Over lunch—which, I might add, was well prepared—we told him we had one thug lined up for sure and a professional who might come on board.

“That makes four, maybe five,” he said.

“I want to talk to the Barbecue King first,” I said.

“To rile him?” Jim Bob said.

“Maybe.”

“What I’d suggest heavily is that if we want to take the fight to them, let’s not just march up to his house and start some shit. If he’s behind this, and it looks like he is, he might have a little army at his command. There’s the eight guys, but then there’s the Barbecue King’s own guys.”

“Technically he doesn’t run the barbecue business anymore,” Leonard said.

“Beside the point,” Jim Bob said. “He’s rich. He’s powerful. He owns the car company, and that means he runs the illegal side businesses, which will make him cautious in the extreme. Guys like that, they are always scared, because there’s always someone looking to take over, and frequently they plan to do it by giving their rivals a nice vacation, so to speak. Give me a few days to do a bit of surveillance. I’d rather do it alone. Easier to hide one than two or three. So in the meantime, hang out and stay cautious.”

* * *

After two days a small four-door white pickup pulled up out front, and a man got out on the driver’s side. He was tall, dark of skin, but it was hard to get an ethnic take on him. His head was shaved and shiny. He could have been black, Samoan, American Indian, or maybe even Asian. Probably all those things. He was wearing a tight white T-shirt that showed he worked out. He wasn't bulging with a lot of theatric muscle but instead was lean, had a boxer's build. He was carrying a compact leather bag. He moved like a cat.

There was a man on the passenger side, and he got out. It was Cason.

It was just me and Leonard in the house. We were in the kitchen looking out the window at their arrival.

"Looks like Cason has brought us the cavalry," I said.

"Looks like one big asshole to me," Leonard said.

We went on the front porch as they walked up. The big man moved as if well oiled but not in any hurry. He had the languid but somehow threatening stride of a tiger. When they were standing at the bottom of the porch, Leonard and the big man took to eyeing one another immediately.

"This," Cason said, "is Booger."

"How you fuckers?" Booger said. He had a sweet baritone voice that might have encouraged his mother to have enrolled him in the high school choir.

"Us fuckers are fine," Leonard said.

Booger gave him a Cheshire Cat grin.

"Where's Jim Bob?" Cason said.

"Out," I said. He had, of course, been gone a couple of days, and we hadn't heard a peep yet.

"How about all us fuckers go in the house?" Leonard said.

Booger made with his Cheshire Cat grin again.

We went in the house, and Booger went straight to the refrigerator and looked inside. Leonard had been doling out his Dr Peppers since Jim Bob brought them. There was one left. Booger grabbed it and swigged about half of it down instantly.

Leonard looked at him as if he had just taken a shit in the middle of the floor.

I touched Leonard's arm casually. He turned and looked at me.

"Son of a bitch," Leonard said.

Booger swigged more of the soft drink, wiped his mouth with the back of his hand, said, "What was that you said, Leroy?"

"Leonard," Leonard said. "I said, son of a bitch. That's my Dr Pepper."

"Not anymore," Booger said. "Maybe I can save you a swallow."

"I'm the only bad nigger drinking Dr Peppers in this house," Leonard

said.

“Now there are two bad niggers,” Booger said. “Though, technically, I’m as much of this as that. I’m what you might call a mutt. More of a junkyard dog, really.”

“That’s not what I was thinking of calling you,” Leonard said.

“Come on, guys,” Cason said. “I’ll buy more Dr Peppers.”

“A case,” Leonard said.

“A case, then,” Cason said.

After a while Cason went away, left Booger with us, and let me tell you, there was one big draft in the room when he departed. Partly it was due to how Leonard and Booger felt about each other, but it was more than that. Booger was like a slice of cold shadow.

Late afternoon we fixed supper, sat and ate at the table. I said, “Booger, we’re glad to have your help, but the pay sucks. Meals and this roof over your head and a chance to get killed.”

“I won’t get killed,” Booger said.

“You know what we’re up against, or may be up against?” I said.

“Cason told me.”

“Maybe eight guys, and who knows, it could be more.”

“That’s all right.”

“Course, we got to find them. It may take time.”

“I got time.”

“We’ll have to fix you up with some guns.”

“Got my own equipment.” Booger looked at Leonard and smiled. “When’s Cason bringing those Dr Peppers?”

“You know,” Leonard said, “one day you’re going to pull on the wrong rope, and it just might be tied to me.”

“Wouldn’t that be delightful?” Booger said.

“Maybe less so than you imagine,” Leonard said.

“You look to me, both of you, like you might be getting a little past it.”

“There have been various opinions on the matter,” Leonard said. “The ones who held your opinion lived or died to regret it.”

Booger grinned, leaned back in his chair, said, “You going to make coffee, Happy?”

“Hap,” I said. “And you can make your own damn coffee.”

“You old men watch football?”

“Not really,” I said. “But there’s a TV here if you want to watch it. Keep it turned down, though. I plan to read.”

“I hope you plan on being alert,” Booger said.

“How alert are you if you watch TV?”

“I can hear a dog taking a dump in the yard and watch TV at the same time.”

“And leap small rivers and buildings at a single bound, and you’re half horse and half alligator,” Leonard said.

Booger gave Leonard a cold smile.

“You know,” Booger said, “I killed my mother and fucked her dog, and her I liked.”

I wasn’t sure if he was kidding.

Leonard said, “Yeah, but what if it had been a Doberman, smarty-pants?”

Booger delivered his cold smile again.

After a while Booger padded lightly into the living room and turned on the TV. He found a sports channel and watched an old classic football game.

Me and Leonard went out on the front porch. We sat on the steps and watched the day grow gray. Leonard said, “I don’t like him.”

“If he’s as bad a dude as Cason thinks, as Booger himself thinks he is, we are going to need him.”

“What if he isn’t?”

“Then he’ll get himself killed. Does he make you nervous?”

“No,” Leonard said. “He irritates me.”

“Sure,” I said.

“Okay,” Leonard said. “A little.”

“What makes him scary is that he doesn’t seem to really have anything or anyone inside that shell. He’s here so he can kill someone, and that’s it. Maybe some odd loyalty to Cason. But in the end, it has nothing to do with setting things right. It’s a whole different country where Booger dwells. My guess is he isn’t all that different from those we have been calling the Canceler. They’re serial killers who have made killing their profession. Slight bend in the road, and Booger could be one of them.”

“I believe that,” Leonard said.

“Believe he killed his mother?” I asked.

“No,” Leonard said. “Well, I don’t think so. He might have fucked a poodle, though.”

“Do you believe he can hear a dog shit in the yard from inside the house while watching TV?”

Leonard gave me a serious look. “Can’t everyone?”

42

The days were hot and the nights were warm, but in the house around Booger there was a coolness stronger than the air-conditioning. Sometimes Booger decided to talk, and he talked at random about all kinds of things, sports and such, and he loved to talk about dead things, and things he wanted to make dead, and it was a long list and seemed to be made in order of desire.

We had one CD that Leonard had brought with him, and we played it on the laptop I had brought with me. It was Restless by Kasey Lansdale. Booger took to playing it more than us. He played over and over one cut in particular. “Sorry Ain’t Enough.” I wondered if those words meant something to him. I doubted he was sorry, but I figured anyone who had done him wrong, at least in his eyes, could never be sorry enough to please him.

We hung out like that for three more days, growing nervous about the wait, and me and Leonard growing nervous because of our companion. I could hardly sleep at night for worry Booger might get bored and decide to kill us in our sleep. But on the last of those three days of waiting, midmorning, Jim Bob showed up.

When he saw Booger he did a kind of double take. “Who’s this? The fucking golem?”

“You can ask me,” Booger said. “I know all about me.”

“Okay,” Jim Bob said. “Who the fuck are you?”

“Booger.”

“Ah, well, that clears it right up,” Jim Bob said. “And I don’t like the way you’re looking at me, asshole.”

“The hat and boots, you look like one of those little dolls you buy in Texas souvenir shops,” Booger said.

Perfect. Jim Bob and Booger, like Leonard and Booger, were already in love. Soon bloody kisses would follow.

“I’ve known you a few seconds, and I wish you dead,” Jim Bob said.

“You can’t imagine how important being liked is to me,” Booger said and showed that smile again.

“Son, you maybe ought not mistake a rattler for a king snake.”

“Here’s a little conversation starter,” Leonard said. “Booger here killed his mother, who I think was a mountain lion, and fucked her poodle, who I actually think was a stuffed plush toy.”

Booger and Leonard did a stare-off. I could see this was not going the way I wanted.

“We’re all on the same team,” I said. This was kind of like that lame invocation “Why can’t we all just get along?”

Leonard spent what seemed like an eternity trying to stare down Booger. Booger didn’t even seem to notice. He yawned.

“Again,” I said. “Same team.”

“Yeah, well, same team or not, right now, since I’m the one with the information, I’m the goddamn quarterback,” Jim Bob said.

“Call the play,” I said.

“You sure this fucker is okay?” Jim Bob said.

“You can depend on me,” Booger said.

“Cason vouched for him,” I said.

“Don’t let us down, kid,” Jim Bob said. “You turn out to be someone doesn’t know the difference between diarrhea and hamburger gravy, you may not only get yourself killed, which I can live with, you might, most importantly, get me killed, and that would be a fucking loss to the world, I guarantee.”

Booger’s face was a blank.

“According to Cason, he’s done stuff,” I said.

“All right, then,” Jim Bob said, and he finally quit glaring at Booger. “Here’s the score. I got our Barbecue King’s schedule down. He’s got a couple of bodyguards, which tells me that any doubts to the contrary about him not being into some shit other than barbecue royalties can be tossed. If you’re just making money off a barbecue deal you don’t need thugs.”

“There are just the two?” Leonard asked.

“From what I can figure. You wanted to talk to him, Hap, and I think that’s a good idea. As far as a squad of hit men, I got nothing out of my surveillance. Not that I expected them to all be hanging out at his house eating free barbecue and swapping recipes for making their own ammunition. I only got his schedule down for a week, but it seems pretty rigid. He gets out and about some, but it’s the same thing over and over, and then he stays home a lot. I watched his house for so long I began to know the birds that were sitting on the telephone wires and named each and every one. The house has a very tall fence around it, but if you drive up Livery Drive and park up there, you can look down over the fence. Nothing odd seems to be going on, but then again, not every week is going to be go-daddy time. Here's the thing, though. Every day he goes to a Japanese restaurant to eat sushi. I guess he's had enough barbecue to hold him. Doug looks to be in his fifties, good shape, gray hair. Looks like a retired businessman. Polo shirts and dress pants and comfortable but expensive shoes."

"How would you know a good shoe from a bad shoe?" Leonard asked.

"I know lots of things," Jim Bob said. "Thing is, I think the best time to brace him without everything going Sam Peckinpah is to catch up with him at the Jap joint."

Nice. Jap joint.

"The bodyguards don't even go inside. I don't think he's really worried about anyone wanting to snap his ass, and that makes me wonder about some other things."

"If he's actually connected to all this?" Leonard said.

"Maybe he just thinks he's invincible," Booger said.

Jim Bob gave Booger a stare. There was a lot of malice in that look. It didn't change Booger's demeanor at all. He could have been talking about gutting someone or going out for an ice cream.

"All right," I said and looked at my watch. "He eat at noon?"

"For whatever reason he's at the restaurant twelve-fifteen on the dot. I watched him go there every day. One day I went in and ate not too far away from him. He sits by himself. He has his phone with him, and he puts it on the table, and now and then texts or e-mails on it. He takes his time. He's there at least an hour, sometimes longer. I think it's kind of a temporary office. He finishes, pays his bill, goes out to the car, where the two guys are waiting. They drive him home. Actually, once in a while it's just one guy. Like I said, the bodyguards seem more out of habit than need. Like he's keeping up appearances. I haven't got that figured altogether."

"I think it's best I go see him alone," I said. "We don't want to overwhelm him with numbers."

"You know what you're going to say to him?" Jim Bob asked.

"It'll come to me."

"All right, but one of us, at least, ought to be nearby," Jim Bob said.

"That'll be me, of course," Leonard said.

"All right, then, you watch his back, and me and Booger will not be far from there, a phone call away if it comes to that. There's a Burger

King just down the road."

"I don't like fast food," Booger said.

"Then order a fucking salad," Jim Bob said, "or just hang over a soda. I don't give a shit. Anyway, things go bad, you got Leonard, and all he has to do is have a text prepared and punch it. We'll be there in two or three minutes. I think the two of you can probably handle two or three minutes."

"I doubt it will turn ugly, not in public," I said. "I like bearding him in one of his neutral dens, so to speak, see if it causes him to get the hit crew stirred and moving in our direction. That will be our chance to clean out that nest, provided it comes to that."

"It better," Booger said. "It was a long drive from Oklahoma."

"We only go code red if we need to," I said.

Booger grunted.

"And somewhere in all this," Leonard said, "I hope to figure out what the hell happened to Sandy."

43

We arrived at the restaurant at straight-up noon in my car, but with Leonard driving. Actually, we parked down from the restaurant a ways, but we had eyes on it.

Leonard said, “I hate waiting around.”

“Me, too.”

“I’d rather have to fight and mate with a wild tiger in a ditch than just sit around waiting.”

“No tigers in a ditch for me, but I do hate waiting.”

“If you didn’t have to fight the tiger, but just mate with it, how would that be?”

“Female tiger?”

“In your case, yes.”

“Count me in.”

“You know, Hap, I think we ought to smother Booger in his sleep. He doesn’t seem trustworthy to me.”

“I haven’t seen that he sleeps much.”

“Every time I get up to go pee, I see him sitting up in a chair with the light on. Reading books you brought. He always smiles at me. He has a creepy fucking smile.”

“We may in fact be getting old. We’re sleeping, he’s watching.”

“You got a point there,” Leonard said. “I sleep light, but I sleep. He seems like a fucking machine.”

“What he is is a sociopath. Cason said as much, and I guess he’s as close as Booger’s got to a friend. I think he seems odd because he doesn’t quite understand human discourse. I think when he gets our goat, he believes he’s being pleasant or friendly. He doesn’t really know what that’s supposed to look like.”

“Jim Bob, like us, he’s been around, and when he was talking to Booger the other day, talking tough, you know what I thought I saw?”

“A moment of hesitation.” I said.

“Like maybe the tiger saw the elephant.”

"Thought I saw it, too. Thought I saw the same thing in your eyes a couple times."

"That was a trick of the light, buddy boy, nothing more," Leonard said.

"All right, then. But I assure you, he makes me a little weak in the knees."

"Hey, that may be your man."

A black SUV pulled up in a parking spot near the front of the restaurant. A big man with black hair who looked like he lived in a gym got out on the driver's side, stepped to the back driver's-side door, and let a man out with stylishly cut gray hair. He was slim and wore blue dress pants and a lighter blue polo shirt. I didn't notice if his shoes were expensive or not, but they were black.

He went inside.

I said, "Okay, heads up, brother. I'm going in."

I got out and strolled along the sidewalk to the Japanese restaurant and went inside. The place had a few scattered customers. The waitress, an attractive Asian lady, asked me how many.

"I'm joining a friend," I said and nodded toward the booth where Doug Creese, the Barbecue King, sat.

"You're the first."

"How's that?"

"You're the first to ever sit with him."

I walked over and sat down in the booth across from Doug. He looked older close up. There were lots of lines in his face, and his mouth drooped at both corners. He studied me for a few seconds.

"Do I know you?"

"No, but I thought you might like to."

"You're not selling insurance, are you?"

"Depends on how you look at it."

"How should I look at it?"

"Like I'm here to save us both a lot of problems."

"Yeah?"

"My name is Hap Collins."

"I know of you."

"Really?"

"Yeah. I hear you're a cracker that runs around with some queer nigger named Leonard and you think you're a tough guy and he thinks he's tougher."

"That's us. And by the way, he just might be tougher."

“I haven’t got any business with either of you.”

“Then how come you know who we are?”

“I hear about you because I’ve known some people who know of you. The name stuck with me. Hap. Unusual. Hap and Leonard. I remember that.”

I nodded.

“Word is you own a car lot downtown, the fancy one.”

“That’s the word, huh?”

“Yep. And word is you don’t just sell cars. You sell pussy, too, maybe dick, and you like film, especially ones where someone with money is caught naked with his pecker hanging out and a prostitute dangling on the other end.”

“You heard that, huh?”

“I hear, too, when people cross you, there’s these guys known as the Canceler, except there are several—eight, I believe—and they get a ticket to kill, and then they get paid really well for it. That’s what I hear.”

“You’re hearing from all the wrong people.”

“Am I, now? Funny. No matter what we hear, it always comes back to you.”

The waitress came over.

Doug gave his order. I told her I’d have the same. I said, “I’ll even pick up the bill.”

She went away.

“You’re ruining my lunch,” he said.

“What I’m doing is telling you that I’m not going to stop what I’m doing, and the people I have with me are not going to stop, either, and we are going to put holes in anyone who wants to cut off our balls or any variation thereof that leads to any of us being dead in any manner, shape, or fashion or, for that matter, just made unnecessarily tired.”

“You should do that. It’s got nothing to do with me.”

“I’m also saying the only thing we really want is to find a lady named Sandy Buckner, and if we can do that, we can save a lot of trouble, because if we know what happened to her, where she is, or where what’s left of her is, we’ll take our toys and go home.”

“How nice.”

“We think so. We wouldn’t want to mess up your lunch routine by you being dead.”

“You threatening me?”

“I’m telling you how it might work out if you start the ball rolling.

But on the other hand, you don't want to cooperate, I got one guy with us who will kill anyone for anything and skull-fuck them. Hell, he scares me."

The waitress brought us both unsweet ice teas. I reached over and got an artificial sweetener from the rack on the table, tore it open, and dumped it in my tea. I stirred it with the straw.

"Collins, I'm tired. Real tired. I just want to spend the rest of my life being comfortable. I don't want any shit. None."

"We're in the same ballpark."

"No, you have on the wrong uniform and have showed up for the wrong game."

"Have I?"

"Listen. Ten years ago I'd have been all over this. I'd have wanted war. I'd have had so many men and resources at my service you'd be dead by the time you left here to get in your car. Your car would be dead. I'd have it shot in the engine block. I'd have your house burned down and your plumbing dug up and have your shit shot, turd by turd."

"So what's wrong now?"

"I'm retired."

"That's lame."

"I didn't choose retirement. I was forced into it. The car lot—I don't really own it. Haven't for years."

"I'm not sure I believe that."

"Believe what the fuck you want. It's still in my name, but own it? Only on paper. It and damn near everything I ran at one time is no longer mine. I had a good business; some of it was legit. I made good barbecue. You know, I don't actually own that anymore, either. I get some payments, a percentage, but I sold that off. I sold it off so I could retire, and I got paid good to let the car lot stay in my name, but I don't make money off of it anymore. I'd like my name off, but part of the deal was it had to stay attached, at least as the owner. That keeps the real owner at a distance. I'm a fucking lame duck in an orthopedic shoe. I can still quack, but I got nothing left to quack about."

The waitress came over with our lunch. It was sushi and California rolls. It looked good. I asked for a fork due to the fact that I might put my eye out with chopsticks. She went away and came back with a fork. I thought she looked a little disappointed when she gave it to me.

I reached for the soy sauce.

"Put some wasabi down first, spread it around, mix the soy in that, gently, and then dip the food in it. It gives it real taste."

“I’ve had it before,” I said.

“Yeah, but you don’t know how to eat it. It’s a one-bite thing, you know that? Though it should be done with chopsticks, because a fork gives it a funny aftertaste. Stir it around in the stuff, and then eat it.”

“I appreciate that,” I said, “but I kind of had another conversation I was interested in. One about you not owning anything anymore.”

He ate a piece of sushi. He put his chopsticks down and sipped his tea. He said, “I got drummed out, and if you got a beef, it isn’t with me. I can tell you some things, though, things that might even help you, and I don’t mind doing that. I got my own ax to grind. That said, I ask you to keep me out of it.”

This was an interesting turn of events.

“All right,” I said. “Tell me some things that might help. I’ll decide if they do.”

“I’m a king without country, Hap. I still got a big house and nice cars and some money, good money, but I have about as much power as a toddler. I’m almost in prison, you want to know the truth.”

“I been to prison once. I didn’t care for it. Comparatively, what you got isn’t nearly so bad.”

“That’s because you don’t have what I have. And in fact, guy out there in the car, he’s my bodyguard in name, but not really. He watches me. He sees you in here, well, he could make trouble for you.”

“I got so much trouble now that adding to it doesn’t matter much. Besides, there’s someone out there watching after me who might as well be named Trouble.”

“You are in deeper than you even imagine, and you still haven’t got a clue what’s going on. I think you think you have a clue, but you don’t.”

“Are you going to enlighten me?”

“I’m trying. Just listen. Don’t talk, don’t answer unless I ask you something. Just listen. Let’s start with Sandy Buckner. Few years back she went to work for me. I had the car company, and I was peddling tail on the side, and she comes in wanting to work for me. Talks to Frank first.”

“That right?”

“Yeah. You know Frank’s a split stump?”

“Heard that.”

“Frank tells me about Sandy, cause then I was boss. Called the shots, hired the help. Frank tells me there’s this girl I might like to hire, a real looker, and I set up an interview. Sandy’s well turned out. I don’t trust her at first. Did a bit of research, like I always did. She had a journalism degree, and I'm thinking she might be playing Brenda Starr, Girl Reporter. So I take the position that I'm interested, but she's got to give me a sample of the goods. I'm thinking this might be the breaking point, that she won't let the beaver loose if she's just there to do an exposé. I mean, sure, she could not care, but it was one way to test. Not definitive, but something. She did me more ways than I thought could be done, and hell, I was running a high-class whorehouse. Still, I was cautious. Time passes, a year or so, and she does her job well, and I think she's all right. Next thing I know there's some guys come to talk to me, my own guys. They say, 'Hey, we're going to put you in more of a consulting position.' My own fucking business. I hit the roof, of course. Consulting? Who the fuck are you? Well, know who they were?"

"How many guesses do I get?"

"The new owners. They didn't buy shit, but they had someone who invested a little money in the right place to get the right guys interested, some real hardware slingers from Houston. They got businesses all over the United States and overseas."

"You got steamrolled."

"That's right. Sandy had some money of her own, quite a bit of it, I think, and she goes to these guys, says she's investing. Besides money, she offers something better, says she's got all the inside dope on the business. And she did. She had done her fucking homework. She tells them she can go wider, spread it overseas.

"Turns out, too, she's been doing this blackmail thing, and she tells these Houston guys, these bent-nose motherfuckers, they can do what she's doing on a wider scale, cause they got some real dough to expand. They dive in, and all of a sudden I'm sitting home with the cold fucking north wind whistling up my asshole. They pushed me out and told me to eat shit and call it caviar."

"Sandy did that?"

"Goddamn right. She is one smart hot-ass bitch, and she screwed me not only on the couch in my office that time, she screwed me over and took my business. Went to work for these Houston turds. Bottom line, I was out, she was in. That's when this Canceler crap got started."

He paused, ate a piece of sushi, put his chopsticks down, and drank some tea.

"Woman you're looking for, she's the fucking mastermind. She doesn't call herself Sandy anymore. She's wheeling and dealing. These guys, these hit men you got the fancy name for, I think they're all kin. Brothers, cousins. Maybe there's some friends thrown in. And Sandy expands the business with them. Used to be one guy, or maybe it was two. I'm not sure, but pretty soon it's a family business for a family of fucking psychos. I've done my share of things, Collins. Or had it done. Some bad shit. I knew it was bad shit when I did it, but I didn't lose sleep over it. It was business."

"Well, then, that makes it just fine," I said.

"Don't even know I disagree with you. Being away from it, I got to say, what the fuck was that all about? I started out selling my dad's barbecue and peddling used cars, next thing I know I'm in the sewer without any hip boots."

"I doubt that was an accident of nature."

"I'm not asking for pity. I come from a family that was so poor the soles of their shoes were the bottoms of their feet. I come from ignorant shits, and my old man was the one taught me how to be crooked. But I was better at it than he was. I got some education and I got some plans and I got rich. I liked being rich. I'm still well off, but I haven't any power, and these bodyguards, they don't give a flying wet sausage in a whorehouse about me. Long as I keep it simple and don't go much of anywhere without them, don't try to take the business back over, they're all jake with me. I had that business back, you know what I'd do? I'd get rid of all those high-end cars and go back to selling Chevrolets. On a bad day I'd sell a Ford. I'd quit running poontang, and there wouldn't be any blackmail. I know it's rare and hard to believe, but I've grown a conscience."

"I think what you've grown is desperate."

"Have it your way."

"So Sandy, she runs your business now?"

"What I said, and someone runs her business. The Houston people. But here's a bit of a rat turd in her soup. What she don't know is I got some records that I kept, old-school, on paper, and I got that and I could maybe cause her a real pain in the ass I was to give it up to the law. It's stuff happened under my watch, but now she'd get asked about it, long as someone knew to ask her. She could have me whacked at any time, though. I expect it every day. One day I go to eat sushi, and instead I'm in a lake somewhere and the fish are eating me. It could happen. Truth is, you sitting here could cause me serious problems. Bodyguards have got more lax in the last few years. They're not right on me like they used to be, but I don't want them to think I'm spilling out of school."

"But you are."

"Suppose I am. Thank God they don't like sushi, which is why I eat here. They're the greasy hamburger types. They think class is what they attended in school. If they went."

"Are you offering this information to me? Sounds like it."

"I'm looking to get out of this trap, but I'm not giving anything to anyone with those hit fucks out there."

"The Cancelers?"

"Who else? Yeah. Them. Listen to me. What I'm thinking is you want what I want."

"Not exactly," I said.

"Yeah, but you want it close enough it works for both of us. What you want is to take their bad asses down. The real ones. The ones that really own the business. Sandy, too, and the ones they hire for the big kill jobs. Start with the teeth, the Cancelers, and you get rid of a whole lot of their bite."

"They'll just buy implants, new killers."

"Not if you go after the teeth, then get them while they're nothing but gums.

"Let me tell you something, Hap. I heard through the grapevine about the biker screws you messed with. I heard that from someone who's part of that club, one of the few spies I got left out there. He's damn near worthless to me, really, but now and again I get some news because he wants some money. He said three guys came down on the whole fucking club and shot the shit out of them and ran over some of them with a car. He said two of those guys were you and this Leonard Pine."

"That sounds about right," I said.

"Who's the third guy?"

"You don't need to know."

"They said Frank was there and you came and got her from them."

"Right again."

"You trust her?"

"No."

"Good."

"But she gave us a bit of information. Some of it would groove nicely with what you're telling me. Some of it. I think Frank might have a way of dressing up things so that it's all in her color. Know what I mean?"

"Frank is an opportunist. She didn't mind I got skunked and Sandy took over and that the Houston people took Sandy over. Long as she has a job and the money comes in, she's hunky-dory with it. Don't start thinking she's got a conscience."

"No need to worry," I said.

"And Sandy, that bitch, she doesn't get her clock cleaned, another five years and she'll be running the Houston group, you mind my words."

I thought: damn, if he's telling it true, I've found Sandy, but Lilly Buckner will not have the cockles of her old and somewhat creaky heart warmed by my discovery. The thought of that made me feel deeply disappointed, as if I had somehow expected something different from the human race.

"Thinking about what you did to those bikers, and you coming here to talk to me, bold as the pope in his underpants, it's got me thinking you might can find a way out for me."

"Does it?" I said.

"It does."

Doug leaned out of the booth and looked outside. I looked, too. His so-called bodyguard was in the front seat of the car with his head thrown back and his eyes closed.

"See?" he said. "Something happens to me, no one's crying. But if you were to get rid of those hitters, then I'm not scared of who else they might bring. But you see, the cops, they can't protect me from those Canceler motherfuckers, because cops and feds, they're all entwined. Some of those Cancelers might just walk into the police station and shoot hell out of everyone while the cops are busy trying to open a box of fucking doughnuts. But if the Cancelers are gone, I would start to believe I can be protected long enough to squeal like a dying rat. I got stuff the feds would want. More and better than what they're getting now. I got about twenty years' worth of material, a lot of it on the Houston guys, the ones who have their peckers in most of the serious moneymaking crime in Texas, might be something the feds would trade for. I used to deal with the Houston assholes all the time, but they didn't own me until Sandy came along, the crafty cunt."

"So what you're saying to me is I should see that the Cancelers are canceled, and then you'll come forward and pin the tail on the donkey?"

"That's the size of it."

"How do I know if I get rid of them you won't just go back to doing what you were doing before? Laying low and having sushi for lunch?"

"Because I want a nice witness relocation by the sea somewhere. Hell, I'd settle for the high desert, fucking mountains. I just want to start over and live the rest of my days reading books and pumping some good-looking widow with grown or dead children. Preferably the latter. Saves money at Christmas."

“If I were to think this was a good deal, where would I find these Cancelers? How spread out are they? Where would I locate Sandy?”

“Sandy works out of Houston. She goes by the name Florence Gale. There’s some humor in that name somewhere. People she works for, the Houston crowd, they’ve done her up right. Got her named changed, given her a nice clean business front that hides the dirt under her fingernails.”

He reached out and touched my hand. I wasn’t expecting that.

“Do this for me, get rid of these Cancelers, then I’ll help you, and that will pull Sandy into the light. I’ll take my chances with the feds.”

I eased my hand away from his, leaned back in the booth, fastened my eyes on him.

“Let me explain something to you, Barbecue King. We do this, and then you welch, you won’t be doing any better than before, cause we’ll have to come see you. Understand?”

“You’re able to take out the Cancelers, then I figure you can take out me. I haven’t any reason to play you.”

44

They are believed to be of one family, and their father was a man named George Greely," Doug said.

George Greely. It came back to me. He had been in the news some years back and is now part of criminal history as well as criminal legend, but not for being a mastermind—simply for personifying evil in human form.

George Greely had been in the military, and according to all the psychoanalysis by people who knew something, or people who knew nothing but thought they did, all the editorials and comments and news reports, Greely was the kind of guy that should clear your head from thinking everyone in uniform, or that's worn a uniform, is a hero. The military suited him because it gave him structure. Something he hadn't had early in life, as his father died when he was two and his mother left him to a couple who in turn gave him up to a orphanage. He became a bully, taking out all his anger for being abandoned on anyone smaller than him. He was a giant of a man, tall, with a barrel chest, dead-white skin, shark eyes, and a thick gray beard. I remembered seeing his photo in the newspapers.

When he left the military he lost his structure and tried to re-create it for himself with rigid rules about what he ate, when he ate, how he slept, and so on. He'd sleep on the floor with the window open in winter with nothing but a thin blanket over him. He read the Spartans did that, and it made them tough, and that's what he wanted to be, a kind of Spartan.

He married a woman he could control. Told her what to wear and how to talk and who to talk to, kept her from using makeup and perfume, even body deodorant. Showers were once a week and don't waste water and to hell with soap.

Greely finally decided she didn't need to talk to anyone but him, period. He isolated her on a farm outside of Crockett, Texas, away from everyone, and there over the next thirty years he built a junkyard and scrap metal business. He and that poor woman had a passel of kids. Greely had kids not only by his wife, but in time, by one of his own daughters. Pretty soon this compound he made of mobile homes linked together was surrounded by a concrete-block fence ten feet high with barbed wire at the top. His land was a hundred acres bought when land was cheap, and five acres of that was Greely compound central.

Later, when they came to take away the bodies, they determined from survivors, cause there were a lot of children there, that the daughter Greely had a child by had managed to move out of the compound by not coming home from school, and in time, a year or so later, word drifted down to him that on the outside she found a boyfriend. Greely felt like a jilted lover and coaxed her and her boyfriend to the compound with promises of money and a slice of the land.

They showed up, he murdered them, and killed two of his older children just for sport while the others scattered like quail. He put their bodies in a pit that was beneath an outdoor privy. He then drove into Crockett with a plan to kill anyone he saw. His first pick was a police officer. Greely's gun misfired, and after a ferocious fight, in which the police officer was assisted by citizens, Greely was arrested and taken away.

Greely told his story in a matter-of-fact way, and the papers were full of it for weeks. He mainly talked about guns and large knives and how he loved them, how he knew things that others didn't, had some direct insight with God. He said God told him to do what he did, and no matter what man's law was, he was right with God. God was testing his faith, same as Abraham and Job.

Bottom line was, some few years later the state of Texas gave him a hot shot. But the family, mostly boys, a few girls, survived. When the news lost interest in them, they slipped into obscurity. According to Doug, the Greely survivors had not learned a damn thing and had taken up their father's habits of incest and fanatic gun and sharp-weapon love. Children were born between daughters and brothers, and they were raised in Greely's unique way, out there among the junk in the compound; it was a family tradition.

In time most of the folks in the compound drifted away, a few died there. That left seven or eight boys. The number varied, depending on who was telling the story. No one knew much about them after that. The Barbecue King knew more than most, because he knew about the Cancelers, and he knew some of the people who hired them. They were all Greely men from early thirties on up. They had found their niche. In time they became the go-to boys for the Houston crew, the Dixie Mafia.

They were perfect. They killed as much for love as money, and they were isolated out there on their land, inside their compound. No one knew what they did or how they lived, because no one was allowed out there, and there was very little contact between the general population and the Greely clan.

“You know something about Greely,” Doug said, “then you know the Cancelers. They aren’t a bunch of fucking masterminds. It’s not like you could get them in a room and they could explain to you why they do it, other than for money. I would do it for money, situation was right, and I could see it as business, but not pleasure. They enjoy it. They have a need to do it. They are stone-cold killers, plain and simple. I’ve heard a rumor they’re all mute, but that could just be a story that gets told because there’s so little known about them and nothing known that came directly from them. I also know that the ones out there are the last of it. I guess they ran out of sisters to fuck. You won’t find a damn thing about them anywhere, because except when they’re on a job, they’re to themselves. You aren’t going to find some profile, or a list of crimes, because they’ve never been caught. Not because they’re so smart but simply because they know one thing. Isolate the prey and kill it, take the nut sack, leave. Here’s the good news, though. I do know this because I do get a whiff of what’s going on through my former company now and then—someone will drop something and I’ll hear it, pick it up, and tuck it away. I’m not a hundred percent isolated. Ones out there, those boys, they’re the last of it. When they’re gone the Cancelers have bought their last pairs of underwear. If they wear them.”

“You’re sure these guys are it?”

“One of the few things about them I’m sure of. As much as you can be sure of anything. I can’t be certain exactly how many of them there are, but I think what I’ve told you is more than reasonably accurate.”

“All right, then. Can you tell me where they are?”

45

With directions from my new pal Doug, me and Leonard drove out beyond Crockett, named after frontiersman Davy Crockett, who stopped there on his way to the Alamo and his date with destiny. We drove through Crockett into the boonies, where the woods grew wild. The hundred acres the Greelys owned were thick with woods, and there was one narrow dirt road that led into it. It was dark down that road, even in dead-solid daylight. Tree limbs came together from either side and knotted up with branches and leaves and made a kind of canopy over us. There was brush growing on the sides of the road, and there were long stems sticking out of the brush, waving in the gentle wind like great insect antennae.

I said, “This looks like the road to the witch’s house that Hansel and Gretel found.”

“What if it’s just a bunch of inbred motherfuckers he’s sent us out here to see? Shit stains on the ass of humanity, but maybe not killers at all.”

“Occurred to me,” I said.

“We get the gang together, come out here and kill them all, and they got nothing to do with any of this business. That would suck.”

“It would,” I said, “though I think Booger would be happy either way.”

We drove down a ways and found a gap where the local assholes tossed their trash instead of taking it to the dump. There was all kinds of rotting garbage there, including a dead white cat with its feet sticking out of a dilapidated plastic trash can crammed with all manner of stuff. Next to the trash can was a couch with springs poking through it, coiled and bobbing in the wind. There was a thin, well-worn path next to the road not too far from the trash heap, and that was the path we wanted.

I said, “Wait a minute, brother. Stop the car.”

Leonard stopped near the garbage heap. I got a shovel out of the back of the car and dug a hole by the trash can. I levered the cat out of the can with the shovel, dumped it into the hole, and covered it up.

"All done, Saint Francis?" Leonard said. He was still in the car with the window rolled down.

"All done," I said and put the shovel away.

It was midafternoon, but as I said, it seemed later due to all the tree shadows and ink-dark clouds clustering together in the heavens and showing through the gaps in the trees, threatening rain. Leonard pulled the car up farther into the gap with the trash, pulled around behind a tree. It didn't totally hide the car, but it was only noticeable if you were looking in exactly the right place.

We got our handguns, and Leonard got a pair of binoculars that were on a strap from the trunk of the car. He slipped the strap over his head and put a penlight in his pocket.

We walked back to the long road that led to the witch's house and started down it. There were NO TRESPASSING signs as well as others that said TRAVEL AT YOUR OWN RISK and one that showed a gun pointed at us and the words: WE DON'T CALL 911.

We walked a long way. Finally the trees opened up and there was cleared land. Wild grass grew on it in spurts of green and yellow as well as twisted dead, gray grass. We walked along, and then Leonard said, "Hold it. Look there."

The wind had done us a favor. It had lifted a patch of the dead grass enough that Leonard had spotted the outline of an opening in the ground. We moved over there cautiously. The dead grass had been dug out in lumps and stacked on top of a piece of thin ply board. Leonard got out his penlight and shined it into the crack. There really wasn't anything to see. Leonard found another place to duck down and poke the light. Finally he laid down on the ground and lifted the ply board slightly and poked the light in.

"There's a pit under that ply board," he said. "It's wide, and it's very deep. They must have used a backhoe to make it. I could see a bit of water shining at the bottom. My guess is that ply board is just strong enough to hold the wads of grass, but had we walked across it, it would have folded. There's a smell in the pit, like old shit. There are stakes down there, and the shit looks to be smeared on them. It was one of the Cong's favorite tricks in Nam. You not only got the spikes, but if you survived, you got a tremendous infection that worked in the long term as well as a bullet. Old Man Greely spent time in the military, maybe Nam. He could have passed that on to his family, such as they were. It's a fucking booby trap, and I'm going to guess there are others."

“They may not use the road much,” I said, “but they use it, so they have some way around this stretch of land.”

“Exactly what I was thinking.”

We went back up the path a ways, stood and looked. It emptied right into that field, and beyond the booby trap was a thick swath of trees. The path split through them and turned slightly left. There was nothing visible of it beyond that.

“Look there,” Leonard said.

He was pointing to a spot to the right of the road. There were no trees there, just tall brush, and the brush was dead like the grass on top of the ply board, touched with dust from the road in a way that made it look as if it had been sprinkled with nutmeg. We walked over and peeled back the brush and took a look. On the other side of it was a narrow road, more of a trail, really. It wound down between the brush and trees.

“They have their own secret road,” Leonard said.

We got hold of the brush and found it was all wired together and on a wooden swivel. We pulled at it, and it slid back like a door.

“Let’s do a bit of recon,” Leonard said. “But watch for booby traps.”

We found one right away. There was a wire across the trail. I walked to one end of it, Leonard to the other. There was a little wooden box on both sides. Leonard said, “My guess is someone trips this wire, the box opens, and something shoots out, backed by an explosive. It could be glass, nails—hell, anything.”

“I’m starting to get nervous,” I said.

We stepped over the wire and went along. No more traps were discovered. In time the trail wound around a large patch of trees, and then there was another clearing, and in the center of that clearing, about an acre away, was a great wall of concrete blocks, just as the newspapers and the Barbecue King had described it. A huge Dixie flag snapped in the wind above it on a tall pole made from a skinned tree.

We squatted down at the edge of the trees and studied the place.

“See those cameras?” Leonard said.

I looked and saw. They were positioned in several places along the wall.

“Think they can see us?” I said.

Leonard lifted the binoculars and studied the wall.

“They look to be pointing down. I think we got within twenty feet of the wall they’d pick us up. I can see lights mounted near them, probably those automatic things that come on when they sense movement.”

“This seems to be more complex than I expected.”

“They may be white trash—inbred, fun-for-the-dollar killers,” Leonard said, “but that doesn’t mean they’re stupid. Inbreeding doesn’t always result in people with quarter-sized moles on their faces and a hole where their noses ought to be. It doesn’t do much for emotional development, though, and it confuses folks at family reunions.”

“What’s our plan now, bwana?”

“We play Jungle Jim. You see how the woods narrows when you look to the right side of the compound fence? We ought to go that way, be in the tree line. Might be the best bet for taking a closer peek at the place.”

46

The woods was full of heat-wilted greenery, crosshatched limbs, and briars, and it was dark and deep and painful to make our way through. I was stabbed and poked, ripped and torn, and I could feel ticks and chiggers crawling on me, racing over my flesh on a mission to create a warm nest of my pubic hair.

We came to a rise in the forest where the trees draped over a hill and thinned enough you could stand in a clearing and look at the compound. The narrow trail had some deeper grooves there from vehicles going down and climbing up the hill. The concrete-block wall did not go all the way around. There was a medieval-looking gate in the side that was wide enough to let a tank through.

The concrete wall, except for where the gate was, was in the front and on both sides, but at the back there were tangles of barb wire fence fastened to metal poles. In front of the metal poles was a wide ditch, and there was mucky water in the ditch and no telling what else. The ditch ran along the back side and draped in at the corners toward where the barb wire fence met the concrete blocks.

Inside the compound we could see cars and trucks and all manner of equipment, most of it rusted and weather-pocked. There was a Ferris wheel and sections of tracks and fragments of old rides strewn all about like dinosaur bones. The sunlight sticking through the trees coated those "bones" with a blood-red sheen.

In the center of the compound, drawn in a circle, like covered wagons defending themselves against Indian attack, were a series of mobile homes, and near them was a large wooden shed. There were ten homes, and they were all connected by slapdash ply board walls, and in some cases only by porches, from one to the other. There were outhouses out back and around the circle of homes. There was an old-fashioned satellite dish weathered to the color of dirt. There were no trees in the compound, no grass, and no sign of life.

I turned around and looked behind me. More trees, but at the top of the hill and slightly to the back of it was a weather-peeled deer stand. It was set back in some trees. From there you could look down on the compound.

"We have to decide: is it over the wall or through the wire?" Leonard said.

"Wire and that ditch are a lot of trouble."

"Over the wall?"

"Ten feet is ten feet, and then there are the cameras and the motion-sensor lights."

"Thing to do, I guess, is go back and tell our bunch what we've found and put some plan in action."

"I don't see a car or truck out there that looks like it could run," Leonard said. "That may mean no one is home."

"You wanting to investigate?"

"Best to come back at night," Leonard said.

"And if there are traps out there?"

"Someone will be really surprised."

"We should send Booger across."

"I was thinking that," Leonard said.

* * *

We worked our way back to the gate of dried brush and closed it and tried to make it look the way we had found it. After walking out, we got in my car and drove back to the safe house, but we stopped and ordered hamburgers and french fries first. By the time we got back the day had mostly run its course. The safe house was dark. Jim Bob's truck was out front, and Jim Bob and Booger were on the front porch, sitting on the stoop. I wondered if there had been a moment of bonding. I dismissed that when I got up close and saw that neither was talking. Jim Bob looked unpleasant, and Booger looked bored.

"So, nice fun day?" I asked.

"Well," Jim Bob said, "it's been a day."

"You two boys been playing pretty?"

"Shit, yeah," Jim Bob said. "Me and him, we're fucking."

That made even Booger smile.

"Then there have been no harsh words, slap fights, or water spitting?" Leonard asked.

"So far so good," Jim Bob said.

"We made some hot chocolate," Booger said. He seemed very happy and sincere about that event.

“We did,” Jim Bob said. “I brought a few things in my rucksack. What you guys got there?”

“Hamburgers. A few extra if anyone feels really hungry.”

“I could lick shit off the sidewalk if there was undigested food in it,” Jim Bob said.

“This will be better,” I said, and we all went inside.

At the table, in the dark, we ate our meal without turning on the lights. Leonard told them all that we had found and what we feared about more booby traps beyond the ones we knew about. He explained that it would take some work to get inside.

“We just have to prepare for the mission,” Booger said. “Go prepared, go in quick, and then get out.”

“We didn’t see anyone,” I said. “No movement. No signs of life. Not a working car there. Electricity is probably from a generator or generators. No wires were visible outside the compound. Us not seeing them could mean they’re out on their various missions. Or on a singular mission together. Or they’re just real quiet. What I fear is that Dougie may have given me a line of manure, and they may just be a bunch of crazy fucks who like to be alone so they can diddle each other in the ass.”

“No,” said a voice from the dark of the living room. “It’s not like that at all.”

We all nearly turned the table over when we leaped up, grabbing at our weapons. A light was turned on by the armchair near the living room window. In the chair sat a fine-looking woman with long blond hair and a silver dress that fit tight and rode high on her thighs, rode low at her chest, revealing the tops of two creamy white mounds, as they used to say in the sex books. Her long, pale legs were crossed, and one very uncomfortable-looking white shoe with a heel designed by Masochist Incorporated dangled off the end of the toes of her crossed leg.

“Oh, they might be diddling each other in the ass,” she said. “But they aren’t just a bunch of crazy fucks, though they are crazy.”

She smiled. “Hi, Hap.”

“Vanilla Ride,” I said.

47

I have arrived," she said.

Her message in the greeting cards had worked, and she proved she could still move like a ghost. I wondered how long she had been inside the house, in the dark. I tried to remember if I had even looked in that direction.

Booger stepped forward, ahead of us, eased into the living room and closer to Vanilla.

"Who are you?"

"I'm the cavalry," she said.

"You?" Booger said.

"Me," she said.

Jim Bob laughed. "I know you."

"Yes, you do," Vanilla said. "Not well, I might add."

"We can remedy that," Jim Bob said.

"It's so sweet of you to think so," she said.

"You look like a wispy piece of ass, you ask me," Booger said.

"No one did," she said.

Booger was still holding the gun he had drawn, and now he pointed it at her and walked over closer. "Shit, I could jerk you up from there, pop you like a whip. Pop you so hard your snatch will snap off and smack the wall."

"So," Vanilla said. "How was charm school?"

Booger put the gun in its holster. Vanilla flicked her foot. The shoe popped off and snapped Booger between the eyes. He yelled, lunged forward, ready to grab Vanilla. She was on her feet then, one foot lower than the other due to the height of the one shoe she was wearing. She reached out and took hold of the hand he was reaching with by one finger, quickly, and made a slight movement, pulling her little finger in just below the joint that connected Booger's finger to his hand.

He hit the floor on his knees hard enough to jar John Wayne's hairpiece, and Wayne had been dead and in his grave for years.

Vanilla manipulated the finger until Booger, who was trying to reach for his gun with the other hand, was stretched out on his belly. He made a mewing sound that was music to my ears.

Vanilla said, “Up, up, up.”

She turned his hand over, palm to the ceiling, and that made him come to his knees. She turned slightly, putting his hand against her chest next to her throat, and pressed his finger. He came to his feet with a grunt, tried to dance around her in a circle. She went under his arm, still holding his finger, and with a twist of her wrist sent him hurtling over the couch. He hit hard on the other side of it.

When he rose up from behind it he had his gun in his hand. Vanilla had one, too. I had no idea where it came from. It was very small and shiny, and the barrel was pressed up against Booger’s forehead. She said, “I think I snapped you hard enough your dick came off, don’t you?”

“You bitch,” he said.

“Now you know my middle name. Drop your gun on the couch, or I’m going to give you a small, bullet-size ventilator shaft.”

Booger dropped the gun, and Vanilla reached out and snatched it up with her other hand. Slowly she pulled the gun back from his forehead, slipped it into the gap of the dress at her bosom. She tossed his gun into the chair where she had been sitting.

Smiling at me, ignoring Booger, she said, “Hap, honey, you have any more hamburgers left in there?”

I nodded.

“I don’t normally eat that stuff, but right now I’m hungry. It was a long flight and a long drive, and then I had to sit in the dark all by myself while you boys discussed things.”

“How long have you been here?” Leonard asked.

“Long enough. If this is your idea of security, I can tell you now, you boys are screwed, considering who you’re up against. They aren’t smart in the normal way, but they are stealthy and determined.”

“Never had anyone sneak up on me before,” Booger said, massaging his finger.

“Now you have,” Vanilla said. “And leave the gun in the chair for now, or I’ll shoot you before you can pick it up.”

Booger didn’t move.

“You know who these killers are?” I asked.

“I do.”

“How could you possibly know what we’re up against?”

“I have quite the network, Hap.”

“Baby,” Jim Bob said, “you are my goddamn dream girl.”

Vanilla gave Jim Bob one of her wide, wicked smiles.

“Girl? Girls play with dolls. I’m a woman. I play with men. I can even get them to dress up funny.”

“Better yet,” Jim Bob said.

48

Booger was out from behind the couch now, but he was moving slow. He was glaring at Vanilla. She didn't seem to care. I knew better, though. She was aware of his every move.

"You can have your gun now," she said to Booger.

He picked it up and eased it back into its place.

"When did you get in?" I said.

"A bit ago. Bad flight and bad food, and then a drive from the airport in Houston. I came by Harley-Davidson."

"We didn't hear you come up," I said.

"I know that. I hope you boys are going to perk up, otherwise the Canceler—and he is a group, which, from listening to you talk, I see you've figured out—is going to have your itty-bitty testicles for lunch."

"How long were you sitting there?" Leonard asked. "Answer straight."

"I was here before you guys came home. I was here while Jim Bob and Sore Finger were here farting about on the front porch."

"In that chair?" Jim Bob said.

"No. In the back, and later in the chair, when it started to get dark."

"Goddamn," Jim Bob said. "No one, but no one, sneaks up on me like that."

"That's what he said," Vanilla said, nodding toward Booger.

"You are one lovely, mysterious woman," Jim Bob said.

"Tell me something I don't know," Vanilla said.

"Come," I said. "Sit down at the table. You can have Booger's chair."

We all sat down at the table again, except for Booger. He came and sat on the kitchen counter with his legs hanging down. It was the first time I had ever seen him look less than confident, and maybe it was the first time he had ever felt less than confident.

"Me and the Cancelers are in the same business," Vanilla said. "Or were. I'm what you might call semiretired. We didn't run in the same circles, exactly, but our circles crossed now and then. Gets right down to it, they're nothing but backwoods rednecks who like to kill."

“You’ve done some pretty brutal things yourself,” Leonard said.

“For money. But I’m what you might called reformed. I have a new way of looking at things. Now I only kill those who need killing, or I do a few favors for friends.”

Vanilla reached out and patted my hand. God, I loved Brett, but when Vanilla did that an electricity went through me that made my pants strain at the crotch.

“How good a friends are you two?” Jim Bob said.

“Not as good as I’d like,” she said.

“I don’t get it,” Jim Bob said. “Booger you just made piss himself—”

“She did not,” Booger said.

“Leonard is queer, and Hap looks like he’s been through the mill, and here I sit, a handsome piece of meat wearing manly footwear and a cowboy crown, and you’re patting his hand.”

Vanilla grinned at him.

“I don’t understand it, either, but Hap here stirs me.”

I felt myself blush.

“And I thought I’d seen every strange thing there was to see,” Jim Bob said. “And I once saw a fellow eat a dog turd for a dollar.”

“Goddamn heterosexuals,” Leonard said. “What you guys see sexually in women confuses me.”

“It should,” I said. “But just for the record, me and Vanilla are only friends.”

“Unfortunately,” Vanilla said.

“I agree with the fag,” Booger said. “You guys are making me sick.”

“Enough bullshit,” I said. “Vanilla, you know anything about this bunch that could be helpful?”

“Basically the best thing to do is kill them all.”

“I’m liking you a little better now,” Booger said.

“How nice,” Vanilla said.

“I prefer we turn them in,” I said.

“Please, brother, please,” Leonard said. “That stuff where a guy goes into a psycho’s den and shoots the gun out of his hand and asks him to give himself up—and the guy does—is for old Lone Ranger episodes.”

“I like The Lone Ranger,” Jim Bob said.

“Yeah,” I said. “Me, too.”

“But,” Jim Bob said, “I have to agree with Leonard.”

“We saw their nest,” Leonard said. “It’s a bitch to navigate.”

Me and Leonard went on to explain in more detail about it. I drew a map on a burger wrapper, drew a kind of design of the compound as we knew it. “As for what’s inside, we have no idea.”

“Seems to me,” Jim Bob said, “the weak spot is that hill you guys said you stood on. You can see right down into the place.”

“We were thinking the same,” I said. “That would be the spot for a lookout.”

“But you don’t know that anyone’s home,” Booger said.

“We didn’t see cars that looked like they would drive,” I said. “So we figure they were out. Hell, for all we know they’re killing folks in Maine right now, packing up testicles to mail home, and won’t be back for a while. They might decide to take a holiday. It could all be futile, but it’s the only plan we got.”

“There was a big building in the middle of the compound,” Leonard said. “Storage shed, maybe, or that could be where they keep their vehicle or vehicles. They may be home and are tucked up in one of those trailers playing cards or stringing their collected testicles on strings for Christmas ornaments for all we know.”

“Hap ought to be posted on the hill,” Leonard said. “He can shoot well. He’d be best with a simple twenty-two rifle. It would do fine from that range, way he shoots. He could kill them with that, and there wouldn’t be a lot of noise. It might make it harder for them to figure where the shot is coming from.”

“It might take a bit more firepower than that,” I said.

“I can do it,” Vanilla said. “I have my own gear, including a sniper rifle. Depending on how far away the hill is, Leonard’s right. A twenty-two might be the thing. These days everyone thinks they need a rocket launcher, but it’s loud and messy and may take out more than you want to take out.”

“I bet that gear of yours was rough to bring in your carry-on,” Jim Bob said.

“I don’t carry it with me. I have suppliers in a lot of places, and I have the money to buy it. I’ll pick it up later.”

“You are so cute when you talk about guns and murder,” Jim Bob said.

“I say we lay out the plan, get anything else we might need, and tomorrow night go out there and see if they’re home,” I said. “If they’re not, we might have to regroup at a later date.”

“This is the full run for me,” Booger said. “I just want to have fun and go home. I don’t know I could stand you people again.”

“I don’t know we’d invite you again,” I said. “And if your ass feels chapped, you can leave at any time. Vanilla promises not to twist your finger and make you cry."

Booger frowned.

"All right, I'm in, now or later," he said. "Let's just do this thing."

49

We bought some supplies the next day and then rested as much as possible at the safe house, except for Vanilla, who brought out the Harley she had hidden in the barn across the way. She told us she needed to make some preparations, that she'd be back in plenty of time. She put on purple leathers and a helmet and rode into town.

When she was gone, Jim Bob looked down the road she had taken, said to Booger, "That little wisp of a girl sure made you eat shit, didn't she, big'n?"

"She surprised me," Booger said.

"That's what she does," I said. "Surprises folks. Sometimes she surprises them to death."

"I respect that," Booger said. "I made a mistake. I underestimated."

"Being underestimated physically is her greatest strength," I said. "That and the fact she's quick and smart and knows some tricks and carries a gun and can shoot the eye out of a gnat in the dark."

"And she's got that long blond hair, those sleek legs, and a face like a goddamn rodeo angel," Jim Bob said.

"You really are smitten," I said.

"One time with her would bring me closer to God," Jim Bob said. "I might even start believing."

Me and Leonard grabbed a couple Dr Peppers, went outside, leaving Jim Bob and Booger in the house. We walked across the street toward the old barn, slipped through the barb wire fence, and kept walking. We hadn't discussed doing this, we just all of a sudden did it, somehow knowing it was something we both wanted to do.

We opened the Dr Peppers and walked out to the barn, went behind it, and leaned against the old log wall and looked at the sky. It was late day, and the sun was beginning its slide to the west, like a fried egg on a tilted Teflon skillet.

"We'll be all right," Leonard said.

"Sure," I said. "We always are."

"I guess we'll be all right until we aren't."

"There you go."

"Think we can trust Booger?"

"I don't like him," I said. "But yeah. I think we can. Cason says he's reliable, and I think he wants to kill someone so bad he'll do the job. I only fear he'll want to do it too well."

"You still thinking you're going to bring some of the bad guys in and that the cops are going to go, 'Oh, sure, you went out there alone and brought them in without telling us, and we have to trust what you told us is true. We like that. Thanks, boys. You can go home now. Here's a lollipop.' "

"I just don't like the idea of shooting them down in cold blood."

"You knew it was leading to this."

"I know. But I don't have to like it."

"I don't like it, but it is what it is, and I do believe there are just some folks that need killing. You and I, this isn't our first county fair, now, is it?"

"I know."

"If I was making a list, brother, these motherfuckers would be right at the top, just under some that are already dead, like Hitler and Jack the Ripper and some that ought to be, like the Pillsbury Doughboy."

"You know I hate that doughy bastard, don't you?"

"You always say you want to take a rolling pin to him."

"I'd make cookies out of that cocksucker," I said.

"And then eat them."

"You got that."

"Vanilla, the extract, not the woman, would be added for me."

"You know it."

"We could dip the cookies in coffee."

"You know we would."

Puffy clouds were blowing across the sky like marshmallows floating in water. We watched them. I didn't say it, but I knew Leonard was probably thinking the same. What if this was the last time we ever paused long enough to study those clouds? It was an odd thought, really, because if we died we weren't going to miss them. I didn't believe in life after death, only in life, and I wasn't sure how good I had managed mine, but I liked it enough I wanted to hang on to it.

We sipped our drinks. It was really hot out there, but the heat felt good. I liked it on my face.

"In case anything happens," Leonard said, "I have a confession."

“All right.”

“One time I used your toothbrush.”

“What?”

“You heard me.”

“Goddamn, Leonard. Recently?”

“Yep. Last time I stayed overnight at your house. I wanted to clean the toilet, and it was handy.”

“Oh, go fuck yourself,” I said, and we both laughed. Right then anything could be thought funny. We leaned there for a long time and drank our sodas and watched the white clouds rolling over the high blue sky and were pleased to have a breeze come up. The hot sun felt good, but the breeze drying the sweat on our faces felt even better.

50

Vanilla came back when the long blue shadows began to crawl and there was only a strain of daylight left. She was in a black Buick Grand National sedan, circa 1980s. It roared into the drive like a lion. We all went out and looked at it. I don't really know diddle about cars, but I knew it looked cool.

Vanilla was wearing black leather pants so tight you could see the outline of a quarter in her pocket, a black shirt, black leather jacket, and tall black boots. She got out and walked around and leaned on the Buick like she was about to have her picture taken at a car show.

"Where'd you get this?" Jim Bob asked.

"Don't ask," she said.

"Stolen cars will give us an unneeded headache."

"It's not stolen," she said. "But still, don't ask."

She opened the back door and took out two large black metal cases. I stepped over and took one from her. It was light. We took the cases in the house and placed them on the couch. Vanilla opened one of them. There was a series of black tubes and truncated rifle stocks inside, along with a scope and boxes of ammunition—.22 longs.

"I brought a very large van with me from Houston. Inside is the motorcycle and this stuff. I had the car arranged for here. Stored the van and bike in town at a storage unit. The car is a 1982 Buick Grand National. Last of the good muscle cars. I hope we won't need the speed, but if we do, we're ready. I'd prefer to just kill them, drive back slow, and have a small decaf later here at the house."

"It looks brand new," Booger said.

"Freshly repainted to match the original. It has a four-point-one liter turbocharged V-six, two hundred thirty-five horsepower. Go to sixty miles an hour in five seconds in spite of its size. Six seconds is common, but this one has had some serious modifications. It also has nice cup holders. Drinks gas like a fish drinks water. But the thing we really need is the stuff in this case."

“I don’t recognize these weapons,” Booger said.

“That’s because they are special made. Not from any gun company. Light. Durable. Heaviest stuff on this trip will be the shotguns you carry. I saw them in the closet.”

“You are quite the snoop,” Leonard said.

“I like to know my surroundings. This one”—she pulled out two pieces of black gun barrel and screwed them together—“shoots a twenty-two round. Technically they have a bit more firepower due to the design of the rifle. Screw these barrels into this”—she reached in and pulled out the body of the gun, and then the stock, which was black and shortened at the back—“and you load it and go. It has a light clip, holds twelve shots. There are spare clips under the foam padding. There’s a night-vision scope that fastens on it.”

“I know what a night-vision scope is,” Booger said.

“Good for you,” Vanilla said.

“What’s in the other case?” I asked.

“My underthings and changes of clothes.”

“Can we look at those?” Jim Bob said and gave her his charm-them-out-of-their-pants grin.

Vanilla said, “No.”

51

The Grand National roared through the night, Vanilla at the wheel, me in the front seat. Behind me was Leonard and Booger and Jim Bob. It was a wide car, and there was plenty of room in the backseat, even if Booger took up a lot of it.

It was just after midnight, and we were tearing through the dark and out into the hinterlands, as I liked to think of it, where the evil bastards lived in their dark little mobile houses with their sharp little wires and their grim little thoughts. Right then, my thoughts were pretty damn grim. I thought of Brett, and I thought of Chance. I even thought of our rescued dog, Buffy. But I didn't let myself think too long.

We hummed along, and I showed Vanilla how to go. When we turned off onto the back road, Vanilla went slow. Hot summer road dust swirled in the headlights and settled on the windshield. We came to where I buried the cat, and Vanilla parked behind the tree and brush where me and Leonard had stopped before.

"Walk in from here," I said.

"Turn off your phones," Vanilla said. "Anyone gets a phone call while we're sneaking, I'll take him out. I'm not getting killed for stupid reasons. But you will."

We checked our phones. Everyone was dressed in black. Vanilla had changed the black leather pants for black leotards. They fit even tighter than the leather but were far more flexible. I know, it's sexist, but I notice that kind of thing, and just about every heterosexual male who walks the earth and isn't neutered or too old to know ducks from chickens, and some that don't, notice those sort of things. It's biology, and it's a bitch. In polite society what you say to an attractive woman who is dressed in a way that makes you understand the power of biology is, "You look nice."

Vanilla had Booger hand her the case from the floorboard of the backseat. She put her rifle together. I knew, too, from watching, she had that little gun of hers in one leather jacket pocket, and strapped on her in clear sight was another pistol, also an automatic and also made of plastic, light as a child's dreams.

We got out of the car and walked to the back and got some rolled-up thick blankets out of the car. That part had been Jim Bob's idea. It was a good idea, but I'll come to that. There was a coiled rope with a grappling hook. Booger took that and draped the coil over his shoulder. Me, Jim Bob, and Leonard grabbed the shotguns. All the shotguns had shoulder straps on them, so we slung them. The shotguns were fully loaded.

We all had extra shells. I had a cold-piece Smith & Wesson revolver with me and it was loaded and the belt it was holstered on had shells in the bullet loops, just like an old cowboy gun belt. Booger had only his bag and whatever it was he had in it.

We walked together, watching for headlights, but there weren't any. Finally we came to the path through the woods with its tight limbs and brush and went along that. Once a raccoon darted across the road in front of us and was nearly shot by all of us who were carrying shotguns. Vanilla didn't so much as quiver.

We stopped at the brush gate and looked around carefully with our penlights in case new booby traps had been placed there, but found none. We opened the gate and went through, and when we came to the wire across the path, Booger studied it with the light, went to one end and used his knife to pry the top of one of the wooden boxes. We stood there with our assholes clenched while he did this, but he knew what he was doing. He said, "The wire pulls a trigger, and it causes an explosion that launches whatever is packed in this plastic bag with gunpowder. Looks like glass and nails."

That was as I had figured.

"We can just step over it," Jim Bob said.

"Yeah, but we come back this way quick we might not want to worry about it."

"Fair enough," Jim Bob said.

Booger used his knife to gently cut the string that pulled the explosive into action. "You got to cut it smooth and without much pressure. This stuff, it goes off, it sprays like skunk stink but hurts more."

He went over and cut the cord on the other side. He tied off the cord to limbs on either side so it appeared to be rigged.

"Now, we come back through here hauling ass, forget about where this is in the heat of the moment, we don't have to worry."

"Good job," I said.

“I know,” Booger said.

We went on up the narrow trail, came to where it rode up on the hill then coiled down through a small patch of divided trees and on down to the compound. At night there were lights in the compound. They were on the wall and inside on large posts, and there was a small light coming from two of the trailers.

“Either someone’s home,” Leonard said, “or they just left a few lights on for giggles.”

“There’s the deer stand,” I said and pointed. “I can position myself there.”

“You’re a good shot,” Vanilla said, “but I have the rifle for it, and I’m used to how it works. I think that should be my job.”

I nodded. “Take it.”

“All right,” Vanilla said. “Good. Stand has a clear look down on the compound. I’ll use it as my crow’s nest. I feel like I need to come down and join you boys, I will. Otherwise, I’ll be shooting from there.”

“Well, don’t shoot us, baby girl,” Booger said.

“Baby girl shoots you, then you know I did it on purpose. I don’t miss a whole lot, not when the target is standing still and doesn’t know I’m out here, and a lot of time even if they do.”

“Holding you to it,” Booger said.

“First I need to take care of the motion lights,” she said.

Vanilla went to the deer stand and climbed up the little wooden ladder quiet and quick as a squirrel. A moment later I saw her rifle barrel poke out of a slot in the stand.

“Do you think me and her might hook up later?” Jim Bob said.

“I wouldn’t know,” I said. “Keep your mind on the business at hand.”

“I can be easily of two minds and know what I’m doing. Don’t you worry about that. Have I ever given you cause to worry?”

“No,” I said.

“Still,” Leonard said. “I worry a little.”

“Shit, Leonard. You can fold those worries into a little square and set fire to it when I’m on the job,” Jim Bob said. “You can rub my head for luck.”

“Still a little worried,” Leonard said.

Booger opened his bag, took out a sawed-off shotgun. There was a holster of sorts that he draped over his back and slipped the weapon into. He already had a Colt .45 automatic in his hip holster; it looked like a collector’s item, had pearl handles. He had a knife on his other hip, and I knew in his boot he had another. He had a pair of small wire cutters stuck in a little bag on his belt. He had a light that fastened to the top of his sawed-off. We all had that, though Booger's rig was special made; mine and Jim Bob's and Leonard's were rigged with duct tape.

Booger stood up and said, "No one leaves anyone behind. That's the military way."

"I'm not, nor have I ever been in the military," I said. "But I'm with you on that one."

I looked down at the compound and the lights around it. It wasn't that well lit, really. In fact, the center of it was dark and shadow-crowded. I thought of the compound Vanilla Ride and I had broken into once, but she had known the place, and it was more organized and easier to navigate. Down below was a pile of mobile homes and carnival junk and old cars and a lot of unidentifiable metal. It made me a lot more nervous than the other compound had.

There was a hissing sound, like an arrow in flight, and one of the lights went out, and the sound was followed by others just like it in rapid succession. The lights on the wall, and the motion lights that would come on if we came within range, were out of commission. Vanilla took them out quickly and efficiently, and she didn't miss once. It was dark on that side now, and it would stay that way.

I glanced toward the deer stand, raised a hand in acknowledgment, and then we slipped down the slope of the hill, using the road. We were about a hundred feet outside the wall when Booger said, "Hold it."

We stopped and waited. "Look out there," he said.

We looked. I didn't see anything.

"You see how the moonlight hits along that line of grass there?"

I looked and saw that there were spots of yellowed grass about ten feet apart, and the spots went on for a long ways.

"Grass is green between, but in those spots it's yellow," Booger said.

"Traps," Jim Bob said.

"Mines is going to be my guess," Booger said, "cause if you look carefully, real carefully, between each spot is a strand of wire. Can you see it?"

I saw it.

"Hit one of those and it'll pull two of the pins off, and when they explode, my guess is they're the sort that will go up and out."

"Sure they're mines?" Leonard asked.

"No," Booger said. "But sure enough."

"The wire is designed so you hit it and it tugs, it'll go. I've seen mines like it before, or similar, in war. All you got to do is not step on the cord. You cut it gently, don't tug it or push it, it'll release tension on the mines. You step on one it'll still knock your nuts up under your chin, but I'm going to slip up there and cut the cord and then we'll go through. If they're real clever, they'll have another line not far from it. That way you see one, the other one will be behind some grass, and you think you're home free, trip the second one up, and—"

"Balls under your chin," I said.

"You get the teddy bear," Booger said.

"Here's an idea," Leonard said. "Let's just go down the road."

"We could do that," Booger said. "It even seems smart, but I got a feeling that road isn't all it looks to be, either. I think you'll note there are holes in the gate, and if you look carefully, there are gun barrels poking out of the holes, and I'll assure you, they are not manned, they are gimmicked. One of them comes in, they most likely got it rigged so they hit a switch, a button, whatever in their automobile, and those guns are disarmed. Way they're set now—and again, this is me guessing, and you're welcome to walk up the road and check out my theory—but way I see it, that's how they're set. Got to be disarmed by some device that we don't have. So we take our chances with the mines. I'll do that part."

He moved then, and I started to come up behind him, but Jim Bob caught my shoulder, said, "Let him run it through. That way, we lose him, it's only one man down."

"And it's Booger," Leonard said.

"Yeah, he'll be missed all of five seconds, though we might be wearing parts of him."

"He blows up, the noise will give them a small clue we're out here," Leonard said.

"Yes, but Booger will be gone, and we'll live to fight another day."

"Good point," Leonard said.

Booger eased forward, took out his knife, and clipped a cord between two spots in the grass, then he eased forward, found another cord, and cut it.

"Damn," Jim Bob said. "He made it."

Booger stood up and waved us forward, showing us where to go between the mines he had disarmed.

We ran along then, and when we got down to the wall, Booger uncoiled the rope and tossed the grappling hook over. It caught in the wire at the top easily enough. Booger pulled on it, and the wire sagged but held. Booger took one of the rolls of blankets we had brought, tossed it over his shoulder, and started climbing up the rope. He went up it quick and silent as a hummingbird.

When he got to the top, he found a handhold without hanging his fingers up in the wire, tossed the blanket over the wire as a barrier between himself and the barbs, climbed up, hesitated momentarily at the top, then dropped to the other side without use of the rope.

Jim Bob went up next with his blanket and his shotgun dangling on the shoulder strap. He went up as quickly as Booger and put his blanket on top of Booger's to make it even safer and pressed the wire down even more, then he was over the wall and out of sight. I followed with my blanket and my strapped shotgun. When I dropped over Jim Bob and Booger had already moved on. Leonard dropped down beside me, and I heard him take a deep breath in anticipation of what was to come.

The big shed was right in front of me and Leonard. Jim Bob was moving to the left, through some cars, toward some high-rising carnival equipment and, beyond that, the ring of mobile homes. Booger was going at the homes from the other side, threading his way through rusted cars on blocks and time-crusted wheel rims.

Leonard and I darted toward the shed. I went on the right side, and he went on the left. Easing along, I came to a door, tested it gently to see if it was locked, and it wasn't. I took a deep breath and cracked it open and stuck the shotgun inside, flicked on the light at the top of the gun. There were a couple of large pickups inside, and there were shelves all around. I slipped all the way in and waited until I heard Leonard come around from the other side and across the front and over toward the door. He came to the door and in a soft voice said, "Don't shoot."

"You're good," I said, and he slipped inside.

It was a pretty big shed, and there were two wide doors pulled together at the front of it for the trucks. We looked around, and what we found made my blood grow cold. On all those shelves were a lot of fruit jars, and I mean a lot. I thought at first they held canned goods, but when I put the light on them I saw that what was floating in the liquid in the jars wasn't new potatoes or jelly. In each jar there were testicles, sometimes in the sack, so to speak, and sometimes free of it. The liquid was yellowish, and in some of the jars were thick streaks of blood. In one of the jars I saw something red and floating, like a bloody jellyfish. Up close I realized it was a red toupee. Red Mop. They had not only taken his balls but also his cheap-ass hair.

If I had any doubt that we had the wrong place and the wrong people, it was gone.

“There’s got to be well over a hundred of them,” Leonard said.

“Easily,” I said, and I could feel my skin crawling as if it were trying to tear off my bones and make for home.

We walked and looked around, me on one side, Leonard on the other, using the flashes on the tops of our weapons. There were a lot of old photos in cheap frames along the shelves. They were dust-coated and showed of a lot of people who looked alike. Family photos tucked among jars of balls. Nothing more homey and nostalgic than that. I leaned in and looked at them carefully, realized they were shots of the dead, men dressed in suits, women dressed in long white dresses, maybe the same suits and dresses for all of them. It reminded me of the old Victorian photographs of the deceased, where they dressed the recently departed up in Sunday-go-to-meeting clothes and photographed them. The Victorians didn’t think it was weird, and apparently neither did the ball snatchers.

Leonard joined me. “I think these are all family photos.”

“Yep. And all dead.”

“What?”

Leonard took the flash off his shotgun and looked closer.

“Goddamn, fuck a lame goat in the ass. You’re right. I have seen some shit, my friend, but in some ways this creeps me out more than the balls in the jars. All we need now is to come across an altar for animal sacrifice.”

“I think this is the ball-snatcher dynasty,” I said. “One dies, they have another to take over the work. I think it’s like Doug said, incest and continuation of the line. They get old enough, they move into the family business.”

“Could be more here than seven or eight,” Leonard said.

“Doug was pretty certain.”

“There you go. Doug, a fucking big-time criminal gave you the true dope, and why doubt his word?”

“Because us killing these folks is to his advantage. If he’s right, we are looking at the last of the line.”

“If he’s right.”

Leonard replaced his light on top of his shotgun.

“How do people end up like this?” I said.

“Choice.”

“Can’t all be choice. They had to have been treated like shit. They think this is normal.”

“Tell you what. We get through here, you get rested, you write a paper on it, and I'll read it while I'm scratching my balls. But since there's no one in here except these balls and some cheap photos, and since that paper ain't written, let's get down to business."

We slipped out the door and trotted smoothly toward the circle of homes.

Jim Bob and Booger were by this time both out of sight.

52

Leonard and I spread apart. I went closer to the center of the homes, where there was a sizable gap between them. Leonard started in the direction Booger had taken. I hoped to hell Jim Bob and Booger didn't shoot us. I thought of Vanilla up there in the deer stand with her makeshift rifle, and that gave me some comfort.

I cruised past one of the outhouses, and the stink was strong. I thought, who in this modern age lives like this by choice? But a better question would have been, who cuts people's throats with wire and cuts off their balls with the wire and keeps them in mason jars in a goddamn shed with pickup trucks?

I hustled on until I could slip through the gap in the circle of homes. They had plenty of ways to keep you outside, but so far nothing I had seen that would alert them you were inside. To my right I saw Booger. He was pointing at the trailer where the light burned. I nodded and joined him. The trailer's front door was on the inside of the circle. There was a set of wooden stairs, sloppily built, that led up to a wooden porch with a short roof that extended out from the trailer and over it all.

I went up first. The stairs creaked, and when I stepped onto the porch it squeaked sharply. I took a deep breath and put my ear to the door. I could hear a TV going inside. I looked down at Booger.

He came up without so much as a creaking sound. A house cat would have made more noise. He leaned his weapon against the door, got a lock pick out of his pocket, and went at it. It wasn't much of a door, and it wasn't much of a lock. It came undone as easy as a whore's bra.

Booger put the lock-pick kit away, picked up his gun, and looked at me. I took hold of the door handle with my gloved hand and turned it and went inside. It was dark inside, and I had turned my flashlight off. I slipped in and stood on the left side of the door, then decided to squat down. Booger came in and took the right. There were only two ways to go in that trailer, left or right. I went left, Booger went right.

Drifting toward the sound of the television and the weak, yellow light, I came to the section of the trailer that served as a living room, slipped through an open space without a door and into the room. The back of the couch was facing me, and there was a man sitting on the couch. All I could see was the back of his head and broad shoulders. He had long, greasy, dark hair. The little light on the left side of the room near a window, and the flickering motion of the TV, made the whole scene surreal. Worse, he was watching an episode of some fucked-up reality show.

Slipping the rest of the way in, I pointed my shotgun at the back of his head. I hadn't gone more than a foot forward when I heard a shotgun cut loose in the yard. The man on the couch stood up suddenly and turned. He had a gun in his hand. That figured. Guys like this probably went around armed 24-7. But that's all he had. He was naked except for underwear, though at that point I couldn't see his feet. He might have been wearing high heels for all I knew. He saw me and let out his breath. It sounded like a snake hissing in high grass.

"Don't do it," I said. And he didn't. He tossed the gun on the couch.

Booger came in then. "Got you one, huh?"

"Who fired that shot?" I said.

"Let's hope Jim Bob."

"Who are you two?" the man behind the couch said.

"Motherfucker can at least count to two," Booger said.

"Ease around here where I can see all of you, much as I hate the idea," I said.

He did. He was skinny and white as snow, and from what I could tell in the lamplight, his hair could have been brown or black or purple. He wasn't wearing high heels. He was barefoot. On the walls were shelves, and on the shelves were jars. I knew without examining them what was in them. They had quite a collection. There were photographs as well as a faded framed invocation: GOD BLESS OUR HOME.

"How'd you get in here?" the man said. His accent was East Texas, but it seemed of some other era, not tampered with by time and association with others. The legend they might be mutes was squashed.

"Teleportation," I said. "Lean your ass into the couch. Booger, why don't you check on who fired that shot, just in case it wasn't Jim Bob?"

Booger went away, and I heard the front door open. Me and the man in the dirty underwear stared at each other until I glanced again at the rows of jars. I said, "You couldn't just buy a few knickknacks?"

The man said nothing. I stared at him, amazed at the banality of it all. This man was part of a tribe of infamous killers who traveled under a single name, and he was really nothing more than an average-looking man in stained underwear. A psychotic sitting around watching TV, scratching himself, drinking beer, and now and again taking a peek at his nut-sack collection. Nothing monsterlike in his appearance, nothing special about him in any way. He was merely a psychopath who liked reality shows, needed a shower, and a lethal injection.

I don't know how long we stood like that, but it seemed like a lot of time passed before Booger came back. He had Jim Bob with him. Jim Bob said, "Shot one coming out of the toilet. I went around to the trailers and looked and didn't see anything."

"You shot Derrick?" said the man.

"Did he look a lot like you, but had pants on?" Jim Bob said.

The man nodded.

"Don't expect him at breakfast," Jim Bob said.

"Leonard?" I asked.

"Didn't see him," he said, shaking his head. "I went and looked inside a couple of trailers, and no one was there. I came around on the side to look in the others, and here come a guy out of the outhouse carrying a roll of toilet paper in one hand and a pistol in the other. He saw me, and he didn't know if he should wipe his ass with the paper or the gun. He decided to shoot at me. With the gun, not the paper. I took him out, and not to lunch. Did you hear a twenty-two fire after my shot?"

"No," I said.

"Pretty sure Vanilla hit him in the back of the head about the same time I shot him. It was a pretty quiet shot. Damn. Look at all those jars full of nut sacks."

"I want to know where Leonard is," I said.

"Told you, don't know," Jim Bob said. "Hell, that's a lot of jars. Cut my nuts off they're going to need a lot of room, lot of jars, more likely a washtub and about ten gallons of rubbing alcohol to preserve them."

"What do we do with this one?" I said.

"You know the answer to that question," Jim Bob said.

"You ought to just go on and find someplace to hide, you know what's good for you," said the man. "You got some chance like that. Not much, but some. Better yet, you might want to get over the wall before my brothers find me."

"And when you and your brothers aren't fucking each other in the ass," Jim Bob said, "where might we find them?"

"Go fuck yourself with a dog's dick," the man said. "They'll be back soon enough, and you'll wish they wasn't."

Booger laughed and lifted his shotgun quickly and cut down on the man. It was messy.

“Goddamn, Booger,” I said.

“We didn’t come here to sort out their issues,” Booger said. “We came to rid them of them.”

“Jesus,” I said. “He gave up his gun. He wasn’t armed.”

“Sounds like a personal problem,” Booger said.

53

We went out through the door we had come in one at a time, quickly, Booger first, me, and then Jim Bob. We walked inside the circle of trailers. No one shot at us, and there was no sound of movement until Leonard came through the gap in the line of trailers I had come through.

“I heard shooting,” Leonard said. “Saw one out by the shitter who will shit no more.”

“Me and Vanilla nailed him,” Jim Bob said.

“One inside got caught with his pants off,” Booger said. “He won’t be around for the holidays.”

“Where are the others?” I said.

“Now, that’s a good question,” Leonard said. “I didn’t see anyone among the junk and cars. Been in all the trailers?”

“Just one,” I said.

“I was in a couple others,” Booger said.

“I checked some,” Jim Bob said.

We sorted out that only one trailer hadn’t been checked.

We didn’t bother with a lock pick this time. Jim Bob kicked the door down, and we went inside. It smelled like a buzzard’s breath. There was no one there, and there were no balls in jars. It looked more like it was used as their crash pad. Mattresses were thrown about on the floor, and there were sheets and blankets twisted about on those. There were a number of automatic weapons leaning against the wall and on hooks. Their bedroom was also their armory.

In the corner there was a yellow curtain supported on metal poles and stanchions. We walked over and looked behind the curtain. There was a window that looked out over the compound. There were no curtains on it. There was a small wooden table with a couple of thick books on it. The moonlight and the compound light came through the window. There was a hospital bed. It had an electronic device, a little plastic bar with buttons on it, for raising the bed up and lowering it. There were metal stands with metal racks around the bed. There were empty glass containers hanging from the racks, tubes dangled loose from those, like snakes that had died of boredom. The ends of the tubes were fixed with rusted needles. The bed itself was yellowed by time and stank of human waste long left and long rotted. The pillow on the bed had a head on it, and the head had some dark hair on it, though most of it had come loose and lay on the pillow. Attached to the head was a body. It wasn't exactly mummified, but it wasn't completely gone, either. It was simultaneously in mid-rot and mid-mummification. I wasn't sure which was going to win out. Obviously, it was the source of the smell. The light through the window caused it to appear to be coated in a thin film of cheese. The eyes had a strip of duct tape over them. There was a thin once-white gown on her, and it had become one with the rotting flesh.

"Okay," Jim Bob said. "We killed two, and the rest of them ain't here, unless you want to count this guy. Woman. Whatever. Jesus."

"They torturing somebody?" Booger asked.

Jim Bob picked up one of the books on the table, flipped it open.

"I think they were doctoring somebody," Jim Bob said. "A relative. Doing it themselves. This is a medical book."

"I'm going to go out on a limb here and say no one on their staff actually had a medical degree," I said.

"At least someone could read," Leonard said.

"Not well enough," Jim Bob said. "The page is turned down on delivery."

"Delivery?" Booger said.

"Babies," Jim Bob said. "They were trying to deliver a baby."

"Since we haven't seen any babies," Leonard said, "I'm going to take it this is the potential mother and they failed."

"It's like Doug was saying," I said. "They ran out of sisters."

"Looks that way," Leonard said, wrinkling his nose against the stench.

They may be awful people, I thought, but they had tried to save one of their own, give birth to another. I liked it better when they were faceless killers who needed killing and there wasn't any humanity involved. I wondered if they propped her up and photographed her after she died.

The stink was making me sick. I was starting to cough. We went away from there quickly, outside into the circle at the center of the trailers. As we were starting back to the wall, we saw automobile lights coming down from the hill, between the trees. They were high enough up that the lights shone down into the compound and lay on us like laser beams. Then there was a loud clicking, and I saw red-dot lights on the inside of the gate go off, and I could see the butt ends of half a dozen machine guns positioned below those dots in the gate, just the way Booger had said. Soon as those dots went off, the big gate sprang open electronically, groaning like an old man straining at stool, and into the compound jetted a black Hummer.

As Underwear Man had said, they'd be back soon enough, and here they came.

We scattered like quail as the Hummer braked to an abrupt stop inside the compound. The Hummer's doors were thrown open on the passenger side, front and back, and two men who looked like stockier versions of the one in his underwear came out into the open with automatic weapons that sprayed the air full of lead. I barely had time to jump behind some piled-up washing machines, and still the bullets tore through them and scattered rust and one nicked my ass as I dove. Once I was on the ground, I immediately began turning my head, looking for Leonard.

I didn't see him, but I heard him off to my right, opening up with his shotgun. That old Remington of his had a certain sound when you pumped it. He was pumping fast. There was another rattle of automatic-weapons fire, all of it in Leonard's direction. I lifted my head cautiously and looked through a gap in the washing machine pile and saw that both armed men were hurrying toward me. Neither had been hit that I could see. And then one of them snapped his head forward and then back, and where his eye had been there was a leap of liquid spurting into the lights of the Hummer. The man with him yelled out something, dropped low, and then turned to race back for the Hummer. By then the spray of bullets ceased, and Jim Bob and Booger rose up from the old cars they had ducked behind and starting firing, but that bastard must have been blessed, because he didn't get hit, or if he did it was minor. It damn sure didn't stop him.

There came that faint snapping sound from the deer stand, and Vanilla nailed him. He turned his head suddenly as if to look in our direction, then banged into the Hummer and slid down it slowly until he fell with his head under it. His ass humped a little, like he was fucking the dirt, and then he was still.

"That bitch can shoot," I heard Booger yell out.

That's when the Hummer roared and burned backwards, running right over the man who had been humping the dirt, squirting what passed for brains out of his head in all directions. The Hummer roared on through the gate, swung around, and turned its nose up the hill with the tires tossing gravel. All of us were firing at it, but nothing we hit on the Hummer caused a problem.

Up in the deer stand, Vanilla snapped off two shots, and I heard the Hummer windshield crack, but it kept going, climbing the hill. We all started running after it.

When it got to the top of the hill, the Hummer turned and ran off the road and went straight for the deer stand, hit it and sent it flying, breaking it apart, launching Vanilla out of it in a flash of black clothes and blond hair. The Hummer tried to run her down then, but she limped behind a tree and the Hummer hit it, backed off, spun around, and started out of there.

We ran up the hill, and by the time we got up there, Vanilla was limping up to us, and the Hummer was gone.

"Get me to the car," she said, "and I will teach them to knock me out of a tree."

"Deer stand," Booger said.

"Whatever," she said, throwing the rifle across her back by a strap she had fastened to it.

She got between Leonard and me, threw her arms over our shoulders, and with Jim Bob and Booger in the lead, we carried on. We made it to the brush gate, or where it used to be, but the Hummer had gone right through it.

"They just thought they were badasses," Booger said, "and then they got a load of us."

"We got lucky," Jim Bob said.

We limped Vanilla along until we got to the end of the trail that led to the outer road. Booger leaned down with his light and said, "They went to the right. You can see where they dug in turning."

Our problem was that the Buick was to the left, so we limped Vanilla along that way, finally got to the car. I thought the Hummer might at this point be all the way to the North Pole.

I was still closing my door when Vanilla got the Buick started. She put her good right foot on the gas and spun us out of there backwards, braked, hit the gas, changed the gears, and away we went. Every time Vanilla shifted gears the car roared louder and flew faster. Vanilla was down the road a piece before she turned on the lights, which was a good thing, because the road was growing narrow and there was a bar ditch on either side. The headlights caught standing water in the ditches and made it shimmer.

"We'll never catch them," Leonard said.

“Yes, we will,” Vanilla said, and she hit another gear. She wasn’t kidding about the car being souped up beyond reason. We tore along like that for what seemed like ten or fifteen minutes, and then we caught the taillights of the Hummer. Vanilla pushed her foot down, and the Buick’s engine sang like a siren; the tires clawed the road with a vengeance.

I hadn’t thought to put on my seat belt, but right then I remembered and snapped it into place and tried not to shit myself. We were going so fast the car was starting to wobble and the trees to either side of us looked like a solid wall. One thing about a Hummer is it doesn’t run that fast, and the Buick was a goddamn ground jet.

We were closing fast.

54

Let me tell you how I screamed. It was loud and long and it blended with Leonard's and Jim Bob's screams and it was almost loud enough to smother Booger's cackling laughter. Vanilla made not a sound.

What caused the scream was that it appeared we were going to run right up that Hummer's ass. We were so close, had the Hummer had a bumper sticker we would have collided. The Hummer had a modified door, so that the back end swung open, and as it did two men with automatic weapons, down on their knees, started firing.

Vanilla braked and drifted sideways into what I thought would surely be a bar ditch or a tree, but we were lucky. There was a wide spot there, and the next instant we were beside the Hummer. I saw that the windshield in our ride was punctured in several places and the punctures sprang fractures and then the fractures spread rapidly with a sound like thin ice cracking under a fat skater's feet.

The glass blew back on us just as I ducked, and I heard Jim Bob yell, "Goddamn it."

When I rose up the windshield was gone and there was blood running down my face. I glanced at Vanilla. She had cuts on her forehead and cheek, and there was a small piece of glass sticking out of the top of her hairline, but if she'd even blinked when the glass shattered, I didn't notice it. Then again, I had just had my head between my legs and had been trying to crawl up my own asshole, so I might have missed something.

I looked back over the seat. Leonard raised a hand in a polite wave. His mouth made a wiggle that I was supposed to think was a smile. He didn't even seem to be cut. Jim Bob was using a gloved hand to pull a bit of broken glass from his shoulder. Booger was on the right-hand passenger side. He rolled down his window and stuck his head and arms and the sawed-off out of it. Blood drops flew off the cuts on his face and blew back into the night like red drops of sweat. The back windshield was gone, too.

I turned back to the front, rolled my window down, and looked at Vanilla.

"I'm going to brake."

"I know," I said.

She downshifted and braked so fast it was like a single motion. The car's hum lowered to a purr, and as we slowed that sent the Hummer flying in front of us again. When it did, I hung my head and arms out the window with my shotgun and hoped Booger wouldn't shoot the back of my head off. Me and Booger fired close together, and the sound of those shotguns made my head feel as if a horde of crazed monkeys were beating on bongos inside my brain.

Booger yelled, "I was born for this!"

I pumped the shotgun, fired again at the open back door where the men stood, and one of them dropped down and rolled out even as the other man tried to grab him. The Buick went over his head with a bump and a loud squish.

Vanilla shifted gears, and we swung to the left side of the vehicle again, just as the other man tried to fire at us. He caught the tail end of the Buick, dancing shots across the trunk and into the woods before we pulled directly alongside the Hummer.

The Hummer driver tried to take the middle of the road and drive us off of it. We were coming up on a narrow bridge, and there wasn't anywhere else for us to go but off of it or back behind the Hummer again. We eased back behind it.

Me and Booger opened fire. By this time Jim Bob had rolled down the window on his side and was sitting in the window with his shotgun swung over the top of the Buick's roof, firing. I heard Leonard say, "I'll just sit here quiet in the middle."

The Hummer clumped its tires over the bridge, and the man in the back who was on his knees firing went backwards and dropped his gun, got himself together long enough to close the back door. No sooner was the Hummer over the bridge than Vanilla was riding the Hummer so close we were like a hemorrhoid on its ass.

The Hummer braked, and in that moment I thought we were all going to be sitting in the front seat with the driver, but Vanilla jerked the wheel left and went forward and alongside the Hummer so close it took the mirror off on my side and scraped the door handles front and back. Since me and Booger had just pulled heads and arms inside, the timing was perfect, even if it hadn't been on purpose.

Vanilla started rolling her window down. She said, "Hap, take the wheel."

"What?"

"Take the wheel and sit on my feet."

I snapped off my seat belt and grabbed the wheel. Vanilla was out the window, drawing her big automatic as she did. I slid over, and she locked her feet under my ass. I put my foot on the gas and pulled us directly alongside the Hummer driver. His hand came out his open window, and it was full of pistol.

Vanilla, sitting on the window frame, twisted and fired over the roof of the car. The driver was close enough to our car I heard him make a sound like a gasket blowing, and then the Hummer went off the road and into a bar ditch and out of that and through some small trees, fetched up finally against a large sweet gum with a soul-breaking impact that scattered bark like confetti. A burst of white smoke rolled out of the back of it, and on the far side a door opened, and I caught a glimpse of a man making a run for it through the woods, carrying a long gun.

Vanilla swung back inside the car with such force she knocked me out from behind the wheel, and the Buick wavered. She caught the wheel and whirled it and hit the emergency brake even as she downshifted. The Buick swung around, facing back in the direction we had come from.

"Yeah," Jim Bob said. "But let's see you make it dance."

Vanilla gunned us forward, came to a stop across from the place where the Hummer had left the road. We all got out of the car. Booger went about three feet and fell down. "Shit," he said. "Took one through the leg. It's broken."

Me and Jim Bob and Leonard ran to the Hummer. Jim Bob jerked open the back door. There was the wounded man with a pistol in his hand and the barrel pressed up under his chin. "I just wanted you to know I made my own way," he said and fired the pistol, launching the top of his skull with its greasy hair against the roof of the Hummer, spraying it and us with brains and blood. The skullcap hit the floor of the Hummer, spun around like a hubcap that had come loose, rattled against the flooring, then stopped moving.

There was no one else inside.

When I turned around Leonard was gone. I went the way I figured he had to go, where the trees and brush were thinnest. I had almost caught up with him when he came to a spot where the trees were sparse and the moon was bright. He went along quick-like—too quick-like, because the man he was hunting lifted up as he passed, pointing an automatic rifle. I fired quickly with the shotgun, and the blast tore through the brush, but if I hit him it wasn't a killing blow. He turned toward me, his teeth flashing in the moonlight, his rifle swinging around, and when he did Leonard turned and shot him, knocking him down behind the brush where he had been hiding.

We were both on him now. We peeled back the brush. He had dropped his rifle on the ground. He was hit bad but not dead. He was reaching for the rifle. I kicked it aside. He lay on his back and looked up at us. He looked small and pale and like someone you wouldn't notice twice. He looked like all the others that made up the Canceler, as if they had been cut from the same bolt of cloth. The moon floated in his eyes.

He turned his head toward me. His mouth opened and closed, trying to find air. I remembered when I was a kid and had a BB gun, thought I was a mighty hunter, and shot a bird. When I went to pick it up, its beak was open and it was trying to find the air it couldn't put back into its small lungs. That was the end of killing birds for the hell of it. I still have that bird's soul on my head, and a lot worse things now. Leonard raised his shotgun to shoot, but then hesitated.

The man quit gasping. The moon floated out of his eyes.

55

Me and Leonard have a veterinarian friend who sews us up in secret when we need it. He charges a lot. He has to. If he got caught he'd be sewing up shank wounds in Huntsville prison.

We went to him. He took care of us, Booger in particular. A fragment of a shell had found a place in his leg where it wanted to live. It was pretty deep, and maybe someone else would have died of shock, but Booger had him take it out without deadening the wound. I think he enjoyed showing us how much tougher than us he was. I thought it showed how much smarter we were.

The vet cut the piece of metal out of him, and Booger only grunted, but when the vet started sewing the wound up, he passed out.

"If he dies," Jim Bob said, "we can call it a win-win."

"That's not very nice," I said.

"Oh, but so true," Leonard said and kind of laughed, or maybe it was a cough.

We all had some cuts and such to patch up, and we got that done. None of us had been cut badly by the glass, though Vanilla was going to have a small scar right in the middle of her part. I looked at her while the vet doctored her up. She was cut in places, and there was blood in her hair, and damn if she still didn't look like a goddess.

When it was all done and Booger came awake and consented to some pain pills, we paid our vet friend with Jim Bob's money and went back to the safe house. Soon as we were there, Booger, who found a place on the couch, said, "I counted seven, not eight."

"I thought about that," I said. "Maybe there were only seven to begin with."

"And maybe," Booger said, "the ones in the Hummer were coming back from some paid mission, and the guys we caught at the compound were holding down the fort. That means there could still be one more out there prowling around, on a job, and when he comes home, boy, is he going to be mad."

"It's possible," Jim Bob said. "Problem is, it's hard to figure out how much was real about those guys and how much was myth. One thing is for sure, they had a lot of balls in jars."

Me and Leonard told them then about the shed and what we found there.

"Jesus," Jim Bob said. "That's a lot of killing these creeps have done."

"I always heard there were eight," Vanilla said. She had just come out of the bathroom, where she had changed into jeans and a loose T-shirt, slipped on white tennis shoes.

"But you don't know it for a fact?" Leonard asked.

"No."

Next morning I made a call to Marvin, and later in the day me and Leonard went to town to the Japanese restaurant, arriving at 12:15. Leonard waited in the car, and I went in. I promised to bring him an order of rice and hibachi beef.

I walked past the SUV parked out front, this time with two guys in it. They didn't look like they were taking their bodyguard duties seriously. One was sitting behind the steering wheel with his head thrown back on the seat and his eyes closed. The other sat on the front passenger side reading something on his cell phone.

Inside I found the Barbecue King in his usual spot. I pointed at him when the waitress came over. I slid into the seat across from him.

He looked at my banged-up face, with its bruises and Band-Aids, observed my stiff movements.

"You look like you shaved with a brush hog."

"I feel worse. Lunch is on you, and I want a takeout order."

"I assume I'm paying because you have good news."

"Your exile ends. Be here tomorrow, and a policeman named Marvin Hanson will be here to visit with you. You will go away with him. More policemen will show up at your place at the same time, and the guys outside, any others that might be around, will have their ass in a crack before they can ask, 'Are those handcuffs new?'"

"I have to take your word for it that you killed the Cancelers?"

"You do," I said. "Here's the thing, pal. It's best you have the meeting, set yourself up to have a chance at rolling over on the others. Maybe the feds will decide you're more important and will find you a nice warm spot in Albuquerque with a new name and a retirement plan. They've been protecting those you say are worse than you, so now you get your chance."

"I'm no angel, Collins, but yeah, they're worse."

“If you got some information you want to show Marvin, and it’s something you can have with you when you show up here, I would. That way nothing gets lost in the arrest and no one can say they just found it and you didn’t give it to them. Put you out of the deal altogether. You want Marvin first, not the feds.”

“I can put it all on a memory stick and have it in my pocket, close to my heart, but since I’m having to give it to the cops, I’ll put it in my front pants pocket, close to my cock.”

“You can put it up your ass for all I care, just have it. Or you will go down, and in a lot less pleasant way.”

He leaned back and crossed his arms. “I’ve conned my way out of the police before.”

“I wasn’t talking about the police.”

He smiled at me.

“Waitress,” he called out, “we’re ready to order.”

56

Now, let me tell you, for a few days I worried about that eighth member of the Cancelers, but after a while I didn't worry so much. I decided, as Leonard did, that there were only seven.

Booger went home, and so did Jim Bob, and Vanilla stayed at the safe house with us for a few days. She came to me one night while I was sleeping, limping a little still. She wore nothing. She crawled into bed.

"It's not going to happen, Vanilla."

She stretched out and put her arm over my chest.

"At least I hope not."

"No?"

"Well, I mean I hope not. Jesus, Vanilla. Really?"

She giggled a little. It was the only time I had ever heard her sound less than reserved. She could talk about anything and sound reserved, but that giggle, it wasn't like her. It was girlish.

"Nobody need know but us," she said.

"I would know."

"You know what I mean."

"Sorry, Vanilla."

"Let me put it like this, Hap. You called me. I came. This is the price."

"And if I don't pay?"

"Don't ever call again."

"Maybe I shouldn't have called in the first place."

"Think about how it went down out there and tell me that again."

I couldn't tell her that again.

"I just don't feel right about it, Vanilla."

"You will," she said.

"Jesus, Vanilla. You're making it hard."

"That's the idea."

"Not what I meant."

She ran her hand over my crotch, said, "There seems to be some activity."

"Damn it," I said. "Don't do that."

"You're not fighting me that much."

"I want to."

"Do you?"

"Less than before," I said. She pressed her lips to mine, and we kissed. I pushed her away and got out of bed and pulled up my pajamas that she had pushed down.

"I'm going to shower," I said. "In cold water."

She slipped out from under the covers and stood by the bed. It was dark in there, but there was enough moonlight from the window to see her standing there in all her glory. I could even tell she didn't shave down there, at least not completely. Good. I didn't like women to look like children. I thought I might tell her how much I appreciated that later, but right then, a shower.

"Good night, Vanilla."

There was a bathroom off the bedroom, and I went in there and closed the door and took off my clothes and turned on the cold water and got in and pulled the shower curtain. A moment passed. I heard the door open, and then the shower curtain was pulled back, and Vanilla reached out and turned on the warm water, and then I just couldn't fight it anymore. I kissed her and held her. But finally I had a moment of strength and pushed her back from me.

"It isn't right, Vanilla. I made a promise. I intend to keep it."

Vanilla looked at me with those beautiful eyes of hers.

"You know, Hap Collins, I think that's why I'm in love with you. You keep your word."

"I try. But I won't lie. I don't know how much longer I can keep that promise if you stay in the shower, so one of us is getting out now."

She took my chin in her hand.

"Oh, Jesus, Hap Collins, you don't know what you're missing."

"I have a pretty good idea," I said. "I have a feeling that tomorrow sometime I'll drive off by myself to someplace private and scream for a while."

She laughed and kissed me, and it was almost enough to undo me. Then she got out of the shower.

I turned the cold water back on.

57

So the others went away, and that just left me and Leonard. I was surprised that I missed them so much. Except Booger. I didn't miss him at all. We continued to stay at the safe house for a time. With Vanilla gone I didn't have to lock my door and spend the night in a steamy sweat hoping she didn't take an ax to the door, because one more time and my resolve might crumble like old cheese.

We found out from Marvin that the material the Barbecue King had given him was good. The super crime ring in Houston came apart quick, with lots of arrests in conjunction with not only the Houston police but the FBI, the latter being kind of ironic. But alliances change rapidly in the world of crime and law enforcement. I'm sure it had a lot to do with what could come out if the FBI didn't comply.

Marvin had me and Leonard meet him in town at a sandwich shop for lunch, told us all about it.

"Sandy Buckner, she calls herself something else now."

"We know," I said.

"I know you know, but I'm just saying. Her days as Lex Luthor are all over."

Leonard shook his head. "It's so unsatisfying, being out there on the search, and then when we find her, we find her secondhand. We didn't actually see her in person, just a photo in the paper."

"And it turns out she wasn't worth finding," I said.

"She is worth sending to prison, though," Marvin said.

Leonard said, "She stole that money from her grandmother to get herself in the business deeper. Screwed who she had to, backstabbed who she had to, set herself up sweet, and she cared about her grandmother the way a lion cares about a baby gazelle. She got away with her shit for a long time."

Marvin nibbled at his chicken salad sandwich, said around chews, "That's right, but thanks to you guys, and to my fine professional police work—"

“What the hell did you do?” Leonard said.

“Kept your asses out of the blender, that’s what I did.”

“Oh, yeah,” Leonard said. “Okay.”

“You killed them all?” Marvin said.

“We won’t answer that on grounds that it might incriminate us and lead to a long prison sentence and possible death by lethal injection,” Leonard said.

“Good reason not to answer. But let’s speak hypothetically, just so I would have some idea what might have happened.”

“Us and a few helpers killed all them son of a bitches,” Leonard said. “I mean, that’s what might have happened.”

“Do I know these helpers?”

“Maybe,” Leonard said. “Some.”

“Went out there to the address you gave, the spot where the body was in the woods,” Marvin said. “Birds had been at that old boy in the woods.”

“One in the woods,” I said. “You’re talking about the fellow who hypothetically got killed near the hypothetical Hummer with the dead bodies in it?” I asked.

“That would be the one, and the dead guy in the road looked like a jelly roll someone had stepped on. Others in the Hummer, and the ones at that fucked-up compound, didn’t look so good, either. Someone was shooting good. Looked like a twenty-two had been at work. Gun like that, had to be some good shooting. And thanks for the tip on the booby traps. That was some sneaky shit they had out there. Tell you something you don’t know. We found a bunch of graves out under the Ferris wheel. Don’t think they were murder victims. The graves were well tended, and there were markers on them but no names. Just numbers. I think it’s their own clan, but we won’t know for sure until they’re dug up, checked for the ways they died, and if there’s a DNA match with the seven dead fellows.”

“They were just some guys,” I said. “Nothing really amazing going on there. The Cancelers were people willing to kill, and there were a lot of them to do it. I pretty much heard that definition from Dougie.”

“That definition could fit you boys, hypothetically.”

“Don’t give Hap any more of a complex than he already has,” Leonard said. “You know and I know the right thing was done. There’s no comparison between us and them. Hypothetically, of course.”

“Of course. Fact is, the feds, they think it was some kind of turf war. You know, other hitters wanting to take them out to take their place or some such theory.”

“So hypothetically,” Leonard asked, “how are the chances for those guys who hypothetically killed those seven guys?”

“If, hypothetically, you did do anything, you are in the clear. Frankly, those boys being dead, and all those balls in jars, nobody gives a shit who killed them. By the way, lunch. You’re buying.”

“You should be buying us lunch,” Leonard said.

“You’re buying for me out of sympathy.”

“And why are we sympathetic?” I said.

“Because everybody be hating on the po-po,” Marvin said.

58

We went over to see Lilly Buckner, but found out from a neighbor that she had been taken downtown to the hospital, and we drove over there. She was in a private room—the last of her money, I guess, or maybe her Medicare. I don't know. But when I asked the plump female nurse about her condition, she asked if we were relatives.

"No," I said. "But we know her."

"You're the only ones who have come to see her."

I repeated my question. "How is she?"

"Not good."

"What's wrong?"

"Old age. So pretty much everything."

"Can we see her?" Leonard asked.

"You're not supposed to," the nurse said, "but you might as well. She's awake, but I don't think she has long."

"How long?" Leonard asked.

"No one can say for sure, but I can say this for certain. The doctors have given in. She won't make it out of this hospital alive. I'm sorry to tell you that, but I believe it's best you know."

"We're not really all that close to her," I said.

"Like I said, so far, you're all that have come to see her, and we haven't found any living relatives."

"And you won't," I said, knowing full well there was one, but considering all that had gone down, I doubted they would let Sandy come see her, and I doubted Sandy gave a damn. She had chosen a different path.

We got the room number, rode an elevator up. We went into her room, and she lay in a bed that seemed far too large for her. She was under white sheets with a big white pillow under her head. She didn't have any makeup on, and she looked even older than before. Her eyes were closed. She reminded me of a starving bird lying in the snow.

I went to one side of the bed, Leonard the other.

We stood looking down at her. I gently took her hand, and Leonard took the other.

She opened her eyes. “You two,” she said, and her voice was as raw as if she had been drinking lye.

“Yeah, us two,” Leonard said.

“So it’s down to this. Two people I don’t really know coming to see me before I take the big siesta…Sandy? Anything?”

“Yes,” Leonard said. “We found her.”

Her eyes brightened a little. “Is she okay?”

“She is,” Leonard said. “She is married and living in Oregon.”

“No shit?”

“No shit,” Leonard said.

“You lying son of a bitch,” she said. “Something is wrong, isn’t it?”

Leonard pulled a chair up with one hand but never let go of her hand with the other. I did the same. We sat beside her bed.

“It’s true,” I said. “She’s in Oregon.”

“Why the fuck would she be in Oregon?”

“Maybe she likes the climate,” Leonard said.

“I been to Oregon. I don’t think the climate is all that good. Now, tell me the truth.”

“Truth is,” Leonard said, “she is in Oregon. She got in a bit of trouble with cashing bad checks, so she took your money, meant to pay it back, and then she met someone and got married. You have great-grandkids.”

I thought to myself, wow. Leonard is lying his ass off.

She looked at me. I nodded.

“She was embarrassed to come back and tell you, having taken the money. She was cleaning up her check debt.”

“So you saw her?”

“Absolutely,” I said. “Why it took us so long.”

“She was ashamed more than embarrassed,” Leonard said. “She has two kids, your great-grandkids, two girls. One is named Lilly.”

“She did that?” She could hardly speak now, her voice was so full of phlegm and emotion.

“Yeah.”

“The other?”

“I think she said Buddy,” Leonard said. “I’m sorry. Don’t remember for sure.”

“A girl named Buddy?” she asked.

“I probably have that wrong,” he said.

“Brenda,” I said. “Not Buddy. It’ll be in our report, the correct names.

She'd like to come see you, but the thing is, well, she's kind of wanted in the state of Texas still. The checks."

"Can't they arrest her in Oregon?" she said.

"Maybe so, but no one is pushing it," Leonard said. "I think that's just an excuse, though. Like I said, she's ashamed. That's the main thing."

"Tell her I don't care about what she did. Can you do that? I got a feeling this bed is going to be my last friend."

"Ah, hell, you're tough," I said. "You'll be all right."

She squeezed my hand and smiled. She didn't have in her false teeth, so her mouth deeply wrinkled more than smiled. "You two are the biggest fucking liars I have ever known. Thought you really had me buying into that shit, didn't you? Thought, throw the old lady a bone, like I don't know when bullshit isn't strudel."

"I thought I'd done pretty good," Leonard said.

"Buddy. What the hell, son? No. No, you didn't do good. You looked kind of cute telling the story, though. But I appreciate it. A man from the FBI came to see me. Being Sandy's grandmother and all, he thought I might know some things. He told me a little about her. She fucked up, and now you boys come lying to me because you know I'm dying."

"Yeah," Leonard said. "We aren't worth a shit."

"What I been trying to tell you."

"We shouldn't have done that," I said.

"You did it out of kindness, not something I've received in a while, mostly because I don't deserve it. Even if I hadn't spoken with that FBI turd, I still wouldn't have believed you. But as I was told when I was young, if someone gives you a shitty present, you pretend you like it, because it's the thought that counts. I'm tired now. So damn tired. Will you sit with me a while?"

"Sure," I said.

"Good. I'd like that. I still love her, you know?"

"Of course," I said.

"I thought she'd do well, but she didn't. She turned out to be a bitch on wheels. She stole my goddamn money because she wasn't anything other than a goddamn thief."

"Looks that way," Leonard said.

"She was here right now I'd punch her in the nose. Course, I'd have to ask her to raise the bed first, puff my pillow, and bend over within reach."

A small tear rolled out of her right eye.

"It's such a disappointment," she said.

“Wish it would have worked out better,” I said.

“Stay with me, boys.”

We did. She closed her eyes and slept, and a half hour later or so, a nurse came in and saw us. Not the same nurse as before. A male this time, but still plump. He looked at us and said, “You’re not supposed to be here.”

“We know,” I said.

“Let me check her vitals,” he said.

He did. When he finished, he stood there looking at her for a moment, and then he looked at us, and said it like he meant it. “I have bad news. I’m sorry. She’s gone.”

I knew that before he did, and I’m sure Leonard did as well. Her hand in mine had turned cold as ice shortly after she closed her eyes.

59

Me and Leonard ended up staying at the safe house for another two weeks. Brett and Chance and Buffy were still traveling. I called Brett one Saturday afternoon from the front porch of the safe house.

"You can come home," I said.

"Good," she said. "I was about to anyway, hell or high water. We've had fun, but I think we're both a little sick of it. And I don't like to think I need protecting. Besides, we're running out of money."

Leonard went back to his home, and damn if John didn't come around again, and damn if they weren't trying again. John wasn't talking religion anymore, and he brought his sixteen-year-old niece with him. She wanted out of her father's home, and part of that was due to her having realized that she, like her Uncle John, was gay. She came to live with Leonard and John in the loft, and at least for the time being, things were good for my brother.

The DNA test was in the mail when I got home, and that was two days before Brett and Chance and Buffy came back. I just couldn't open it. The morning before they were home, I did. The note inside said the sample had been ruined accidentally, and would we like to try again, no charge?

The air went out of me.

Brett, Chance, and Buffy arrived that same afternoon, and I was so glad to see Brett I teared up. Buffy, who seemed like a different dog, happier and more sure of herself, came bouncing up to me with great excitement. She hadn't forgotten me, or maybe she was just the kind of dog that was happy to see anyone but that asshole who had kicked her for entertainment. Chance was smiling and nervous. She took the news about the DNA test stoically. She hugged me, and I hugged her. Damn, I really hoped she was my daughter.

When I took Brett in my arms, I have to tell you, right then I was glad I had turned Vanilla away. Another heartbeat that night and we would have been at it. I was a little ashamed of how far it had gone, even if I hadn’t initiated it. Jesus, that woman.

But the one who came back to me was every bit as delicious.

More so.

Because I loved her.

60

We sent off the new DNA sample, but we didn’t do it until the fall. I can’t tell you exactly why we waited that long, but that’s how it was. I think we feared the answer might not be what we wanted.

As October blew in with a gust and the leaves turned yellow and brown and blew down from the great oak in the front yard by the curb, I was at peace. It gave me great joy to walk across the yard and crunch those drying leaves underfoot, because I damn sure wasn’t going to rake them up and burn them.

We had done a number of jobs at the agency since Brett came home, and they had all been simple, and even Chance helped on a few occasions. Nothing big—little things, like watching someone who needed watching, making notes and snapping photos from concealment for divorce work, that sort of thing. She had a kind of knack for it, and with her beauty she was easily welcomed most anywhere.

So life was good, and one night in late October, on my birthday, we invited Leonard and John over, John’s niece, and we had a kind of birthday celebration that turned out to be large pizzas and too many side dishes, including Leonard’s favorite, vanilla cookies.

I received a few small gifts, little things I liked, mostly gift cards to food places, a box of animal crackers from Chance, and then it was over and everyone was going home or preparing to turn in for the night. Leonard decided to stay behind awhile and visit, and I agreed to take him back to his loft after an hour or so. We helped Brett and Chance store the remaining pizza away. I put the trash from the feast in a bag, and then we sat and had cups of decaffeinated coffee so we wouldn’t be up all night. Leonard and I talked about the old days, how we had first met as teenagers on a dark night in the Sabine River bottoms. Brett and Chance sat and listened to us talk. We were on a roll.

When the ladies left the room, Leonard said, “Think I’m going to give John one more chance.”

“You said that four chances ago,” I said.

"I mean it this time."

"Did you not mean it the other times?"

"Not enough."

"Okay," I said.

"You don't fucking think I ought to, do you?"

"It's not about what I think. It's about what works—"

"Shut the hell up. Be straight with me. No psychology horseshit. Should I or shouldn't I?"

"You don't, you'll feel miserable," I said. "You do, you'll feel miserable."

"No opinion, then?"

"Frankly, Leonard, I'm fed up with the motherfucker."

"I should be."

"You were last time we talked, I think. I lose count. I think you've kicked him to the curb for good, next thing I know he's back greasing your asshole."

"I get fed up, and then I get over being fed up. Right now I'm over it. One more time into the breach, and you know what I mean, and if it don't work this time, seriously, I'm out."

"Brother, you got to make yourself happy if you can. Go for it."

"Thing is, I don't know I can. I'm starting to think the best relationship for me is a fresh box of Kleenex and a bottle of baby oil."

"Eeew."

The women came back then, and Leonard picked up his coffee and sipped it.

We all visited awhile, talked nonsense, mostly, and then the talk died down and our energy died with it. I decided to take the garbage out before I took Leonard home. I carried the bag out the back door, toward the garbage can. My mind was so engaged with the pleasantries of the evening I didn't sense the presence of someone in the yard until it was too late. He rose up from between the two garbage cans by the redwood fence, and as he did, I dropped the garbage bag and turned toward him. I was pretty quick for being distracted, but he was quicker.

There was a glint of light on an edge of steel, and I tried to use both hands to catch the man's wrist, but I was late and the blade was long, and it got me. It went into my stomach, and I groaned. I felt as if a cold wind had washed over me, and there was a numbness followed by a sensation like an electric shock, and then I stumbled backwards and fell against the garbage cans, knocking them over with a loud clatter, but somehow I managed to stay on my feet. The knife, a bayonet, actually, came loose of his hands, and I sort of melted backwards until my back came up against the fence. I clutched at the blade, cutting my hands, making them slick with blood.

He came at me again, bare-handed. I felt strange and detached, like I ought to do something but suddenly didn't know how. And then there was a great shadow looming behind my attacker, and the shadow struck out with two ridge hands to the man's temples and dropped him. The shadow was Leonard. The man on the ground turned and grabbed at Leonard's legs, and took him down. The man tried to scuttle onto Leonard's chest, but Leonard grabbed him by his jacket and jerked him down close and slapped a palm over one of the man's ears, a man I now realized had to be Number Eight, the last Canceler.

Number Eight screamed with pain, and then Leonard rolled him over and was on top of him. Leonard hit him in the throat, I think, because I heard a gasp from the man and then a gurgle, and then Leonard's hand went down two more times, the last in a clawing motion and then a ripping-back movement.

I saw all this as I eased down to the ground with my back against the fence. I so wanted to get up, but my legs weren't working and my mind seemed to have hit the Pause button. Next thing I knew Brett was bending over me, and she was screaming in a way I had never heard before, and then there was Chance bawling and Buffy was licking my face and whimpering.

Leonard reached down and picked me up and carried me out the redwood gate as if I were nothing more than a small sack of feathers.

Leonard lifted me into the back of the car with Brett, and away we went, Leonard at the wheel. Me holding my stomach with both hands, the bayonet still in me, my head in Brett's lap, Chance up front beside Leonard. Chance leaned over the seat and touched my face. Her hand was cool.

Number Eight had found out Leonard and I were involved, no mean feat if anyone from the car company had escaped arrest. Hell, Frank, from behind bars, might have given them the word to make it less likely they would pay someone in prison to stick her. It could as easily have been Leonard who had been stabbed. I was glad it wasn't him. I hoped Jim Bob was okay. Vanilla, I knew, would be long gone and damn near impossible to trace. And Booger. Well, fuck Booger.

As he drove, Leonard yelled from time to time, just some kind of wild exclamation full of fear and disappointment. I thought, happy fucking birthday, Hap.

61

By the time we got to the hospital I was weaving in and out, and as the folks came out with the stretcher and loaded me onto it, they began to do something to my stomach—apply pressure, I guess. I couldn't really feel much by then. The pain had gone away. I realized I wasn't wearing a shirt anymore because I felt the cool October wind. I wasn't wearing a bayonet, either.

As we entered the hospital hallway and Leonard raced alongside me, I saw an odd thing on his shirt. I couldn't figure what it was at first. Some kind of sea creature, maybe. It had a small, bulbous body and lots of bloody tentacles. I was studying on that when we went through some swinging doors, and one of the ladies pushing the stretcher said, "You'll have to leave, now, sir."

And I heard Leonard say, "Screw you. I'm here to stay."

"We'll call security," said the nurse.

"Tell them to bring a couple days' rations. They're going to be here awhile," Leonard said.

I realized then what was stuck on Leonard's shirt. It was Number Eight's eyeball. That clawing and ripping motion he had made, he had tore it right out of that bastard's head.

* * *

The lights came and went, and I closed my eyes and felt weaker and more tired than I had ever been. When I opened my eyes I was in a big white room, not unlike the one Lilly Buckner had been in, and by my bedside were Leonard, Brett, and Chance. The only one missing was Buffy, and I'm sure she would have liked to come.

I might have laughed at that thought. It's hard to be sure.

And then I blinked, or it seemed that way, and the only one in the room was Leonard. He was in a chair pulled up close to the bed and he had my hand in his and his head was dipped, and I knew he had fallen asleep. I tried to speak to him, but the effort of it sent me spiraling again, down into blackness, around and around, and I came out I knew not where. But sometime down in that place of no recognition, I heard a voice I didn't know, a nurse, maybe, a doctor, say, "He probably won't make it past another night."

I went away again, and there was a tunnel of light, but I went backwards, away from it, and when I came out of the unknown place with its tunnel of white light, I was glad to be back, not thinking that long, white tunnel was any goddamn path to heaven, knowing full well it was merely my brain trying to die, my focus narrowing, the kind of tunnel vision beginners get in a fight. I told myself that I was no beginner, and I would not go gently into that good night.

I fought hard, and I came back, and I was glad to be back. I rose up from the darkness like a ship on the peak of a wave, and when I did, there were Leonard and Chance and Brett, all by my side, and I think I said, "It's okay. Doesn't matter anymore," but maybe I just thought it.

I looked at them and loved them, and I thought, there stands my brother, who ripped a man's eye out of his head for me, and I love him as if he were my own blood. It was him I hated to leave the most, the way you think you'd like to keep both legs, because in that instant I knew I was leaving. The tunnel of white light was beckoning. I felt my ship on its wave starting to go down on the other side, my timbers squeaking with stress, my sail folding with pain.

I heard Leonard say, "You're just getting even cause last time it was me in the hospital. Let's just call it even."

He smiled when he said it, but he couldn't hold the smile, and I heard him say, "Goddamn it," and I continued to sail away on those dark waters, and then I felt calm, as if I had made it to the dock. I felt good. It was a strange kind of good. Free of all pain except regret. And then I felt those dark waters stir again, and my ship slipped loose of its moorings, sailed away from the pier toward what could have been the rising or the dying of the sun.

I looked up and saw Brett's face again, crying, then Chance, trembling, and finally Leonard. He was bawling like a child. My hand couldn't feel his hand anymore, but I knew he was holding it.

Then my ship sailed out farther into deep, dark water, toward that great light. I was having trouble breathing. I heard Leonard yell like he was trying to get my attention from across a great distance.

The bright sky beyond the black sea went as dark as the waters that were carrying me away, and I wasn't sure I could make it back.

About the Author

Photo credit: Karen Lansdale

Joe R. Lansdale is the author of more than three dozen novels, including Paradise Sky, the Edgar Award–winning The Bottoms, Sunset and Sawdust, and Leather Maiden. He has received eleven Bram Stoker Awards, the American Mystery Award, the British Fantasy Award, and the Grinzane Cavour Prize for Literature. He lives with his family in Nacogdoches, Texas.

Thank you for buying this ebook, published by Hachette Digital.

To receive special offers, bonus content, and news about our latest ebooks and apps, sign up for our newsletters.

Or visit us at hachettebookgroup.com/newsletters

Contents

Cover
Title Page
Welcome
Dedication
Epigraph
1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31

32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57
58
59
60
61
About the Author
Newsletters
Copyright

The characters and events in this book are fictitious. Any similarity to real persons, living or dead, is coincidental and not intended by the author.

Copyright © 2016 by Joe R. Lansdale
Cover design by Lauren Harms
Cover photograph by Wendy Stevenson / Arcangel Images
Author photograph by Karen Lansdale
Cover copyright © 2016 by Hachette Book Group, Inc.

All rights reserved. In accordance with the U.S. Copyright Act of 1976, the scanning, uploading, and electronic sharing of any part of this book without the permission of the publisher constitute unlawful piracy and theft of the author’s intellectual property. If you would like to use material from the book (other than for review purposes), prior written permission must be obtained by contacting the publisher at permissions@hbgusa.com. Thank you for your support of the author’s rights.

Mulholland Books / Little, Brown and Company
Hachette Book Group
1290 Avenue of the Americas, New York, NY 10104
mulhollandbooks.com
twitter.com/mulhollandbooks
facebook.com/mulhollandbooks

First ebook edition: February 2016

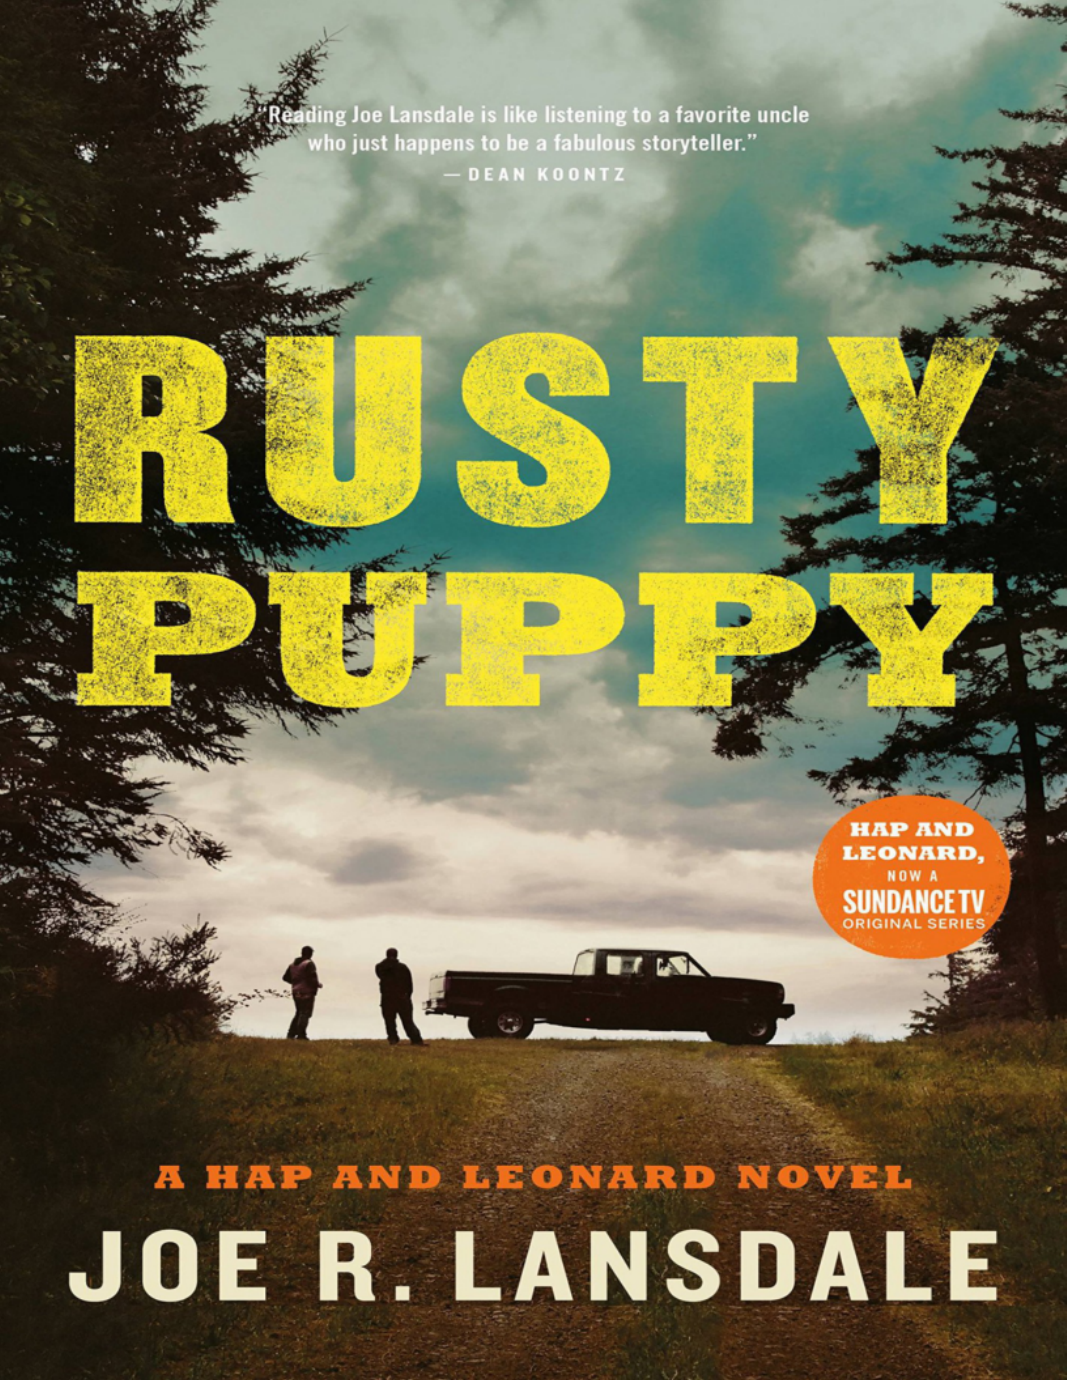
Mulholland Books is an imprint of Little, Brown and Company, a division of Hachette Book Group, Inc. The Mulholland Books name and logo are trademarks of Hachette Book Group, Inc.

The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.

The Hachette Speakers Bureau provides a wide range of authors for speaking events. To find out more, go to hachettespeakersbureau.com or call (866) 376-6591.

ISBN 978-0-316-32938-5

E-3



"Reading Joe Lansdale is like listening to a favorite uncle who just happens to be a fabulous storyteller."

—DEAN KOONTZ

RUSTY PUPPY

HAP AND LEONARD, NOW A SUNDANCE TV ORIGINAL SERIES

A HAP AND LEONARD NOVEL

JOE R. LANSDALE

RUSTY PUPPY

JOE R. LANSDALE

MULHOLLAND BOOKS

Little, Brown and Company
New York Boston London

The characters and events in this book are fictitious. Any similarity to real persons, living or dead, is coincidental and not intended by the author.

Copyright © 2017 by Joe R. Lansdale
Cover copyright © 2017 by Hachette Book Group, Inc.

Hachette Book Group supports the right to free expression and the value of copyright. The purpose of copyright is to encourage writers and artists to produce the creative works that enrich our culture.

The scanning, uploading, and distribution of this book without permission is a theft of the author's intellectual property. If you would like permission to use material from the book (other than for review purposes), please contact permissions@hbgusa.com. Thank you for your support of the author's rights.

Mulholland Books / Little, Brown and Company
Hachette Book Group
1290 Avenue of the Americas, New York, NY 10104
mulhollandbooks.com
twitter.com/mulhollandbooks
facebook.com/mulhollandbooks

First ebook edition: February 2017

Mulholland Books is an imprint of Little, Brown and Company, a division of Hachette Book Group, Inc. The Mulholland Books name and logo are trademarks of Hachette Book Group, Inc.

The publisher is not responsible for websites (or their content) that are not owned by the publisher.

The Hachette Speakers Bureau provides a wide range of authors for speaking events. To find out more, go to hachettespeakersbureau.com or call (866) 376-6591.

ISBN 978-0-316-31154-0

E3-20180119-JV-PC

Contents

Cover
Title Page
Copyright
Dedication
Epigraph

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9
10
11
12
13
14
15
16
17
18
19
20
21
22
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30

31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47
48
49
50
51
52
53
54
55
56
57

Discover More Joe Lansdale
About the Author
Also by Joe R. Lansdale

This one's for my literary agent Danny Baror and my film agent Brian Lipson, both of whom have helped make my life more comfortable, and to them I send my sincere appreciation for their consistent efforts to improve my career, which can be a full-time job unto itself, and for being good friends. Thanks, guys.

And an acknowledgment to my friend Jim Mickle for directing my works so well on screen, and for my brother Nick Damici for adapting those works so kindly and carefully.

Once you get dead, then you ain’t dead anymore, and you come back because somebody pressed on your chest and you took a breath and shot a turd, you got a different view on things. That being said, if I ain’t in the hospital, and I can get around, I never miss Tuesday night chili.

—Jim Bob Luke

1

I was still getting over being dead, and let me tell you, that's a comeback.

I died twice in the hospital after being stabbed, and the last thing I remember before I awoke from death was Leonard being there, shoveling vanilla cookies into his face, waiting for me to wake up. Actually, I was awake, but I couldn't fully open my eyes other than just enough to see him. I repeatedly felt as if I were drifting away on a slow boat to nowhere with a stick up my weenie. That turned out to be a catheter, but it felt like a stick. A big one.

Doctors and nurses saved me from the big, dark plunge, and I didn't thank Jesus when I came around. I thanked the medical staff, their years of schooling, their tremendous skills. I always figured if I was a doctor and I saved some person's life, and the first thing they said when they came around was "Thank Jesus," I would have wanted to stick a pair of forceps up their ass and tell them to see if Jesus could yank those out for them.

Bottom line was, I was back. It took me a few months to pull it together, but finally I was out and about regularly, and on this day I was totally on my own. I had lost a few pounds while being on the tube-down-your-throat diet (not the same tube as the one in my pecker, I hasten to add) but as of recent, my strength was back. I felt like I could bench-press two-fifty and beat an angry gorilla's ass, but maybe not in a fair fight.

That said, I also had days when I would weep uncontrollably and had the concentration of a squirrel. Doctors told me there would be days like that, days when I not only knew I was mortal, but had come smack up against the concept. Watching cartoons helped. I came around pretty quick, and the doctors were amazed that I didn't have any real posttraumatic stress. I didn't mention it to them, but I thought, No, I only have that when I kill people, and I'd learned to live with that stress as if it were merely a quarrelsome comrade. I had plenty of practice there, having known Leonard much of my life. But as far as quick recovery went, I've always been like that. Recuperation skills and a hard head have served me well in life.

So there I was, doing better, back to work, feeling mostly normal, only having brief visitations from the mortality fairy and a now-and-then concern about the eventual heat death of the solar system from the inevitability of the exploding sun. I'm something of a worrier.

On this day I had office duty at Brett Sawyer Investigations, where I worked for my girlfriend, Brett, worked with my best friend, Leonard. I was sitting with my feet on the desk, noticing my socks didn't match, feeling like a classic private eye, though my detective skills were right up there with my mathematical ability, which means you shouldn't ask me to do your taxes. But I'm persistent. That's another good trait you can add to quick recuperation time and a hard head. When I was sixteen my dad got me a job with a fellow who had me help him haul brush and tear down old houses he had bought to sell for scrap lumber. My dad said to him on my first day at work, "He might fuck up a lot, but he's no quitter."

That was kind of my motto.

I was at the office alone because no one else could be there that morning. Leonard was in Houston having sex with some guy he met on the Internet, which made me nervous for both of them, and Brett was nursing a cold. She shared her cold with a young woman named Chance who had turned out to be my daughter. DNA tests proved it, and I was damn happy about it. I had only known about her a short time, but she meshed with my family of Brett and Leonard and Buffy the dog as if she had been with us since birth.

Chance was staying at our house and working part-time at the local newspaper as a proofreader, looking for full-time employment. She had a journalism degree, which is kind of like a degree in Latin. The uses are small.

Like Brett, Chance was off work, home with her cold, resting on the couch. I figured I was next to get the bug, but so far I felt tip-top. After being stabbed in the stomach and dying for a while, coughs and sniffles could kiss my ass.

Buffy, the German shepherd Leonard rescued from an asshole who was kicking her, was with me at the office, lying on the sofa. She was remarkably well mannered, and much better housebroken than I was. Ask Brett. She'll tell you.

It was a pleasant morning, sitting there in the office wearing a pair of new blue jeans that my lady Brett said for once fit me in the ass, and I had on some new tan shoes that Buffy had chewed only slightly. I had on a nice green pullover shirt without food stains. My underwear was clean. My thinning hair was combed, and I had a cup of coffee with real cream in it and one package of Sweet'N Low. I had an open bag of Leonard's vanilla cookies that he had hidden behind our office refrigerator, and they were so good. Not only because of the taste, but because Leonard thought they were well concealed. I planned to eat them all and put the empty bag back behind the fridge. I might even put a note in there that said Cookie Fairy was here. Fuck you. You didn't share at the hospital.

As I sat there, contemplating on my return from the dead, I think I was starting to catch on to something about that whole nature-of-the-universe thing, bordering on some incredibly brilliant revelation that might be written up into some kind of philosophical paper, when the door opened and a black lady came in.

She was well groomed, overweight, wearing red stretch pants, a loose green top, and pink house shoes. All she needed was a church-lady hat with a fishing lure and a golf ball sewn onto it. She was carrying a purse about the size of an overnight bag. She could have been forty. She could have been fifty. She was certainly tired-looking.

I took my feet off the desk.

She said, "You the only one here?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Where's that black one?"

"Leonard or Marvin?"

Marvin was no longer there. He had sold the business to Brett, but I thought she still might be referring to him.

"They black?" she asked.

"Yes, ma'am. All the time."

"They both work here?"

"Actually, only one of them does. Like me, he's a worker bee."

"Which one of them black fellows looks like he's pissed off?"

"That would be both of them. One is stocky and sometimes carries a cane, and he's maybe five or six years older than me. He's no longer here. The other one is muscular and my age and likes vanilla cookies. Just like these."

I patted the bag.

"I guess it's the muscular one I saw."

"Now that I think about it, they're both muscular. But one is older and heavier, like a bear that was trained to wear clothes."

She was studying me hard.

"As you can see," I said, "I'm not either of the black ones."

"I was just thinking I can't tell how old you are. White people, they're hard to judge. Can I have a cookie?"

"Take two. Would you like coffee?"

"You got a clean cup?"

"You bet I do."

She told me how she liked it. I got up and fixed her a cup. No artificial sweetener for her; she took four packages of sugar, stirred it with one of our plastic spoons, tasted it, asked for one more package, and I gave it to her. While she drank her coffee, she dunked one of her cookies in it and nibbled. She knew what was up.

"I guess it don't matter which one it is. I seen him come up the stairs and go down, so I figured he worked here, and him being black, I thought I'd want to talk to him."

"Some of us white folks talk and investigate pretty good."

"I guess so."

"How'd you see him?"

"What do you mean?"

"The black guy, Leonard. I assume you weren't in the tree by the parking lot with a pair of binoculars."

"Are you being a smartass?"

"Only a little."

"I live across the street, Master Detective. That's why I'm here in my house shoes. I sort of put on what was in front of me."

"I guessed that."

"No you didn't," she said.

"All right, I didn't."

"I got some money. I don't want anything for free."

"I've offered nothing for free."

"Uh-huh," she said. She removed a change purse from her very large handbag, which had enough room for an alternate universe, and probed around in it like she was digging for King Solomon's gold. She took out a wad of bills that would have choked a dinosaur and slapped those on the desk, poured some coins on top of them.

She looked at me. I reached over and pulled the money close and counted it out. It was a big wad, but most of it was in small denominations. Forty dollars in ones, a five, a dog-eared twenty with a chewed corner, chewed by an actual dog, maybe. There was twenty-eight cents in change and a nice pile of lint and a round chunk of peppermint wrapped in plastic. She took the peppermint back and dropped it into her purse. I bet that peppermint is still falling.

“What’s that buy me?” she asked.

“Honestly? A cup of coffee, some of these cookies, and maybe you and me could go to the movies.”

“I don’t date white men.”

“I know how to show a lady a good time.”

“I ain’t prejudice, mind you. I just don’t deal with white people any more than I have to.”

“That’s kind of the definition of prejudice.”

“So that won’t get me nothing?”

“Tell me what’s going on, and maybe I can see what this will do for you. It might be a simple business that I can take care of quickly.”

“I need you to talk to a fellow.”

“I guess we’ll be talking about something specific?”

“What’s that mean?”

“Means you have a point to all this. You would want me, or the darker gentleman, to talk to him about something that’s on your mind, right?”

“I suppose you could say that,” she said. “I think my son was murdered.”

“Oh,” I said.

Now I was truly interested. I had feared this would be a lost-cat job, and though I’ve nothing against reuniting folks with their lost pets, most of the time a cat will just come home.

“I want the black man to do it ’cause he’s black.”

“You think that would help?”

“You might not fit into the projects in Camp Rapture.”

I nodded. “That could be true. Sounds to me like you need the police. I know a good cop that can help you.”

“I been to the cops. They say I need proof.”

“Yep. That’s the way it works.”

“This is in Camp Rapture,” she said.

“Ah,” I said. “The pit.”

“Shit hole is more like it,” she said.

“Cop I was talking about is one of the black men you saw here, Marvin Hanson, but he’s a LaBorde cop, not Camp Rapture.”

“Then get the other one,” she said. “I want the black man here to get proof. Dealing with cops makes my ass hurt and nothing gets done.”

"When I'm not toting a bale for them ole white masters or hoeing a row of cotton, I work here as well. And I gave you the vanilla cookies. Trust me, the black one, he wouldn't have given you the crumbs in the bottom of the sack."

"You ain't never hoed no row of cotton."

"And neither have you. Only cotton around here in the last fifty years is in an aspirin bottle."

That made her grin.

I said, "I have done farmwork, though. Used to work in rose fields. I worked in an aluminum chair factory, had an unfortunate period of employment at the chicken plant—"

"You worked there?"

"I didn't fit in. It was what you might call an unsuccessful period in my work history."

"I worked there."

"When?"

She told me.

"I was there then," I said.

"Say you was?"

"I was."

"You remember that woman got attacked on the other side of the fence, and a white fellow climbed over it and saved her?"

"That was me."

"No it wasn't."

"Yes it was."

"You the one…you was thinner then, wasn't you?"

"Thanks for noticing."

I had just been congratulating myself on how much weight I had lost, and now she was telling me I was thinner then. Certainly I had been a bit more spry.

"I was right there in the crowd," she said. "I didn't know that was you."

"Yep. I got a free vacation from the employer out of it. It wasn't as refreshing as I would have hoped. But that's neither here nor there."

I didn't mention the black man she wanted to take her case had gotten us left by a cruise ship, and then we had been attacked by thugs on a beach, and Leonard had gone around wearing an embarrassing hat and a bad wound. We got wounded a lot. We had a way of annoying people.

"Okay," she said. "Okay. That's good. You was the one, that's good.

You did good by that girl. Saving her like that. You're hired."

"Keep in mind I can only do so much for this amount of money."

"You talk to this fellow seen the murder, that's all I want. Start there."

"All right. Tell me what it is me and this fellow will be talking about. Besides murder, I mean. I'm going to need details. I'll want to visit with the cops too."

She shook her head. "I don't like that. I said I talked to them. Shit. I'm pretty sure they was the ones done it."

2

Her name was Louise Elton, and she had a hell of a story. When she finished giving me all her details, I called Leonard. He didn't pick up, so I left a message. I'd hoped he might be back in town but didn't expect him to be. He and John, his longtime lover, were still broken up, something they did about as often as cows went to pasture, and Leonard had decided to play the field. That's how he met the guy on the Internet.

Louise's son's name was Jamar. There wasn't any proof the cops killed him, except there was a guy who claimed to have seen it. But there were problems with his story, or at least that's how the cops saw it. She was convinced this guy had information I could use.

I thought I could at least talk to him and get a read. His name was Timpson Weed. The projects in Camp Rapture were where Timpson hung his hat, if he wore one. It was not a nice place and white people were still considered the enemy down there. Thing was, though, I was bored, and Leonard wasn't around, and I had a number for the apartment.

After having a lunch of some very bad soup I heated in the office microwave, I gave Buffy a pat, got my coat, and drove over to Camp Rapture. It was a fairly short drive from LaBorde, and the projects looked like a place where dreams went to commit suicide and hope got screwed in the ass.

It was a cold day, and my breath came out white when I got out of the car. I pulled my coat tighter around me, started walking along the cracked sidewalk toward a row of apartments. They looked rough. The bricks were chipped, the walls were painted with graffiti, sweet nothings like I FUCKED YO MAMA AND HER PUSSY STANK.

There were similar remarks here and there, names plastered on the wall with what the police liked to call gang signs. Sometimes, if the same signs were on an underpass, they claimed they were satanic. They liked to keep it simple. Whatever they wanted them to be, they became.

Cops in Camp Rapture had really gotten a bad rap of late, though for that matter, they had always had a bad rap, and there was some evidence it was deserved. Not six months ago, they had "discovered" a car thief in a ditch near the car he had stolen, and he'd been shot in the back of the head five times. He was written down as a suicide. That didn't hold up, of course, but I think they thought it might, which gives you some idea of their level of professionalism.

I saw a group of young black men moving in my direction. Late teens and twenties. They were walking that kind of tough-guy walk where one leg seems to drag behind the other. They had their hands in their pockets and there might have been something other than hands in those pockets. Not expecting a shoot-out, I hadn't brought my gun with me. I hated how it was for them, young men without jobs or much in the way of future plans, but mostly I hated there were five of them and there was one of me.

"How are you gentlemen?" I said as they gathered around.

"We fine," said one of them. He was a tall kid with long, lean muscles and a red shower cap on his head. I've never quite understood that fashion statement, but I will say this: If it rained or he decided on a quick shower, he was ready.

"What you want?" said the one with the shower cap.

"Money and fame, of course."

"You a smartass?" said Shower Cap. This question came up frequently.

"Yep."

"You won't be so smart with your teeth on the ground and your ass kicked up around your neck."

"I would neither be smart nor happy if that were to happen," I said. "I'm looking for a fella. You might know him. I have an apartment number."

"We know him, you can bet your white ass we won't be pointing him out," Shower Cap said.

"Well, as I prefer not to bet my white ass, thank you for your time," I said.

I walked through a gap in the near circle they had made and didn't look back. When it came to young men with nothing to do and chips on their shoulder, you handled it the way you handled junkyard dogs. Show no fear, don't make eye contact, and walk away slowly and hope they don't bite you on the ass.

I walked toward where I thought the number of the apartment might be but wasn't. The numbers were wonky. I went around the other side of the apartment. There were a bunch of kids playing on that side, boys and girls, eleven years old or so, kicking a ball around.

They stopped as I came around the corner. White-man sightings were as rare as Bigfoot in those parts. One of the little girls said, “What you doing around here?”

She was rough-looking, had her hair in cornrows, and was wearing clothes that looked to have been handed down from someone larger. She had on pink tennis shoes with dirty white shoestrings in them. She wore an oversize T-shirt with writing that said MY ASS MATCHES YOUR FACE.

Charming.

“Looking for someone?” I said.

“You po-po?”

“I am not the po-po. Aren’t you kids supposed to be in school, or maybe setting fire to something?”

“It’s Saturday, fool,” the girl said.

“You know,” I said, “it is.”

“Course it is, and tomorrow be Sunday, and the day after that be Monday.”

“In school, I bet you make As.”

“Naw I don’t.”

“But your marks in personality are high, aren’t they?”

“What?”

“Nothing. I’m looking for a man named Timpson Weed. I got five dollars for the first person points me to where he lives, and if he actually lives there, I got another five when I come back from seeing him.”

I was already out a large part of my initial down payment on the case.

The little girl gave me the hairy eyeball, like a banker considering your credit report. “Let me see you money.”

I took a five out of my wallet and held it between my fingers.

“Right there,” she said. She pointed at a door on a landing above us.

“I was told number nine-oh-five, not six-oh-five.”

“You know so good, why you asking?”

“That is a very good point.”

I had asked because the lady who hired me said she couldn’t remember if it was a nine or a six. This way I had confirmation. Either that or I had just been worked out of five dollars.

I gave her the bill, went up the stairs and over to the door. I could smell cooking food from under it, chicken and dumplings and a lot of onions. I could also hear the TV going, a game show. I knocked on the door. I waited through a couple of ice ages before it was opened.

It was a short woman with a flower pattern on her housecoat. She was about thirty-five. She had her hair cut close. She was a little thick, with breasts that appeared to need somewhere else to live, there not being enough room in the housecoat. She wore fluffy pink house shoes, a fresher pair than those Mrs. Elton had worn; must have been a trend. They were open in the front and her toes stuck out and her toenails were painted silver. Her fingernails didn't match. They were red.

"What you want?"

"And good afternoon to you."

"What the fuck you want? I got things to do."

"I was told this was the address of the charm school."

"The what?"

I was being uppity and an asshole, but all I was trying to do was help Louise Elton get a fair shake for her son and I had gotten nothing but shit from an eleven-year-old on up. For all I knew, Louise's son Jamar was a bad guy and had died being bad, but the idea was to find out, and so far I was batting nothing. On the other hand, considering how it was in Camp Rapture, at least in some sections, I'd be suspicious too, especially if they thought I was a cop.

"Who's that at the door?" I heard a voice say.

I tried peeking around the woman in the doorway, but that wasn't possible. She had a way of moving so that she was in my eye line. A moment later a big black man without a shirt came to the door and eased her aside.

"What's all this racket?" he said.

"This peckerwood done here asking questions," the woman said.

"Go on back in there and watch the stove. And pull that goddamn housecoat together, woman."

She gave me a look that almost knocked me over the railing, then disappeared in the back to watch the stove and whatever was cooking.

"What you want?" the big man said. He was really big. Tall, wide, and though he had some belly, it wasn't all fat that was moving around under it. Somewhere in there were some abdominal muscles that wanted to show me they were still hard, just slightly marbled.

"Are you Timpson Weed?"

"What if I am?"

"Louise Elton sent me?"

"She did? She still on that business with Jamar?"

"Still is."

"That nigger's dead and most apt to stay that way. Ain't nothing else for it."

"I'm a private investigator, and she hired me to check into his death. See if maybe there was more to it than the police say."

"Course there is. Always is."

"Police aren't always out to screw you," I said. "I know some good ones."

"Ought to try being a nigger for a day."

"Black cop, I'm talking about."

"Yeah, he's just a white man painted over. I've had some experience."

I didn't see any point arguing.

"I'm just trying to help her out," I said.

"Taking her money, you mean."

"Not much money."

He studied me for a while. "I ain't got nothing much to say."

"Tell me the little you have to say?"

He had grown quiet, as if there were spies in the woodwork.

"I don't know," he said.

"It's to help a lady out. If it's not what she wants to believe, then that's better than not knowing what happened."

"Tell you what, you buy me a beer."

"Where?"

"The joint outside the city limits. Seven o'clock."

"Joint have a name?"

He laughed. "That's just it. It's called the Joint."

"Seven p.m. I'll find it."

"Might want to bring a razor and a billy club with you. The clientele is old-school."

"Meaning?"

"They don't like white guys. Hell, they ain't that fond of each other."

3

I went downstairs and started across the lot, and here came those young men again, the red shower cap in the lead, all of them doing that leg-drag act. I had a feeling they had decided to give me a bit of a bounce just to show Whitey who was in charge down here. I was glad to let them be in charge.

I glanced around to see if there was another way to my car, but there was only a clearing to the right and the projects to the left. The clearing led across a dried-out field of grass littered with broken bottles and no telling what all. On the other side of it was another housing project. I would have had to have packed a camp stove and provisions to walk that far around to avoid trouble. That's what I should have done anyway, but my pride wouldn't let me. Or, to be more exact, I was too lazy to do it.

The little girl I gave the five dollars to came out of an open door in the projects and said, "You find him?"

I stopped, kept an eye on the young men. They were still coming.

"I did," I said.

"Then you owe me five dollars now, don't you?"

"Guess I do."

"Ain't no guessing about it."

I got five dollars out of my wallet, glanced toward the young men. They had stopped and started to mill, like they were waiting on me. Behind them, coming up the walkway, I saw Leonard. He had gotten my message, which meant he had been near home when I called. He was walking in that kind of swagger he has, his head held up; his eyes, even from a distance, looked like two hard nuggets of coal. He had on a shadow-black fedora, his new affectation, and he wore it like he was a black Humphrey Bogart and was swinging two sets of nuts.

"Them boys don't like you none," said the little girl, glancing in their direction.

"I don't even know them."

"That why they don't like you."

"I don't plan to agitate them."

"They always agitated. That big one, got on the blue shirt, that Laron. He lives to fuck people up."

"You got a mouth on you, kid."

"Ought to heard my mama."

"What about the one in the shower cap?"

"He bad as Laron. Laron, he don't talk much, but Tuboy, he a talker, and he sneaky. He got a razor he carry behind his back under his shirt."

"Thanks for the tip."

"Won't do you no good."

The boys were starting to come my way again.

"They gonna sort yo' shit just 'cause they can."

"It might sort out different than they expect."

"Why, you gonna turn into a bunch of white boys? That your superpower?"

"My superpower is a friend in the right place," I said, and started toward the crowd of men.

Leonard had come up behind the boys now. He had already read the situation, and since he had on his badass hat, he was talking shit.

"Get the hell out of the way," I heard him say, and they parted before him as if he were a Mack truck. Leonard isn't a little guy, but he's not supersize either. He always gives the impression of being bigger, way he talks and walks. He leads with his dick, as one old man we trained martial arts with once put it.

"Hey, man," said the big one, Laron. "What the fuck you doing? Coming up in here like that."

Leonard hooked him to the head with a right and knocked him down. Laron lay still, either unconscious or wisely aware that getting up would be a bad idea.

Red Shower Cap, also called Tuboy, turned then, brought his hand out from behind his back. I got a glimpse of the razor opening. I started running toward them.

Leonard stepped up and hit Tuboy in the mouth while he was bringing his hand around. Tuboy fell to his knees and dropped the razor. He rocked in place.

One of the young men looked as if he might try and pick the razor up.

"Fixin' to be a stack of you assholes laying up in here," Leonard said, whipping his head around, glaring at the others.

They stepped back.

I arrived.

"Good," Leonard said. "Now you show up. You stop for a bowl of chili?"

"Came as fast as I could, but I did want that chili."

Leonard reached over and grabbed the shower cap on Tuboy's head, yanked it off. There were cornrows underneath and there was lint in the cornrows.

"What you got this on for, you stereotypical country motherfucker," Leonard said. He looked at the others. "I ought to just slap the ever-loving pig shit out of all of you. Living up in here like a pack of roaches, wearing a fucking shower cap. What are you, animals?"

I thought, Animals wear shower caps?

"You ain't got no call to talk to us like that, brother," said one of the young men.

"I ain't your fucking brother. Shoo on out of here, and take these fat asses with you. I'll keep the shower cap. I'm going to shit in it."

They scattered like geese. They didn't bother to take Laron or Tuboy with them. It was every asshole for himself. Tuboy was still on his knees. His eyes were glazed. He was probably seeing little blue gnomes riding on unicorns.

"He's out, Leonard," I said.

Leonard used the palm of his hand to push him. Tuboy groaned a little, toppled, and lay on his side.

The little girl came over. "You think you're bad, don't you?" She said this to Leonard.

"Baby girl, I don't think, I know I'm bad."

"Them boys hold grudges," she said.

"Do they now? Well, that's going to worry me for days. Who the hell are you?"

"Reba. I was named after a white lady that sings."

"Yeah?" Leonard said.

"Mama liked that cracker shit. I don't. I like me some real music. I mainly go by Little Woman."

"You just made that up," Leonard said.

"Startin' now, then."

"I like Reba," Leonard said. "I mean the singer, if that's who you're talking about. You I don't like at all, you little snot-nosed pile of rat shit."

"Leonard," I said. "Kid."

"This ain't no kid. That there is a fucking four-hundred-year-old midget vampire.”

“Fuck you,” Reba said.

“Fuck you too,” Leonard said.

“You ain’t black at all?”

“What the fuck color am I? This look like shoe polish to you?”

“Uncle Tom is your color.”

“Yeah, well, you want to stay in the goddamn projects and wear your own shower cap and house shoes and whine about the Man keeping you down, you go on and do it. Me, I spit in the Man’s fucking face, tell him it’s face wash, and he’s got to like it.”

“I hope you get et up by a tiger,” she said, walking away.

“Not likely,” Leonard said.

“Leonard, really? You’re going to pick a fight with a kid?”

“She started it. Ancient midget-ass motherfucking vampire.” He yelled out to her then. “I hope your fucking tricycle has a flat.”

She kept walking away, and without looking back, she stuck her hand up in a fist, extended her middle finger.

4

Leonard carried the red shower cap out to his pickup like a scalp he had taken in battle. He opened the door on the driver's side, tossed it inside.

"Can you believe that? Motherfucker going around with a fucking shower cap on his head, and he didn't even have a new do drying out under it, just a nappy head. What the fuck, man?"

"You are not a nice man, Leonard."

We climbed in our respective rides and drove back to LaBorde. Leonard passed me with his window down, waving at me and showing me nearly all of his teeth. He had removed his fedora and was wearing the red shower cap.

Back in LaBorde we drove to the office, went upstairs, Leonard now wearing the fedora again. Buffy met us at the door and I took her out for a walk and to do her business. When she finished and I had a plastic bag of dog poo in the dumpster, I went upstairs and washed my hands. While I did that, Leonard hugged Buffy. He was the one who had rescued her, and I was the one who took her home. He said, "So give me the usual shit about my hat. Get it over with."

"I like it."

"What's that? My hearing going?"

"I like it."

"Be still, my fucking heart."

"No. The fedora works. Only hat you ever wore that worked, except for a cowboy hat. Though, I have to say, that shower cap was precious. Seemed closer to your true soul."

"Fuck you. What exactly were you doing in the projects, anyway? Your message was cryptic. Old as you are, you ought to know the projects ain't a good place for you to be. You might fall down and be yelling, 'I can't get up 'cause a bunch of niggers are whipping my ass.'"

"I was doing fine," I said. "Since when have a bunch of jerks like those guys scared me?"

"I give you that, but that was a double-team job. You being up in there talking to my peeps without backup, and you lily-white, that's not smart, Hap. We go into a place where it's all cracker motherfuckers, I like you with me, so you could have waited a while."

"I concede your point."

"Do you now?"

"I do. But they're not your peeps, Leonard. Except for me and Brett and your reflection in the mirror, you pretty much don't have peeps. And I don't think you would wait on me if you got a wild hair up your ass, cracker motherfuckers or not."

"True. Up in there, though, them projects, you can get your ass killed. Them ain't good people."

"They're not all bad people."

"Yeah, but there's bad enough ones there to get you killed while the good ones watch. You'd think someone would clean that place up, way it is."

"Easy to say from the outside," I said.

"Shit, man, you drove by a white-trash fucker's house and seen it falling down, a washing machine and a stack of tires on the lawn, you'd just think he was lazy-ass trash. You see black folk living like pigs, then you start handing out your liberal bullshit about how they are downtrodden."

"They are. You should know that."

"I know black folk been run over by a lot of shit, but a lot of what runs them over is their own self-pity. I was taught to work."

"They need a job so they can work," I said.

"Need to get off their ass and go look for one, same as them white-trash motherfuckers, who I bet you ain't so sentimental about. Way I see it, color ain't got nothing to do with that lame-ass shit. You go to work or you don't. Opportunities ain't always been there for black folks, but there sure ain't any when you're nested up in some shit hole living on a government check with a crack den next door."

"Wow. That is stereotypical, Leonard. You really got to stop watching Fox News and listening to white-boy talk radio and using the word nigger so much."

"It ain't got a damn thing to do with black and white," he said.

I knew there was no way we were even going to meet in the middle on this, so I told him what Louise Elton had told me.

"So she says cops killed her son, and this fellow you were talking to seen it, but he don't want to talk to you in the projects?"

"Pretty much it, yeah."

"He wants free beer, Hap. You take him out, buy him a beer, and he'll tell you he saw an alien eating green cheese out of a dead dog's ass on the fucking landing outside his window."

"You have very little faith in mankind," I said. "Of course, I don't have much either. But I'm going to hope on an individual. Hell, he went in and told the police for Louise. They didn't believe him, or didn't want to. Also, the backstory is a little more complex."

"Whose backstory?"

"Louise's. She gave me some background on things."

"Let me get a cookie…Wait, what the hell, man? Those are my cookies. Why are they on the desk?"

"Louise was company. I thought we should share."

"Fuck Louise. Them cookies were hid."

"You are a lousy hider."

"Damn near the whole bag is gone."

"She liked to dip them in coffee."

"I bet she wasn't the only one."

He snatched at the bag, pushed the fedora back on his head, and started eating what was left. That wouldn't take long.

While he ate, vengefully, I told him all Louise had told me.

5

Louise has a young teenage daughter and, according to her, a fine-looking one. And one night, driving home, she gets pulled over by the police. They tell her she's drunk, but she doesn't drink."

"That may not mean much, a mother telling you her young daughter don't drink," Leonard said. "I bet, to hear Mama tell it, she don't fuck or wear white after Labor Day neither. You know how that is."

"Agreed. But she's pulled over, and the cop, a white cop, he says, 'Tell me your birthday,' et cetera, and then 'Say your ABCs,' and she does this, doing the singsong way of saying the ABCs, and Louise said her daughter, Charm, didn't miss a lick."

"Her name is Charm?"

"Yeah."

"What the fuck happened to Alice, Mary, Karen, and such?"

"Leonard. I didn't name her. So Charm does this, and then the cop says, 'Tell me your driver's license number.' And she does. Can you do that?"

"I can't."

"Louise said Charm did, but the cop, he has her follow him to the station. He takes her in, puts her in an interrogation room, but—get this—handcuffs her. It's just him and her in there and probably no camera. That's my guess. Anyway, Charm says this officer, Officer Coldpoint, he checks her for weapons, but mostly he just rubs his hands over her tits and ass, presses his cock up against her backside."

"This is Charm's story now? Right?"

"Right. So when Coldpoint gets through, he kind of tugs her pants down a little in back, and then he takes her out and cuffs her to a radiator in the back hallway where they bring in baddies. She says she was standing there all night, handcuffed. She asked to take a Breathalyzer right away, but Coldpoint didn't do it. Said he didn't need to, had her dead to rights. She asked for a phone call, asked for a lawyer. Nothing. All night she's handcuffed there and they're bringing in druggies and all manner of assholes, and they see her as they go by, and one of them wets his finger and dips it down her pants into her ass crack, and she's got to hear all the usual smartass remarks jerks make about a good-looking woman, 'cause that kind of talk works so well for lining up dates. Dumbasses with brains a lot smaller than their balls."

"You think things like that," Leonard said. "And sometimes you say them to me, about women."

"I don't manhandle or mistreat women," I said.

"True. But you notice what you think is a good female ass. I don't know exactly what that is, liking men and all. I do know you don't have a good ass."

"Uh-huh. Next morning, this lady cop, Manuela Martinez, she sees Charm there, asks her what's going on. Charm tells her, and Martinez lets her out of the cuffs, lets her go. No questions. No explanations. She's one moment handcuffed, next moment out on the bricks."

"I'd have had me about two lawyers buried up their asses then, and one little back-up lawyer just so I'd have someone to argue with them in the hallway. I'd go hire me that fucking four-hundred-year-old vampire midget at the projects. She could just be there to give them folks shit."

"I hear you," I said. "But Charm didn't do anything at that point. Was just glad it was over. Or thought it was. Next thing she knows this cop is following her around. She drives to the store to get a quart of milk and a box of tampons, there he is. She goes to bed at night, looks out the window, he's parked there, shining a laser pointer at her, that kind of shit. She calls the police station to lodge a complaint, and no one seems able to take it. She even goes to the police station. They're not having it. This other cop, this Manuela, she's fired. Charm doesn't know why, but Manuela has been given her pink slip. So she can't even talk to her about it, least not in an official capacity.

"This harassment shit goes on for months, this cop following her, pulling her over for a broke taillight that wasn't broke before but got broke in the night."

Leonard leaned back in his chair and looked into the emptiness of his cookie bag. "That's some serious shit, man. You believe this Louise lady?"

"I believe it's what she believes. But I haven't gotten to the good part yet. So Charm's brother, Jamar—"

"What is up with these made-up names?"

"All names are made up, Leonard. So the brother, he's pissed, and he's in the car a couple times when this cop is following Charm around.

He goes in to see the cops, and the next thing, he's arrested. They said for starting a fight with Officer Coldpoint. He claimed he only spoke to him, said he was mad, all right, but didn't shove, hit, or bother anyone the way they said it happened."

"This is what he told his mother?"

"That's right. He gets out of jail pretty quick, 'cause they decide to let him go. Next thing Jamar does is he starts filming the cops outside his house—"

"Wait. You said cops, but I thought it was just Coldpoint."

"And his partner. I have his name in my notes somewhere. Maybe some of the others' too. I think other cops were drafted into the cause, at least now and then."

"Hell. Wait a minute. I remember Coldpoint. You remember? He worked at the LaBorde cops for a while."

"I don't remember, but I'll take your word for it. Anyway, Jamar is videoing them with his phone, taking notes, keeping track of when they show up and what they do, and next thing Louise knows there's word Jamar got in a fight and got killed at the projects."

"That's the place for it," Leonard said.

"You're going to stay on that, aren't you?"

"I am."

"Except why was he there? Didn't have any reason to be there, Louise said."

"Louise may be more deluded than Lois Lane about Superman's identity. I mean, really, Clark is wearing a pair of glasses and has his cowlick pushed back. That's a disguise?"

"Is this going to lead to can Captain Marvel beat up Superman? Are who runs the fastest, Superman or the Flash?"

"Well, the comics always cheated on that part about who could run fastest. I think it should have been the Flash. I mean, that's his power. He's fast, and now Superman, he can do that too, he can tie him? I don't buy it. He's got all them other powers, and they have to have him fast as the Flash? That ain't right, man."

"Back to business. Jamar had never been in trouble, nothing. Straight-A student in high school, same as his first year at college."

"But still he was found dead in the projects, and probably went there in the middle of the night?"

"That's the speculation."

"You know why folks go to the projects in the middle of the night, right?"

"To score drugs, mostly. Maybe take in the beautiful sights."

"Bad things do go on there, and as you saw earlier, bad things can happen to strangers who show up there."

"The bad things I saw there were you punching people in the head. The homeys had bad things happen to them, not the strangers."

"True."

"Okay, Jamar, he could have gone there for a nice little bag of something in powder or pill form, what have you, and he didn't have the money, or the would-be seller didn't care he had it or not, could have decided to keep his wares, take Jamar's money, and mash his head. It could be that and nothing more."

"It happens," Leonard said. "Tweakers selling to tweakers, folks get crazy easy."

"Yep, but we don't really know why he was there, and that doesn't mean he needed to die. And then there's one other thing. This man I'm going to see tonight at the Joint. He says he saw cops kill Jamar."

"Yeah. That's some bad business, buddy."

"East Texas hasn't exactly been the land of opportunity for black people."

"Not that much opportunity for anyone here. Not unless you're a doctor, a lawyer, or a drug dealer. But being black and poor doesn't mean I'm going to live in the projects and be tormented by some fucking thug in a shower cap. I live where I want."

"No. You live where you can afford to live. And you're right. That is fucked up about Superman tying the Flash. I'm not buying it."

"Now you're talking."

We bumped fists.

6

We drove to Camp Rapture that night in Leonard's truck to meet up with my secretive snitch.

"You kept the red shower cap, didn't you?" I said as Leonard tooled us along, head thrown back, fedora dipped in front, one hand on the wheel.

"Did not."

"You had it on and were fucking with me."

"That was it. I was fucking with you."

"So I'll never see the shower cap again."

"I don't think so."

"Don't think so?"

"Don't pressure me, Hap."

"You do look cool in that fedora."

"Like I value your opinion."

"But you do."

"Do not."

"Do."

"So you like it?" he said.

"Stylish, brother. You found something that works for you. I know how hard that must be for you."

"You're still searching, though," Leonard said. "Your daughter doing okay?"

"Yep."

"That's working out?"

"Except she and Brett have the colds from hell. I think it might be flu. Brett actually asked that I stay at the office tonight. They are seriously infectious. And I don't want that shit they got."

"But you don't mind sharing their germs with me?"

"I don't have a single symptom," I said. "And I'm keeping it that way. I'm actually kind of enjoying being on my own at the office. Well, there's Buffy. It's nice for a change of pace. Me and Buffy can play checkers until late at night. She hasn't quite got chess down yet."

"You can stay at my place, asshole."

"I'm fine at the office. John and you might get back together, and I'd rather not hear you fucking behind the wall. I can't enjoy that. I keep thinking something is in the wrong hole."

"Long as I've known you, you are still bothered by it?"

"Not the gay, just the act. I don't want to hear it going on."

"That's the same."

"How do you feel about heterosexuality?"

"Nothing against it, but it makes me kind of go eeew."

"Now you get it."

"I'm going to tell Brett you referred to her equipment as a hole."

"I was just speaking in a general way."

"Uh-huh."

"Please don't," I said.

"I'll consider on it," he said.

We pulled up at the Joint. There was a scattering of cars in the lot, most of which looked to be on their last set of rims and happily ready for the car crusher. As we walked toward the entrance we could hear hip-hop popping on a jukebox. When we got to the door, pushed it open, and stepped inside, the place was mostly dark except for neon word twists and beer signs that gleamed with colored light. There was the pulsing glow of an old-time jukebox to the right, and to the left mostly empty tables, except for two guys in a booth against the wall. I didn't see Timpson Weed.

The air smelled of beer and barbecue, a faint aroma of fried hamburgers and onions. There was a little kitchen at the back, to the side of the bar. There was a lit window there and a shelf where the orders could be picked up. There was a sharp-looking black woman with a kerchief over her hair. She was tucked into a pair of shorts so brief the back of them was disappearing into the crack of her ass. She had a tray with beers and food on it and was carrying it toward the rear. She turned her head and gave Leonard a look. Hell. What was I, smashed peanuts? He ain't even batting for your team, gal.

She went on by, and Leonard swaggered over to the bar and sat down on a stool in front of it. I sat beside him. A bartender glided up like a wraith. His face was dark and the blue and red neon lights along the back of the bar made his longish, wild hair shine oddly. His teeth caught the neon when he turned toward us, and the lights gave them a colorful sheen. They looked small in his enormous head.

“You gentlemen might be in the wrong place,” he said.

“No, this is it,” Leonard said.

“Well, I was thinking your friend here might have taken a wrong turn at Sears. Last time a white man in here probably about 1700 and he was scalped by Indians.”

“You’re a real historian,” Leonard said.

“I’ve been told.”

“You ain’t no Indian.”

“Oh, I got some Cherokee in me.”

“When that Indian did the scalping was up in here, did he order a beer? I know I’m going to. Hap here, he’ll have a Diet Coke or some such, and if you got Dr Pepper, I’ll have that for a chaser.”

“You are some tough drinker,” the bartender said to me. “Diet Coke?”

“Put it in a dirty glass,” I said. “Though from the looks of things, that might be standard.”

The bartender smiled broadly. There were bubbles of spit on his teeth, and the teeth and bubbles shimmered with neon light. The bartender had a way of holding his mouth open when the smile was gone, like a whale cruising for plankton.

“It’s just that my clientele don’t enjoy me having white folks for customers,” he said.

Leonard looked around. Besides the waitress, dropping off orders, in the back, two black men at a booth lingered there with all the excitement of a poetry reading. They didn’t even look at the waitress, which might suggest blindness. At a couple of tables nearby, some lonely drunks sat staring into their beer bottles, hoping for genies to come out of them and offer them their youth back, along with a fresh beer.

“Looks to me your clientele doesn’t know work sweat from bottle sweat,” Leonard said. “You give this man a Diet Coke if you got it, and if you don’t, you give him one anyway. As for that white stuff, what the fuck you think this is, 1960? You hear of integration, motherfucker?”

“You better put a wheel lock on that mouth of yours,” said the bartender. “Integration worked the other way around.”

“Actually it works both ways,” I said.

The bartender looked at me. Leonard looked at me.

“Don’t get your fingers in my jam jar, Hap. I’m kind of on a roll here.”

“Only roll you gonna be on is rolling out that door with my foot up your ass,” said the bartender.

"Now how can I roll with a foot up my ass?" Leonard said. "That don't make sense."

The waitress glided behind us and started through a door at the back. She paused at the door, cocked her ass, and gave Leonard a look that a straight man would remember on his deathbed.

Leonard said, "Save it, honey, I suck dicks."

She looked startled, lost her smile, went on through the door and out of sight.

"I bet you do," the bartender said.

"Oh, I do. Just not yours."

The bartender realized Leonard was serious, and his mouth made a shape like he had just bitten into a sour persimmon.

"I like my dicks clean and attractive, and I like the bodies attached to them not to look like they pull a beer wagon on its way to the barn."

"I done told you where my foot's gonna go," said the bartender, "but considering what's been up your ass, I'm reconsidering that."

"Your foot goes in there, little gel might get on it. I just had a fresh one up there this morning, and I don't mean a foot. Wasn't that good, actually. It was like fucking a bedpost with Vaseline on it. I like it warm and loving. This wasn't. That's all right, though. A dick in the ass is better than a greased cucumber any day."

The bartender was going through a list of snappy comebacks in his head, but his mouth wasn't delivering.

Leonard checked his watch.

This confused the bartender.

"How long does this fucking song last?" Leonard said. "What is that shit?"

"Music," said the bartender.

"That what you call it?"

"I like it," I said.

"You got no taste in music," Leonard said. Then to the bartender: "Jesus, you need to get you some Hank up in here, some Loretta, Kasey Lansdale, Merle Haggard, or Reba. Going too fast for you? I was wanting you to write this down. You know, make a list for your distributor."

"You some kind of hoedown nigger?" the bartender said.

"I thought you was about to put a foot up my ass," Leonard said. "I think you got a certain hesitation, is what I think."

About that time Timpson Weed came in and strolled over to us. He sat on the stool by me.

Bartender said to Timpson, "You know these motherfuckers?"

“The white one.”

“That would be me,” I said, raising my hand.

“I’m starting to like him better than the other one,” the bartender said.

“It’s all right,” Timpson said, nodding at me. “I invited him in to talk. I don’t know this other one.”

“This is my partner, Leonard Pine,” I said. “We work together.”

“On what?” the bartender said.

“Freelance plumbing,” I said. “Let’s have that beer and Diet Coke, and whatever this man wants. Put it on my tab.”

“You don’t have one,” said the bartender.

“Fix me one up,” I said. “You got any peanuts?”

“Not for you,” the bartender said.

We slid away from the bar and went over to a table and sat down.

“You have me come here so you could screw with me?” I said.

“I ain’t screwed with you,” Timpson said.

“Yeah, but the bartender has.”

“Me and him ain’t got our legs tied together,” Timpson said. “He does what he wants.”

“Like you don’t know a honky is going to get his chain jerked in here, or worse,” Leonard said.

“He looks like he can handle himself,” Timpson said. “I seen them scars over his eyes, knot on his nose.”

“He handles himself all right,” Leonard said.

“So you were fucking with me?” I said.

“Some,” Timpson said.

He looked at Leonard, said to me, “So who is this dude?”

“Same guy he was a minute ago,” I said. “Leonard Pine.”

The barmaid brought our drinks over, but she didn’t look at Leonard this time. She put them down and moved away quickly. As expected, there were no peanuts.

I nodded at Timpson. “Tell again what you saw? Tell me what you couldn’t say at the projects.”

7

I could say it," he said, "but it worries my woman to hear it. She don't want no cops coming down on us. I tried to do the right thing, and that didn't work out so well. Ain't no right thing when you come from around here."

"Let me get my violin out," Leonard said.

"What?" Timpson said.

"Forget it," I said. "It's just us now. No cops. Me and Leonard work together, so we both need to hear it."

Timpson Weed gave Leonard a hard eyeball, but that didn't cut any ice. Leonard didn't blink. Timpson turned his attention to the two men in the back booth. They looked at him for a moment, then looked away.

"I went out on the landing to smoke," Timpson said. "I could see what anyone could see if they was out there. Figure there was plenty witnesses, but I'm the only one ended up talking. What I saw was this boy getting a beating out there in the lot. Last time I seen a beating like that it was on television and it was Rodney King, only he was big and this boy wasn't big at all. Teenager. They hit him so much like a piñata, I expected him to shit candy."

"Sure they were cops?" I asked.

"They had on cop uniforms. Three of them. They had nightsticks, them old-fashioned kind, and even though it's some distance, there's enough light there to see by. They looked at me, and I went in the apartment."

"How long did the beating go on?" Leonard asked.

"Before I went inside, maybe a minute or two, but a lot of smacking takes place in a minute or two, as they had them a three-man team. I wasn't all that against it, as there's these meth heads all up in there, and my woman's son by another man, he died of that stuff. She had a little problem on it herself for a while. But I tell you, in that time I seen them, they beat on that boy until he was flat as a rug, and then they looked and seen me, and like I said, when they looked and saw my ass, I went inside. I expected I'd get me a knock on the door. But I didn't. Next day I find out who that boy was. Not no drug dealer that anyone knew of. Though some said he was there to buy from some of them wandering niggers we got there, ones think they're tough. I heard a story about a man wearing a hat like you come up and knocked a couple of them fuckers so hard their nuts flew off. That was you, wasn't it? I'm putting it together now."

Leonard nodded. "I think their nuts come a little loose, not completely off. I was feeling a little poorly that day."

Timpson grinned, then almost immediately turned as serious as a rattlesnake.

"I got to thinking on that beating, and I thought, buyer or seller or whatnot, he was just a kid and he took a hard whacking, hard enough to smack his life loose. But he didn't have that drug-dealer look. You can't tell by looks all the time, but you get so you got an idea. I went down to the station and reported on those cops. No one had heard of them, way I described them. No record of a call-out to the projects. They didn't know nothing, including their own shoe size. I come back to the apartment, and then I got word to that boy's mother, what I seen, and I tried calling some people that said they could get me up in there with the police chief, but what that got me was a cop car following me for a few days. Finally I dropped it. I never mentioned it again. I didn't want to be another dead nigger in a ditch with his asshole pulled up over his head. Boy's mother tried to talk to them, brought up what I saw, and that's when the police start on my ass again. I drive to town to get a six-pack, they was there. I go in the toilet at a filling station, hell, they was damn near there to wipe my ass. I didn't say no more about it. I got the picture and the frame it was in. They quit following me again. I shouldn't be saying nothing to you. I don't want to get dragged in on it, but I can't forget how it sounded out there, them clubs laying into that boy. I could hear bones break up like peanut brittle. It was some shit, I tell you that."

"We'll keep you out of it for now," I said.

"For now?" Timpson said. "Man, I come in here and try to do you a solid, and you gonna put me out there in it again?"

"Only way you'd have to come back in it," Leonard said, "is we get enough shit on those cops that killed that boy, the law might want them to put you on the stand."

"Camp Rapture ain't got no law. It's a goon town when it comes to law."

"Case like this," Leonard said, "I bet we could get a trial moved to someplace like LaBorde. Cops there are run by a good man and a friend of ours. You'll get played fair by him."

"I don't trust any cops," Timpson said. "I could start having some memory loss."

"You could," I said. "But I think you could still hear them bones breaking like peanut brittle in your head. We find out what the hell happened and why—"

"He got beat to death is what happened," Timpson said.

"—we'll nail the killers' dicks to a wall, then maybe you'll feel freer to talk to the authorities."

Something passed over Timpson's face that was hard to identify. It could have been a heavy thought; it could have been gas.

"Don't count on it," he said. "Right now, consider me and you two done. I just come here for a beer. But I wish you good luck."

"By the way," I said. "Were these cops white, black, Hispanic…"

"White," he said. "Big mothers, except for one. Well, he was big, but not tall. He was about as wide as a beer truck without the wing mirrors."

"One more question," Leonard said. "Who all else did you see out there while you were watching? Who else might have seen what went down?"

"I didn't take note," he said. "I got my ass inside."

"Did you see a car the kid might have been driving?" I asked.

"No. I didn't. I didn't even see a cop car. I wasn't taking notes or taking pictures, just trying to smoke a goddamn cigar."

He turned his beer up and finished it, stood, and pushed his chair back.

"Good night, fellas," he said. "Try the pulled pork here, it's fucking divine."

He went out.

8

We sat and drank our drinks, watched the fellows in the booth at the back. They weren't interested in us at all. Or at least they pretended not to be. We were about to leave when Leonard turned and went back to the bar. I trailed after him. Leonard put money on the bar for our drinks.

"You know, I'm going to leave you a tip," Leonard said and leaned over the bar. "The tip is some advice."

"I can't spend that," the bartender said.

"It's worth having and possibly lifesaving. I wouldn't give you two cents more than the drinks," Leonard said, "but this advice is free and valuable. We ever come back in, don't fuck with us next time."

"Don't come back in."

Leonard pondered that idea.

"That's fair enough," Leonard said. "Where's your shit house? I need to pee."

"You can go somewhere else and pee," said the bartender.

Leonard leaned away from the bar, unzipped his pants, and got his dick out. He started peeing against the bar, splashing it on the floor.

"I have to pee now, not later," Leonard said. "All you had to do was tell me where the shitter was."

"You son of a bitch," the bartender said, and he reached down behind the bar.

"You've been warned," I said.

I eased up really close to the bar, leaned my face over it. I was maybe two feet from him. "Best be a bugle you pull out from behind there, and you better know how to play it."

The bartender stared into my face. He lifted his hand up. It was empty.

"Damn," Leonard said, shaking his dick, the nose-twitching smell of urine in the air. "That was refreshing. You're lucky I didn't need to shit."

One of the men in a booth at the back stood up, a heavy guy with a bit of a belly.

“Sit down,” Leonard said.

The man stretched and sat down.

Leonard zipped up, made a show of it, slow and tedious, like he was sacking up an anaconda.

The bartender glared at him. Leonard glared back. I tried to look pleasantly amused, which wasn’t that difficult.

“You know what, bartender,” Leonard said. “It smells like piss in here. You ought to clean up. Maybe spray some kind of de-stinker around.”

We went out, not too briskly, but quickly enough.

As we were climbing into our ride, I said, “Couldn’t help yourself, could you?”

“He was rude,” Leonard said.

“Thank goodness you showed him some etiquette,” I said.

Leonard nodded. “You never know what will stick with and educate a man. And if he didn’t learn anything, at least I got to pee.”

9

I drove us away from there and said to Leonard, “What do you think about Timpson?”

“Got a good story, but maybe too good. Sounded somewhat rehearsed to me, maybe mixed with some truth. I don’t know, I get weird vibes from that guy, like he’s trying to put his life in the middle of the road when he’s been whipping left and right for some time. Shit, I’m not sure he ain’t still whipping.”

“Sounded believable enough,” I said.

“Uh-huh, so do them people see Bigfoot now and then, but they ain’t yet convinced me there’s any Bigfoot, and that Timpson fellow ain’t yet convinced me that things went down like he said.”

“You are very hard to please.”

“Get the best out of life that way,” Leonard said.

* * *

Back at the office, I took Buffy for a walk, and when she finished with her business, me and her went upstairs and I washed up. I got a jar of peanut butter and a half loaf of bread from the cabinet, pulled out a jar of strawberry jelly from the minifridge, used a plastic knife to make a sandwich.

“Want one?” I asked Leonard.

“I do,” he said while washing his hands.

I made two.

I got a dog treat out of one of the drawers, a pig’s ear that was actually made of peanut butter, and gave it to Buffy. She loved those things, though they did make her fart.

I got Leonard a Dr Pepper out of the fridge and a small carton of milk for myself.

We sat at the desk, me in the client’s chair, Leonard in the other. We ate our meal.

“How was your date?” I asked.

"Dry. He didn't lubricate very well."

"Not what I meant. How was the date itself, without the details on your snake's journey down a dry well?"

"Feel stupid about it, going on one of those dating sites."

"Yeah. I didn't know they had those for gay folks."

"Yeah. We date too. Some of us own property."

"Not what I meant."

"It's new. They match you up. Me and this guy, Terrance, we have the same beliefs, similar background, though he's better educated—"

"An extra day in kindergarten and he's better educated."

"Fuck you very much. We fit just about everywhere, except in certain slots."

"Okay. Enough."

"I don't just mean those slots," Leonard said. "For once, I was being metaphorical. On paper, or onscreen, if you will, we are such a match it's a surprise we aren't long-lost twins separated at birth."

"That could be a messy dating situation if it's true," I said.

"He's as black as me, got the same politics, likes country music and even likes vanilla cookies of all denominations."

"Is he a fool for hats?"

"That I don't know. But we got together, and no chemistry. It was like a duck and a rat. They don't want to hang out. Nice-looking fellow, got a great ass, but dry, and me and him, we don't really have anything in common outside of what's on the dating site. I thought, damn, me and him can play country music while we fuck, have some vanilla cookies afterwards—"

"A hand wash will be in there someplace, right?"

"But I find him almost as interesting as a horseshoe tournament."

"Those can be tense," I said.

"Let's say almost as interesting as buttering toast, without the butter. Did I mention he's kind of dry?"

"I think it came up."

"He's like talking to a cardboard cutout, but with less expression. He has all the humor of a corpse after ten years in the ground."

"Maybe your humor sucks."

"He's like one of your jokes. You know the joke, but you don't know how to tell it. I told it, he thought it was hysterical. One about the big-mouth frog. You can't do the frog's small voice. That's what pulls it off. But that joke was his one laugh. I mean that, he laughed once."

"You said he thought it was hysterical."

"That was hysterical for him. You see, he knows what humans do, but he don't know what they're like. Mostly he's a mimic. He don't know how to play it so it ain't just an act. It's so obvious, he practically brings his scenery and sound track with him."

"Sociopath?"

"No. Just dull."

"I tell great jokes, by the way."

"No, you don't."

"So, you and him? No more dates?"

"Not sure. We definitely do not click. He's a juicy-looking thing, but there's no juice in him. He's like a plastic apple."

"Damn, this is interesting, but you know what? Let's talk about the case."

"I like to talk about me."

"Yeah, but let's don't. It always leads to a drilling expedition."

"You asked."

"My mistake."

"All right," Leonard said. "Here's what we got. Your lady Louise, she has a daughter, Charm, who got picked up by a shit-head cop and his shit-head partner. They treated her badly and a bad guy stuck a wet finger down her ass crack. A female cop let her go, and the cop got fired. Charm's brother decided to take care of her by harassing the cops who were harassing his sister. He aggravated the police who were following her around, and the cops killed him. We have an eyewitness who doesn't really want to talk about it, and who sounds fishy to me, and we got a dead kid. So thing is, or so it seems to me, we got to talk to those cops. Thing that bothers me, though, is how did the kid get to the projects? He had to have had a car. That hasn't come up, and Timpson said he didn't see one."

"Doesn't mean it wasn't there, and in the end, does it matter how Jamar got there?"

"It might. Was he dropped off? Was someone there with him that escaped a beating?"

"Or was he led to a beating?" I said.

"That crossed my mind. And how did he end up there with three cops beating him to death with old-style billy clubs. Who carries those these days? Timpson didn't see a police car either. Were they fucking beamed down by Scotty on the Enterprise?"

I took a moment to consider.

"Do you think Scotty would do such a thing?"

“No,” Leonard said. “Not really. He always seemed like one of the good guys to me…So the cops see Jamar, and they are sick of his shit, and here they have him buying dope—”

“You don’t know that,” I said.

“No, I don’t. I’m just fishing.”

“All right,” I said. “They were sick of him following them around, taking photos. They didn’t like the shoe on the other foot, saw their chance to get even. Maybe he wasn’t buying or selling shit, just like his mama said, but they might have wanted to pin dope-buying on him, or -selling. Make it look that way. Decided to have him resist arrest, even if he wasn’t. They gave him a good ass-reshuffling for annoying them, but they got too happy in their work, did the billy-club boogaloo on his head, and he died.”

Leonard nodded. “Could be. Still, something seems to be seriously missing in Timpson’s tale.”

“You keep coming back to that,” I said. “He sounded sincere.”

“And you keep coming back to that. Good liars sound sincere, which is why they’re good liars. He sees this cop killing, goes in the house, and the cops just forget him? They were willing to kill Jamar, why are they letting Timpson go? That doesn’t make any sense.”

“Good point. But I get the feeling that’s his story and he’s sticking to it.”

10

I decided I'd talk to Marvin at the cop shop. He probably knew some of the coppers in Camp Rapture, could maybe give me a lead into who was dirty there and who wasn't, who might be a contact worth having, but when I phoned him, he was out. I left a message, and then me and Leonard left for the day. I'm sure there was plenty we could do to find out who did what, but to tell you the truth, I wasn't sure what it was or how to go about it. I wished right then I had Sam Spade's private number. Of course, he'd be really old by now, might be missing a step or two. McGruff the crime-fighting dog could be available, though. We damn sure needed someone's help on this.

Me and Leonard aren't so much detectives as we are persistent bumblers, though some detective skills were wearing off on us in spite of ourselves. Thing was, though, Leonard wasn't exactly on his best game. He was acting tough, as always, and frankly, it wasn't much of an act. He was the toughest son of a bitch I knew. But he was acting tough, not only in skin and bones, but in emotions as well. He was tough enough, all right, but no one is that tough. I knew he was hurting over John.

For a while John and his niece had moved in with Leonard, then John left again, and Leonard helped the niece, Felicity, set up her own apartment. She had a job at a Starbucks and it was a good start. Like her uncle John, she was gay, and catching hell from her father because he thought gay was like choosing a haircut and all you had to do was let it grow out or get another haircut. Unlike her uncle John, Felicity knew who she was and was proud of it, and Leonard was her hero. I could understand that. He was kind of mine sometimes.

Anyway, John left again, for the umpteenth time, and Felicity stayed in LaBorde. Her having only a part-time job gave her time off, which made her think she might could get some college in come next semester. She wanted to be a pharmacist.

Leonard had plans that night to take her to dinner and a movie, give her a pep talk or some such, so his head wasn't really into the business at hand. Honestly, we could take a bit of time. Jamar wasn't going to get any deader.

I put Buffy in the car and we went home, daring ourselves to catch what the ladies had, though I guess Buffy was immune. In spite of my telling Leonard how I was enjoying a bit of time away from home, I was starting to get lonely. I missed not only Brett, but Chance as well. Each day, I found myself bonding more closely with my daughter.

Daughter.

That was really hard for me to wrap my head around, but I liked the idea a lot.

It was quiet in the house, and Chance lay on the couch as if dead. Brett was in the kitchen heating water. Buffy went over and sniffed Chance, then lay down in front of the couch.

Brett spoke softly when she saw me.

"Cold medicine. It knocked her on her ass," she said. "I'm just now recovering from the same stuff."

Brett's face was pale and her nose was red and her eyes looked watery. She had her hair pulled up and tied at the back of her head. I thought she was beautiful.

"Feel better?"

"For the moment," she said. "I think it's actually more than a cold, some kind of flu. I do okay, and then I'm not okay. It's like constantly being run over by a train, revived, and run over again. You really should stay at the office. Let me assure you, you don't want this stuff."

"As a nurse, don't you know what this stuff is?"

"Former nurse."

"So you forget everything when you quit being a nurse?"

"I was never very good at diagnosing myself, because I so rarely get sick."

I moved closer to her. She stuck her palm against my chest.

"I'm not kidding. No kissing or hugging. This virus is a bitch with a hammer."

"Maybe a kiss would make it worthwhile," I said.

"Hey, I kiss like an ace, but even my wonderful wine-sweet kisses wouldn't be worth it."

"Actually, your lips do look dry."

"They are. I'm making hot tea. Want some?"

"Sure."

"Get the honey."

I prowled through the cabinets for the honey. It was in one of those plastic bears. I put it on the table, told Brett to sit, and finished making the tea. I found some animal crackers, something I liked and Chance loved, and put the box on the table.

"My stomach won't take it," Brett said.

"More for me," I said.

"You better save Chance some of those," she said.

"Do I have to?"

"She's your daughter. Do you want to become like Leonard, way he is about vanilla cookies?"

"I do not."

"You and her are a lot alike. Genetics isn't for nothing, you know."

"Love of animal crackers is no doubt a deeply embedded genetic trait. As for environment, I'm not sure we're offering her the best there is. That being my fault, of course, not yours."

"We are doing fine. You are doing fine."

Brett sipped her tea.

"All I can taste is hot," she said.

I tasted my tea. It was fine and sweet with honey, but then again, I wasn't sick. My taste buds were working. I had an animal cracker.

"Tell me what you have going?" Brett said.

I told her about Louise and our interview with Timpson Weed.

"Sounds like you've earned your sixty-five dollars, and then some."

"I suppose so," I said.

"But you want to keep digging?"

"You know I do."

"All right," Brett said. "Let's talk about it. So the kid was following the cops around, and the next thing you know, he's dead, and Weed says he saw him beat to death in a field by the project houses by some cops?"

"Yep."

"Know what bothers me about that?" Brett said.

"The fact that three cops in plain sight beat a kid to death? Leonard also brought up the part about them just letting Timpson Weed sail loose, and that no cars were seen by Timpson, or so he said. People live there, they notice things like that. They knew I was on-site before I actually got out of my car."

"What I'm thinking is, why were the cops that stupid? Why didn't they arrest him, take him in, or, if they really had a grudge, why didn't they take him somewhere else and kill him? That would have been smarter."

“Perhaps they didn’t intend to kill Jamar,” I said. “They were mad and it got out of hand. And maybe, simply put, it was a situation of opportunity, and they’re not that smart.”

“Could be,” Brett said, and sipped at the tea and made a face.

“Stupid people get jobs too,” I said. “Thing is, folks that get the badge a lot of time couldn’t get a merit badge from the Cub Scouts, but they want the job and are persistent, qualified or not. Next thing you know, they’re carrying a gun and an attitude and have a badge pinned on their chest.”

“There are good cops.”

“Of course. Marvin is the best. I know a few others. But there are still plenty that when they were kids they got a participation trophy for coming in dead last, and they’re still mad about it. What is a fact is the kid, Jamar, was following them around, pissing them off, filming them. They didn’t expect it, didn’t like it, and the kid ends up dead.”

“Uh. I’m feeling worse.”

Brett stood up with her cup of tea and poured it in the sink.

“Should I take you to the doctor?”

“Nope. I’m a nurse. Remember?”

“Were.”

“Hasn’t been that long.”

“Now suddenly you’re falling back on your nursing credentials.”

“I like to work it the way it works best for me.”

“You make a good nurse but a lousy patient.”

“That’s probably right,” she said. “Look, I got to go back to bed. Will you check on Chance, see that her fever is going down? Mine sort of comes and goes, so I guess she’s in the same boat.”

“You look pretty weak. Need help upstairs?”

“No. I got it.”

Brett headed up and I went over to the couch and gently touched Chance’s head. It was warm, but not on fire.

I went back to the table and finished my tea. I sat there and thought about what Brett had said, and the more I thought about it, the more I wondered. Maybe she and Leonard had the right kind of suspicions. Would the cops just beat the kid to death there in plain sight? They wanted to kill him, why not get him in the car and take him some place isolated and fix him so he’s fertilizing grass. Thing was, why were they following Charm in the first place, which was the business that led to them following the brother? Those thoughts ran around and around in my head like a mouse on a hot stove.

I finished up with the tea, put the cookies away, cups in the dishwasher, started for the hall bathroom. I stopped when I passed the couch. I looked at the young woman sleeping there, my daughter. She was covered in an old quilt Brett had inherited from some relative, and all that was visible was her head on a couch pillow, her black hair tumbling over it. She looked like her mother, or at least the way I remembered her. I could see parts of me there too. Not in a Frankenstein-monster stitch-up kind of way, but in a blend of two people.

Being a father had as much to do with being present as it did with genetics. More, actually. A lot of what we say is genetics is proximity, by my reckoning, and the way we learn to be human is by example. I wasn't sure how good my example was. I had killed people, and I had hurt people. All for good reasons, I told myself, but at three in the morning, and sometimes in moments like now, I wasn't so sure I was anything more than a thug who justified his actions. Leonard, at least, believed in himself and the choices he made. I was more shaky about those things.

Chance stirred a little. I went over and sat in a chair across from the couch. She opened her eyes and saw me.

"Hey," she said.

"Hey. You still have a fever. Brett said it was really high before. Not as much now. I felt your forehead."

"I dreamed a bird lit on my head. That was you."

"Most likely. Any better?"

"Just feel unbelievably tired. Hard to pick up my arms sometimes. Brett, she's been really sick."

"I know. She was up a bit, but now she's back in bed."

"It's more than a cold."

"Brett thinks the same. Flu is my guess."

"You're going to end up with it," she said.

"I hope not. You get better, you and me, maybe we could do something."

"Arm wrestle?"

"We could."

"Badminton? Perhaps a little polo, take part in a tractor pull?"

"You're kind of a smartass."

"From what I can tell, you and Leonard and Brett are all smartasses."

"It's not as positive a trait as you might think."

"But you stay a smartass."

“Some of us have looks and some of us have brains, and some of us are just smartasses. We embrace what we have.”

She sat up on the couch, pulled the blanket around her. She reached down and gave Buffy a pat on the head.

“Can I get you something?” I asked.

“Orange juice.”

I went into the kitchen, washed my hands, poured her a glass of orange juice, and gave it to her. “Can you eat anything?”

“I don’t think so. I don’t get quite as ill as I did thinking about food now, but my stomach is still not crazy about the idea.”

“Okay, then.”

“You know, you look all right.”

“Well, I’m not sick,” I said.

“Not what I mean. You said some got the looks and others got the brains. Mama thought you looked good. I think a lot of women might.”

“So you’re saying I didn’t get the brains?”

She laughed a little. “Brett likes you for some reason.”

“There are still desperate ones in the world,” I said, “and I think in Brett’s case, her eyesight might be failing, and she likes having someone less intelligent than her around.”

“You undercut yourself a lot, but I’m not even sure you believe it.”

“Oh, that’s where you would be wrong.”

“And you three, you, Leonard, Brett, you’re all bright. I like being here. I like talking about something besides what Mama’s boyfriends talked about. Guns. Jesus, which was funny, considering they were gun fanatics and drunks, and when they weren’t talking about Jesus, they were cursing black people, gays, and so on. A few of them had been in prison. None of them had read a page of the Bible, but to hear them tell it they were God’s right-hand men.” She paused a moment. “Leonard seems to really like guns, but he’s okay.”

“Leonard likes what they can accomplish, but he’s not someone who dresses them up and talks to them. He doesn’t talk about ammo and gun grips like he’s talking about beloved family members. Well, actually, he doesn’t have any family members.”

“There’s you and Brett. Me, I hope.”

“Yeah,” I said. “You’re right. He’s my brother. And, Chance, I want you to know, I’m not a perfect kind of guy. I have some skeletons in my closet. I need to be clear about that.”

“Brett’s told me some of it. I figure there’s a lot more to it than she’s told me, but I know this: you’re a good man.”

I actually blushed. “I’m not so sure,” I said.

“I am,” she said. “I know you are.”

“Who you want me to be.”

“I truly believe you are a good man.”

“We’ll give that some time to sort out,” I said.

Right then, one thing was for sure—I wanted to be a better man than I was. For Chance.

11

After sitting by myself in the kitchen, reading an old and not-too-good Western novel now and again, I answered a brief call from Marvin and took a moment to make myself another cup of tea, which I drank quickly.

Chance was asleep again on the couch, Brett was still asleep upstairs, both of them loaded to the gills with fresh flu medicine. I was bored. I called Leonard and he came by and picked me up. I brought Buffy out to the truck with me and let her hop in the backseat. It was one of those four-door truck jobs with a shortened truck bed so as to allow a backseat.

"Wasn't sure you'd want to leave your house," I said.

"Why not. Me and Felicity went to eat, then to the movie, and, well, I could tell she wanted to go home and look at Facebook or some such shit, so I took her. Only so much time a young person wants to spend with a middle-aged person."

"Middle-aged, huh? Double your age and tell me that you are truly middle-aged."

"I'd rather not," Leonard said. "I went home, sat around, and there's no one there but me. I played with my dick awhile, but the dick wasn't interested. Ever have that happen?"

"My pecker is always curious and up for adventure."

"I don't doubt that. I remember one time when we were on a fishing trip. We were up, let me see, Caddo Lake, I think, and we were coming back, and we stopped in that little town—"

"Dangerfield."

"Maybe."

"Pretty sure that was it. Pretty sure I see this coming."

"We found this café, stopped to get a bite, and you start chatting up the waitress."

"Hair black as a raven's wing. Lips like rose petals falling apart, to quote a Bob Wills song."

“Yep,” Leonard said, nodding. “So you start chatting, and the next thing I know the place is closing and we’re going to take her home, and she has you get in the backseat with her, and damn if you two aren’t going at it like a couple of goddamn jackrabbits back there, and there I was in the front seat, a few inches from all that business. Didn’t know where I was going, just driving around like an idiot because she never gave me her address, and if that wasn’t bad enough, you didn’t just screw her until her lights dimmed, you kept going, trying to put them out. She kept saying, ‘Oh, baby, I’ve come, can’t you come?’ And you’re just pounding her so loud that old wreck of mine is vibrating like an egg timer, and you say, ‘I’ll get there when I get there,’ and then she’s screaming and yelling, ‘I’m doing it again,’ and then you still didn’t quit.”

“I am virile,” I said.

“You are an animal. It went on and on. I had to stop for gas, and you two, you’re back there still pumping away while I get gas, and might I say the sight of your raw white ass riding up and down was not a pleasure.”

“Then why were you looking?”

“I wanted to see how it worked. Shit, what do I know about being heterosexual? Curiosity set in, you see.”

“I think you wanted to see my butt.”

“That was an accident, and frankly, it’s left me a little scarred. So I put in the gas, drove to a hill overlooking a park bench, and you two went at it for hours.”

“It wasn’t hours.”

“Well, it was a long time. The car was rocking so much I was getting seasick. I got out and sat on the bench and watched the car rock. When you finished back there, I thought, Thank goodness. But then the two of you were at it again. Had no shame.”

“We were young and passion made us stupid and immodest, and I think you are exaggerating a mite.”

“I kept sitting there, and the car kept rocking, and I know for a fact that was how you actually met Chance’s mother.”

“I know you know.”

“What I been thinking is how could a beautiful girl like Chance be made from you, and, if you’ll pardon me, I think her mother would have screwed anything with pants on and maybe a few others wearing short-shorts or a kilt?”

“Our urges have nothing to do with Chance.”

“Actually, they have everything to do with her,” Leonard said.

“Well, okay. But not that night. I don’t think.”

“What messes me around is Chance looks like you, but somehow on her it’s good. Hear what I’m saying? Her mother looked good too, the way I think heterosexual women are supposed to look if they look good, but Chance looks like you.”

“Is there a point to all this?”

“Yeah. Don’t ever tell Chance how you met her mother, outside of saying you met in a café. I know you have a way with the women sometimes, and I don’t get it, but then I wouldn’t. Still, that was cheap. The two of you making a sausage sandwich, and now I know what came of it.”

“She forgot to take the pill, or the pill didn’t work. I asked her if I should use protection, and she said she was on the pill. I’m no idiot.”

“You are an idiot, Hap. You took the word of some woman you had just met. But, considering the result was Chance, then or later, I guess that makes it kind of all right and makes me an uncle, but wow, you buy a hamburger, and the next thing I know you two are in the backseat doing the nasty.”

“We just clicked, man. I liked her.”

“You liked something. And I think she did a lot of clicking.”

“We dated awhile, and you need not be so judgmental. You’re dating off the Internet, and dry holes at that. That’s no better, you know?”

“You have a point. I think because I couldn’t get it up today, and you always can, or so you say, I was a little jealous. And the other thing, well, I didn’t like what you did that night. There wasn’t any courting going on. Just wham-bam-thank-you-ma’am.”

“I got her number. We spent time together after that.”

“Time is one thing to call it.”

“This coming from you. Once again, let me remind you: Internet. No courting. Quick fuck. Dry hole.”

“Yes, but I’ve come to expect more of you.”

I laughed. “You are a piece of work, Leonard. That was many years ago. I hadn’t been broken up with Trudy that long, and it was the one time in my life I was prone to drink. The only time I ever drank, to be exact. And I didn’t do anything she didn’t want to do. Why are we talking about this?”

“I’ll say it again. A bit of jealousy at your ability to perform at the drop of a hat, and for a lengthy period of time. And also, I thought about it today, and thought it might be an embarrassing memory, and that would be fun. But you don't look embarrassed."

"No reason to. So, having trouble with your pecker, huh?"

"I think it's psychological. It's all this stuff with John. Used to, I got up in the morning, had a cup of coffee, I'd start climbing the walls like a goddamn monkey, masturbating all over the place. Had John there, well, I'd bend him over and fuck him hard enough to drive him to town and send him through the car wash."

"You are such a romantic," I said.

"Now, my dick droops, looks like one of those things they used to sharpen knives on. A strop."

"But smaller. Listen, Leonard. Don't let it get to you. Jealousy of my sexual prowess has ruined many a man. And I'm sorry you got a look at my ass, because once my godlike body is revealed, no man or woman will ever suit you again."

"You are so full of shit. I have seen your charm fail you more than once. Even a blind squirrel finds an acorn now and then."

"First I was a hot sex machine, now I'm a blind squirrel."

He chuckled. It was all absolutely juvenile, but we had done it for years, and I think ribbing each other over everything from sex to hair loss was our way of connecting; verbal comfort food.

"Part of the problem is fucking and loving aren't always the same, Leonard. Romantic you're not, but I think the way you talk about John is bullshit. You love him."

"Yeah. Damn me…Hey, why are we riding around with Buffy? We dropping her off at the mall?"

"Because my family has the flu."

"And you're bringing flu germs into my ride, along with dog odor?"

"I'm not sick. Brett and Chance are asleep, so there's no one for me and Buffy to play with, so I called my bestest friend forever."

"And when he couldn't make it, you called me. Again. But why is Buffy in the backseat?"

"She likes your ribald stories," I said.

"We're going to get ice cream cones at Dairy Queen, aren't we?"

"Buffy likes a good cone."

"You really wanted me to take you to get your dog an ice cream, and that's why you called me, isn't it? You wanted to save gas and give Buffy a cone and not have Brett know about it. You heard her say the dog is getting fat."

"I left a note and said we were going riding with you. No secret. Brett will figure out where and why I went."

“Unless you get home before she wakes up.”

“Then I would have to remove the note, and me and Buffy would be silent conspirators together. And you will also be involved.”

“I’m your patsy.”

“That is correct.”

“You, Hap Collins, are a liar.”

“It’s a white lie. And look at it this way. You got to tell me about your dick problems, and you got to tell a true-as-shit story about my manly prowess.”

I looked back at Buffy. She was leaning over the seat with her nose pressed against my cheek.

“She knows we’re going for a cone,” Leonard said.

“Brett thinks I spoil her.”

“You do,” Leonard said.

“A princess deserves special things. Also, I thought we might do something else. Talk to the cop that got fired for letting Charm go.”

“Manuela. You know where she lives?”

“Right before I called you, Marvin called me. He says the cops in Camp Rapture are known as shit stains on the underwear of law enforcement. And that’s a quote. He did say he knew the deputy that got fired, though, and called her a ‘good egg.’”

“A good egg? He’s been watching old cop shows again, hasn’t he?”

“I think so. He gave me her address.”

“I underestimated you. I thought you were merely using Buffy to get yourself an ice cream cone, but you are after evidence.”

“We are detectives.”

“This fired cop’s place close to our Dairy Queen?”

“Not that close,” I said. “And besides, Buffy needs to go to the office.”

“She have paperwork?”

“No, but she does like to tidy up.”

“All right, then, after we have our cones and drop the Buffster off, we’ll drive a little faster on our way over.”

12

We went through the drive-through at Dairy Queen. I got a chocolate cone, and Buffy and Leonard had vanilla. Dogs aren't supposed to eat chocolate, and Leonard always prefers vanilla.

We didn't actually speed up, as Leonard had suggested, but drove around town slowly, eating, listening to Lightnin' Hopkins on the disc player, me holding Buffy's cone so she could lick it until she was down to the cone itself. Then I gave it to her. Her tongue turned blue from the ice cream, and when she was done she stretched out on the backseat and closed her eyes. I think her brain was frozen.

Finished up, we drove Buffy to the office. I took her for a short walk out in the grass beside the office, cleaned up her poo, put her inside, then we drove to the address I had for the deputy, Manuela Martinez.

It was solid dark when we got to Ms. Martinez's place. The CD in the player was now finishing up a Kasey Lansdale tune, "Can't Blame You for Trying." The house was a small house in a less expensive part of town, and it was on a street with similar houses on both sides. Nice houses, but nothing dramatic, middle class with a view to moving upwards. A little better house than mine and Brett's place, brick, with a yard lit by a porch light strong enough to make the moonlight wish for greater wattage. The flowers near the porch were wilting.

There were lights behind the windows, and there were lights on in most of the houses along the street. There was a black pickup truck and a white Ford under the open carport at the Martinez house. Leonard parked at the curb and we walked up the sidewalk that led to the porch and I pushed the doorbell.

We could hear it ding-dong inside, and then a small dog started yapping, and after a few moments we heard a female voice say, "Shut up, Trixie."

Trixie shut up briefly, but by the time Manuela came to the door and cracked it, the dog was barking again.

"Hush, Trixie," Manuela said. I could see the dog through the cracked door. It was a small, mixed mutt, and this time it went quiet and sat, looking at us with what I deduced was an angry-dog expression.

“Yes,” the lady said. She was petite with thick black hair and a fine face that was almost model material, but she had a long scar from her left ear to the tip of her chin. I liked it. It wasn’t deep, it was just a strong white line on a fine dark face. She wore a loose black T-shirt and yoga pants. She was barefoot.

“Sorry to bother you,” I said.

“Are you?” she said.

“Yes, ma’am.”

“My hand that’s behind the door,” she said. “It’s holding a Smith and Wesson.”

“Is that some kind of old-fashioned typewriter?” Leonard said, and grinned.

“No. But it does make a rat-a-tat sound if I pull the trigger just right.”

“We’re not here to bother you,” I said.

“Well, recently I have been bothered.”

“We are not whoever it was that bothered you.”

“Selling Jesus or sewing machines, you are still on my shit list.”

“Neither,” I said. “I don’t think they sell sewing machines door to door, so you can mark that off your list. Jesus has mostly moved to the Internet, I think.”

“It might be cool, though,” Leonard said, “if Jesus was selling sewing machines door to door.”

“You are Manuela Martinez?” I asked.

“I am.”

“We’re here to talk with you about a young lady named Charm. Her mother, Louise, asked us to. She claims her son was murdered by the law and that her daughter was harassed by them. She has us looking into it.”

“Private detectives?”

“Very private,” Leonard said.

“You carrying?”

“Just our handsome selves,” Leonard said.

She smiled a little. “All right, come in, but I’ll hold on to my gun for a while, if you don’t mind, and I’ll have to pat you down.”

“Really?” Leonard said.

“Really.”

“Would it matter if we minded about your gun?” Leonard said.

“It would not.”

“That’ll be just fine, then,” Leonard said.

13

The house was simple but nice inside. Through an alcove I could see into the living room. The couch in there was fat with colorful cushions. A painting on the wall of a great fish jumping appeared to have been stolen from a motel. On the left side of the room, mounted on the wall above the couch, was a very large game fish with a long snout, like the one in the painting. It was coated with dust.

Manuela patted us down, finding no weapons except our razor wit, which was much more self-contained than usual due to her holding that pistol.

She eventually invited us to sit on the couch. Manuela sat in a fat cushioned chair that matched the couch. Trixie jumped up and lay down across her knees. Manuela put one hand on the dog's head, and in the other she held her weapon.

"We have a few questions, just to verify what we were told," I said.

"Who actually sent you? I'm thinking you ought to talk to my lawyer. I have a lawyer on this business, the firing, so if you're sent from the department in any manner, shape, or form, you can fuck off."

"We're not trying to trick you," Leonard said.

"We work for Louise, really," I said. "She said her daughter, Charm, was picked up for drunk driving, but when she asked the cops for the Breathalyzer, they refused, chained her standing up with her pants slightly pulled down in back, left her that way until morning. You came along and let her loose. Is that accurate?"

"What are your names?"

We told her. We told her about the agency and mentioned Marvin Hanson.

"Marvin," she said. "Sure. I should have gone to work in LaBorde, but he wasn't chief there then. Still, would have been better off than Coldpoint and Camp Rapture."

"It's starting to sound as if going over Niagara Falls on a log would be better," Leonard said.

"That's the truth," she said. "All right. You know Marvin, and you used to work for him, so I'll talk. A little. I don't know about the Breathalyzer part, but she was cuffed, and her pants had been pulled down slightly in back, showing her butt crack, and no one would let her pull them up. Her hands were chained in front of her. The officers in charge were mad when I pulled them up for her, and they were madder yet when I uncuffed her and let her go."

"What made you decide to let her go?" I asked.

"It's a boys' club there, and I had a bad feeling about it, and then I looked at the arrest report, and it seemed dodgy. I mean, here's a girl not in a cell, but bound to a radiator, right where perps are brought in, and they're ogling her booty. I knew enough laws had been violated there wouldn't be a real case anyway. I figured Coldpoint was the main one who had violated them. He doesn't like it when people don't do exactly what he says, legal situation or not. He can talk calm and sound intelligent, because he is, but he is a narcissist of the first degree. You know he was in trouble for a shooting some years back, black teenager who got a warning shot in the back of the head, as we say."

"And you were fired over letting Charm go?" I said.

"They said I wasn't holding up my end, but that's not the real reason. Like I said, it's a boys' club of the worst kind, so I wasn't all that upset to leave. I was married for a while, and that job ruined my marriage. Wish they'd let me go a couple years ago. At least then I'd have my marriage and not just some trophy fish he caught mounted on my living-room wall. That really has to go, by the way."

"Yard sale," Leonard said. "Some bozo will buy it and claim he caught it."

"You know, maybe it is best my husband is gone. I never did understand all that trophy fishing and hunting. Had a lion's head somewhere. Maybe he took that with him. Might be in the garage attic. But damn, I did like my job, and I did take it home with me, so I can't blame Brian for becoming annoyed with that."

I waited a moment while she studied the fish on the wall, then turned her head to study us again.

"Did Charm say anything to you?" Leonard said.

"She was crying and she had a camera around her neck, and she said it was starting to wear on her, that it was heavy, and could I at least take that off of her, but I let her go. My guess is Coldpoint wanted to con her into sex, saying if she did that he'd let her go. I don't know that, but rumor is that's his brand and that it works more often than you might think."

"Lot of rumors," Leonard said.

"That's true, but that place stank like week-old fish, and there's things I know that aren't rumors. I've shared those with my lawyers. Charm wasn't playing the game the right way for him, so he decided to punish her. Like I said, he can't stand to lose. He was mad at me already because I wouldn't have sex with him. He said he could help me move up the ladder. I told him there was nothing at the top of any ladder he provided I wanted, and I didn't think my vagina was a ladder, or for that matter a basement."

"A camera?" Leonard said.

I was focused on the vagina part, but Leonard had been more practical.

"Yeah. It wasn't a big camera," Manuela said, "but with it hanging around her neck all night, and with her standing, it probably felt like a truck tire."

"Anything else you can tell us, Miss Martinez?" I asked.

"Not really. And everyone calls me Manny. I let Charm go. Because of that, I went to court, and Coldpoint lost the first round, though I still have more court dates ahead of me. That shit never ends. Main reason they lost on me letting that girl go was they didn't have any Breathalyzer results and the usual judge they have on their payroll wasn't presiding. He was on a fishing trip, so it didn't work out so well for them, and it not working out so well for them isn't something they're used to. Anyway, after the trial, that's when Coldpoint started harassing the brother for harassing them."

"You knew about that?" I asked.

"Yeah. It took them a while to drum me out, so I was around, and I picked up on what they were doing, heard them talk when they didn't know I was listening. As for me, they wanted to make my firing about something else so it wouldn't look suspicious, so it took about a month to get me fired. I kept having to go up for evaluation, this not being right, this being wrong. All bullshit. But I knew Coldpoint was following Charm around, and then when the brother started filming them in return, that damn sure put Jamar on their shit list. Heard the guys gripe about it. They are a sorry bunch, just about all of them. Couple okay fellows, but even they go along to get along. Thing was, Coldpoint wanted me out because I wasn't a team player. And another thing was, early on, he wanted me to lay down in the back of his cruiser and be initiated, same as some female prisoners, and I wouldn't do it. And there's more going on than that. I don't exactly know what, but there's something else, maybe a lot of elses. I think for one they resell the drugs they get from the druggies, make sweet deals with dealers. They use a bit of the product themselves from time to time. You been around that stuff for a while, brought in enough users, you recognize the signs."

"But that's speculation?" I said.

"In court it would be, but I'm more than certain that the sexual favors, drug use, and drug sells are going on. But I couldn't prove it in a court of law. Thing about Charm, though, seemed to be something else going on there. She wasn't your usual druggie, or prostitute, or even someone with a reputation as being the local poke. It seemed when they didn't get their way, they were out to humiliate her, couldn't stand that she and I wouldn't play their game. As for Jamar, can't say they did anything to him. I don't know. But if you had me guessing, I'd guess they had something to do with it. Quite a coincidence that she is harassed, and then her brother harasses them and is found dead."

"Anything more you can tell us?" I said.

"I may have talked too much, more than my lawyer would want, but I do dislike those guys. I'll just say this: You dig deep at the Camp Rapture department, you're going to find a well of rotten shit. And another thing: Be careful while digging. The whole damn town's high rollers are attached to them. They're all playing grab-ass with one another, and if you try and get in the middle of that, you might end up a Rusty Puppy."

"Rusty Puppy?" Leonard said.

"You know where the old sawmill used to be?"

"There are a lot of sawmills," Leonard said.

"I mean the really old one, one goes back to the thirties. On the hill at the edge of Camp Rapture. Closed down now."

"I know," I said.

"Yeah," Leonard said. "Had an older cousin worked there, right before it was shut down in the eighties. Dangerous place to work. Cousin had one finger missing on one hand, two on the other, and the tip of his thumb got sawed off too. Folks called him Lobster. We called him clumsy."

"There's a big pool of brackish water out there now," Manny said. "It used to be a pit where the sawdust gathered, but over the years it sunk in and got rained on enough to make a deep pond. They have dogfights out there, and dogs that die in the process, or if they fight badly, they shoot them in the head and dump them in the pond. All that old sawmill dust has mucked up in there, and when the dogs floated up, because sometimes they did, they looked like they were covered in rust. Humane society rightfully got up in arms. They told the police, and they went out and looked at the dead dogs, dubbed them Rusty Puppies. Probably half the dogs in there were owned by people on the force. They love dogfighting. Still fight them out there. Cops didn't do a thing about it because they were the ones doing it."

"Now I really do hate them," Leonard said.

"Wasn't just dogs showed up there; there were a few human bodies, which were also called Rusty Puppies. They lie in that sawdust long enough, it composts them. No telling how many were turned into compost. Sawdust, it eats a body up like acid, and it does it pretty quick. The others were found before that happened, but again, how many weren't? I'm going to bet there were plenty."

"Anyone know who the bodies in the sawdust were?"

"Oh, yeah. Local ne'er-do-wells. Beat to death and dumped there. A few prostitutes and drug dealers who maybe knew too much about how the folks on the force were operating. Sometimes folks fresh out of jail. Mixed bag, really. Now and again another body pops up out there. None of those murders are ever solved, nor will they be. I figure it's the cops who put them there."

"That's a strong accusation."

"I worked in that department, not you. Let me tell you, those boys answer to no one."

"Up until now," Leonard said.

14

As we drove away, I said, “Nice-looking woman.”

“I was waiting for that,” Leonard said.

“Just noting,” I said.

“You can’t fail to notice, can you?”

“Do you fail to notice attractive men?”

“I note them, but you are at heart a goddamn hound dog. A loyal hound dog, but a hound dog nonetheless.”

“As long as I don’t go into someone else’s yard and hump their dog or get the water hose turned on me, I think Brett is happy.”

Leonard grunted. “Know what I was thinking?”

“Another ice cream cone would be special?”

“No. We are not having another ice cream cone,” Leonard said. “I was thinking, why was Charm in Camp Rapture in the first place, and what was she doing with a camera, and what was on the camera, and where is that camera?”

“Whoa,” I said. “You are fucking Charlie Chan.”

“Yeah,” Leonard said. “I think I may have tripped over a clue.”

“Oh my God,” I said. “Sounds to me like you are doing some actual detective-type thinking.”

“What I thought,” Leonard said. He looked pleased enough with himself to be a parade-float captain.

“This means we got to talk to Charm.”

“What I was thinking,” Leonard said.

As we drove over to the house across from our office, Louise’s place, a car drifted along behind us for a while. It was a dark sedan, not a cop car, but I noticed it. Leonard turned the pickup where we didn’t need to turn, and it sailed on by, made a curve around Shawnee Street, and kept going.

“You saw it too,” Leonard said.

I nodded.

We may not be the world’s greatest detectives, but cars following us we generally noticed. Tonight it appeared to be merely paranoia. Leonard turned around in a driveway and headed back to our destination. No dark sedans were seen.

Not long ago we had dealt with another woman who spied out her window and ended up sending us down a dark rabbit hole with strange killers and stranger circumstances. It also nearly got me killed. Not long before that event, Leonard was almost killed. We liked to argue over who was the most dead for a few moments, but the thing was, I had this uncomfortable feeling that the current rabbit hole we were diving into was deeper and darker than it appeared.

We parked in our lot, near the bicycle shop, walked across to Louise's house. There was a dim light in the window. The house was older, and most of the street had upgraded to more modern styles, but her place was still small and made of wood and the roof needed a bit of work. You could tell that when you looked out the second floor of our office. I had stared at that roof a lot but never knew who lived there until she came to the office that day.

We knocked on the door.

After a long while, Louise answered. She was wearing a long nightgown. "Oh, you're the detective."

She said this directly to Leonard.

Then to me: "You're the white guy I hired, right?"

"Right."

"Wasn't sure. You people look so much alike."

"So you've said. Sorry about it being late. But we need to talk."

She invited us inside. I said, "We're really here to ask Charm a few questions. Is she home?"

"She is. I'll wake her."

We stood just inside the front door. The house was nice and tidy and there were shelves that had more knickknacks than a flea market. Leonard had his hands in his pockets. He said, "I'm actually, very carefully, fondling my balls."

"Oh, shut up."

"He studies the shot. Thinks he can make it. If he only had a smaller cue stick. The one he has is really too enormous for the job."

"Ha-ha."

"Here goes, one black-as-night ball in the side pocket."

"Stop it."

About that time, Louise came out from a room across from us and Charm came out behind her, dragging her feet, looking sleepy.

“Missed the shot,” Leonard said so only I could hear.

“I hate you,” I said.

Charm was short and petite and so pretty she’d make a monk’s back teeth ache.

“Hello, Charm,” I said.

“Hi,” she said.

Leonard nodded at her and smiled.

“I guess your mother has explained to you who we are and what we’re doing?”

She dipped her chin. “Yes.”

“Good. Louise, would it be okay if we speak to Charm in private?”

“I don’t know.” Louise was still holding Charm’s elbow.

I saw something move across Charm’s face, a shadow of teenage lies, perhaps.

“It’s all right, Mama. I don’t mind.”

“I mind a little,” Louise said.

“It’s up to you two,” I said.

“It’s really all right,” Charm said.

“Okay,” Louise said. “But I’m going to be down the hall there, and if you need me, call me.”

“I will,” Charm said.

“Sometimes it just works better if we talk in private, so no one feels the need to answer in a certain way,” I said.

“We tell each other everything,” Louise said, and she gave me a look that said she was certain of that statement, and if I didn’t like it, she was up for three rounds and no referee.

“I’m sure of that,” I said.

“Damn straight,” Louise said. She started down a short hall, threw back at us, “I’m just right here.”

“It’s okay, Mama,” Charm said.

Louise disappeared into a room and closed the door.

Me and Leonard ended up sitting on the couch, and Charm took a stuffed armchair. It was a kind of replay of our roles in Manny’s house.

“I want you to know we are very sorry about your brother,” I said.

“Thank you,” she said, and her chin quivered slightly.

“We want to get to the bottom of why what happened to him happened,” I said. “That’s why we’re asking you questions. Not to harass you or make you feel uncomfortable.”

“I understand,” she said.

“You going to be a journalist, huh?” Leonard said, and showed her his nice teeth.

“That’s the plan, though right now there’s not a lot of jobs in the field, newspapers disappearing and all. I thought maybe magazine work.”

“Hap’s daughter, she’s got a job in journalism.”

“Where does she work?”

“Right now, local newspaper,” I said. “But only proofreading for the moment. Part-time.”

I realized I was speaking very proudly of Chance, even though right then she was living in Leonard’s old room in mine and Brett’s house.

“Here’s a question,” I said. “Why were you in Camp Rapture in the first place? Before you say anything, we’ll keep your answers as private as possible, and remember, this is about your brother. We are trying our best to find out what happened to him. So as straight an answer as you can give us would be appreciated.”

“Mama said she didn’t have any real money to pay you. Will that make a difference in how much you do?”

“No,” Leonard said. “Hap here is privately rich and supports me. When this is over we’re opening a coffee bar in Tibet.”

Charm gave a wan, sleepy smile, one that said, You know, that’s not really that funny, but I’m going to go with it.

“I was there to take photos before sunset,” she said. “I was told when the sun went down it made the trees and the old mill and the water pit look interesting. It was a photojournalism piece I was doing on the lumber industry in the 1930s. It’s like a high school final.”

“Were you leaving the mill when you were pulled over?” Leonard asked.

“I was. I went there after the party.”

“And you took the photos, I assume?” I said.

“Correct.”

Leonard said, “So you were leaving the mill and were back out on the road, and were pulled over, and then what?”

“A big cop, him and his partner, got out and one of them—”

“Coldpoint?” I asked.

“Yes, sir. I didn’t know that was who he was then, but that’s him. He got out and claimed I was weaving, that I was drunk. I proved I wasn’t, but it didn’t make any difference. When he wouldn’t give me a Breathalyzer test, I knew it wouldn’t matter what I said, what test I performed. He said, ‘You want to blow, we can work it out so you blow, but not into a Breathalyzer.’ I didn’t take the bait. I think he was certain

I would.”

“Unfortunately for that asshole,” Leonard said, “he was working from experience. Probably his idea of a date.”

“What happened to the photographs you took?” I said.

“They took the memory card out of my camera at the station,” she said.

“Any idea why?”

“I just know when I came down the hill from the sawmill they were waiting. They followed me to the edge of town and turned on their lights and pulled me over.”

“This other cop,” Leonard said. “Know his name?”

“At the station, I think they called him Seerfault.”

“Could it have been Sheerfault?” Leonard said.

“It could.”

I glanced at Leonard. He looked as if he had just sucked on a shit-stained lemon.

“You sure he was a cop?” Leonard said. “He wearing a uniform?”

“I’m sure,” she said. “And he was.”

“Any idea why they were following you in the first place?” I said.

“No, sir. Really, I have no idea. They took the card out of my camera and hung it back over my neck and chained me to a radiator. I think you know the rest.”

I said, “May we have a peek in Jamar’s room?”

“I suppose that’s okay,” she said.

She led us to his room, which was down an opposite hall. We went inside, and Charm left us alone. There were photographs and posters of boxers, and there was a shelf near the bed with boxing trophies.

Leonard picked one up. “First place. A university boxing event.”

We looked around a bit more, then went out. Charm was waiting on the couch. We sat down across from her.

“Saw your brother was a boxer,” Leonard said.

“He was pretty good. One time there was talk of him going to the Olympics, but he didn’t want to. He had other interests. Boxing was more like a hobby, but he was very good.”

“You think of anything else, our office is across the street,” I said.

“I know,” she said.

“You were at the sawmill just for photos?” I said. “Nothing else? I wouldn’t ask, but it could be important.”

“I was supposed to meet a boy. Kevin Conners. He didn’t show.”

“But you didn’t want your mother to know that?” Leonard said.

"I didn't. Does she have to know?"

"I don't think so," I said. "You didn't see him anyway, so no need."

"I want ever see him now, at least not on purpose," she said.

"Thank you, and tell your mother we thank her for letting us into her home," I said.

As we stood up: "This Sheerfault," Leonard said. "Can you describe him?"

"Yes, sir. Rough white guy, looked like a professional fighter," she said. "You know, scars around the eyes. I know something about that because Jamar watched fights, was interested in boxers. One of Sheerfault's eyes sagged slightly. The right one. His nose had been broken. It had a knot on it, and it was a little out of line. He looked like he worked out. Not in a bodybuilder way. But he was in shape."

"You will make a fine observant journalist," Leonard said. "Sheerfault was a professional fighter. I know him."

We thanked Charm again and left.

15

We walked across the street to the office, and I took Buffy out for another walk. Afterward, I made sure she had fresh water, then I got me and Leonard bottled water out of the fridge.

“You know Sheerfault, do you? Never heard you mention him.”

“He’s a sore spot. Back when I was kickboxing he beat me in the ring. On points, I might add.”

“Counts in sport.”

“It does.”

“But you’re bitter about it?”

“I was beat on points a few times,” Leonard said. “I always fought like it was real. Up to a certain level, anyway. It’s the referee’s job not to let it get too real.”

“If I remember right, I out-pointed you once, back when we were first starting to know one another. I don’t mean touch points, I mean real points. I got a whole seventy-five dollars, a trophy that I threw away, and a really sore face for about two weeks.”

“Shit,” Leonard said. “We fought to fight, wasn’t no money in it then. We were testing our skills.”

“Now they get paid big-time, and some of them get paid more than big-time.”

“Those were the days,” he said. “Fighting for pretty much nothing in the way of payment and enjoying it. Sheerfault pointed me, quite a bit. He was quick. He hit pretty hard, but he didn’t land much that was solid.”

“You’re quick,” I said.

“Not like he was. He was quick like you’re quick. I hit harder than you, but he was bunny-fuck fast.”

“Why the grudge?”

“Something about the guy rubbed me the wrong way. We both had a tough background. I actually knew him a little from around LaBorde, and he was a bully. He liked to rough people up and take what little money they had. A street thug. He acted like that point win against me made him the toughest motherfucker in the badass basket.”

“You feel like you beat him? Don’t you?”

“I thought I hit him harder than he hit me, and I made him run a little. Losing on points to that asshole chapped my ass. Something about him. But he’s tough as a nickel steak, no doubt. I gave him some shots that would have made an elephant shit a stack of lawn chairs, and he kept dancing. He has a head like a block of stone. But had we been on the street, which is where I’d like to get that motherfucker, I would have beat his ass like a tom-tom. Hit hard, hit fast, go to the house, like they say in Shen Chuan. Sport is a sport. I get beat that way, normally it’s no harm, no foul, but Sheerfault, he’s got a way about him that sets my teeth on edge.”

“You’re both older now,” I said.

“I can still whip ass,” Leonard said.

“No doubt,” I said. “I meant maybe he’s matured, even if you haven’t.”

“Ha, ha.”

Buffy came over and laid her head on my leg and I scratched her behind the ears.

“Back to what’s important,” I said. “I think we need to find out what it was about Charm’s camera, about where she was taking pictures, that got the Camp Rapture cops nervous. How about tomorrow we go out to the old sawmill?”

“Yeah, and let’s bring our own camera,” Leonard said.

16

Leonard dropped me off at home. I tore up the note I had written Brett, since it was obvious neither she nor Chance had stirred. Buffy checked on Chance on the couch, sniffed her, then came over and lay at my feet. I sat at the table and wrote a new note about how I was sleeping at the agency, still avoiding flu, and then loaded Buffy in my car and drove back to the office.

Now that I was involved in this business with Charm and her mother, I damn sure didn't want the flu to slow me down. I wanted to be at my best. I figured we had a tiger by the dick, but I wasn't exactly sure if we could yank on it enough to cage him.

I drank a bit of cranberry juice I had in the refrigerator straight from the container. I was the only one who drank it, so I figured it didn't matter. I folded the couch out and got the rolled-up foam mattress from the closet and put it on the couch frame and made it up with sheets and blankets, a pillow. I turned out the light and climbed into bed, Buffy at my feet. I lay there trying to figure how Charm and her camera went together and how that fit with her brother being murdered. As I drifted off, I thought too about those poor dogs and people in that sawmill pool, crusted over with ancient sawdust, congealed into sticky flakes that made the dead look rusty.

17

Early the next day I drove me and Leonard out to the sawmill on the edge of Camp Rapture. The morning was fresh with cold air, and the sun was creeping over a horizon lined with trees and houses, turning the sky red as a ripe, polished apple.

Both of us had lived in this area once, between LaBorde and Camp Rapture. Terrible things had gone down with me and Leonard at his old house, back when he owned dogs and we both worked in the rose fields, back when my former wife, Trudy, came calling and messed us up. Or, to be more precise, I messed us up because she had me under her spell and I wanted it that way. That had been a turning point in our lives. It had changed us. Set us on a different and more brutal course. I always thought of Leonard as the naturally brutal one, but the truth was, my choices had led us into all this, and here we were, at the zenith of those choices and mistakes, two middle-aged men, tough of flesh, but tired. At least on my end. Leonard wasn't one to complain about it much. I didn't know if he had noticed he'd aged. I had noticed I had aged. I felt it in my bones on cold days like this one, and I thought about the avenues missed when I put my head on my pillow at night. But it wasn't all bad. There was Brett, and now Chance, and I had my brother Leonard with me. That's the kind of thing a lot of folks want and never get. But as Leonard has said, I'm hard to make happy.

As we drove, I remembered Leonard's old place, where Trudy had died. He no longer owned it. In fact, his old house was no longer there. It had caught fire and burned down after he moved, and a double-wide mobile home had been hauled in and blocked up in its place. There was a real lawn now and it was always mowed. The trees that had been along the edges of his property had been cut down and a series of shrubs had been planted. The shrubs were green for about a year after they first got ripe, as I liked to say, and then they became brown clutters that ran along either side of the property.

The worst part was that at one time, well behind Leonard's house, deep in the woods, there had been a massive oak. It was the last of the great oaks and came from an older time when trees grew for a long time without fear of the saw, grew fat and tall. The oak had thick limbs you could climb up on and stretch out on and sleep without fear of rolling off. I know. Both of us had done it, just because we loved it out there. We would lie in the tree in the spring with the canopy of leaves above us, shiny and green, and in the fall we were sometimes there too, when it was cool, before the nights turned truly cold. We would lie there on separate limbs and talk. We had some great discussions.

We called the tree the Robin Hood Tree, like the humongous tree where Robin and his merry band gathered to talk and feast. I also called it the Tarzan Tree, imagined how you could build a tree house on its wide limbs and have plenty of room to live with a lithe, blond Jane and do more than call elephants and swing on vines. I guess Leonard might have dreamed of having Tarzan as his mate, though no doubt, he would have made Tarzan his bitch.

Leonard and I would meet at the oak, me having to hike through the woods from my place, which wasn't all that far away if you came by wooded path and then broke off the path and took a deer trail and finally a winding trace through a series of tall, blackjack oaks until you arrived at Fisherman's Creek. Across the creek the trees thinned in number but not in magnificence. There were sweet gums and hickories and, of course, pines.

The Robin Hood Tree was the granddaddy of them all. The oak rose higher and spread its limbs wider than all the others. Its bark was healthy and dark, and in the spring the leaves were green as Ireland. To stand beneath it when it rained was amazing, because the limbs were so thick and the leaves so plush that during the spring and much of the summer, if not the fall, when the leaves were crisp and brown and yellow and dropping, you would hardly get wet. When it stormed, the limbs shook like angry Spartans rattling their weapons, but the limbs didn't break. The soil beneath the oak was thick and dark with many years of dropped and composted leaves. There were fat acorns on the ground, and sometimes when you came to the tree, squirrels were under it, rare black squirrels that made that part of the woods their home. They would be in the tree as well, chattering and fussing as you arrived.

Leonard and I met there many mornings, usually having a breakfast of boiled eggs that we brought in brown paper bags. We drank coffee from thermoses. We brought our fishing gear with us. We would sit beneath the tree and eat and talk and take our time drinking coffee.

Finally we would go away from there, carrying our gear and cooler, one of us with a bucket of dirt loaded with worms. We walked through the trees and along the narrow creek bed to where the pond was. It was a big pond, and at one time there had been a house near it. Now the house was a pile of gray lumber and rusty nails and a few bricks that showed where the fireplace had been. Beyond that was a clapboard barn that still stood, the wide doors gone, probably removed for lumber for someone's project. Trees crowded the barn, and one sweet gum had grown up and under the roof and was pushing it loose on one side.

The pond had been dug maybe fifty years before and filled with fish, and we were fishing their descendants. There was a small boat down there, one we had tediously carried along the creek bank, and we left it there for when we wanted to fish. No one bothered it, because no one besides us came there anymore. The land was owned by someone up north who had mostly forgotten about it. The pond was always muddy, but the fish were thick. We caught them and generally threw them back, unless they were good-size enough and fat. Then they went home with us and became our supper.

We fished with cane poles, not rods and reels. It wasn't a place for rods and reels. It was a place for fishing in an old and simple way. We put lines on the poles, sinkers, corks, hooks, and bait, usually worms. Out in the boat we would dangle lines and drift and watch the fish jump, the dragonflies dip down on the water, see the shadows of birds flying over. Now and again there was the sight of a leaping frog or a wiggling water moccasin. Turtle heads rose like periscopes, then fell beneath the water with a delicate splash and a ripple.

In the spring it was cool for a long time, and in the summer it grew hot, but with wide-brimmed hats on, we still fished, and we lazed, and sometimes we talked softly, fearing we might frighten the fish. We talked about all manner of things we believed in, same as when we were in the tree. We talked about how we differed from one another. I told Leonard about my women, and he told me about his men. We talked about brotherhood without speaking of it directly. I told bad jokes and Leonard grumbled. We were tight before those times, but that was when we bonded like glue.

When Leonard moved from the house next to the woods, and I later moved from where I lived, we lost that spot.

Some years later the people up north remembered the land. They brought in pulp crews and cut the woods down, even the great and ancient oak, which must have fought the saws valiantly with its old, hard wood. But the saws won. It tumbled down and was coated in gasoline and set on fire. They didn't even bother to make it into lumber. They wanted the pines. The land where the great oak stood was a black spot for a long time.

Eventually they filled in the pond. A company that raised chickens for a supermarket chain bought the land, and a series of long, commercial chicken houses took the place of the original pond and the woods that had surrounded it. Now there is a wide gravel road that leads out of where the trees once grew and on to the highway. It's odd, but looking out here now, it seems like such a short distance to where the pond once was. It seemed a long ways away when the trees were there.

As we drove by, Leonard refused to look in the direction where the chicken houses now stood. I looked, but I didn't like what I saw. The rain still falls and the wind still blows, but the oak and the pond and the rare black squirrels are gone.

18

We arrived at our destination. My memories had placed me in a melancholy mood, and somehow that ancient abandoned mill made it more so. It stood precariously outside of Camp Rapture, on a high hill, behind a thick swath of trees that covered most of the rise. The trees grew all around it as if to spite the developers who'd mauled many of their leafy clan into lumber on that very spot. One pine, very brave and defiant, was pushing up through a gap in the roof. The evergreen needles glistened as if with sweat.

There was a good-size pond to one side of the mill, and the morning sun gave it a bronze sheen, and the heat on the cold water made it mist over. It was an ugly pond, not like the one Leonard and I had loved, back where the chicken houses now stood. That one had been muddy, but it had been fine.

We parked as near as we could to the mill, where the road ran out, walked over, and looked at the pool of water. The mist was slowly evaporating as the sun rose, and we could see the pond was dark with caked sawdust. It looked like quicksand, and it was the reason for the water's bronze appearance.

Once upon a time a chute had projected from the sawmill and sawdust had been sent down it as the whirling blades inside milled the trees into lumber and progress ate up the East Texas forests. Rainwater had gathered in the pit beneath the chute and had made the stagnant pond. The pond gave off an acidic odor.

"So," Leonard said, "Charm took a few photos of an old sawmill. So what? Everyone knows bodies have been found here, so no news there. What could have been so important Charm got pushed around by angry cops and had her sim card taken and her brother killed? Seems to me, they were better off just letting her be."

"Could be it's not what she photographed but what they thought she photographed."

"And then she got set loose and they just gave up on her?" Leonard said. “Why?”

“They had a chance to look at the sim card. Nothing there bothered them. But what could Jamar have known that would be of any concern to them?”

“Again, he was annoying them.”

“Still, seems like a big jump from him being annoying to a bunch of cops punching and kicking him to death. Even these yo-yos in Camp Rapture couldn’t be that stupid.”

“As we have done noted many times, people who do stupid things are usually stupid. You and me come to mind.”

“You have a very good point,” I said. “Let’s look in the mill.”

We walked along a weed-coated drive. The weeds were bent down and brown, and you could see where cars had been driving over them, and recently. The gravel crunched beneath our feet like broken glass.

There was a large piece of plywood leaning against the side of the mill. I could see a strip of light between the edge of it and the building. I pushed the board aside. There was an opening into the mill where the wall had gone to rot. Inside, the morning sun dropped into the room through holes in the roof and lit up the floor and made the pine growing through the rip seem much greener. There was a large saw with a great rusty, dust-covered blade and dusty old belts attached to massive pulleys attached to a bulky engine.

When we walked, the floor beneath us felt like carpet where the sawdust had congealed. Mice darted across it and disappeared under split boards and into holes in the wall. There was a thick, wire fencing around the pine, probably about twenty feet out from the trunk. The fence made a complete circle around it. On our side there was a little open gate made of chicken wire and slats of wood and rusty hinges.

“Dogfighting,” Leonard said.

“Looks that way,” I said.

We went inside the circle of wire. The ground was covered in sawdust there as well, but it was kicked up, and you could see the dirt floor was scratched over by the struggling paws of unfortunate dogs, or so I presumed.

Maybe they thought Charm was secretly photographing the dogs fighting, and perhaps it was like Manny said, the cops were sponsoring it, a thing they called a sport, as if the dogs had volunteered. They might have thought she got photographs or video of a fight that could have been going on that night, feared that if she got images of the people who were there, and if the cops and prominent town officials were some of those people, it would blow back on them.

Leonard had brought a camera, and he took photographs of the place, and I used my phone to take more, and I mailed them to my computer at home.

We strolled outside, put the plywood back, and walked to the car. As we were about to get in, a blue sedan rolled up the drive behind our ride, blocking our exit. Two men got out and came around to stand in front of the car. One was dressed in jeans and a loose Hawaiian-style shirt. He was big and his head was shaved and the top of it was sunburned in contrast to how white his face was. His face looked as if it had been paddled by a two-by-four. The other man was shorter and stockier and ruddy-skinned, with a thick head of black hair and a bent nose and a walk like his balls were too heavy on one side. He stood with his mouth open, sucking air. I kept hoping a fly would land on his tongue.

"Well, well," Leonard said to the man in the Hawaiian shirt. "If it isn't Your Fault his own goddamn self."

I got it then. This was Sheerfault, the guy Leonard had fought and lost to and didn't like. He was a physically capable-looking guy.

"Leonard Pine, why, I haven't seen you in a coon's age," Sheerfault said. "No offense. I want you to know that wasn't a nigger joke…I think last time I saw you…Let me see. Didn't I whip your black ass?"

"Points," Leonard said.

"What losers say, but I had you dead to rights. I could have knocked you out if I had another round."

"I doubt you could have knocked me out with a hammer," Leonard said.

Sheerfault grinned. It was the kind of grin that made you want to feed him his teeth.

"I wanted a rematch," he said, "but as I recall, that's about when you retired."

"I didn't want to lose again on being tagged, not hit."

"Oh, you were hit, all right." Sheerfault's grin spread even wider, which seemed impossible, but he managed it.

"Who's your little friend?" Leonard asked. "He looks like he might need to be paper-trained."

"Bobo Townsend. He isn't what you'd call a thinker, are you, Bobo?"

"Ain't no thinker," Bobo said.

"He got hit by a train about five years ago, and he wasn't exactly a mental giant before," Sheerfault said. "Train hit his truck crossing the track, smashed the truck into a wad, and knocked some wires loose in Bobo's head. Bobo has a simple approach to life, don't you, Bobo?"

"I like to hit people," Bobo said.

"That sums it up," Sheerfault said. "He likes to hit people. Also, he hears a train whistle up close, he shits his pants."

"Can't help it," Bobo said.

"You should carry toilet paper with you," I said. "Change of underwear."

"I could hit you," Bobo said.

"No need for unpleasantness," I said.

"Go ahead," Leonard said. "Hit him. See how that works out for you, Banjo."

"Bobo," Bobo said.

"No need to prove anything," I said and tried to look calm and in my happy place.

"Go ahead, Banjo," Leonard said. "Hit him. We'll be sure you get a nice burial, and then when you're down deep, I'll pack what's left of your partner in the hole with you, take a big shit on top of both of you."

Damn you, Leonard. I thought Bobo looked pretty sturdy, and I would rather not start my morning with my nose broke and a tooth missing.

"I ain't gonna let you hurt my friend," Bobo said.

"That's sweet," Leonard said. "But Hap will sort your shit for you, and I'll sort your friend's."

Bobo stepped forward, dropped his chin. Sheerfault reached out and took him by the shoulder. "Not today, Bobo. The boy is just blowing."

"Not as much as you might think," Leonard said.

Bobo stopped, relaxed. He looked at me with his blank eyes. His face hung like an empty sack. Inside his head, a brain cell used a stepladder to find a high-shelved thought.

"Yeah," Bobo said. "That's all right. Another time."

"You cracker motherfuckers just out for a little sun?" Leonard said.

"All we come up here for is two things. First, Pine, I wanted to remind you how bad I beat your ass, and second, we wanted to tell you that you ought to stay away from Manny. She's kind of a liar. She's claiming cops wanted her body, and the thing was, no one did. It disappointed her to not be desired."

"So, a beautiful and smart woman like that wanted to hump you ugly bastards, but no, you turned her down because you are so fine and noble and stalwart," Leonard said.

"We ain't queers like you, Pine," Sheerfault said, "but sometimes, some nooky, well, it stinks, and you just don't want it. Manny, she stinks."

"Metaphorically, I assume."

"Maybe both ways," he said. "Never got the chance to get down there and sniff."

"She turned you down is what you're saying?" Leonard said. "Sounds like a woman with taste."

"Stay away from her," Sheerfault said. "It would be best for her and you."

"Or what?" Leonard said.

"I don't know," Sheerfault said. "Something might happen. I mean, I wouldn't want you breaking the law in Camp Rapture, on account of you could get arrested, and even in a sterling jail system like we have, sometimes folks get hurt. You know, by other prisoners. We got fellows there, they don't like being thrown in with a person of color. Isn't that what you people say? Persons of color? See how I'm avoiding the word nigger. I am, if nothing else, progressive."

"What about you, Sheerfault?" Leonard said. "You want to hurt me your own self, not leave it to some prisoners?"

"Already have."

"You only made me a little tired."

"I won. I got the money."

"Hope you invested that seventy-five dollars in some extra health insurance," Leonard said. "'Cause you want to kick my ass, which you have yet to do, you'll need it."

Sheerfault smiled. "Still a sore loser."

"Oh, I lost the match, but I didn't lose a fight," Leonard said. "I lost some bullshit dance contest."

"You keep thinking that, Shiny," Sheerfault said, went around to the side of the car, opened his car door, smiled, and slid in behind the steering wheel.

As Bobo started to climb in on the passenger side, I said, "You a cop too, Bobo?"

He paused at the open car door and put his arms on top of it, collected a couple of thoughts, said, "I ain't no cop."

"Good. I was afraid you carried a gun, you might shoot yourself in the foot."

Bobo thought that over, said, "Thank you."

He climbed into the car without closing the door, and then he climbed out. He had found another brain cell with that stepladder.

"Was that some kind of crack?" he said.

"Sleep on it," I said.

He studied me, slipped back into the car, and closed the door.

When they drove away, Leonard said, "I really hate that guy."

"I can see that."

"Don't think I care for Bobo either, fucking animated fireplug."

"Bet Bobo's mother wishes she had smothered him with his teddy bear when he was a child," I said.

"Maybe I'll do it for her."

"Oh, and thanks for trying to have him start a fight with me, brother. I owe you for that one."

"You'd have fucked him over. Way you move."

"You're a troublemaker."

"A little," Leonard said.

"Thing is, guys that want us not to think anything is going on are certainly doing stuff that makes me think some bad shit is in fact going on."

"Perhaps they really are stupid," Leonard said.

"Or nervous."

"We're good at making people nervous."

"Ain't we?" I said. "Hell, I make myself nervous."

19

On the way back to LaBorde, Leonard said, “That story Timpson Weed told. It still bothers me.”

“You keep coming back to that.”

“Because it still bothers me.”

“Shall we pay him a visit?”

“I think we should,” Leonard said.

We drove over to the projects, and, with Leonard wearing his fedora, we made our way across the wilted grass toward where Weed lived. The group of guys that were there before were there again. The one who had worn the red shower cap was now wearing a blue one. The big one, Laron, had on sagging pants with his underwear hanging out.

“Goddamn,” Leonard said as we walked along, “what’s this shit with the fucking shower cap?”

“Protecting the do, I guess.”

“Last time he had that red cap and no do. I bet he ain’t got one under there now. What the fuck he need to have a do for anyway?”

“Some folks are cosmopolitan, Leonard. Some are not. You are not.”

“Yeah, and a punk in a shower cap is?”

“Depends on how you define cosmopolitan.”

“Yeah, sure. And the guy with the sagging pants, don’t he know that little fashion statement comes from prison, showing you’re ready to take some thug’s dick, that you’re a jailhouse bitch?”

“I’m betting he doesn’t know. And frankly, Leonard, who gives a shit?”

“It’s just stupid,” Leonard said.

The guys stared at us, trying to look tough. Leonard shot them the finger. They didn’t shoot it back. No razors or pistols were produced, just sour faces. So good so far.

“Pull up your fucking pants,” Leonard yelled at Laron.

Laron didn’t pull up his pants, just continued to glare.

Since we weren’t there to give out freelance fashion tips, we went up the stairs and onto the landing and stood in front of Timpson Weed's door and knocked.

The sweet lady from before answered, bringing with the opening of the door a smell of fried fish and onions. She was wearing a large muumuu and shoes with her heels breaking them down in the backs. "What the fuck you want?"

"You talking to me?" Leonard said.

"I was talking to this peckerwood, but you can take a little of that if you want it."

"Can I now?" Leonard said.

"We just want to see Timpson for a minute," I said.

She came out then and closed the door.

"You want to see Timpson?"

"That's what he said," Leonard said.

"Yeah. 'Cause you such close friends?" she said.

"Because we have a bit of business with him," I said.

"Yeah, well, you want to see that nigger, you gonna have to go down to the fucking funeral home and see him."

"He works at a funeral home?" I said.

"Fuck no, he don't work at no funeral home, unless he gonna get up dead tonight and sweep out the goddamn place."

She was starting to cry a little now, tears running down her face. I had a little pack of tissues in my coat pocket. I took it out and pulled a tissue from it and handed it to her. She snatched it like a hawk grabbing a mouse, patted her eyes, then blew her nose on it, handed it back to me.

"You keep it," I said.

"Come up in here and me grieving and Timpson dead as a bag of nails, act like you all kinds of friends with him."

"We said we have business with him," Leonard said.

"That business gonna have to wait until you get to the Pearly Gates, I can tell that to you. He over at J. Greely's funeral parlor cooling out."

"What happened to him?" I said.

"What happened?" she said. "What didn't happen? They beat him, then run over him with something a whole lot bigger than a bicycle, and then he got his black ass thrown in a fucking ditch beside the road, or some such."

An East Texas classic. Killed and thrown in a ditch.

"Who did it?" I asked.

"How the fuck do I know? You care? Bullshit. You just the same as the cops, just another dead nigger."

"I happen to be of the black persuasion myself," Leonard said. "So it concerns me. It concerns my friend here. Shit, this motherfucker, Hap, he wears a shower cap around the house, and he once wrote a letter in Ebonics."

"I do not wear a shower cap in the house," I said. "And the letter was well meant."

The woman looked at Leonard and smiled a little.

"You got a woman?"

"I got a man," Leonard said. "Sort of."

"What?"

"I'm queer as a three-dollar bill."

"Naw you ain't."

"Am."

"Naw."

"Am."

"Damn, man. That's a fucking waste. Come over here some night and let me make dinner for you, and I can turn you."

"That's a sweet proposition, but you sure have moved on fast," Leonard said. "Snot in a tissue, and you're ready to bring in fresh meat."

"Timpson just stayed here when he wanted. He had him other women on the side. I think it was one of them he got the clap from. I come down with that shit, and let me tell you, that is some whole 'nother kind of experience. Had to get shots. He come home with crabs one time. Have to near set fire to yourself to get rid of them."

"That is a delicate situation, for sure," Leonard said.

"Telling you," she said.

"Any idea who killed Timpson, and why?" I asked.

"I ain't got no idea," she said. "He might have got hit crossing the road, for all I know. Somedays I'd have run over him. Hit me once, but I caught his ass a good one upside the head with a stool. One of them little wooden ones got four legs. They solid, I'm telling you, and it's like they was made for swinging. I knocked him plumb out. Nigger was sprawled on the floor like a throw rug. He woke up and got his shit and got out, but he come back around after a time. He done had a sniff and a taste of the good stuff I got, so he come back. He made me keep the stool in the closet from then on, though."

"I see," I said. "When was Timpson killed?"

"Other night. Said he was going to see someone at the Joint, which usually meant he was gonna get stagger-ass drunk and come home and puke in the sink. The fucking sink. Got a toilet, and he pukes in the sink. That shit don't wash down so easy in the sink, and he wasn't gonna clean it up. No, sir. He left that mess for me. He had it good here. Good cooking, cleaning up after him, and then he had this fine ass."

She slapped herself on the ass.

"Pleasant companionship," Leonard said.

"Damn right."

We thanked her and she went back inside with the fish and onions. We went downstairs.

I said, "Damn."

"Probably run over himself so he wouldn't have to fuck that bitch," Leonard said.

Walking across the lot, we saw the project boys were leaning on Leonard's truck. The four-hundred-year-old vampire girl, Reba, was with them.

Leonard picked up his pace.

We came to his ride, and he said, "Your nasty asses scratch my truck, I'm gonna rub out the scratches with your faces."

They moved off the truck immediately. Except the four-hundred-year-old vampire.

"You done come back asking about that boy, ain't you?" Reba said.

"That's right," I said.

"That's just a rumor run up through here. That boy wasn't killed here. We all know that."

"Ain't no rumor," Tuboy said. "It's a goddamn lie."

"Back that truck up," I said. I sort of liked that phrase and was just waiting to use it again.

"How come that's the story gets told, then?" Leonard said.

"That Weed telling that," Tuboy said. "Now his ass stretched out at the funeral home. Or in a box or some such. Put in a sack. Whatever they do."

"Why would Weed tell a lie like that?" I said. "Who asked him?"

"Ain't got no idea who asked him," Tuboy said, "but we know it's a lie. There was people all over the place that night. And he's the only one seen it. Bullshit."

"He said others saw it," I said.

"Figure he say that, you don't think to ask around, see if it's true," Tuboy said. "You ask around?"

"No," I said. "I didn't find the relationships here all that fascinating."

"That Egg Breaker Timpson was a motherfucker."

"Egg Breaker?" I said.

"Uh-huh," said Tuboy. "You know he go to jail once for fucking chickens?"

"I hope the chickens got compensation," I said.

"Naw. They was dead. He fucked them to death. Got drunk as a rat in a beer barrel, went out and found someone had some chickens, and fucked them."

"He fucked the chickens or the owners or both?" I said.

"I done told you who fucked what," Tuboy said. "Oh, you being funny, huh?"

"He tries," Leonard said.

"They brought him in on it," Tuboy said, "and he told the cops it was good for the eggs or some such. Tell you one thing, didn't do them chickens' asses no good."

"Guess not," Leonard said.

"Everyone round here call him Egg Breaker, not Weed."

"When did this chicken event take place?" I said.

"When he a teenager, before we was born. But it done followed him around like a dog."

"Shit," Leonard said. "Fuck a few chickens, and no one gets over it, but lie about a dead man, and everyone moves on. Why the fuck didn't someone around here say something?"

"We ain't got no reason to say," Reba the four-hundred-year-old vampire said. "We talk to the po-po, it never work out. Next thing we know we pulling time. Besides, he wasn't one of our niggers. That Egg Breaker, he been up in jail a lot for this and that. Last time he was up in there he come out with a head looked like a fucking pumpkin."

"They beat him, you mean?" I said.

"Yeah, they beat him. He didn't want no more pulling time, 'cause he thought he might not come out next time. I can feel his worries on that."

"You're a child, what the hell do you know about pulling time?" Leonard said.

"My daddy done up in that Huntsville," she said. "He got another twenty years to go, then they start another thirty on him. Consecutive bullshit, they call it. He ain't gonna finish that last one out. Which is good. He ought to be up in there. He killed a whole mess of people while he was fucked up on some shit."

"Who do you live with?" I asked.

"My uncle Chuck," Reba said. "Sometimes my grandma."

"I bet that is a treat for them," Leonard said. "I figure your daddy's doing time just for making you."

"Leonard," I said. "Shit, man. Cut it out."

"All right, all right."

"You are one shitty motherfucker," the little girl said.

"I just don't like you," Leonard said.

"Like you some kind of peach," she said.

"Let me pull this back to where we were," I said. "So there was no body found here? How did it get around there was?"

"Egg Breaker," Tuboy said. "We done told you. What the fuck, white man. You deaf?"

"I just like to be certain," I said. "Cops said he was found here, wasn't just Weed…Egg Breaker, Chicken Fucker, whatever."

"Uh-huh, and we ain't got nothing for that," Tuboy said. "Them cops probably took him out and killed him and said he was found here, on account of everyone knows we ain't nothing but a bunch of losers."

"I second that," Leonard said.

That comment didn't bring a smart remark from the project kids, just a momentary silence.

"Yeah, you right," Laron said. "Kill someone here, ain't like you losing a future Nobel Prize winner."

"Damn, boy," Leonard said. "I didn't know you could speak."

"When I got something to say."

I was more confused than ever. Why would Weed, aka Egg Breaker, tell that lie? Who would ask him? And worse yet, would it be smart to pin it on the cops if he didn't see them do it? Egg Breaker said the cops were the ones told him to shut up. What seemed like a simple truth had turned into a complex lie.

"So, no idea who killed Jamar?" Leonard said. "Jamar's the boy Weed said was killed here, by the way."

They shook their heads.

"He got a cool name, though," Tuboy said.

"Any idea who gave Weed his trip to the funeral home?"

"Coulda been anybody. Wasn't nobody but Tamara like him."

"Tamara?"

"Lady he lived with," said Reba. "One you just talking to. Tell you one thing, don't never eat nothing she cooks. It all tastes like onions. That woman can't boil a cup of coffee without putting an onion in it. She ain't no smart one neither. Can't sort socks right, even if they all the same color, but she know how to survive."

"Look here," I said. "I'm going to give you one of our cards. You hear anything, want to tell us anything, call us. Might be some money in it."

"How much money?" Reba asked.

"I don't know," I said. "You won't be buying a car with it. Besides, you don't even have a driver's license."

"I could sell that car," she said.

"There is no car," I said. "A bit of money."

"I don't get out of bed for five dollars," she said.

"Since you made ten from me last time," I said, "I know your price."

"To point to a door, yeah. Not for everything else."

"So you got something?" Leonard asked.

"No," she said. "Just asking. I can pay attention a lot better for enough money."

"We'll make it worth your while," I said.

"What I'd like to do is give you to some kind of clinic for experimentation," Leonard said. "Something to do with cutting off heads and packing them in ice."

"You can go fuck yourself," she said.

"Get back from my truck," Leonard said. "All of you. All the way away from it."

Everyone moved away, but Reba the four-hundred-year-old vampire took her time, strolling lazily away from it. She said to Leonard as he was getting in the truck, "They experiment on me, it's 'cause they want my essence."

"Essence?" Leonard said. "You ain't got no essence, girl, unless it's from lack of taking a bath."

Reba shot him the finger. "I'm up in that shower ever' morning, you wiseass motherfucker."

He shot her the finger back.

We left out of there.

As we tooled along, I said, "You have such a way with children."

"I got deep love for them little stinky-ass motherfuckers."

20

At the funeral home we spoke to a pleasant young black man in a black suit and white shirt with a black tie and black shoes with a shine so bright it hurt my eyes. He asked us to wait and went away.

Leonard stuffed his hand in his pants pocket, said, “And he shoots.”

“Shut up,” I said.

About five minutes later a very fine-looking black woman in a black dress that, though conservative, looked more than adequate on her and showed just enough of her sleek legs that no one could cry foul came out and shook hands with us.

“I’m Karen Wilson,” she said.

We introduced ourselves, then followed her into an office positioned off the chapel. When she was seated behind her desk, and we were sitting in comfortable chairs in front of it, the young man brought us all coffee on a silver tray, along with spoons and packs of sugar and sugar substitutes. The coffee was in nice china cups with flower designs. They were about the size of a thimble with a cup handle that I could barely get my little finger through. We prepared our coffee and sipped it and I tried not to spend too much time checking out the mortician, because she was certainly nice to look at, and my first impression had actually not done her justice. Forties, very dark-skinned, with thick shoulder-length hair and a smile that showed some very well-taken-care-of teeth.

The young man stood near the door while we sipped, his hands folded in front of him and over his crotch as if they were a fig leaf.

“This is my son Kevin,” Ms. Wilson said. “I don’t know what I’d do without him.”

We nodded at him, and she smiled at him, and that must have been his cue, because he went out.

“No one has even asked about Mr. Weed,” she said. “Well, there was one lady, but she was mostly interested in finding out if he had died with money in his pockets.”

“Why, that would be the lovely Tamara,” Leonard said. “That was quick."

"There's no one to pay for his funeral, but we're going to do as nice a job as we can."

"You're absorbing the price?" I said.

"Well, unless you're friends or family."

"No," I said. "I only talked to him a couple times. The cops have the body examined?"

Her lovely features soured. "They weren't even curious. Whoever did what they did to him rolled him out here. I think it was some sort of joke to them. We called the cops, they came by, said, 'Yeah, he's dead. Hit by a car.' I pointed out that he had taken a beating, had several bullet wounds, and that there weren't any cars I was aware of that fired bullets, and he had been run over several times, so, yes, a car was involved, but the bullets had been part of the equation. He had mud ground into his body along with the tire treads over his face. There won't be an open-casket service, and besides, who's coming? I know that sounds harsh, but that's the truth. I'm going to give him a simple coffin and a burial at what we call Potter's Field, which is the back end of the old black cemetery. I don't know his preference of religion, if any, but I am a minister as well as a mortician, so a few words will be said over him. Anyone deserves that much."

"What did the police say after you told them about the condition of the body?" Leonard asked. "Explained he wasn't just hit by a car?"

"They acted like they were writing things down, then left. I followed up this morning and they said the case was closed. I asked did they catch who did it, and they said they couldn't discuss it, and the next thing I know I'm listening to a dial tone."

"Interesting," I said.

"I thought so too," she said, and then paused. "You know, I really don't know who you two are."

I explained what we had been hired for but didn't give out any major information, because, frankly, we didn't really have any. I gave her a stripped-down version of events, leaving Charm and the sawmill out of it.

"I know about Jamar's death," Ms. Wilson said. "We prepared him for services. Most business of that sort for the black community ends up here."

"You mean you embalmed him?" Leonard said.

"Of course."

"Beat to death," Leonard said. "Maybe not as bad as Mr. Weed, but bad enough they both ended up in the same condition. Dead.”

“Correct,” she said.

“Let me get back to Mr. Weed,” I said. “We were thinking his death and our case might be connected.”

“They both had a lot of bruises and cuts, like they had been hit a lot,” she said, “but Mr. Weed had bullet wounds and was crushed by a car. Jamar was beat to death. Still, similar enough to make me curious. But then again, I’m not a detective.”

“So cops didn’t ask you about the condition of the bodies, didn’t have an autopsy done on them, didn’t see a connection?” Leonard said.

“The police seldom seem interested if someone is killed in this part of town,” Ms. Wilson said.

“Or dumped in this part of town,” Leonard said.

“Good point,” Ms. Wilson said. “And now that you mention it, I think Mr. Weed was killed up near the old abandoned sawmill. I hadn’t really thought that much about it, but it makes sense.”

“Why would you say that?” I asked.

“His shoes, knees of his pants, had sawdust mashed into them.”

“There’s a lot of sawmills in these parts,” Leonard said.

Karen Wilson nodded. “True enough. But that’s the nearest one, and if he was killed there, and whoever did it wanted to get rid of him, this is a close and ironic place to dump him.”

“So you think the murderers are into irony?” I asked.

“Actually, I have no idea,” she said, “I’m just winging it. I’ve read too many murder mysteries.”

“Maybe we should read more of them,” Leonard said.

“Another curious thing,” she said, “Jamar had sawdust on his body as well. I think that’s interesting, don’t you?”

“We do,” I said.

“I’ve probably said too much,” she said. “I don’t want any trouble. I’m a mortician, not a detective.”

“You said that,” I said, “but you are proving to me you’re pretty astute in the detecting area. That stuff about the sawdust, for one.”

“Well, I really don’t know much about anything,” she said.

I could see she immediately regretted what she had said earlier and was trying to patch it up a bit. I understood that. This was the community she had to work in, and the police in Camp Rapture seemed to pretty much do as they pleased, so it was best not to get on their bad side.

“Anything we’ve talked about here,” I said, “it won’t get back to the Camp Rapture police. A lot of it we already know, and what we didn't know about Mr. Weed's body, what you told us, that's something the cops already know. They saw the body. They know what it looked like and they know how he died."

"And maybe who killed him," Leonard said.

"I'm sure they are doing the best they can," she said.

That sounded about as sincere as a nine-year-old boy's fart apology.

"No worries," I said, and stood up. I reached across the desk and shook her hand. Leonard did the same, and we left.

21

While Buffy licked the last of the food out of her bowl, I used a ladle to dip chicken soup out of a pot into deep blue bowls, then placed one in front of Brett and one in front Chance. They sat at the table with their heads in their hands, staring into their soup. They looked miserable. Red noses. Swollen eyes. Listless.

Finally Brett lifted her head and looked at me. “Crackers.”

I got a box of crackers and opened them and placed them on the table. I poured them each a glass of ice tea.

Brett sniffed and raised her head, showing me her Rudolph the Red-Nosed Reindeer nose. “So, how’s the investigation going?”

“It sucks,” I said, and poured myself a bowl of soup. I gave them large spoons, took one for myself, then sat on the far side of the table away from their diseased bodies. There was hot sauce on the table and I poured a bit of it into my soup. It goes with all kinds of soup, not to mention just about everything but ice cream, and Leonard says it’s pretty good with that, you mix it right.

“Appreciate the soup, Dad,” Chance said. “I think I’m worse. I was doing better, but now I’m worse. It’s bad, and then it clears up a little, or seems to, but it’s just going out for reinforcements. What really peeves me is I had a flu shot.”

“This brand of flu wasn’t one they expected to be a real threat this year,” Brett said. “It wasn’t in the vaccine. They were wrong. I had a flu shot too, and I hate needles. I got needled for nothing.”

“You’re a nurse and you hate needles?” Chance said.

Brett nodded slightly. “I didn’t mind sticking someone else with one, and I don’t get sweaty when I need to have one stuck in me, but I don’t like it. I mean, who does?”

“I hear you,” Chance said. “Wow. This soup is hot. Face-of-the-sun hot.”

“Yep,” I said, “just burned all the hair off my tongue. Let it cool.”

“It’s like lava,” Brett said.

“You can cook for yourself next time,” I said.

“But it’s good lava,” Brett said. “Nice chicken lava.”

“That’s better,” I said. “I suppose you don’t want any hot sauce. it’s a different kind of hot, and it really spices the soup up.”

“No spices,” Chance said. “My belly won’t take it.”

“Do you have any guesses about the murders?” Brett said.

“They’re connected,” I said. “That’s my best guess, and not exactly a Holmes and Watson moment. But I don’t think I’m going too far out on a limb to say that. They were both beaten, though in Timpson Weed’s case, he was also shot and run over by a truck. The confusion is why did Timpson say he saw the cops beat Jamar to death, but no one else in the projects saw a thing?”

“Perhaps they’re all lying,” Brett said.

“I don’t think so. I think the four-hundred-year-old vampire can be trusted.”

“Who?” Chance said.

I explained about Reba.

“I’m not even sure Jamar’s body was found at the projects anymore,” I said.

Brett slurped her soup.

“Sorry,” she said. “It’s cooled enough to eat, and it’s good, and I sound like Oliver Twist sucking up his last drop.”

“You can have more,” I said.

“More please?” Brett said, and held the bowl toward me.

I took it and put more in the bowl, placed it in front of her, and sat back down.

Chance was staring off into space. She said, “What if Weed was telling the truth about what he saw, or telling the truth mostly, but wasn’t telling the truth about where it happened? Maybe he’s more involved than he wanted to let on, so he’s assuaging his conscience with a half-truth.”

I felt like a lightbulb turned on. It was low wattage, but the bulb was burning.

“Sorry,” Chance said. “I took a criminology course.”

“Let me think on it,” I said.

22

At the office, Leonard said, “So what we have here—besides this excellent bag of vanilla cookies that I have brought for myself, and none for you—is an idea Chance threw out that you grabbed onto? She is one smart young lady, but if it looks like a duck, walks like a duck, quacks like a duck, and tastes like duck once you cook it right, it’s a duck. And I think this case looks like a duck.”

“I got lost somewhere,” I said.

“Yeah, I think I extended that metaphor too far.”

“I think Chance may be onto something,” I said. “I think what we were getting from Timpson Weed was guilt, but not the sort I thought it was. Originally, I thought he felt guilty because he had seen a murder and couldn’t get the cops to do anything about it. Could be more to it than that, because I was also thinking about what Reba said.”

“Oh, that little fountain of wisdom.”

“She said Timpson had done a lot of jail time.”

“Chicken fucking.”

“That was when he was a teenager, but remember she said last time he came out of the jail, he was beat up.”

“He is black and lives in Camp Rapture. That’s kind of the way it goes. Get arrested. Get beat up. Nice lunch on the county, shit on a shingle. Pay your fine, and after another ass-kicking, go home.”

“Guess I’m thinking we may be looking at the wrong duck,” I said.

“So you admit there is a duck?”

“I do. What if Timpson, the old chicken fucker, knew what happened to Jamar and lied about how, not what?”

“Because he had a conscience? I don’t know, Hap. He didn’t lose sleep over those chickens, I bet. Here’s a hole in your theory, and you’ve heard it before, and I keep coming back to it because it makes sense and you don’t. Why would he go to the cops if he saw the cops kill Jamar? That would be like climbing into a hot frying pan and asking for lard to be poured over you.”

“Perhaps we should find out who Timpson spoke to at the station. I say we go back to Manny.”

I reached for a cookie. Leonard pulled the bag away.

“Nope. You did me dirt with that old lady, giving her my sweets.”

“It was a joke.”

“My joke is you put your hand in my cookie bag, you draw back a bloody stump.”

“Man, you do not forgive, do you?”

“No, sir, I do not.”

23

We arranged to meet Manny at a dog park in LaBorde. She said she wouldn't meet in Camp Rapture.

It was a nice cool day. The dog park was a large fenced-in area down by a creek with a number of hardwood trees growing around it. Leonard had once punched a smartass college kid on the jogging trail there. A sweet memory.

Inside the dog park there was a concrete bench beneath a large pecan tree, and we all three sat there while Trixie ran about barking at larger dogs who seemed to be sizing her up for a sandwich.

"Those assholes drive by my house frequently," she said. "Not Coldpoint. He's the superior, so he sends Sheerfault. Sheerfault rides around with this guy that isn't even a cop. It's against regulations, but if we start talking about the regulations they break, you'll have to go buy a couple pens and half a dozen notebooks to list them."

"This guy with him," I said. "Bobo?"

"Ah," she said. "You've met."

"We have indeed," I said. "He wanted to dance, but I declined."

"He looks like a guy that might step on your feet a lot," Manny said.

"Yep, that's what I'm thinking," I said.

"We got a question you might can answer," Leonard said. "Timpson Weed."

"Chicken Fucker, or Egg Breaker, some people called him," she said.

"You know our man," Leonard said. "Question is this. According to what we heard, and keep in mind we got this from a four-hundred-year-old vampire midget—"

"Say what?" Manny said.

"Ignore him," I said.

"This midget said Weed was arrested quite a few times, and he came back and looked like he'd been beat on," Leonard said.

"There are rumors," she said. "Sorry I have to come back to rumors, but that's what I've got. That and suspicions. There are people they arrest on a regular basis, people on the margin, with little money and little recourse to real law, and they often end up beat up. There's always some excuse. The inmates were in a fight. One of them gave a jailer or an officer some trouble and they had to get rough with them. Mostly it's men, sometimes women."

"You see any of that happen?" I said.

"No. I knew it went on, though. A multitude of rumors of that nature is why I quit and am now living on savings. My bit of pension seems to be held up in a pit of legal quicksand. I'll get it, but they're making it difficult. They're claiming I sexually harassed them. Them being Coldpoint and Sheerfault. They're doing that because I have a suit against them for harassing me, and for other transgressions, as my lawyer puts it."

"Was Jamar ever arrested?" Leonard asked.

"I don't know. As for this Weed character, definitely he was arrested. Drunk driving. Drugs on him. About once a week for a year he got arrested, but he was always loose in short time, and then he kind of fell off the radar until the kid was killed."

"He reported Jamar's death to the police, right?"

"Now that I think about it, I believe he had a lawyer do it."

"That's new," Leonard said.

"He could afford a lawyer?" I said.

"It was Tom Barker. Ambulance chaser. Cruises hospitals and such, does a lot of work where if he wins, he takes a bite out of the settlement. I'm sure he saw some kind of money in it, eventually. Guy like Barker, he lives a lot on eventually. My guess is he thought the department might want to settle the case without accepting fault, and the settlement would give him a nice payday."

"Okay," Leonard said. "Lawyer thinks he might drum up some kind of suit and make some dough, that makes sense. But the thing still bothers me is why would Weed want to go to the police if the police were the ones responsible? Why would he think that would work out? It would put a target on his back with the Camp Rapture department."

"You got me there," Manny said. "But I can talk to the one or two people I'm still friendly with at the department. They aren't actually in cahoots with the rest of them. I can make a few phone calls. But no promises."

"Good enough," I said.

"Yeah," Leonard said, "but watch your ass. I don't think these dudes are playing around."

“I assure you,” Manny said, “they are not. But neither am I.”

24

On Monday we looked up Tom Barker and drove over to his office in Camp Rapture. It was off an alley and you had to go through a paint-peeling door to reach the hallway that led to his office. The hallway was dark enough to grow mushrooms.

Barker's pebbled-glass door was decorated with time-worn black stenciling that read TOM BARKER, ATTORNEY-AT-LAW. Underneath that was a list: SEMI-TRUCK INJURY, PHYSICIAN MALPRACTICE SUITS, DUIS, PERSONAL INJURY. I GOT YOU COVERED.

"He's got us covered," Leonard said.

"Seems like it."

"Might be a good idea. We have a lot of personal injury."

I opened the door and went in. The outer office was small and tight with a desk taking up much of it. A young girl behind the desk who looked like she still had two years to go before she was a high-school student glanced up at us.

"Excuse me," I said. "Is Mr. Barker in?"

"He's out," she said.

She was a little thing with shoulder-length brown hair, a bit of baby fat, and a cute face sprinkled with acne that had been covered over with makeup that appeared to have been designed for another skin tone.

"Do you know when he'll be back?" Leonard asked.

"Uh-uh. I don't work here, really. I'm his daughter, Connie. He doesn't have a receptionist right now. Last one quit a year ago. Hasn't hired anyone else. Sometimes, after school, I help out."

"Okay," I said. "Maybe I could give my name and a phone number—"

That's when the door opened and a man with a very similar face to the girl's, minus the acne and the makeup, came in. He was short and a little portly, but it wasn't baby fat. This was hard-earned marbling. He had thinning brown hair and wore a brown suit that fit him about as comfortably as a three-piece suit fits a groundhog. He gave us a practiced grin, letting us know he could get that settlement for us, though we might have to go around with neck braces for a couple weeks. There were a few bottom teeth missing on the left side of his mouth. Like the suit, he had seen better days.

“Gentlemen, what can I do you for?”

“Can I go now?” the girl said.

“Sure, honey, go on ahead. You go on.”

Connie started toward the door, was stopped by Barker. He got out his wallet and gave her a twenty and she went out and shut the door. When he’d opened his wallet I noticed there weren’t many other bills in it and they looked like ones.

“Kids,” he said. “They go to lunch, they got to have soup to nuts and a cookie to go. Kids.”

We smiled. We couldn’t think of anything else to do.

“Come in the office. Come on.”

He opened another pebbled-glass door, this one minus the stenciling, and in we went. There was a saggy leather couch in there, and there was a blanket on the couch, and a pillow. Barker picked up the blanket and folded it and took the pillow and carried all of it to an open closet and stuffed it inside and closed the door.

“Me and the wife,” he said. “We’re kind of taking a break. I been sleeping here.”

“Sure,” I said.

Barker sat behind his desk and we sat in hard wooden chairs in front of his desk. Thirty seconds later, my ass felt like it was broken.

“Oh.” He stood up suddenly. “I forgot to introduce myself.” He leaned over his desk. Leonard and I stood up and shook his hand in turn. “Tom Barker.”

“Yes,” Leonard said. “We know.”

“Of course you do. Of course.”

We all settled into our seats.

“I’d offer a beverage, some coffee, but you know, I’m plumb out. Need to make a store run. Been real busy. Plumb out of everything.”

He looked like the last time he’d been to the store you had to harvest your own coffee beans.

“Sure,” I said.

“We work for a private investigator, and we’re looking into the death of Jamar Elton,” Leonard said. “And while we’re at it, we might as well throw in Timpson Weed.”

“Oh…Oh…I see. Yeah. Well, I don’t know that I can help you with that. Just don’t know I can.”

"But you know about it," I said.

"A little. Very little. Just a tiny bit."

"You were the spokesperson for Timpson Weed, as I understand," I said. "You told the cops what he had seen."

"I did. I did. That I did."

He looked nervous, like his dick was in a sausage grinder and someone angry had a hand on the crank. The man's repetition of words and phrases was starting to crawl along my backbone.

"We just wanted to know what was said, and why Timpson had you speak to them about Jamar, and how that worked out."

"There's really nothing. Nothing. I was just doing a kind of favor."

"There were no money possibilities in it for you?" I said.

"Not really. Not really…Well, maybe. But it didn't come to anything. I like to make myself available, you know."

"Could you maybe tell us a little about what Mr. Weed had you do, and why?" I said. "Jamar's mother is our client and obviously it's all tied together. Here, let me show you who we work for."

I took out one of the cards Brett had made up for us and put it on his desk, then leaned back in my chair. The card lay on the desk in front of him. He leaned over and looked at it.

He read the card out loud, like we might not know what was on it. "'Brett Sawyer Investigations. Hap Collins, Leonard Pine.' That's you two?"

"Still is," Leonard said. I was hoping my man didn't get too testy and start pissing off Barker. Leonard is not patient with bullshit. Start laying that on him, Leonard goes negative and mean, and sometimes pretty damn funny pretty damn quick.

"Jamar's mother hired us," I said. "We're just trying to find out how he died."

"I see. I see."

Barker wasn't actually acting like he did see.

"I sort of hit a wall with that. Hit a wall."

"What kind of wall?" Leonard said. "A blue wall?"

"It's not really anything I can talk about," Barker said.

"Or won't talk about?" Leonard said.

"Now, there's no need to be smart, be smart, you see, no need."

"Would you rather us be dumb?" Leonard said. "You're treating us like we're dumb. We know you went to the station for Timpson Weed, and you told the cops he saw Jamar beat to death."

"I don't like your tone. I don't."

“We aren’t trying to be tuneful,” I said. “We are trying to find out what happened to a young man for his mother, and I guess, while we’re at it, we’d like to know what happened to Mr. Weed, and what this has to do with the Camp Rapture police force, and what was said by them when you told them what you told them. And just for icing, why does this all make you so nervous?”

“I have to leave, leave now,” he said. “You need to go first.”

“I guess so,” Leonard said. “You leave, we’d feel pretty silly sitting in your office by ourselves.”

“We could play checkers,” I said.

“Like you remembered to bring a game board and checkers,” Leonard said.

“We wouldn’t be drinking a cup of coffee, that’s for sure,” I said.

“I’m quite ready for you to go now, go on out,” Barker said.

“Who the hell is going to know what you tell us besides us?” Leonard said.

“All right. All right. It’s time for you two to go. Go on now. Go.”

We sat for a moment. Barker stood up, pushed his chair under his desk, put his hands on the back of it, and looked at us.

Taking our time, we got up and started out. When we got to his inner office door, I turned around and looked at him.

“What if it was your daughter, Barker? What if something happened to her and you thought someone might know something. Maybe just a piece of something, and they wouldn’t tell you? How would you feel?”

“That’s a low blow, bringing my daughter into it. A low blow.”

“Jamar’s mother suffered an even worse low blow,” I said. “Her child isn’t coming back.”

“Get out now, or I’ll…”

“Were you going to say ‘call the police’?” Leonard said. “I don’t think you’re going to call the police. I think maybe you’re afraid of them.”

“Go. Go now.”

We went through the outer office, down the dark hall, out to the alley, and back to our car. There was a flyer for a gun show under the windshield wiper.

25

As we sat in the car at the curb, Leonard said, “Okay, there is definitely a big turd in the soup somewhere.”

“Agreed, and on that note, how about lunch?”

“Just as long as we don’t have soup,” Leonard said.

We drove back to LaBorde and to a café downtown on the square. A diner. It was our first time there. We had been meaning to try it.

An older woman with silver hair so severely bound back it damn near pulled her cheeks over her ears showed us to a table. I asked her if they had crayons for Leonard, but she just stared at me.

“He likes to color,” I said.

“Oh,” she said and, without a hint of humor, said, “We do have crayons.”

“He’s messing with you,” Leonard said.

“Oh, I see. Long morning. I should have got that.”

“Bad joke,” I said.

She took our drink orders and went away.

“I can’t draw a direct line to what’s going on with all this Jamar business and the Timpson Weed aka Chicken Fucker business,” Leonard said.

“Maybe not a direct line, but you can draw a wavy line right through Charm, Jamar, Weed, and Barker. That’s enough for me, the connections. And I bet if we look real close, we’ll see that line runs right through Coldpoint, Sheerfault, and the train-fucked Bobo.”

“And there’s Manny too,” Leonard said.

“She’s just to one side of the line, at least as far as I can tell, but yeah, she’s in the vicinity.”

“She has too many rumors and not enough solid information,” Leonard said. “And I’m wondering about Timpson turning in information to that lawyer, and then the lawyer telling it to the cops, and suddenly the lawyer is frightened out of his skin.”

“He did look scared,” I said.

“Yeah. You’d have thought we were the Ebola virus.”

“‘Hey, how are you? We’re the Ebola virus, and we’ve come to kill you.’”

“Yep. That’s how he acted.”

“Barker looks like he scrapes by. He doesn’t seem like a mastermind, and doesn’t seem like someone cops would have on their payroll normally, but what if they paid him to keep his mouth shut?”

Leonard shook his head. “But he didn’t keep his mouth shut. He told them about Jamar being beat to death, told them what Weed told him to tell them. Since then he’s gotten nervous. Well, he was most likely always nervous, but now he’s like a pig that just saw the butcher pull up.”

“I think the money may have come after he said what he said to them. They told him, ‘That’s a nice story, but if we hear it again, we’re going to pull your asshole over your ears and drop you down an old well somewhere.’”

The waitress came back with our drinks and menus. We glanced at the menus, and before she could go away, I ordered a chicken salad and Leonard ordered a hamburger with fries. A hamburger and fries was what I wanted, but I forced myself to have a salad.

“So what we know is what we know,” I said, “but now we know what we know is more shadowy than we thought.”

My cell buzzed. I took it out and looked at the number. I didn’t recognize it. “Get me some more tea, will you?” I said to Leonard, having already sucked down the glass I had while we were talking. I’m a serious ice tea drinker.

I got up and went outside and answered the cell.

“Hey, this you? White man with the loudmouthed nigger?”

I recognized that voice. It was Reba, the four-hundred-year-old vampire.

“You got him,” I said. “But cut the nigger stuff, okay?”

“You paying good money?”

“For what?”

“Information, asshole. You was the one said it.”

“Depends on the information. But please, I had asshole legally dropped from my name.”

“That was a mistake.”

I walked along in front of the restaurant, glanced through the plate-glass window, and saw Leonard watching me. I walked on farther down the sidewalk and stopped in front of a shop that sold Texas souvenirs.

"That Timpson not only screw the ass out of chickens, he kill that boy himself."

"That boy?"

"Jamar. The dead fucker. You and me talked before, right? I ain't dialed the wrong number and got the wrong honky."

I let that sink in.

"I'm the right honky. How do you know?"

"I want to see some money first before I tell you squat."

"How much money?"

"I figure it's worth ten thousand dollars."

"Oh, really. I haven't got ten thousand dollars. What the hell, girl? Ten thousand dollars. You out of your mind. I look like Rockefeller?"

"Who?"

"Never mind."

"Okay, a hundred."

"A hundred thousand?" I said, just to mess with her.

"Yeah, I guess."

"Nope."

"All right, then," she said. "Hundred dollars."

"That sounds more like it, if you have something that's worth a hundred."

"I want to see that hundred dollars. Take a photo and text it to me."

"I haven't got a hundred dollars on me. I use my debit card mostly. I got a few bills, that's it."

"Well, then, you ain't gonna get no new information, is you?"

Leonard was right. This wasn't a little girl. This was indeed a four-hundred-year-old vampire.

"How about this? I get a hundred dollars out of the bank, text a photo of it to you, then you call me back with the information."

"Naw. You send that photo to me, then I'll call where we can meet, and then you feed me something good at McDonald's."

"They have something good at McDonald's?"

"Don't get snooty on me," she said. "I like me some McDonald's. And to me, you look like you'd get down on some supersize French fries in a New York minute."

"Like you'd know a New York minute."

"Yeah," Reba said. "I ain't got no idea what that means, but it sounds fast."

"When does this need to happen, this trip to McDonald's?"

"I got business now," she said, as if I would really think she had business. And as I thought about it, she just might’ve. She could have business terrorizing squirrels, shooting birds the finger, knocking streetlights out with a rock.

“When, then?”

“This afternoon, say five thirty. Meet me on Choctaw Street. It’s below the projects.”

“I know where it is,” I said.

“But we don’t got no business till you text me a picture of that hundred.”

“I could just show up with it,” I said. “Either way, you got to trust I’m going to give it to you.”

“You give it to me, and then I give you the information.”

“What if your information sucks?”

“It don’t.”

“Yeah, but what if it does?”

“Then you out a hundred, ain’t you, Mr. White Man.”

“I hate you,” I said.

“Hate me on up to five thirty, then show up with a hundred dollars in your hand.”

26

When I went back inside, Leonard was eating my salad.

"What the hell, man?"

"It came out first. I was hungry."

"So you're eating my salad?"

"Looks that way, don't it? And you know what I did? You're going to thank me for this, Hap. I ordered you a hamburger and fries, 'cause I know that's what you want."

"I'm trying to be healthier."

"Not today. This salad is damn good, though. Who was the call?"

"My broker."

"Yeah. I hope you fire him. I know your finances."

I told him all that Reba had said.

"You can't count on her doing nothing but working a deal," Leonard said.

"Crossed my mind," I said.

"Instead of a hundred dollars, you ought to bring a stake and a mallet, and drive it through her heart."

"I'm starting to think you might be right."

"Damn tootin', I'm right."

We ate and I paid the bill. Leonard seemed to have forgotten his wallet.

As we were getting in the car, my cell rang again.

It was Barker.

"Maybe we ought to talk," he said.

"All right."

"You got to understand I'm putting my neck on the chopping block, right on it."

"Not if they don't see you put it there," I said.

"That's the problem, they just might, they just might."

"When?" I said.

"How about you come by the office, say five thirty?"

"Can't. I have another meeting with someone about this case."

"Who?"

"Client confidentiality."

"You know there's nothing legal about a private investigator and their client having confidentiality."

"Nothing legal, but I gave my word."

"You might give all you know up if the wrong people get hold of you," he said.

"I don't doubt that," I said. "I think I would cave right away if they brought out a pair of pliers and a ball-peen hammer. But right now I'm sitting pretty in my car with my best friend and I have a bellyful of hamburger and nobody is threatening me."

"Six thirty, then?"

I considered. I looked at Leonard as I muted the phone.

"Barker. He wants to meet at six thirty."

"We can make it work," Leonard said.

"Seven," I said.

Leonard shrugged.

I pushed the mute button off, said, "Seven p.m. Your office."

"Oh, hell no. How about we meet at the old Camp Rapture High School, out by the tennis courts. No one goes there anymore, not since they built the new school."

"Seven p.m. Old Camp Rapture High School tennis courts."

I hung up and Leonard said, "Now, if someone would call and say you've won a million dollars, this could be a real good day."

"When it rains it pours."

"Someone did call with some money like that, you'd split it with your dear friend and brother, wouldn't you?"

"Not likely," I said. "Remember the cookies?"

27

The four-hundred-year-old vampire had quite an appetite.

"Be careful there," Leonard said, "you nearly ate the paper napkin."

"Go fuck yourself," Reba said.

"You've just about had the left side of the menu," I said, "so is there a point where you actually give me some information about how it was Timpson Weed killed Jamar? Or did you just con us into a free meal?"

"I'm going to need a couple fried apple pies."

"Are you?"

"Don't know I got a thing to say I don't get a couple pies."

"Would you like a cup of coffee with that?" Leonard said. "Maybe a silver sugar bowl and a matching spoon, and when you finish I can wipe your mouth for you?"

"Naw, but I'll take a glass of milk."

"Eat any more, you're going to blow up," Leonard said.

"I can eat a lot," she said.

"We've seen that," Leonard said.

"I ain't eat nothing all day, so thought might as well get my fill, but I ain't there yet. Still got an appetite."

I went to get the fried pies and the milk.

When I came back, Reba was licking her fingers.

"I hope you washed good or that ain't your wiping hand," Leonard said.

"You a funny nigger," Reba said, but she didn't actually look amused.

I gave her the pies and the milk.

"That milk ain't as cold as I like," she said.

"Well, shit, Hap," Leonard said. "You go back there and tell them to ice that milk. The princess likes it real cold."

"Enough of this," I said. "I texted the photo of the hundred. We've bought you a week's worth of groceries, and so far we only know you like milk with your fried pies."

She sipped the milk and it gave her a frothy mustache.

I pulled the hundred-dollar bill from my wallet and put it on the table. I carefully put my wallet back in my pocket and pressed the bill out with both hands.

"It's a crisp, fresh one hundred right out of the bank. Probably flown in from the mint this morning."

"How pretty it is don't impress me none," she said. "It's how it spends."

"For Christ sakes," Leonard said. "It spends like a hundred-dollar bill. That's how it spends."

"Can't buy as much with a hundred as you used to," Reba said.

"Used to," Leonard said. "You hardly been alive long enough to know when the price of gas last went up."

"Our deal was a hundred," I said.

"I'm thinking now you could maybe add a twenty to that to sweeten it on up to serious sugar," she said.

"They're fixing to find you in a ditch tomorrow with a goddamn McDonald's sack over your head," Leonard said. "Get on and tell us what you brought us here for."

She didn't say anything.

I sighed. I got my wallet out and removed a twenty, which was all I had left, and put it on top of the hundred.

"That's it," I said. "You either got information or you don't. Tell it, or we walk, and with the cash."

She reached over for the money.

Leonard slapped his hand down on the bills.

"That ole dog ain't going to hunt," he said. "You got to at least give us a taste of this big information you got. We don't get a taste, you don't get a taste."

Reba leaned back in her chair. She took her carton of milk and sipped it like it was fine bourbon.

"Timpson was the cause Jamar got killed, and he was upset about it."

"And you know this how?" I asked.

"I heard him and this fat white fella talking about it, out in the parking lot. I was in a tree."

"There's one fucking tree in the projects, except for those down on the creek, and you were in it?" Leonard said. "Lying on a limb like a constrictor snake at just the right time to overhear a conversation between Timpson and a fat guy? That's some rich shit, girl."

"I climb up there all the time. There's a hollow up there I keep stuff in. Here come this fat white fellow and he pulls up right under where I am. Sits in his car. Could see him through the window glass. Calls on his phone, and here comes Weed out of the projects, coming down to the parking lot. Fat man gets out of the car and he and Weed lean on the car door and they talk."

"And you heard all this from a tree?" Leonard said.

"They right under me, so, yeah, I did."

"Could've told us this before," I said.

"Wasn't nothing in it for me until you made that offer, and I wasn't gonna talk in front of them niggers out there, or they'd come down on me when I got the money."

"All right, then," I said. "What did they say?"

"When they start talking, I got quiet and still, 'cause I figured this wasn't something I was supposed to know, way they was meeting and all. My mama may have been a drug addict, but she didn't raise no fool for a daughter."

"Go on," I said.

"So Weed, he tells this fat man he wants him to do something for him, 'cause on the back end there might be some money. He says he wants him to tell the cops he gonna go to another bunch of law and tell them that they made him fight Jamar, and that he near beat him to death, and then they finished him off. Told him to say the body was in the projects. But it wasn't."

"You're sure you heard right?" I said.

"I ain't old enough to be deaf yet," she said. "Said if the law didn't pay him some real money, he was gonna say they did it, and he was gonna say they did it up in the projects, 'cause there was gonna be a whole lot of politicians could say it was police brutality, up there where all the black folks were."

"He was going to blackmail the police force?" I said.

"If that means he was gonna tell what really happened and say he didn't have no choice but to do what he did, yeah, then he was gonna do that, and he was gonna be quiet, they give him some money."

"Not exactly feeling his conscience," Leonard said.

"Maybe a bit of column A, a bit of column B," I said. "So, you're certain Jamar was killed somewhere else?"

"I never seen nothing, and them niggers run the lot from daylight to dark didn't see nothing either."

"How would you know if anyone else in the projects saw something or didn't?" I said.

"Please. Them fuckers can't keep they mouths shut if you glued they lips together with superglue.”

“Really doesn’t matter where he was killed,” Leonard said. “He was killed, and that’s what matters.”

I nodded at Leonard, then turned my attention to Reba. “Any idea how Weed knew the fat man?”

“I ain’t never seen him before,” she said. “I don’t even know what he do.”

I looked at Leonard.

We had a real good idea what it was he do, and who he was.

28

We dropped Reba off on Choctaw Street with a to-go order in a bag. Four hamburgers and four fries and four apple pies. She didn't say Thank you, Kiss my ass, or Hope you get hit by a car.

She got out, slammed the back door, and started walking toward the projects.

"I miss that little bitch already," Leonard said.

We sat parked at the top of Choctaw and waited until we thought Reba had gone into the projects, added time for her to get to her place, then I coasted us down and past the projects. There was one great oak at the edge of the lot. It was big and the limbs were wide. A little girl like Reba, she could have been up there, and if no one looked up, they might not have seen her. Past the oak and the projects were more trees, and then there was a creek. I drove over a short concrete bridge, found a place to turn around, and drove past the projects again, on up Choctaw Street.

We still had time before seven p.m., so we went to a coffee shop Cason Statler had taken us to once, sat there with strong cups of coffee, and watched the clock.

"What do you think about Reba's information?" I said.

"I got to think she got a nice crisp hundred-dollar bill, and about a century's worth of greasy food she'll be shitting out about the time we take our old-age pension."

"You don't believe her?"

"I guess I do, but I keep thinking, okay, she just happens to be in a tree in the parking lot. The only tree, and Barker, 'cause that's who it sounds like it is, pulls up and Weed comes out and she hears their conversation?"

"I believe her," I said. "Not that I don't think the sweet Reba might tell a little lie, she took a notion. But I think she's telling the truth. That description fits Barker to a T. It's such an odd story it strikes me as true. Even she couldn't pull a story like that out of thin air."

“I have more faith in her lying, conniving self than you do,” Leonard said.

We waited until six forty and drove over to the old high school. I don’t know exactly when it was abandoned and the new one was built, but the old one was a lot better constructed than the new one that was off the edge of the main highway. The new one looked like a prison.

The old one had been built by the WPA during the thirties. There were some additions in the fifties. There was a football stadium within walking distance. Out back were tennis courts. Somehow it was decided a new location was better for the students, and the new school was built. One day, I presumed, they would knock this one down, along with the stone memories of all those men Roosevelt put to work.

The side road at the back of the school was dark. The few streetlights had been rocked out or shot out some time back. I parked by the old gym. I got a flashlight out of the glove box. Leonard put his fedora on the seat between us, and we got out and started walking along a narrow street behind the school, near the tennis courts. I turned on the light and flashed it along the gym. It was covered in graffiti, most of it instructional of a sort and anatomically impossible.

“What the hell is Barker?” Leonard said. “A bat?”

I turned off the flashlight.

“I’m not liking this,” I said.

That’s when we saw headlights and a car turning off the main street and into the little avenue that split the gym and the tennis courts. The stadium loomed in the distance, reminiscent of a small Roman Colosseum.

After a moment the car stopped and the driver’s door opened and we could see someone get out. It was Barker. We could tell by his shape.

I flicked on the flashlight and we walked over there.

When we were past the tennis court, almost to the little, dark avenue, lights came on at one end of it, and then another car came the way Barker had come and pulled up near Barker’s car. The car on the other end pulled up close and kept the lights on. The lights were harshly bright and we were pinned between them.

I looked at Barker. He was standing by his car, his hands having no place to rest comfortably; they fluttered against the sides of his legs.

“You fucked us over, didn’t you?” I said.

“I had to,” he said. “My daughter.”

“We live through this, she may still be fatherless,” Leonard said.

Doors slammed at both ends of the street, and we could see shapes coming toward us. In front of the bright headlights they looked like dark cutouts.

"Hey, if isn't my colored friend," a voice said.

"Sheerfault," Leonard said. "Of course. I only dreamed you were dead."

A shape moved closer to us, and now we could make out Sheerfault. Behind him trailed his pet gargoyle, Bobo.

"Bobo," I said, "how's the ole cucumber hanging?"

"Shut up," Bobo said.

Now from the other end another man came toward us. He was well tailored in a nice blue suit and had perfectly combed blond hair. He had a face that looked as if it belonged on the front of a men's fashion magazine, not somewhere in the shadows behind an abandoned school. When he was close I could smell his cologne.

I said, "I'm going to guess you're Coldpoint."

"That's a good guess," he said. I noted now another part of his wardrobe that I had overlooked at first. He had a handgun held down close to his leg.

"It's nice you invited us out here," I said to Barker, "but I think maybe we'll head out now. "

"No," said Coldpoint. "You won't be leaving until I say you're leaving."

He and Bobo and Sheerfault were all close to us now, and no one looked particularly friendly. Coldpoint continued to let the gun hang by his side.

"I guess we could stay awhile," I said.

Coldpoint smiled. "Of course you can. What we got here is just a friendly chat."

"Gun makes it less friendly," Leonard said.

"This is merely a room monitor of sorts," Coldpoint said. "We're not in a room, but you get the idea. Barker here told us you were meddling in police business."

"Monkey business," Leonard said.

"Hell," Sheerfault said. "You should know, them monkeys being your kin and all."

"No need for racial invective," Coldpoint said.

"Sorry," Sheerfault said. "Just don't like niggers, and this one in particular."

"'Cause you know you didn't really whip my ass, and can't," Leonard said.

“I got the trophy,” Sheerfault said, and gave us his shit-eating grin. “I got the money.”

“I’m going to ask everyone to shut up, and I want you boys to get in the car,” Coldpoint said.

“I take it you don’t mean our car,” I said.

“You take it right.”

He pointed to the car he, Sheerfault, and Bobo had climbed out of.

We didn’t move.

He lifted his gun but didn’t point it at us, merely held it in such a way as to be a persistent reminder. “Afraid I got to insist.”

Barker, still standing where he had been, lifted his head, said, “It isn’t personal. Really. It isn’t personal.”

“Go fuck yourself,” Leonard said.

“Go away,” Coldpoint said to Barker.

Barker got in his car and started it up, backed down the little avenue and onto the street, turned it into place, and drove away.

At gunpoint, me and Leonard got in the car. Sheerfault and Bobo rode in the backseat with us. Like magicians, they had produced handguns. They poked them against our ribs. I had Bobo on my side, and I figured I got the worst of that deal. He had breath that stank like a dead skunk’s ass.

“I bet you get a lot of grooming products for Christmas,” I said.

“What?” he said.

Coldpoint climbed in behind the wheel, turned on the engine and the lights.

“Can we go through a drive-through?” Bobo said. “I’m hungry.”

“Later, Bobo,” Coldpoint said.

“I could use a sandwich too,” Leonard said.

No response. Coldpoint eased the car between the stadium and the gym, and gunned it along the dark and silent street.

“I guess yelling for the police isn’t going to help much, is it?” I said.

They didn’t bother to respond to that.

Coldpoint drove on.

“You two, you think you’re helping out people that are downtrodden, don’t you.”

“Our client paid us.”

“I researched you two, and what I get out of it is, you are do-gooders.”

“That how you see it?” Leonard said.

Coldpoint nodded. “You got to understand, this is a dog-eat-dog world. My mother, she was a party animal, never saw her. Dad liked to drink with friends. Drop us off outside a bar, and he'd go inside and drink. Us being me and my sister. We got food out of the dumpster out back of the bar. A piece of this, a piece of that. Sometimes something nasty was on it, but you know what, we ate it."

"I don't give a shit," Leonard said.

"I figured right then and there you had to get yours, and you had to get it the way you wanted to get it. My sister, she didn't think that way. She became a public defender."

"Still don't give a shit," Leonard said.

"And she was good at it. One of her clients, he ended up knifing her. Guy she was trying to get off. People, they're shit, fellows. Me, I do some good things for the community, but I do it in a way that gets things done, not in a way where I beg for control or power to do something that protects citizens."

"Damn," Leonard said. "I am getting teary-eyed."

"Shut the fuck up, nigger," Sheerfault said.

"Ease off of that," Coldpoint said. "So, I made myself what I am today."

"I don't doubt that," Leonard said.

Sheerfault poked him in the side with his gun.

"My sister, Jewel, she was trying to live her life right, help people, but the people she was helping, they didn't deserve it. Criminals all of them, and one of them killed her. You think life is about doing the right thing, but I say the right thing as the law sees it isn't always the right thing. The end truly does justify the means."

"We agree on that, to some extent," Leonard said.

"And you, Mr. Collins. What do you think?"

"I'm sorry. Did you say something?"

"Doesn't matter," Coldpoint said. "I just thought you should know my philosophy a little better. Maybe you can understand my choices."

"Nope," Leonard said. "Not getting it."

29

We took a little ride in the country. The moon had been sacked by some ambitious black clouds and it had started to rain. I thought, Oh hell, I've seen this movie, and it doesn't have a happy ending. The shadowy trees on either side of the road looked like mountain ranges in the night. The headlights were foggy with mist.

Coldpoint tooled us out to where the old sawmill road was, drove up it. All I could think about was that sawmill sludge in the pit out front and how flesh and bones dissolved in it like snowflakes on a hot skillet.

There were other cars parked up there, and I could see a light seeping out from where the plywood covering was, and there was more light leaking out of the hole in the roof where the brave pine grew.

"Get out," Sheerfault said.

They walked us to the plywood barrier. We could hear hooting and hollering inside, the sounds of something smacking something else.

Bobo slid the board back, and we all went inside.

A generator was humming, and a crowd was gathered around the fence with the pine in the middle. The generator was near where the great saw was. The generator was one of those boxy things you roll in on wheels. It was the source of the lights and had a long cable coming out of it that fit into another box with a lot of long, thick extension cords running out of it. The extension cords led to where lights were arranged on high racks that looked like old-fashioned TV antennas. They were placed primarily around the fencing.

"Get up closer," Coldpoint said.

We did.

"Give some room," Coldpoint said to the crowd, and they moved aside. I noticed the handguns had gone back under their coats.

When we could see what was going on, we saw two young men, teenagers, in the middle of the circle. They were wearing gloves, boxing shorts, and boxing shoes. They had on T-shirts that had a logo for the Camp Rapture Boxing Club. There was a solid-looking older man in the middle serving as a referee. He looked like he had gone a few rounds in his life.

Across the way, standing behind the fence, were four sets of boxers, all dressed the same way. All of the young men were stout-looking and fresh-faced and nervous.

“Camp Rapture Boxing Club,” Coldpoint said.

Coldpoint seemed relaxed, not menacing at all. “That’s what we do here. They haven’t got enough money to train at the actual club all the time. Place shares with gymnastics and children’s tae kwon do. It’s not really an official club, that place. It costs to be there. Not much, but for most of these boys if they had to pay a quarter to fart, they’d have to burp. They train there, but the club is mostly T-shirts and a place to gather, so they train here too. We don’t charge. Two of these boys, ones in there now, they’re training for the Olympics. Fellow in the middle, that’s their coach. Maxwell Landing. He won a few titles in his time, nothing big, but he’s a good coach.”

“I’ve heard of him,” Leonard said.

I watched the two boys move around, and they were pretty good, though one kid had a habit of dragging his back foot; keeping it in the bucket, we used to say. He also had a habit of going too wide when he punched. The other kid was fast and circled, and had the most potential, but the bucket-foot kid could really hit.

“So, you brought us at gunpoint to see the Camp Rapture Boxing Club?” Leonard said.

“I didn’t think you would have come otherwise,” Coldpoint said. “You got it all wrong, fellows. We’re trying to do something for the community. Sometimes we got to step on a few toes to do it, bend a few laws, but we get it done.”

“Does this include killing a young man for taking photos and threatening his sister with your brand of law if she didn’t put out?” I said.

“There are human failings in the mix,” Coldpoint said. He nodded at the boys in the ring. “We let them train here. We raise money for the club. In time, maybe we can get them someplace to train more regularly, not just a couple hours on Wednesday over at the recreation center, trying to find spots and time between the girls’ gymnastics lessons and the like. Get the poorer kids free admission to the club, get money off their minds and put boxing on it full-time for a while.”

“You are such fucking humanitarians,” Leonard said. “And here we thought you were just assholes. Oh yeah, there was the gun thing, and threats from Bobo and the dancer. That doesn't make things seem nearly as polite as you make out."

"Again, you might not have come," Coldpoint said. "I wanted to nip this all in the bud before you got too worked up and started trying to pin that kid Jamar's death on us."

"I'm no dancer," Sheerfault said.

"Hush," Coldpoint said to him. "You see what's going on here. This place, it's not supposed to be used for anything. Supposed to be dangerous. But it's what we got for free, so it's where we come. Yeah, it's illegal and I'm a cop. Building code, safety regulations, and all that. But they need a place to train for those who can't go to the club, and for those who can, they only get two nights a week. We add to that."

"You're just some sweet fellas helping some sweet kids," Leonard said.

"Exactly," Coldpoint said, and gave me his magazine-model smile.

We stood and watched the kids finish up. When they came out, two others went in, smiling at each other, lifting their gloves to touch, the referee giving them the signal.

That fight was a good one, better than the two kids that were supposed to be up for the Olympics. Both had game and skill, both were fast and hit hard for their age and size.

"And who are all these people?" I said.

"Investors," Coldpoint said.

"In what exactly?" I said.

"These boys. Their futures. We're trying to get them to sponsor buying this old place, turn it into a boxing club. Some repairs would be needed. But in this crowd, there's some real money, and a few people who work as carpenters and the like are part of it, and they could make it better with free labor, if we get them to believe in what we're doing."

When the fights were all done, the boys filed out, and then the crowd followed. In time it was just me and Leonard and the three humanitarians. Bobo appeared to have gone to sleep on his feet, his mouth hanging open, his eyes glazed over.

"Sheerfuck," Leonard said. "We got a ring, and we got the time, how about you and me do it again? You dance the Charleston, and I'll fight."

"I already proved what I have to prove," Sheerfault said.

"In a dance contest," Leonard said.

"Shit, burr-head, you don't want me on your ass again."

"You afraid I'll show you up? I was you, and it was me you had to fight, I'd worry too. Name-calling don't break a bone, motherfucker. But fists and feet do. No pointing rules. None of the referee stuff."

"Seems like a good idea to me," I said. "Sheerfault is so certain, here's his chance for a repeat performance, but not on points."

"What do you think?" Coldpoint said, looking at Sheerfault.

Leonard had Sheerfault where he wanted him, and in front of his asshole friends.

"Sure," Sheerfault said. "We can do that. But I'll tell you, Leonard, we go in, when it's over, you wake up at all, it will be in the hospital with a tube up your nose."

"Done got me trembling all over," Leonard said.

"No eye-gouging and no throat strikes," Coldpoint said. "I'm going to insist on some rules. Gets too bad for one of you, I'm breaking it up."

"Don't think it's too bad before it is," Leonard said.

"For the record," I said, "you got nothing to prove, Leonard. I know you can whip him, and you know you can whip him."

"Yeah, but he don't know it yet," Leonard said.

Sheerfault said, "You know that's right."

"And another thing, no gloves," Leonard said.

Coldpoint glanced at Sheerfault.

"Sure," Sheerfault said.

"I get through, Hap here will punch Bobo's lights out," Leonard said. "All two watts."

"Leave me out of this," I said. "Bobo can keep his lights on."

"Lights?" Bobo said.

"It's an expression," Sheerfault said. "I'll explain it to you later."

"All right," Coldpoint said. "You called it, Pine. What do you two need to do to get ready?"

"I'm always ready," Leonard said. "They pulled me out of my mama, I was ready for lunch and a fistfight."

30

They stripped off their coats and shirts, and Sheerfault took off his ring and watch and handed it to me along with his coat and shirt because I was the closest to the edge of the fence. Leonard came over and gave me his stuff.

"Leonard, you are a dumbass."

"Yeah, but I can fight."

Leonard went to the center. I folded the ring and watch up in Sheerfault's shirt. The ring was a peculiar thing, a hefty silver skull on a thick silver band. I placed the shirts and coats on an apple box by the edge of the fence.

In the center of the wire enclosure they stood ready. Sheerfault was a little heavy, but not fat. Just a guy with a light winter coating of meat. Leonard was not at his peak, but when he's out of shape he's in better shape than most.

Leonard and Sheerfault began to move, circling at first, looking for a hole, meaning a spot where they could slip a punch through. Leonard held his hands a little low. It was a ploy of his, get you to think you could come in and find a spot to hit, and then up came the hands and he hit you. Also, higher you held your hands, more tired you got. Sheerfault had a more classic style, hands high. They both held their chins up; didn't put them to their chests like boxers of old.

Sheerfault faked high with his right hand and brought a round kick around to Leonard's thigh, but Leonard turned his leg and slid off most of the attack. They circled some more, and then Sheerfault tried a similar trick on the other side, and that's when Leonard closed.

He hit Sheerfault two quick ones in the head with a motion so swift the blows sounded almost like one. Sheerfault ducked enough to take them on his forehead. That can be hard on bare knuckles. It can be hard on your head, for that matter. Neither seemed fazed.

Sheerfault was swift and his hands came quickly, like flesh missiles. Leonard dodged a few, but the others hit, and that worried me at first, but then I realized what Leonard knew. Those hits, though fast, were arm hits, meaning Sheerfault didn't put his body behind them, didn't turn his hips in a way that generated power. This was what Leonard meant about Sheerfault winning on points. The touches would count in a ring fight, a controlled fight, but in a real fight, not so much.

Sheerfault flicked again, and this time Leonard slipped inside and body-punched Sheerfault twice with the same hand, once in the solar plexus, once in the kidney. Sheerfault let out some air and tried to disengage, but Leonard wouldn't let him, kept on coming, throwing his punches hard, hitting Sheerfault with most of them. Sheerfault couldn't seem to get it together. Leonard had stolen his balance and every time Sheerfault tried to regain it, Leonard was there to steal it again.

Sheerfault finally disengaged by managing to hit Leonard with a jab in the face that was a pretty good punch. It stunned Leonard a little, and that gave Sheerfault some room.

Sheerfault dove in for a tackle, but as he grabbed Leonard's front leg, Leonard threw his reverse leg back and dropped down on his belly, driving Sheerfault to the ground as he went. Then he hit Sheerfault in the nape of the neck with an elbow. Sheerfault lost his grip on Leonard's front positioned leg, and Leonard swiveled like a trick rider and was on Sheerfault's back.

Sheerfault tried to roll out of it, but he wasn't rolling anywhere. Leonard had his weight distributed just right, and then he had his arm around Sheerfault's neck, positioning it in such a way that he didn't have his forearm in Sheerfault's throat, just his bent elbow. He was going for the constriction choke, what my dad used to call the Japanese stranglehold.

Sheerfault thought he was finally managing to rise a bit, pushing up with his arms, but that was Leonard's ploy. He was making himself lighter by lifting up on the balls of his feet, giving Sheerfault a false feeling of accomplishment. As Sheerfault rose, Leonard clamped his legs around Sheerfault's body and rolled on his back with a movement so quick it took us all by surprise. Now Sheerfault was facing the ceiling, his body in Leonard's clamps. Leonard lay comfortably on his back, choking Sheerfault by squeezing his arms together and expanding his chest.

Leonard didn't cross his ankles around Sheerfault's abdomen. He did that, Sheerfault could push down on Leonard's ankles with his hands, even throw his own leg over them, and cause excruciating pain. Leonard dug his heels into Sheerfault's thighs.

Sheerfault tried to twist loose. He managed to slide Leonard a short pace across the sawdust flooring, but he couldn't pull Leonard's hands off. Sheerfault tugged to dislodge Leonard's arms, without results. It was as if he were making a polite suggestion to a hungry python to loosen its coils, but pythons and Leonard didn't play that way.

I saw Sheerfault's eyes roll up, and his feet wiggled desperately, as if pedaling a bicycle, and then Sheerfault's arms dropped to his sides, as useless as a dead man's dick. Leonard didn't quit squeezing.

"Let him go," Coldpoint said.

But Leonard didn't let him go.

"Bobo," Coldpoint said.

Bobo started for the gate. I put a hand on his shoulder, said, "Hey, look, she's naked," and pointed.

Bobo looked where I was pointing, and I hit him in the jaw. I really brought that one by express train, but it merely made Bobo's head nod.

I stuck my heel into his thigh, way you would use it to push a shovel into the dirt. His leg went out from under him. I got my knee in his face a couple of times, jammed an elbow into the back of his neck. He went facedown in a scattering of dirt and sawdust.

I walked around Bobo, through the gate, and into the ring. I bent close to Leonard.

"You showed him," I said. "Let him go."

"I don't like him," Leonard said, and squeezed harder, pushing in with his chest, his chin in the top of Sheerfault's head.

"I know," I said. "But you want it so he remembers it."

"I want that?"

"Sure you do."

"Silly me," Leonard said. "I thought I wanted to kill the son of a bitch."

"If you get everything you want for Christmas, there's nothing to look forward to."

"That's true," Leonard said, let go and pushed Sheerfault off him. Sheerfault lay still in the sawdust. Coldpoint came through the gate and inside the fence.

"You better not have killed him," Coldpoint said.

"He'll come around," Leonard said.

Bobo was up now, staggering a little, starting through the gate toward me.

"That's enough, Bobo," Coldpoint said. "Get out of there."

Bobo let that command move around inside his head like a blindfolded man in a new house. Finally he stopped and stood by the fence. He looked at Sheerfault, said, “Is he dead?”

Sheerfault certainly didn’t look as if he were merely taking a nap. Maybe Leonard was wrong about him coming around.

I sighed, grabbed Sheerfault under his arms, and pulled him up a little. I stuck my knee in his back, rubbed at the sides of his throat, rubbed down on his chest with my palms, bent him forward, hammered him a few times in the small of the back. He coughed and spat up a wad of blood and fell over onto his side in the sawdust, breathing heavily. His eyes came open, fluttered, closed again.

Leonard stood over Sheerfault.

“I was wrong,” Leonard said. “You don’t even dance that well, Sheerfuck.”

I took Leonard by the elbow and we started toward the gate.

“You took me by surprise,” Bobo said as me and Leonard went past him.

“That was the idea,” I said. “Me and Leonard call it the elephant of surprise.”

31

They dropped us off by our car at the high school and drove away. Leonard had his coat under his arm. He was still heated up from having fought Sheerfault.

“I don’t know about you,” he said, “but I don’t believe any of that shit about helping the poor kids have a place to train.”

“They’re doing that, all right,” I said, “but that’s not all they’re doing. The idea that Jamar was murdered and Charm was sexually harassed just bounces off of him. He’s one of those guys think their misery in life makes them special. Allows them to justify anything they do and say it’s the best for the people. Jesus.”

“Really think they believe we’ll buy that line of shit?”

“No. I think Coldpoint thinks we just can’t see the bigger picture, but I doubt he honestly thinks we’ll toe the line. But if we push it, and someone says, hey, what did you see out there, and we tell them, there isn’t much that nails anyone to the wall for a crime. And they are cops. It’s something’s being done progressive for the neighborhood, and it’s only a little bit illegal. No one is going to give them too much shit for that. They’re showing us how unconnected we are in Camp Rapture, showing us that we have our ass hanging out over here, and if we keep showing it, someone is going to drive a spike up it. They were trying to scare us.”

“That didn’t work.”

“Did for me,” I said. “It scared me plenty. I was envisioning us being in that sawmill pond by night’s end, if not sooner.”

“But you weren’t scared enough to quit, I figure.”

“Of course not. I was scared, but I’m also stupid.”

“There you go. That’s the Hap I know and love.”

I unlocked the car. Leonard tossed his coat in, picked his fedora off the seat, and put it on as he slid inside the car.

“I want to drive by Barker’s office,” Leonard said.

“Suits me,” I said. “I find myself a little put out with that bastard.

Hey, know what?”

“What?” Leonard said.

“You tenderized Sheerfault like a hamburger steak.”

“Choked him out and threw him away,” Leonard said. “And you, my brother. You knocked Boo-Boo on his ass.”

“Bobo,” I said.

“Whatever.”

32

I parked us behind Barker's office. Leonard checked himself in the mirror on the sun visor, adjusted his hat.

"Yeah, I be looking good," he said.

We got out and Leonard put on his coat and adjusted his fedora again, and we tried the outside door. It was locked. Leonard took the key from me and went to the car and got a tire tool out of the trunk, came back and stuck it into the edge of the door and heaved.

There was a cracking sound and the door came loose and swung open.

"They call that breaking and entering," I said.

"They do indeed," Leonard said.

We went down the hallway like before and came to Barker's office. The door was locked. Leonard, without hesitation, knocked the pebbled glass out with the tire tool, reached in, and flicked the lock. A moment later we were inside.

Barker, wearing only a T-shirt and boxer shorts, opened his inner office door with something in his hand, but it was too late. We were already standing there. Leonard whacked his hand lightly with the tire tool, and Barker dropped what he was holding. A little silver automatic.

I picked it up and put it in my coat pocket. Leonard pushed him into the office and turned on the light. Barker said, "Okay. You got me. Cut the light, though. Cut it. We can talk in the dark."

"I don't like what you might have in the dark," I said. "In more ways than one."

"I got nothing. What I had, you got. I got nothing."

"All right," I said, "but don't try to get cute. As you might expect, we are not in the best of moods."

I turned off the light. It might have been a paranoid move, but no use advertising we were all upstairs, not after what had gone on tonight. For all we knew, Coldpoint and his band of merry assholes might decide they wanted to take us out.

“They let you go,” he said, rubbing the hand Leonard had hit with the tire iron.

“They did at that.”

“Why?”

“Personality,” Leonard said.

There was light coming in through the window behind the desk. It was from a streetlight. It wasn’t much, but it was enough to see around the room after my eyes adjusted.

Barker sat on the couch and dipped his head.

“I had to do it, boys. I had to.”

“Did you now?” Leonard said.

“I tell you I had to, had to.”

“Tell us why? And then tell us why you’re surprised to see us.”

“Make it good,” Leonard said, “’cause I’m thinking of hitting you with this tire tool so many times they’ll have to build a wing on the hospital just to take care of your ass.”

“I didn’t know what they were going to do, but they threatened me, and my family. They can have my wife, the coldhearted bitch. But my daughter, that’s different.”

“They said they’d hurt her?” I said.

“Indicated it. Sheerfault and Bobo, they’re the muscle, and Coldpoint, he calls the shots, though I get the impression Sheerfault is getting tired of him. Coldpoint’s kind of a politician, crooked as a dog’s leg, but clever. He knows piling up bodies isn’t the best thing to do. He’s piled up a few, I feel certain, but he’s got cautious over time. He gets the police chief job, connections he’s got, he’s got a license to steal. Doesn’t see any reason to rock the boat when they’re giving him the ocean. Those other two would just as soon wear your ass for a hat. I admit I’m surprised to see you here, surprised. But you got to understand, what I did, it wasn’t personal, wasn’t personal.”

“You said that before,” Leonard said. “Don’t say it again. I don’t like it. And for the record, the muscle got their asses handed to them.”

Barker smiled a little. “I’m glad that’s how it worked out. I’m glad. Really. I didn’t want you hurt, but I didn’t know what else to do, didn’t know what else.”

“What you’re going to do now is you’re going to straighten some things out, answer some questions,” I said.

“Yeah,” Leonard said patting the tire tool against his open palm. “That’s what you’re going to do, and you’re going to be clear about it and it’s going to sound pretty to us. Everything is going to fall right in place."

"I know what I know," Barker said, "but I don't know it's all you need to know."

"Start with this," I said. "Timpson Weed. Did he or did he not ask you to tell the police he saw Jamar beat to death by cops?"

"Not exactly."

"And what, pray tell, did he have you say?" Leonard said.

"Timpson…Well, you need some background. He spent a lot of time in jail, and it got so when they wanted him at the jail, they picked him up on some charge or another, real or otherwise. They took him in when they had someone they wanted to put him with."

"What does that mean?" I said.

"They run fights with the prisoners. Pick some guy up for dope or some misdemeanor, whatever they like to call it, and they set him up to fight. Provided they got someone in there can fight back. Weed, he could fight, could fight good. He made a lot of money and made the gamblers more money until he got so good no one would bet on him losing, not bet on him at all. When he was younger, I think he boxed professionally. Way I heard it anyway, way I heard it."

"That's not quite in focus," I said.

"First time he goes in, he gets in a fight with a cell mate, and he cleans his clock, and Bobo, who's a jailer, sees it and tells Sheerfault."

"So that little bastard has gainful employment," Leonard said.

"Instead of giving Timpson more time for fighting, they ask him to do it again, say they can drop any charges he's in on, make it go away like it never happened, never happened at all. Thing is, he's got to fight, and so does the other guy."

"And all this happens at the mill," I said.

"That's right, the mill, at the mill."

"But not on Sunday nights," Leonard said.

Barker nodded. "That's the boys' fight club night. That's kind of the way they beard themselves. Weed, he was whipping all comers, and there was a lot of money made until no one would bet against him. It's not just some of the people on the force come there to bet, it's people around town. The fighter's black, that's even more a part of it. They have a thing about black people, a thing, want to see them hurt."

"Just like the good old days," Leonard said.

"How long has this been going on?" I asked.

"Some time now. You see, Jamar, he was a boxer who was fighting at the club, and they seen him, and he was good. He was smoking the Olympic kids, but he didn't have any interest in that, wouldn't go to the sawmill for fight training. They pushed at him to do it, but he wouldn't. That's why they stopped his sister. They were messing with him. Showing him they could do what they wanted when they wanted to. See, they wanted him to win a few amateur fights, push him into being a pro. They wanted the money he could make them. Even if it was just at the sawmill."

"Typical white-man shit," Leonard said. "No offense, Hap."

"None taken."

"Only Jamar didn't play along," Leonard said. "Started filming them. Didn't like them bothering sis."

"Right. That's right. Filmed them, had a scanner, followed them around, followed them when he could and made it hard for them to do anything he wasn't putting on film. They got mad and one night they decided they'd had enough, grabbed him, put him in the ring up there, made him fight. It wasn't a public fight. They had him fight until he couldn't, and they beat him to death. See, it was Timpson, it was him. He was brought in to fight because they wanted to teach the kid a lesson, a permanent one. No betting on that fight, they just paid Timpson good, brought him in, and since no one bet on him anymore, he wasn't making that good fight money. I don't know Timpson meant to beat him bad as he did, but he did, and then when the kid went down and couldn't get up, the rest of them, Sheerfault, Bobo, and Coldpoint—though I doubt he got his hands dirty—finished the kid off, finished him off."

"And you know all this through Timpson?" I said.

Barker nodded. "You see, it kind of got to him, doing what he did. But what got to him more was the idea he could have me go in and tell the cops he was going to go to other authorities, they didn't pay him off not to tell what happened up there. He thought he could work a regular payday out of it."

"Blackmail," Leonard said.

"That's right, that's right."

"And you would take a cut," I said.

"Yep, you're right there, right as rain. They didn't care though, didn't care. They own the town, everyone in it, or at least they know the people own the town and work for them, that's more it, more it. That's when Timpson got mad and started telling his story, putting it out in the projects. He didn't use common sense, not at all. He got vengeful, way they used him, used him up. And he wanted to make it hard on them, force them to give him some money, and then he'd recant his story if it ever got so he was actually brought in for it, but if they didn't pay him he'd rant and rave."

"So they killed him," Leonard said.

"They sort of asked me to have him meet with me, say I had some money for him from the cops, some money."

"You set him up like you set us up," I said.

"And told them Timpson might have a loose lip?" Leonard said.

"I needed the money, needed it, real bad."

"You sleazy little shit-greased weasel. You gave up Timpson for a buck, and he was your client, and you gave us up. You knew they'd kill him and figured they'd kill us too."

"I didn't really think about it," Barker said.

"Oh," Leonard said, "well, that makes it all right."

Leonard moved toward Barker. I put my hand against his chest.

"Easy," I said.

"Come on, let me hit fat boy once?" Leonard said.

"Maybe come Christmas," I said.

"How much was Timpson's life worth, dick cheese? How much?"

"Three hundred dollars," Barker said.

"Goddamn it," Leonard said. "Timpson was a bastard, but you're ten times worse, you money-grubbing asshole. Come on, Hap, just a couple punches to his head. That ain't nothing compared to what he done."

"No," I said. "We are the good guys."

"I don't know why they didn't kill you two," Barker said. "I'm glad they didn't, I am, glad, really."

"I think you'd have spent your money, jacked off, and slept just fine," Leonard said. "Did I mention I might break your neck?"

"It came up," Barker said. "Or something in that range."

Leonard took a step toward him. I pressed my hand against his chest again. I could feel him vibrate.

"And why the fuck do you repeat yourself?" Leonard asked.

"Childhood habit," Barker said. "Habit. Insecurity, insecure, that's it, insecure."

"My guess is Jamar and Timpson ain't the only ones died at the sawmill," I said.

"I have heard rumors there are others, others," Barker said.

"Rumors," Leonard said. "I got a little rumor for you. You know too much now, so I was you—and if I was, I'd have someone saw my head off—but I was you, I'd be special careful."

"Will you protect me, will you?" Barker said. He seemed small then, and as sad as anyone I had ever seen.

"Nope," Leonard said. "You made your bed of nails, now lie down on it. Hap, hold this tire tool while I hit him some."

"No, Leonard. That won't change things."

"But it would brighten my night," Leonard said.

"Oh, all right. Give me the tire tool."

I took it.

"Stand up," Leonard said to Barker.

Barker looked at me. I shrugged.

"You're going to let him bully me," he said.

"Considering you nearly got us killed," I said, "just this once. One shot, Leonard."

Barker stood up slowly. Leonard stepped close and gave him an uppercut in the stomach. He didn't really put a lot into it. Barker's knees bent and he fell back on the couch in a sitting position, dropped his head, gasped for air.

"That's to let you know we got a sour streak," Leonard said. "That's to let you know you tell them any more shit on us, have anything to do with them making a run at us again, that's just a sample of what I'm going to do to you. Wasn't messing with you about them having to build that wing on the hospital, and next time Hap may not be with me, may not be here to hold me back and talk me down. You listening?"

Barker lifted his head a little and nodded but didn't say anything. He couldn't. Didn't have the breath for it.

"We're going to go now," Leonard said. "Think of something we ought to know, get back to us. Think of something you think they ought to know, keep your mouth shut. Here's another thing. As soon as you get your breath, arrange for your daughter to leave town. Do not pass go. Do not stop to jerk off or take a piss, do it now. Oh, and you might want to take your own self out of here too. But that's up to you. Your well-being is not a big thing with me. Good night, and fuck you very much."

33

Sitting in the car, Leonard said, “They came after Timpson, and then us. Who’s next?”

“Mrs. Elton and Charm.”

“Could be that way, or fat ass in there, but he’s not my concern.”

“Ought to be,” I said. “He has the word from Timpson on how things went down.”

It was late when we arrived at Mrs. Elton’s house. I knocked on the door and pushed the doorbell. To the right of the door a curtain slid back at a window. The curtain closed; a moment later the door opened.

It was Mrs. Elton.

“You got news?”

“We got to move you.”

“I don’t understand,” she said.

“We’ll tell you about it,” I said.

“Come in,” she said.

She was wearing a heavy robe and house shoes; her hair was under a scarf. She sat on the couch, said, “It’s bad news, isn’t it?”

“Bad information. You already know the news. We just have more details, but the bottom line is this: We may have stirred the pot a little too much, and they may be more dangerous than we thought. It’s a simple thing, but it’s a bad thing, and it has deep roots.”

“Tell me,” she said.

Leonard broke it down for her. When he finished she was trembling and crying.

“Thing is,” I said, “you got to get some stuff together, wake Charm, have her get her stuff together. We’ll take you someplace safe until we can sort this all out, get those bastards behind bars.”

“Or somewhere in a ditch,” Leonard said.

Always a ditch, I thought. Always a ditch.

“Charm isn’t here,” she said. “She’s out. She went to a party. Said she’d be in late.”

"How late?" Leonard asked.

"Late. That's all."

"All right, no big deal. If they don't know she went to a party, it's all good. Here's what we're going to do, just to be sure you're safe. Get some things together for you and Charm, go with Leonard. I'll stay here and wait for her. She have a cell phone?"

"Of course she does," Mrs. Elton said.

"Let's start there," I said.

She went away, came back with her own cell. She called.

"She's not answering," she said.

"Send her a text," I said. "Young people answer texts better than phone calls."

"I don't know how," she said.

"May I see it," I said.

She handed me the phone. I wrote as if I was Mrs. Elton, typed in: Really need for you to come home right now, please. Not an emergency, but important. I won't be here. Hap Collins, the private investigator, will be here to pick you up. Call me if you have questions.

I gave her back the phone, said, "Take a phone charger with you. Keep it charged, and keep calling or texting or both. Leonard will help you text. Want to make sure she gets the message."

"They call me Mr. Technology," Leonard said.

"I know of no one who calls him that," I said.

"But why do I have to move from here?"

"We can explain the why later," Leonard said. "Get some possibles together."

She hustled off to do that. When she was gone, Leonard said, "So, what's the plan?"

"Across the street to our office. That way we're close together, but you're also up high with a good view. The office is a pretty good Alamo."

"Folks at the Alamo lost," Leonard said.

"I'll take that under advisement. They may not show up anyway, but it's as safe a place as one can expect until we can do some serious thinking. Shit. What if they decide to take a run at Brett and Chance? I hadn't considered that."

"Brett will shoot them," Leonard said.

"She will, won't she?"

"Goddamn right. Should I call Marvin?"

"Yeah. I'll call Brett and give her a heads-up, see if she wants to move her and Chance to a safer place.”

Mrs. Elton came back with two small bags. Leonard took them and they went out to the car. Leonard drove it across the street and behind our office. I watched him do it through the front window, the one where Mrs. Elton had seen Leonard and Marvin come and go.

The car wasn’t exactly hidden, but it seemed good enough for the moment.

I called Brett. The phone rang, went to voice mail. I had an uncomfortable five minutes thinking about how knocked out she might be due to the flu medicine she was taking. I could call Chance, but I didn’t want to frighten her. She wasn’t entirely indoctrinated into our way of life, not yet, and I wasn’t sure I wanted her to be.

I called again. This time, on the third ring Brett answered.

“Brett, sorry, baby, but you and Chance and Buffy have to leave the house.”

“Oh, shit, what now?” she said.

“The usual mayhem, and I should add this is just a precaution. Take a gun with you. Might as well be straight with Chance, though you can boil it down to the bone if you want. Bottom line is our investigation may have stirred up some bad men who might want to take things out on me and Leonard and anyone around us.”

“I feel like shit still, and so does Chance,” she said.

“All the more reason to get out of the house.”

“I can handle myself.”

“I know, but it’s not necessary.”

“Give me the scoop, Hap.”

I told her more details but boiled it pretty much to the bone.

“I wasn’t sick, I wouldn’t go,” Brett said. “I’d send Chance away, but I wouldn’t go. But since we are both sick, I’m going.”

“All I’m asking, go because you’re sick and take Chance with you.”

“Duh,” Brett said. “Of course she goes with me.”

“Don’t forget your flu medicine. And remember, text me when you find someplace safe.”

After that I called Manny.

She answered on the first ring.

“This better be good, whoever you are,” she said.

“Define good,” I said.

“Who is this?”

I told her.

“Oh. I hope you didn’t call me in the middle of the night because you decided I would be a swell date. Though tomorrow might work. I need a nice dinner and a movie. If you're calling about those contacts I said I'd make, I tried, but they didn't call back."

"Nothing like that," I said. I gave her the stripped-down version, finished with "I need you to watch yourself. I got a feeling they may be planning to clean house."

"You think this why?"

"Gut reaction."

"What do you need from me?"

"Just warning you."

"I'm a big and capable girl. Let me state it again, so you hear me: What do you need from me?"

She sounded like Brett. But she wasn't sick.

"Backup."

"Where are you?"

I told her, said, "You might bring something to eat as well."

"Would you like some little initialed dinner napkins?"

"That would be swell."

"I'll wear a nice little maid outfit and bring them to you on a silver tray and later we can make whoopee."

"That really would be nice, but alas, my girlfriend doesn't let me date."

"Ah, then I'm bringing a friend, my nine-mil," she said.

34

I was sitting there thinking what do I do if they show up, call them bad names and declare king's X? I didn't have a gun. I didn't like guns, but I was in a business where guns mattered. What I had was some pocket lint and a headful of empty dreams.

Maybe if they showed up, I could just keep the door locked and tell them no one was home. Or like the bandit who hid in the henhouse, I could say when the bad guys came, "Nobody in here but us chickens."

Then I remembered the gun I had taken from Barker and put in my coat pocket with the lint. I reached in my pocket and pulled it out. It was shiny and it was small. A .22. That will kill you good as any firearm, but it might not be the best gun in a shoot-out, considering the kinds of weapons the other team might have.

Then again, there was no reason for them to know I was here. None. However, they might come for Mrs. Elton and Charm, and if they found me, I'd do just as well. Way I figured it, me and Leonard were on their list.

Lights flashed through the curtains. Holding the .22 automatic in my hand, I eased to the hallway where there were a row of windows, gently slipped a curtain aside, and looked out.

Someone got out of a car. It wasn't Sheerfault or Bobo, unless they had taken to wearing a short dress and high heels.

The door unlocked; a voice said, "Mr. Collins?"

"Charm," I said. "Step inside and close the door."

She did.

"You are supposed to go across the street to our office," I said.

"Got a text saying to come home. Nothing after that. My phone went dead."

"That was an error on my part," I said. "Your mother is there with Leonard. He'll watch after you. Safer there than here. Leave your car, and I'll walk you over. Your mom gathered you up some things. Give me your house key."

We locked up and walked across the street. I escorted her upstairs, called out gently to Leonard. He opened the door and let her in. He had a shotgun from the closet. It was the only one there at the moment, so nothing extra for me. But at least both of us were armed now.

Leaving Charm in Leonard's care, I started back down the stairs.

"Maybe you should stay here," he said, standing in the doorway, looking down at me. "Not divide our forces."

"I think it's better I'm over there. Should they show up, I'll call you."

"That's a good idea because?"

"We got them on both sides."

"So the two of us have them surrounded?"

"Manny is coming."

"We don't know Manny. Not really."

"Beggars can't be choosers, buddy. I figure she hates the department enough, she'll do all right. Marvin? You call him?"

"Didn't want anyone else to know what was going on at the station, because it's pretty complicated and not easy to digest unless you're a part of it, so I left a message for him to call me. Called his home too. Went to voice mail."

"Stay observant."

"The fucking Invisible Man couldn't get past me."

"Nice to know," I said, and went down the stairs.

Back at Mrs. Elton's house, I wandered around and found some sodas in the refrigerator. I took one and made a mental note: Owe one diet soda. I went back to the window and looked out. Nope. Nothing. I sat in a chair and tapped my fingers. That didn't make anything happen. Good. My magic was working.

Some dogs barked down the way. I strained to listen, but the barking stopped. I finished the soda, went back to the kitchen, and put the can in the trash, as I didn't see any recycling business like at our house. I got another soda out of the fridge. I owed two now.

I sat down in my chair, soda in my left hand, .22 on my knee, tapping my fingers on the arm of the chair. So far that had brought me good luck, so why stop now?

Time limped by on a walker.

Lights shone through the curtains as cars drove by on the street. None of the cars stopped. I put the empty soda can beside the chair. I was feeling a little sleepy.

No naps, I told myself. That would be bad. Ever vigilant. Ever alert. Frosty as hell and ready to go.

Actually, I nodded a little.

That's when I sensed someone was behind me. Sensed may be too strong a word. Maybe I heard something, felt a faint change in the temperature of the room due to another presence. I quit tapping my fingers and put my hand on the .22 on my knee. I was about to hit the floor and roll from a possible shot when a voice said, "You are not a ninja."

It was Manny.

"Damn, girl," I said.

"Came through the back. Picked the lock. Had I been a bad guy, they'd find your head in the yard with a turd in your mouth."

Manny was dressed in black and was wearing a holster with her sidearm in it, had her hair tied back. "I parked down the street, three blocks, walked over. No one saw me but some dogs."

I had heard them bark and hadn't suspected a thing. Hap Collins, ever ready.

"So you'll feel better about it, I'm a really good sneak. What is that you have in your hand? A cap gun?"

I let it rest in my palm and held it out to her.

She picked it up and looked at it. The streetlight outside gave us enough light to see by.

"You might as well throw this at them and hope it hits a vital spot."

"Not the way I shoot," I said.

"Let's hope you're a better shot than you are a sentinel."

"Thankfully, I am."

"If they should come here," Manny said, "my guess is they'll do what I did. One of them, anyway, and when the one out front thinks the sneak has had enough time to pick the lock and slip in the back door, the other one will come through the front door, guns blazing. You know, of course, this can all go south even if we put them down. It's police you're dealing with. They can make up any story they like."

"If they don't act like police, they're not police."

"If you can prove they aren't acting like police, then you will be in good shape."

"I'm very optimistic."

"I suspect that's a great comfort. Got any more sodas?"

"Aren't mine, but yes. In the fridge."

She went to get one. I told myself, Okay, now I owe three sodas.

When she came back she was carrying a chair from the kitchen table. She placed it against the wall to the left of my chair, sat down, pulled the tab on the soda.

“Any more information I need to know?” she said.

“I sometimes stay up past my bedtime. I try not to snack after six, but right now I could eat the ass out of a dead pig.”

“I’m a little snacky myself,” she said. “Speaking of a dead pig’s ass, I like pork skins. You like those?”

“I do.”

“Good. We like pork skins. I think this is like a bonding moment.”

“Could be. We always called them pork rinds, though.”

“Did you now?”

“We did.”

“Hap, you are one hell of a conversationalist.”

We sat silent after that. I considered another soda but figured I’d have to pee at the wrong time if things started to go down. Actually, I needed to pee then and I went to do it.

When I came back, Manny met me in the hallway. She had her pistol in her hand. She was moving and speaking softly.

“There’s someone fucking with the back door,” she said.

35

Manny went to one side of the door and I went to the other. A voice said, “Hap. It’s me. You got a gun, don’t shoot.”

“Who is me?” Manny said.

“Marvin Hanson,” I said, and opened the door.

Marvin came in and closed the door.

“Hey, Manny,” he said.

“Hey,” she said.

I forgot they knew one another.

“What the hell, man?” I said. “Shaking a door could get you shot.”

“I wanted to stir things a little, just in case someone had already got to you. Figured someone other than you was here, they weren’t going to say anything if I called out your name. If you answered, well, I been hearing your voice a lot longer than I’ve wanted to, so I’d recognize it.”

“It’s a nice voice,” Manny said. “Kind of baritone.”

“He just uses that to impress the girls,” Marvin said.

“Or when I have sinus,” I said.

“Didn’t know you were here, Manny. Wasn’t in the message. Hope hanging with this guy doesn’t become a habit.”

“We both like pork skins.”

“That’s something. I think a friendship could be formed around that,” Marvin said.

“What I said. Hap and I consider it a bonding moment. He calls skins pork rinds, though.”

“He’s out of touch,” Marvin said. He looked at me. “Got Leonard’s message.”

“Well, that part’s easy to figure,” I said.

“You are such a detective.”

“Cops coming too?”

“I am the cops.”

“The rest of them?”

“Not exactly. You know, one town, one ranger.”

"You're not a Texas Ranger."

"Don't remind me. I wanted to be. Thing is, I got your message right after I got another one about some guy named Barker, ambulance chaser. Well, he caught one. Though, to be more accurate, he caught a hearse."

"What?"

"Dead. Beat to death."

"Son of a bitch," I said.

"Yeah, son of a bitch," he said. "Thing was, he had Brett's agency card in his coat pocket."

"Leonard gave it to him."

"And then I got Leonard's message, this address. He said the Camp Rapture police department might want you and him dead. I can absolutely understand that."

"We have trouble making friends. I blame Leonard."

"I got Leonard's call, and I'm starting out, and I get a phone call from a dispatcher I know in Camp Rapture. He knows I know you guys. Who doesn't? A blessing and mostly a curse. He says there's a dead guy that's been found behind the old high school, and the unknown someone called it in got your license number, saw your car over there, Hap."

"Uh-oh," I said.

"Yeah," Marvin said. "Uh-oh. And that's not all. This dead body, he's got Brett's agency's card in his pocket."

"And the dead guy is a sleazy lawyer named Barker," I said.

"Bingo," Marvin said.

"Shit."

"Yeah," Marvin said. "Shit."

"We got set up. The boys who gave the license plates to the cops were the cops. They got it when they met us there tonight. We went by and saw Barker on account of he set us up."

"And how's that?" Marvin asked.

I explained, left out the part about Leonard punching Barker in his office, then said, "We gave him a card so he could call us. We told him his life was probably in danger and he ought to get the hell out of town. Maybe he was on his way when they got him. Maybe he was still sitting there thinking things over. I think the Camp Rapture cops, at least two of them, and a jailer named Bobo, decided he might talk too much. He may have, before he bit the big one, squealed on how he talked to me and Leonard, gave us the scoop."

"Leonard gave me a little of it on the phone," Marvin said.

“Here’s the rest of it,” I said, and told him what Barker had told us.

“So you’re sitting here thinking they might come for Mrs. Elton and Charm or you and Leonard?”

“Yep.”

“And Manny, you just happened to drop by for a cup of coffee?”

“Actually, I had a soda and talked about pig skins,” she said.

Marvin shook his head. “You admit to me you were at the old school, and at his office, and I believe you didn’t kill him, but that story and your license plate number doesn’t do you and Leonard any good.”

“I know,” I said.

“Look, I’m the fucking police chief. I can’t show favoritism. I got this information from the dispatcher over there, in a friendly way, and I got to take you and Leonard down to the station.”

“Are we going to have a movie night?” I said.

“Nope.”

“Since you’re taking me and Leonard in, can you have someone watch after Mrs. Elton and Charm?”

“We can arrange that.”

“Can I come to the station too?” Manny asked. “I’m up. I got nothing to do. Maybe I could put an application in for a job.”

“Good. Manny gets a job and me and Leonard get the shaft,” I said.

“I’m not hired yet,” Manny said.

“And there’s the whole business about you being here with a murder suspect,” Marvin said.

“Oh yeah. That could be an impediment,” she said.

Marvin studied me carefully, said, “And there’s just a little more information I got for you.”

“Ah, shit,” I said. “The hits keep on coming.”

“An officer named Sheerfault pressed charges against Leonard for attempted assault and battery, but he said in self-defense he had to hand Leonard his ass.”

“Bullshit. Sheerfault voluntarily climbed into the ring with Leonard, and Leonard beat him like a redheaded stepchild with a harelip, choked him out.”

“And they say you hit Bobo with a board when he wasn’t looking,” Marvin said.

“I am not above that, and I did distract him, but I didn’t hit him with a board, and he was actually about to hit me. I used the elephant of surprise.”

“What?” Manny said.

“Ignore him,” Marvin said. “Look, I got to take you and Leonard in.”

“You have had a big night,” Manny said, and she clapped me on the shoulder.

“What is that you’re holding there, Hap?” Marvin said. “A cap gun?”

“This is going to complicate things,” I said, handing him the gun. “It belongs to Barker.”

36

Me and Leonard were in the main interrogation room at the newly renovated police station. The room was larger than the old room and the table had yet to be carved on with keys and pens and stout fingernails. Things got serious, you'd end up in one of the smaller rooms at closer quarters with your interviewer, your hands cuffed to a rail in the table that was fastened to a ring in the floor. So far, we were getting the luxury treatment, the guest suite, not the galley-slave quarters.

Marvin said, "Don't mention Barker's gun unless somehow they bring it up. Don't mention Manny being there with you either."

Manny was in the main office filling out an application. Mrs. Elton and Charm were somewhere under protection. I had called Brett and let her know what was happening, told her to be alert. She pretty much said fuck it, bad guys or no bad guys, she was going to sleep. She had Buffy to protect her and was too tired and sick to come down to the station.

I was not that confident in Buffy's protective abilities.

"And another thing," Marvin said. "Going to say you guys turned yourselves in."

"How did we know we were supposed to turn ourselves in?" I said. "Figure that one, smart guy?"

"Right now we don't have to explain it. I can look cool and enigmatic. Later on, we got to tell them something, we will. Things don't add up right, I got to throw you under the bus, and I'll probably be sliding under there with you. I might quit being police chief, and you two might go over to Huntsville for a little stay and a cocktail party that involves a very sharp needle and a long nap."

"That's not nice," Leonard said.

"Judging by our arrangements, I get the impression we'll be having visitors soon," I said.

"Yep," Marvin said. "Coldpoint, Sheerfault, and Bobo are coming over. They want to play pin the tail on the donkeys."

“I presume we are the donkeys,” Leonard said.

“Bingo,” Marvin said, and he went out.

We sat and waited.

Leonard said, “Right now, that cocktail and a nap sounds pretty good.”

Finally, Marvin came back. He had Coldpoint, Sheerfault, and Bobo with him. Sheerfault looked like he had been in a car wreck. Black eyes and cuts on his cheeks and forehead, one ear mashed and swollen. Bobo wasn’t bruised or injured in any way. Damn. I hit him pretty hard.

Marvin said to us, “Although you aren’t under arrest, I want to warn you that you have the right not to say shit and all that, and you can have a shyster if you want one.”

“We don’t need a goddamn lawyer,” Leonard said. “We ain’t done shit.”

“After tonight,” Coldpoint said, “you’re going to need a magician to get you out of this.”

“Everyone shut up,” Marvin said. “I’ll ask the questions. This is being recorded, by the way.”

“Recorded?” I said.

“Upscale shit is going on here,” Marvin said. “This room records sound and sight, and we got a doohickey that freshens the air.”

“Good,” Leonard said. “Let me go on record saying these three motherfuckers are liars and assholes. I beat Sheerfault’s ass like a dead goat, and Hap knocked Bobo’s dick in the dirt.”

“Noted,” Marvin said.

“We’re fellow cops,” Coldpoint said. “You can’t let him talk to us like that.”

“He was going on record,” Marvin said.

“What the hell?” Sheerfault said.

“You’re in my jurisdiction now,” Marvin said, “so put away the high hat.”

“This is our case,” Coldpoint said. “Happened in Camp Rapture. Our jurisdiction.”

“And they were picked up in my jurisdiction,” Marvin said, “and right now, there’s no real evidence of them committing a crime.”

“Sure there is,” said Coldpoint. “There’s an eyewitness says Hap’s car was at the old school.”

“Anonymous witness,” Marvin said.

“Still, we got to take them back on account of them attacking an officer,” Coldpoint said.

“And a monkey,” Leonard said. “Don’t forget the monkey took a beating too.”

Bobo swelled his chest, looked as if he might leap at Leonard.

“Hope you took your vitamins,” Leonard said to Bobo.

“Everyone, calm down,” Marvin said. “You fuckers are in my station now.”

“We go with them, let me tell you how it works out,” Leonard said. “They’ll say we tried to escape and they had to fire a few warning shots into the back of our heads. That would be a treat for you, wouldn’t it, Coldpoint? One dead nigger and a white-trash motherfucker stacked at the curb.”

“Thank you for including me,” I said.

“What I’m going to need for these two to go anywhere with anyone is some real facts,” Marvin said.

“Just told you some real facts,” Coldpoint said.

“No,” Marvin said. “You gave me some opinions and some stories I don’t believe. Leonard got in a fight with Sheerfault, but he didn’t get his ass whipped, for one.” Marvin nodded at Sheerfault. “Look at you, boy. Looks like someone climbed your ass with cleats, set you on fire, then shit on you until the flames went out. You won that fight, you must have taken a little extra time afterward to beat yourself up.”

“Whose side are you on?” Coldpoint said, glaring at Marvin.

“I haven’t picked a side yet,” Marvin said.

“We know you guys are friends,” Coldpoint said to Marvin. “You may find your time as police chief brief, you keep this friendship up. And you two. I’ve heard about you. You’re the kind that ends up in prison bending over a toilet bowl with a dick in your ass.”

“Been there,” Leonard said. “But not a prison, and the bending was by consent.”

“Shut up, all of you,” Marvin said. “I’m not kidding. Hap. Leonard. You want to spend the night in the jail on general principle, keep it up.”

Leonard drew a zipper motion over his mouth.

Marvin looked at me. I did the same.

Marvin turned to Sheerfault, said, “Have Barker’s death photos sent over to me.”

“We can get them for you tomorrow,” Coldpoint said.

“You can get them for me now,” Marvin said. “Give me your body cutter’s number, and I’ll call him. We got all kinds of technology these days, and those photos, which I’m sure were taken at the crime scene, can be here within seconds, faster than you can get a delivery pizza.”

“You have always been an asshole,” Coldpoint said.

“Yeah,” Marvin said. “I have. And I remember when you worked here, both of us cops together, and you have always been a scum-sucking bottom-feeder trying to look sharp and cool and well dressed. In final evaluation, you’re just a cheap hood with a badge. Maybe once you did something right and lawful, but I can’t prove it.”

“This is all recorded, remember?” Coldpoint said.

“For posterity, I hope,” Marvin said.

37

Marvin sent everyone out of the room but us. We were brought some coffee by Officer Carroll, a cop we had recently met. He was new to the force. A stout, nice-looking guy with a shaved head.

"Where have you guys shit this time?" he said.

"You might say we missed the toilet," Leonard said.

"Never mind, I'll read the reports," he said.

"Good," Leonard said. "I've told it about as much as I want to."

"Just have your coffee," Officer Carroll said.

The station had been renovated, but the coffee was still the same crap as before. Acid with a touch of colored water and caffeine and the slight aroma of mouse droppings.

"All right," the officer said. "I got to ask this. Bobo, what's up with him?"

"Got hit by a train," Leonard said. "Did you know it raised his IQ?"

"Damn," Carroll said, and went out. Leonard carefully watched him go.

"I kind of like the way he looks," Leonard said.

"He looks like a large-caliber bullet," I said.

"I know."

A short time later Officer Carroll came back.

"Hey, guys. Chief wants to see you. You can bring your coffee with you."

Leonard looked into his cup, said, "Do we have to?"

38

Marvin was behind his office desk, leaning back in his chair. He had his heels on the desk. He had a cup of coffee from Starbucks.

"Hey," I said, "we have to drink the cop-shop shit and you had Starbucks brought in for you."

"Yep."

We sat down and Officer Carroll leaned against the wall.

I said, "What happened to Manny?"

"Filled out an application and I sent a patrol to drop her off at her vehicle."

"She got off easy," I said.

"Yes, she did," Marvin said. "Got the photos of Barker's body."

"Already?" Leonard said.

"Told you, faster than a pizza. Take a look. See anything interesting?"

Leonard took them from where they lay in front of Marvin and spread them on the desk in front of us. They were nude shots of Barker stretched out on a table. It made me long for him to be wearing his cheap suit.

"Very small dick, for one," Leonard said. "Ugly feet."

"The wounds," Marvin said. "The beating."

There were standard shots, and there were close-up shots. Marvin opened his desk drawer and took out a magnifying glass.

"Look at you," Leonard said to Marvin. "Sherlock Homey."

Marvin handed me the glass.

"Why him?" Leonard said.

"More responsible," Marvin said.

I put the magnifying glass against the photo, roamed it over the close-up off Barker's head. At the back of his ear I saw something. A bloody imprint.

I put my finger on what I saw, looked up at Marvin.

Marvin swung his feet off the desk, pulled the photo away from me, held it up to us with his thumb next to the spot I had indicated.

"That wound right there, it's an odd mark," Marvin said.

He put that photo down and snatched up another.

"Visible in most of the shots, but this one is really good. I don't think Coldpoint had any idea what was there, wasn't looking for it. Had his folks send it over because he felt he didn't have to worry. They weren't investigating anything because they had you two framed for it."

Marvin tapped the photo with a finger. "Look close."

Leonard leaned forward. "A little skull?"

"Yep," Marvin said. "It is not a mark that naturally appears in nature. Barker did not have a case of the skulls, nor do fist and feet have skulls on them."

"But rings can have skulls on them," I said. "I noticed that ring when Sheerfault took it off to fight with Leonard."

"Damn, look at you," Leonard said. "You're like Ellery Queen."

"Who?" Carroll said.

"My opinion of you just went slightly downhill," Leonard said, and he and Carroll grinned at one another.

I hadn't gotten it until right then. He and Leonard were flirting.

"And I saw that ring on his finger tonight in the interrogation room," Marvin said.

"I didn't notice," Leonard said. "I was thinking about how bad the coffee was."

"That is why you will never be the keen detectives that Marvin and I are," I said.

"Way I figure it," Marvin said, "Bobo probably helped Sheerfault beat Barker to death. Maybe Coldpoint too, but I doubt it."

"Manny said he didn't do his own dirty work," I said.

"And she'd be right," Marvin said. "I've known him for a long time, and I've disliked him just as long."

"I assume this helps our situation?" Leonard said.

"It does. Another thing will help is there was no gun taken from Barker. Right?"

"None at all," I said.

"And I'm going to give the gun that was not taken back to you to get rid of so that it is not in my possession. You get caught with it before you get rid of it, then the gun will exist, and your balls will be in a vise. A gun I didn't know about will have turned up, and it will complicate matters."

"I didn't shoot him with it," I said.

"Yes, but it is probably registered to him, and if you were to have beat him to death, you might have taken it off his body. Dig? No use giving them any kind of ammunition for a defense."

"Dig, daddy-o," I said.

"Get rid of this nonexistent gun and go home."

"Are you going to arrest Sheerfault?" Leonard said.

"That's the plan, but I'm going to lay this case out really good. We're checking for someone else's DNA on Barker's body. Beat a guy to death wearing a ring like that, it might have cut into you, might have caused you to bleed and leave some DNA. Maybe Sheerfault or Bobo slobbered on the body while it was being kicked and punched. We get that, well, they can't say that anyone could have had a skull ring. We find DNA and we got the ring too, we got those motherfuckers by the short hairs."

"Charm and Mrs. Elton?" I asked.

"We'll take care of them," he said. "Might want to watch yourselves as well as keep a close eye on Brett and Chance."

"So we can go?" I said.

"You can go. And remember, the gun that doesn't exist needs to not exist at all. Least not on your person or in any location near you, and keep your fingerprints off of it."

"Gotcha," I said.

Marvin reached in the drawer again and took out Barker's cheap pistol. It was wrapped in a handkerchief. He handed it and the handkerchief to me.

"Get rid of it," he said. "I've wiped it clean."

39

Officer Carroll drove us over to our office.

"You look like you work out regularly," Leonard said to Carroll when we stopped. "Maybe you could use a partner? We could work out together."

"I might could do that," Carroll said. "I'll consider it, sure will."

"Good," Leonard said, and he got out of the car and closed the door and watched Carroll drive away.

"Okay, you're both gay, right?"

"Wow," Leonard said. "You are so tuned in."

"And you are interested in him?"

"And him in me."

"How do you know?"

"We have hidden gay impulses that tell us things that you heteros don't know about. We had an entire conversation telepathically."

"What was the subject?"

"Quantum physics, of course," Leonard said.

We went upstairs and locked the door. I said, "This isn't exactly a safe house. I mean, hell, we work here. Even Buffy could track us here, and she is the worst dog ever when it comes to dog stuff."

"Let's have a Dr Pepper and then figure it out," Leonard said.

"I still need to get rid of the gun."

"I want a Dr Pepper first."

"Will you kick and scream if you don't have one?"

"Probably."

"All right, Dr Pepper, then we get rid of the gun, and then I'm going to check on Brett and Chance and the ever-vigilant Buffy."

Leonard pulled a Dr Pepper from the fridge and I got a bottled water. We sat at the desk with our chairs turned so we could look out the window through the gauzy curtains. We had the lights off. We could see out, but as long as the light was off, no one could see in.

"You know what would be nice?" Leonard said.

“Winning the lottery?” I said.

“That’s good too. But I was thinking of cookies.”

“People in hell want ice water.”

“I don’t know about that, but I could sure use a cookie.”

“Sounds like a personal problem,” I said.

I pulled out my cell and called Brett.

She answered on the first ring, sounding less sick.

“So,” I said, “you’re healing?”

“Both of us are doing pretty good,” Brett said. “And just so you know, we’re not home anymore. I decided to take your advice. We were too sick to wrestle a paper bag and win. Anyone had come for us, most likely we would have been asleep.”

“What about the ferocious Buffy?”

“Most likely she too would have been asleep.”

“So where are you?”

“Safe house where you and Leonard stayed,” she said. “I called Marvin and told him I didn’t want to worry you two, but way I was feeling, I ought to go somewhere safe and take Chance and our hound with us. He set it up.”

“He didn’t mention it to me,” I said.

“Probably thought I told you.”

“Whatever,” I said. “Glad you and Chance and Buffy are there.”

“There’s a pretty big yard, and Buffy likes that.”

“And there’s a barn across the road from the house?”

“There is,” she said.

“Yep,” I said, “that’s the one where we stayed a while back, along with Jim Bob, Vanilla, and the cosmopolitan Booger.”

“One other thing.”

“Shoot,” I said.

“Chance lost her job at the paper. Since she was part-time, she doesn’t have sick leave, and with her out as long as she’s been with the flu, they let her go.”

“Ah, shit.”

“She says she wants to work for us,” Brett said.

“Hell,” I said. “I don’t want to work for us.”

“She thinks it might be exciting.”

“It might be,” I said, “which is why I don’t want her to do it.”

“What say we kind of go at it on a trial basis? I can give her donkey work to do, and if she holds up to that, she can maybe move into other areas. She could make a bit of money that way.”

“We barely make a bit of money,” I said. “But sure. I don’t want her not to have a job. She’ll most likely bore of it anyway.”

“So it’s a go?”

“Yep. But for right now, you two just get well.”

I heard Chance squeal in the background.

“She’s been listening, hasn’t she?”

“Maybe,” Brett said. “Good-bye.”

While Leonard slowly sucked on his Dr Pepper and enjoyed his cookies, which he had replaced at some point without telling me, I told him about the safe house, about Chance wanting to come on board.

“I like it,” Leonard said. “She’s a lot smarter than you, and that would certainly help. You know what would make a great sign? ‘Brett Sawyer Investigations, along with Leonard Pine, Hap Collins, and Baby Daughter.’”

“Hurry up,” I said. “Let’s dump this gun.”

40

We went downstairs and out to the car.

The light that was supposed to be shining in the parking light was not shining. It had been shining moments ago. I looked at the post. The light had been knocked out, maybe with a rock.

“Shit,” Leonard said.

He caught on to the sudden absence of light about when I did.

Two black men were waiting in the dark near a line of shrubs that connected to a house on the side of our business and the bicycle shop. They came out into the open and joined us where we stood next to our car. One of them had a limp, the other wore a baseball cap with DAIRY BOB on it, an East Texas hamburger and hot-dog chain ran by a guy named, you guessed it, Bob. His father before him and his grandfather before that were named Bob. I just thought you might want to know.

The guy with the baseball cap moved as if itchy.

They were very large men with very ugly faces and they had some huge black pistols that were equally unattractive. One was holding a flat, black automatic on us; the other held his similar weapon to the side of his leg. I thought they looked familiar.

“There they are, Mr. and Mrs. Fucked-Up America,” said the one with a limp. “King White Trash and King Black-Ass Nigger.”

“Which is which?” Leonard said. “And do we get both awards?”

“We got the guns, and you’re running your mouth,” said the limping man.

“It’s not like I figure we cooperate, things are going to turn out well,” Leonard said. “Might as well go for it. And what the fuck is your beef? We don’t know you.”

“But we know you,” said Limp. “We know you just fine. We also know a lot about you.”

“Nice stuff, I hope,” Leonard said.

“Not a word of it,” said Itchy, and he scratched at his chest with his free hand. He kept moving and scratching like his skin was full of fleas.

“Couple of smart-mouths that need taking care of, and we can do that.”

“Lice?” I said, as Itchy scratched again.

“Scabies,” he said.

“What we’re gonna need you to do,” said Limp, “is get in your car. One of you drive. We sit in the back with guns and you do what we say.”

“Why would we do that?” I said.

“We have guns.”

“I’ve had enough of that shit,” Leonard said. “I’m at the point where you got to shoot me right here. I’m not going anywhere.”

“Me too,” I said. “This would be our second abduction tonight.”

Limp and Itchy looked at each other.

Limp said, “We want you to get in the car.”

“Nope,” Leonard said. “Shoot us right here.”

“We ain’t supposed to do that,” said Itchy.

“Life is just full of little disappointments,” I said. “We’re not going anywhere with you two. You can make noise and a mess here in the neighborhood, but we’re not getting in a car with you.”

You could almost see and hear the machinery working in their heads. This wasn’t how it was supposed to go. They weren’t supposed to make a mess here, not where they could be heard firing guns and be seen.

I put my hand in my coat pocket. Barker’s little pistol was there. I casually took hold of it, still wrapped in the handkerchief, and shifted it a little and pointed it at Limp, who was closest, and pulled the trigger.

The little gun made a snapping sound, not too loud, not the way their guns would have, and Limp made a face. Neither he nor Itchy seemed to understand what was happening.

Limp’s gun sagged in his hand. “That’s some shit,” he said, and went to his knees.

Limp was so surprised he dropped his gun. I kicked it away, and by that time Leonard had moved, surprising a distracted Itchy. He had hold of Itchy’s hand. He pushed Itchy’s gun aside and hit him on the jaw with his free hand. Itchy went back against my car. Leonard hit him again. Blood ran out of his nose and over his mouth.

Itchy moved as if to fight back, and Leonard hit him again.

Itchy sat on the ground and Leonard took the pistol from him about the same time I picked the other one up. Leonard looked at the pistol.

“The safety was on,” Leonard said.

41

My shot had hit Limp in his gimp leg, in the upper thigh, and he was bleeding, but not as much as I had feared. The bullet had gone into him and stopped. It was a bad load, and I was glad for that. I wasn't going to have another man's death on my head. Leonard wanted to shoot both of them and call it in as a random shooting in our parking lot.

I doubted anyone would believe that. I pulled Limp over so his back was against my car, his butt against the rear tire. He was about four feet from Itchy, who hadn't tried to get up. Itchy sat where he was, shaking a little, scratching.

"All right," I said. "You are going to have to spill it."

Limp said nothing. Itchy said, "We gave our word not to rat."

Leonard put the gun he had taken from Itchy against Itchy's head.

"I got the safety off," Leonard said. "I don't like you."

"We don't even know you," said Itchy.

"What I was thinking," Leonard said. "So why kill us?"

"Money," said Limp.

"How much?" Leonard said.

"Five hundred," Limp said.

"That's it?" said Leonard. "That hurts, man. That hurts."

"Who was it hired you?" I said. "Best talk. Leonard there, he's got a short fuse and you two have lit it."

"Roscoe."

I looked at Leonard, and Leonard looked at me.

"Roscoe?" Leonard said.

"Who's Roscoe?" I asked.

"Roscoe Washington," Limp said.

"All right," I said. "Let's go at this a different way. Who's Roscoe Washington?"

"Bartender at the Joint," Itchy said.

"No shit?" I said.

Itchy nodded at Leonard. "He didn't like this one peed on his floor."

“In my defense,” Leonard said, “I did ask where the restroom was.”

“That’s right,” I said. “He did.

“Ah, hell,” I said. “I remember you two in a back booth.”

“He found out who you guys were, and he sent us,” Itchy said.

“Roscoe might as well have hired a couple of squirrels and given them guns,” I said.

“We had our own guns,” Itchy said.

“How nice,” Leonard said.

Leonard held the gun on them and I pulled out my cell phone and called Marvin. I didn’t call 911. I called Marvin’s private cell.

He actually answered.

“We got a little something for you,” I said.

“Shit,” Marvin said. “I hate it when you have that tone. It’s never anything good.”

“This one is kind of fifty-fifty,” I said, “but I done a bad thing.”

“Of course you did,” Marvin said. It sounded on the other end as if his life force had left him. “Okay, Hap. Tell Daddy what you done.”

“I shot a guy with a limp with Barker’s .22 pistol. He limps worse now.”

“No, you didn’t?”

“Yep. I did.”

“I want to express my complete hatred for you,” he said. “I told you to get rid of that goddamn gun.”

“Was on my way to do it, and, well, these two guys came up and they had guns and they wanted to make us get in my car and were going to drive us off somewhere and shoot us.”

“If only,” Marvin said.

“Hey,” I said.

Leonard said, “Tell him how much we were worth.”

“They were going to shoot us for five hundred dollars,” I said. “Wait.” I turned my attention to Limp. “Was that apiece?”

“To split,” Limp said.

“Really?” I said.

Limp nodded.

“We got some raccoons out of an attic for the same price,” Itchy said.

“They were going to kill us and then split five hundred dollars, the same they got for getting raccoons out of an attic.”

“Raccoons are underrated,” Marvin said. “They are tough little buggers. You know, they can pick locks, and once they do it, they can remember how to do it easily for up to three years, case they need to come back.”

“That’s some fascinating shit, Marvin.”

“Where are you?”

I told him, and he said, “I’m coming. You are going to really love seeing me.”

“Not as much as you might think,” I said.

42

Everybody hates us," I said.

We were back at the cop shop, but this time in the smaller interrogation room.

Officer Carroll came in. He looked at Leonard, said, "We may have to put those workouts off for a while."

"I hear that," Leonard said.

Marvin opened the door and came into the room.

"You make it so hard," he said. "If I let you go up for a few things sometimes, that would make my life easier. Actually, you might do better in prison."

"Been there," I said. "Didn't love the food."

"It was self-defense," Leonard said. "We didn't start it."

Marvin collapsed into a chair like a discarded ventriloquist's dummy. "I know, but I still hate both of you."

"We are on a lot of people's lists," I said.

"Sometimes at the very top of them," Leonard said.

"Those two idiots said what they did," Marvin said, "and why, and even said you shot in self-defense."

"That's nice of them," Leonard said.

"They are dumb as two bricks in a sack of shit," Marvin said. "Problem here is you shot that gun. You know the one. One I told you to get rid of. Small. Twenty-two-caliber that didn't used to exist but might exist now. Was in your coat pocket wrapped in a handkerchief. Ring any bells?"

"I know just the one," I said. "But here's one thing. The handkerchief was wrapped around it, so my fingerprints aren't on it."

"True," Marvin said, "but it was in your coat pocket, and there's a hole in your coat pocket that the bullet from the gun came out of, and the bullet, when ballistics gets through, will be from the same gun that belonged to Barker."

"But he wasn't shot with a twenty-two," I said.

"No, but since that's his twenty-two, even Laurel and Hardy in there could figure out that with you having it in your pocket, you might have taken it from Barker."

"That is a problem," I said.

"So are your fingerprints on Laurel and Hardy's weapons?"

"We disarmed them," Leonard said. "Course our prints are on their guns."

"What we got here is what we call a detective's dilemma," Marvin said.

"They call it that?" I said.

"Of course not, donkey dick," Marvin said.

He sighed and sat still for a long time. Finally he said, "Give me your coat."

I stood up and pulled it off and gave it to him.

Marvin took it and went out of the room and a moment later Officer Carroll came in.

"He said for me to drive you two home," Officer Carroll said. "And he said too that you two shouldn't think you're going to slide out of this one. But between you and me, I think you will. We want the bad guys, not you guys. We'll get around the twenty-two slug somehow."

43

Officer Carroll drove me back to my car in the office lot and let me out, said, “I’ll drive Leonard home. I’m supposed to make sure he gets there. Chief thinks you two do better when you’re not together.”

“What about me?” I said. “I am a known desperado.”

“You’ll be all right,” he said.

He drove away with Leonard sitting on the front passenger side.

He hadn’t even said good-bye.

I drove home then, and it wasn’t until I was in the house that I realized Brett and Chance were in the safe house still nursing the flu. I felt weak and tired and lonely and disappointed and small and worthless right then. I got a blanket out of the hall closet, and a pillow, and put them on the couch. I went upstairs and got my revolver from the nightstand and brought it down and laid it on the floor beside the couch. I went into the kitchen and poured a glass of milk and made myself a cheese sandwich, but after three or four bites, I put it in the garbage.

I checked to make sure all the doors were locked and no windows were open, and then I turned out the lights and stretched out on the couch, nestled my head into the pillow, and pulled the blanket over me.

I lay there and the ceiling got close, and then the walls got close. I had experienced something like this before, and right then I knew I had been too cocky about my recovery.

Reality was coming down on me now that I had had time to relax and let it all soak into me. I’d been abducted twice in one night and held at gunpoint, and the feelings I had missed out on after coming back from the dead had been jump-started. I trembled for a while. I had faced worse than those two goons a number of times, but right then it all came down on me, them and everything else I had ever done that I shouldn’t have.

I wondered about Leonard. But I knew the answer to that. He was fine. And if he wasn’t fine, I might never know, even as close as we were. There were some bridges he didn't cross even with me, at least not yet. I lay there and trembled for a long time, and then I told myself, It's over. I'm fine. No use feeling this kind of fear when there was nothing to fear.

Then why do you have a revolver lying by the couch if you're doing so good, tough guy? Why's that?

Just because, I told myself, but then, as fast as it had come over me, the trembling stopped and I found my center and started to relax. I thought of Brett. I thought of Chance, and of course I thought of my brother, Leonard.

He was probably in his apartment with Officer Carroll doing what a client of ours had once called the dirty dog.

You're all right, I told myself. You're good. Don't worry now. You didn't die and you're fine and you'll be okay. Everything will work out. You know what happened to Jamar now, and all that remains is to tell his mother, sad and horrible as that will be. Figuring out who killed him was solved too, though not proved. That was the next step, and we had given the information we had to Marvin, so it was in his court now.

Eventually, I slept.

44

The next day I woke up and made coffee and had a granola bar for breakfast. I called Brett to make sure everything was okay, and it was. She and Chance were almost well and planned to come home later that day.

When we finished talking I poured myself another cup of coffee and called Leonard.

"And how are you this morning?" I asked.

"Better than I been in a long time."

"I got the impression that you and Officer Carroll may have gone home together."

"His name is Curt. I call him Pookie."

"To me he will always be Officer Carroll."

"Well, he is very official. I had to work hard not to let him take charge in bed. You know I don't like that."

"Actually, I didn't know that, and now that I do, I wish I didn't. How is he?"

"Very firm."

"Generally."

"Very firm."

"Leonard, come on, man."

"I like him. Quite a bit."

"I thought way it worked is you wanted someone softer than you, more feminine. Two tough gays, I don't know. That might throw the universe out of whack."

"Since I know you're trying to be funny, I'll let that pass," Leonard said.

"He still there?"

"Nope. Had to go to work. By the way, I now have an inside track, and when I was listening to Pookie talking to Marvin this morning, I learned they arrested Roscoe. He admitted it all. He says he was only going to have us beat up good, take us out in the woods and have those two knuckleheads pound on us awhile, tell us why he did it, and leave us out there to make our way home. Not only was the one gun on safety, it and the other one were unloaded."

"Maybe they were just stupid."

"They were that, okay, but I'm not sure I believe Roscoe. I think he picked a couple of turnips. He may have given them the guns and they were too stupid to check the safety and the loads."

"They said those were their guns."

"Turned out they lied. Changed their story. Said Roscoe gave them the guns."

"That Roscoe," I said. "What a kidder."

"Thing is, they got him," Leonard said. "I'm going to take a shower and have a big cup of coffee, some ham and eggs and a side of grits, all cooked by me."

"So, a nasty meal, way you cook."

"You offering to take me to breakfast?"

"I had a granola bar and coffee," I said. "I'm done."

"Cheap man."

"You ate my salad. I have not forgotten."

"Yeah, well, I'll check up on you later."

"Officer Carroll, huh?"

"Good-bye, Hap."

45

Brett and Chance and Buffy came home about lunchtime. The flu had finally faded and they were feeling spry, even if they looked a little watery-eyed and tired.

“Don’t kiss me,” Brett said. “I’m over it, but who knows, I might still be contagious.”

“Yeah, we better not hug either,” Chance said.

Buffy sniffed my pants cuff. Her I could pat and hug, and I did.

We decided to go out for lunch, as none of us were in a cooking mood, and we ended up at a Mexican restaurant. We all had tortilla soup. I might add that Buffy did not have tortilla soup. She stayed home, most likely asleep on the couch. She always climbed up there when we left. When we touched the doorknob she dropped to the floor with a thud and lay on the rug in front of the couch. She thought she was sneaky.

On the way back to the house, my phone rang. It was Marvin. He said, “You know a black girl kid with all the personality of a water moccasin?”

“The four-hundred-year-old vampire?”

“What?”

“What Leonard calls her. It’s a long story.”

“And I’d love to hear it, but do you know her real name?”

“Reba. Don’t know her last.”

“We picked her up under an overpass, or rather near it, in some bushes.”

I was pulling into the driveway then, and both Brett and Chance were silent, letting me finish the call.

“She okay?”

“In the larger scheme of things she’s all right, just beat to hell. A cruiser come across her coming out of the woods, right on the edge of LaBorde, out where the woods get thick on the east side. She tried to run from the cops, but her leg was broke and she was using a stick to get around. She fought like a tiger, but she was in bad shape by then. Good thing. Officer Thompson, a nice lady who once beat up two male thugs using her fists, said it was a hell of a fight. Said she got hit with the stick a couple of times, but finally got Reba in the car. Had to handcuff her. Drove her to the hospital. Girl tried to leave twice since she's been there, and she can't actually walk. Caught her opening a window to get out, and she's on the second floor. I got Officer Carroll outside her room. She won't tell us what happened; not all of it, anyway. She won't talk to anyone but you or Leonard, preferably both. Come to the hospital. I'll call Leonard."

When I clicked off, Brett said, "Everything okay?"

"Not sure yet. I have to go to the hospital."

"Should I go with you?" Brett asked.

"I don't know," I said.

I explained about Reba and how she was fastened to the case we were looking into, and when I finished, Brett said, "Sounds to me you boys just need to do it. Me and Chance don't know her, and you appear to have a special relationship."

"Yeah, she blackmailed us into buying her a giant un–Happy Meal at McDonald's and she talks mean to both of us and Leonard hates her. Special relationship? I don't think so."

"She wants to talk to you two for a reason, and I think that reason is she trusts you," Brett said.

"The relationship may be more special than you think," Chance said.

"And maybe she just wants a lunch from McDonald's," I said.

46

I have never liked hospitals, and as of recent I have liked them less, it only being a few months ago when I was in this very one. Leonard was already there when I arrived, waiting at the front of the emergency room. He had a large sack in his hand.

"I kind of understand the impulse to beat up the four-hundred-year-old vampire," Leonard said as I walked up, "but I don't like that it got done."

"I hear you," I said.

Inside we asked about Reba. We got the information and rode the elevator up and started down the hall. I hadn't mentioned to Leonard that Officer Carroll, aka Curt, aka Pookie, was the cop on duty.

When Leonard saw Curt, his face lit up, and so did Curt's. As we neared the room, Curt opened the door and I went through. I glanced back and saw Curt and Leonard bump fists. That must have been some night.

In the room, Leonard closed the door and we went over to the bed. The bed seemed huge, like a white cloud, and there was a black dot at the top of it, Reba's head. She looked so small there on that cloud. Her face was swollen and one eye was closed and the lid was a mound of inflammation and her lips were cracked and bloody. One arm was in a cast and lay outside the sheets like a large piece of plumbing pipe.

Leonard took one side of the bed, I took the other.

Reba had her eyes closed. We stood there, not knowing exactly what to do, but in a few moments she felt our presence and opened her eyes, looked first at Leonard.

"Damn, that there a thing to open my eyes to," she said.

"Yeah, well, you ain't looking so good neither," Leonard said. "You try to bite an oncoming train?"

"Two niggers beat me up," she said.

"Black men," I said.

"Whatever," she said.

“It’s best not to call people that,” I said.

“He does,” she said.

“Him, I can do nothing about, and you, most likely nothing as well, but I got to try.”

“Quit trying,” she said.

“But you haven’t told the cops about these two men?” Leonard said.

“I don’t like cops.”

“Marvin, the police chief, he’s a good man,” I said.

“I don’t like cops. You got stopped-up ears.”

“Okay,” I said. “You asked to see us.”

“I guess.”

“Did you or didn’t you?” Leonard said, and placed the sack on the sliding table beside the bed.

“What’s that?” Reba said.

“You know what it is,” Leonard said. “It says ‘McDonald’s’ on the side of the sack. There’s two hamburgers in there, giant batch of fries, and two fried pies. I didn’t get you a drink. I can go down the hall and get one. Better yet, Hap can do it. I ain’t your slave.”

“Ain’t nobody do much for me,” she said.

“We’re here for you,” I said.

“He is, anyway,” Leonard said. “Me, I’m just here on account of I ain’t got nothing else to do today.”

“Tell us about the men who beat you up,” I said.

“They come looking for me,” she said. “I was out in my tree, and they knew right where to look for me, and one of them picked up a rock and threw and hit me. I tried to move fast then, and I fell. That’s how I broke my arm. My leg done broke too. They did that when I fell. One of them kicked me there. Then they dragged me off and put me in their car and drove me out to the river bottoms, pulled me down in them woods. They done stuff to me then. You know.”

“Yeah,” I said. “I’m sorry.”

“Ain’t the first time. You live up there in them projects, things happen.”

“I’m really sorry,” I said.

“Not as much as me,” she said, and this time she shed a tear. I thought for a moment she was going to break out crying, but she got a hold of herself. She was too tough for that, and she was so tough it made me tear up.

“I bit one of them niggers good,” she said. “I stomped one of them’s foot good, and then he got real mad and they started beating me. They beat me bad."

"We can see that," Leonard said.

"Yeah, my modeling career done out the window. They dragged me off deeper in them woods and started whaling on me. I had me some beatings before, from some of Mama's boyfriends, but none like that. They done knocked me out a bit, but I come to. They thought I couldn't get away, 'cause my leg was broke. I fooled them and started crawling, going like a crippled dog. I fell down a hill, onto the edge of the river, and they couldn't get down to me on account of it was steep and there was lots of briars and such. I got a bunch of stickers in my ass. I lay there like I was dead, and they figured I was, or close enough to it, 'cause they went on. I crawled awhile, got me a stick for a crutch, and work on up to the highway. That's where I see a cop car. I tried to get away from it, go back in the woods, but I couldn't move fast enough, and this white lady cop got me and brought me to the hospital, then other cops come in. That big nigger, the chief, he interviewed me and here I am."

"Why didn't you tell Chief Hanson what happened?" I said.

"Yeah, your ears done stopped up for sure," she said. "I told you. I don't like cops."

"Bet you don't like those two thugs either," I said. "Want to get them, you need to tell the cops."

"I want you two to get them," she said.

"Why would we do that?" Leonard said.

"'Cause we done worked together."

"Have we?" Leonard said. "In some quarters, how you and us worked together is called extortion."

"Is that like working together?" she said.

"Not exactly," Leonard said.

"Listen, I think I got a little Easter egg for you," I said.

"Easter egg?" she said.

"A surprise. Describe those two grabbed you."

She did.

I said, "One of them still has the limp you gave him, and the two of them are in custody."

"You sure?" she said.

"Pretty sure," I said. "They fit the description."

"You got to be sure," she said.

"Why did they want to hurt you, Reba?"

"Hurt? They was trying to kill my ass."

“Why?”

“I don’t know exactly. I seen them around before, though. They come to see Chicken Fucker a few times. He used to thug a little, beat on anyone didn’t pay for their drugs, and they was the same.”

“Timpson sold drugs?” Leonard said.

“No. He was one of them collector types.”

“Who did Timpson thug for?” Leonard said.

“He work for the same one them two big niggers worked for, Roscoe Washington.”

I looked at Leonard. He said, “Click.”

47

What upset me more than what had happened to Reba was how she took it. She had been raped and beaten, and there was a part of her that seemed to accept it, as if she had been there before and expected nothing better. By the time we went out of the room I was sick to my stomach.

I told Leonard I needed a bathroom trip. He paused to talk with Curt while I found the men's room. I splashed water on my face and used a paper towel to dry off with. My eyes were full of tears. I washed my face again and got it together and went out to the car with Leonard.

"You're upset, ain't you?" Leonard said.

"Yeah."

"Me too, but the way we do good for that girl is to put this right."

"How can we? They're already in custody and Reba says she won't talk to the cops."

"She'll come around. But before she does, we need to go on over to the projects."

We left Leonard's pickup in the lot, and I drove us over to the projects. When we got out of the car, the thug gang, about five this time, including Tuboy and Laron, were standing out by the drive leaning on a car, trying to look cool. Way they really looked was scared. They hadn't forgotten Leonard.

Leonard stopped near Tuboy, and when he did, Tuboy unconsciously licked his lips in a snakelike fashion. I figured they had suddenly gone dry.

"You ain't gonna hit us again, are you?" Tuboy asked.

"That depends," Leonard said, standing close to Tuboy.

"On what?" Tuboy said. He was trying to sound like a tough guy, but his voice had gone up an octave.

"Watch our car for us," Leonard said, "'cause I know you wouldn't let anything happen to it."

"Your car ain't our problem," Tuboy said.

“Is now,” Leonard said. “I’m assigning it to you.”

“I don’t want nothing to do with it,” Tuboy said.

“Me neither,” Laron said.

The others grumbled in agreement.

“You don’t get to choose,” Leonard said. “All you got to do is make sure it ain’t touched. A bird shits on it, I hold you responsible.”

“Man, that’s cold,” said Laron.

“Is indeed. Let me ask all of you something. You know about Reba getting beat up?”

“Shit, she gets beat up a lot. She’s got an uncle, Uncle Chuck, who beats her up when he gets drunk and can catch her. I think he gets an arm workout like that. Soon as he’s drunk, he’s looking for something to hit, and she’s it, he can catch her. She’s gotten faster.”

“Last night, smartass,” Leonard said. “Any of you know anything about that shit happening last night? Good information is worth a twenty.”

“A twenty,” Tuboy said. “You can’t get a hand job for less than fifty.”

“Oh, I bet you’d give me one for a lot less, I insisted,” Leonard said.

Tuboy stepped back without really thinking about it. He studied Leonard. The others looked first at Leonard, then at Tuboy, as if at any moment Leonard might hang his wang out and have Tuboy go to work on it.

“They say she was knocked out of a tree, put in a car, and hauled off,” Tuboy said.

“They say?” Leonard said. “What kind of shit is that?”

“I guess I might have seen it.”

“Did you call the cops?”

“Not my business.”

“What if it had been you,” I said.

“Then it would have been my business,” Tuboy said.

One of the group laughed.

“You know how I’ve made that car your business?” Leonard said. “Now I’m making information about Reba your business, ’cause I find out you knew something and didn’t tell me, after I get through sticking your head in a hole in the ground so I can kick your ass for entertainment, I’m going to call the cops and have them come down on you so hard you’ll think the sky done fell on you.”

“We ain’t doing nothing.” Tuboy said.

“That’s right,” Leonard said. “You ain’t, with your life, anyway. But I know your kind.”

“Can’t judge a book by its cover,” Laron said.

“Yeah, but you ain’t no book, and you smell like lying shit, and if you’re giving me shit, handing me a pile of lies, I’m going to rub your noses in it. Don’t think I won’t. Now, that little girl may not mean anything to you, but she means something to Hap here, and Hap means something to me, and none of you mean a goddamn thing to me. You starting to get where I’m coming from?”

“You don’t like us,” Tuboy said.

“I don’t like what you want to be,” Leonard said. “I don’t like what you are now, and what you are now is pretty much what you want to be, and I call that fucking stupid. Now, why would anyone want to hurt Reba, besides her uncle, and by the way, we get through with this other question, I got one more question for you. But let’s take these quizzes one at a time.”

Tuboy and Laron looked at one another, and then all the gang looked at one another and back to Leonard. Tuboy cleared his throat.

“You got to understand, we could end up way Reba did, or worse,” Tuboy said.

“And worse could start in less than a minute,” Leonard said.

“I seen them two that was here,” Tuboy said. “They hang out at the Joint. I done been up in there a couple of times, but the bartender, he don’t like me.”

“I don’t like you either,” Leonard said, “but I like the bartender less. Let me give you a jump start. We know those two thugs grabbed Reba, and we know the bartender, Roscoe, put them up to it. But I’m thinking there’s a bigger picture here. You give us something, hear?”

One of the boys who had not spoken before, a thin fellow with a wool knit hat on, stepped up to the front of the group.

“I get the twenty?” said the boy.

“Maybe,” Leonard said. “What’s your name?”

“David.”

“Tell us something worth twenty,” Leonard said.

“Everyone knows the cops run the game. Take drugs from buyers and dealers, but you don’t hear about no drug busts. They just run it back through the community.”

“Timpson helped them sell drugs?” I said.

“He helped, but he don’t sell,” David said. “Just collects. It’s his old lady runs the show for the cops. She gets paid for making sure things go smooth, and if they ain’t smooth, she makes sure things get smoothed out.”

"You mean Tamara?" I said. "She runs things?"

"That's the one," Tuboy said.

"Hey, this is my twenty I'm trying to get," David said.

"Yeah, and when you do, you gonna buy us all something with it," Tuboy said.

"No," I said. "He gets to keep it, but if we get the real stuff, there's a twenty for each of you."

"I ain't having shit to do with this," said one of the boys, and then walked off.

"Anyone else walking?" Leonard said.

"Tamara be the one," David said. "Everyone knows that. She tell Timpson what to do when he was around to do it. He say something, it come from her, you can bet on that."

"Do you know her contacts?" Leonard said.

"Just like I done said," David said, "the police."

"Cops here, they run things like they see them, like they want them," Tuboy said. "They ain't no more cops than we are, 'cept they got rides and shooters. Well, I got a pistol."

"Look in Tamara's apartment, you'll find enough meth and other shit to fill up a dump truck," David said. "I know, I buy me a little taste of this and that from time to time."

"Good to see your life's right on track," Leonard said.

"I ain't gonna stay up in here forever," David said. He had gotten a lot braver now, taking the head-dog position away from Tuboy, at least for a few moments.

"Naw," Leonard said. "You ain't never coming out of the projects, except carried out. You're too stupid."

"Does this mean I don't get the twenty?"

"It means you get the twenty," Leonard said.

"You said we all get twenties," said Tuboy.

"Hap, give them twenties," Leonard said.

"What?" I said.

"Give them twenties."

"I don't have that kind of money."

"What you got?"

I opened up my wallet. "Forty dollars."

"Give it to me."

I gave it to Leonard. "All right, he's got forty and I got thirty-five," Leonard said.

"That ain't twenty apiece," said Tuboy.

“At least you can count. First grade wasn’t a waste after all. But we’re going to give you what we got and put the rest of it on the installment plan.”

“The fuck?” Tuboy said.

“And you’re going to like it,” Leonard said. “Now I got that second question. Where’s that uncle of Reba’s?”

48

Leonard got the apartment number from one of the boys, went and knocked on the door. When a big man with more muscles than Charles Atlas opened it, Leonard asked if he was Reba's uncle. The man eyed Leonard, said he was and that if he was wanting to buy him a piece of her ass, that was all right, but it cost extra for white guys. He meant me, of course.

"Naw, we ain't here for that kind of thing. What we're here for is because of that kind of thing."

"There's a difference?" the uncle said.

"Oh yeah," Leonard said. "Mighty big difference."

"You're starting to rub me the wrong way," the uncle said.

"You have no idea," Leonard said, then turned to me and said, "Hold my hat."

I took it from him, and that's when Leonard wheeled and hit Chuck the first time. It was like a missile landing on an aircraft carrier. The uncle dropped hard on his ass. Leonard dragged him out of the doorway by his ankles and let him get up, and then he hit him a couple of sharp blows that made the man bleed. I knew the ass-whup boogie had really begun. He hated Sheerfault, but this was beyond hatred. Leonard knocked the uncle against the building where he couldn't get away, and then he went to work; a surgeon couldn't have been more precise. The man tried to hit back, but he might as well been trying to fight a tiger with a toothpick.

A couple of people came out of doors, saw what was going on, and went back inside. I kept watch in case the uncle had any defenders, and by doing that, I didn't always have my eyes on Leonard, but I could sure hear him at work. Rhythmic, without hesitation between blows. Leonard certainly seemed to have his wind that day. When the uncle was on the ground unconscious, Leonard started kicking him in the head. I let him do that a few times, then I went over and got Leonard by the shoulder, and then by the waist, and pulled him back.

“Murder doesn’t help any of us,” I said.

“That motherfucker dies, that helps the universe,” Leonard said.

“Come on, I don’t want to visit you in Huntsville.”

“You stay away from that little girl,” Leonard said as I dragged him off. “You hear me, asshole?”

“He’s not hearing anything at the moment,” I said.

“Then he better get him some telepathy,” Leonard said.

I eventually got Leonard away from there, got him walking toward the car. As we went, the gang of boys stood there with their mouths open.

“Damn, Chuck was someone Timpson was afraid of, and he bad,” Tuboy said.

“Think I was bad today, you ought to see me on a Wednesday after breakfast,” Leonard said.

In the car Leonard took a deep breath as I backed out.

“And I don’t even like the four-hundred-year-old vampire,” Leonard said.

“Of course you don’t,” I said.

49

We didn’t talk to Tamara, and we didn’t call Marvin. We had other ideas and they weren’t necessarily good ones, but they were what we had.

First, though, we drove back to my house to give some attention to Leonard’s shoulder. He had pulled the rotator cuff a little from hitting Uncle Chuck so often, nothing that wouldn’t be okay, and not so bad he was out of commission. He was just pained.

Back at my place, Brett had him take off his shirt. She got a bag of peas out of the freezer and laid those on his shoulder and had him hold it there.

“That’s cold,” Leonard said.

“No shit,” Brett said. “Hold it, and don’t be such a big baby.”

Chance came out of the back room then, looked at Leonard. “What happened to you?”

“Tennis injury,” Leonard said.

“Yeah, I bet,” Chance said.

Brett gave some ibuprofen to Leonard, and then we ended up in the living room. Chance made us coffee, and we sat there sipping, Leonard balancing a bag of frozen peas on his naked shoulder.

When we were relaxed, I said, “Coldpoint and his minions, Sheerfault and Bobo the Clown, have been using the projects to run drugs. They are feeding that stuff right back to the kids there, as well as branching out. They hide behind being cops and being respectful, helping kids make it to the Olympics in boxing.”

“They got a little girl beat up and raped and tried to kill her on account of she talked to us,” Leonard said. “Someone told that she did, and I figure that someone is one of the assholes we talked to today, and there will be hell to pay. Shit, I’m not through with her uncle.”

“It could have been anybody in the projects,” I said. “That place has a thousand eyes and ears. Thing is, we got connections to Coldpoint and his crew all over the place,” I said, “but we don’t have the hard stuff on them. Timpson was their bitch, but he was also his girlfriend's bitch. He helped kill Jamar, and then he tried to make money off of it with the cops, and they gave him a permanent attitude adjustment. Figure Roscoe was in on all this too, and he wasn't going to have us beat up or killed because his feelings got hurt and Leonard peed on his barroom floor."

I had to stop and explain about that part, catch Chance and Brett up some more.

"I got my suspicions," I said. "And it's if you're going to sell product, you got to have someplace to do it, and the projects and the bar are part of it. Timpson had us meet him there, and my guess is it was a way for Roscoe to tag us, which is why Timpson made a point of introducing us. Roscoe tagged us, and so did the two dumbasses at the back of the bar. Lucky for us, him using them was like trying to get a couple of Chihuahuas to take down a grizzly. Me and Leonard, collectively, are the grizzly bear."

"You know that's right," Leonard said.

"So Timpson set you up, had you identified by meeting you at the bar," Brett said.

"He thought he'd get rid of us, keep us out of his and Tamara's hair, out of the way of their drug business, not to mention his plan to blackmail the cops. Stupid plan."

"That all makes sense," Leonard said. "I hate to say it, but I think you got it figured."

"What about Charm and Jamar?" Chance said.

"Charm was merely taking pictures for a class, and the cops thought she was taking pictures of their illegal fights, had some clue what was going on up there. They gave her shit, tried to throw a scare into her, and her brother tried to protect her. He had a bit of a rep as a boxer, and they thought, Well, he's going to give us shit, we won't kill him outright, we'll get some sport out of it. That's when Timpson killed him, or beat him bad enough the others finished him off. That part may be hard to know."

"But we know Reba heard what she shouldn't have heard," Leonard said, "and then she told us stuff that Tamara didn't want told, and somehow it got back to Tamara what Reba did. Maybe Reba ran her mouth. She strikes me as someone might do that. I don't know, but it got found out, and that's when Tamara and Timpson got Roscoe and the goons involved. Had I known they'd done to her what they did, I'd have killed them right then and there. Wouldn't have been no jail for them."

“Did you tell the cops all this?” Chance said.

“No,” I said.

“I thought cops were good,” Chance said.

“They are people,” I said, “and therein lies the problem. Some are good, some aren’t. Marvin certainly is. But the cops in Camp Rapture, not so much. They’re like thugs with a license to steal and murder and pretty much do what they want. It goes all through the city officials. You get rotten apples at the top, it spoils the apples all the way down, or, rather, a head rotten apple attracts others of its kind by design.”

“Those are some crafty apples,” Brett said.

“What are you going to do about it?” Chance asked.

“Me and Leonard came up with something of a plan on the way over here.”

“How about you give us the working parts,” Brett said, “and I bet me and Chance can make it less stupid.”

50

It was a cold night and it was colder for us because we weren’t at home or in the car. Brett and Chance were parked near the police station in Camp Rapture. Before they’d dropped us off, we described Coldpoint, Bobo, and Sheerfault for them and determined Coldpoint was at the station. We had spotted his car in the lot. The four of us even saw him come outside once, smoke a cigarette, and go back in.

“He’s kind of good-looking,” Chance had said.

“Yes, and he is kind of a devil as well,” I said.

“Easy, tiger,” Brett said.

After that, Brett and Chance let us out on the hill near the sawmill and drove back into position, which took about twenty minutes, the hill being on the edge of town. Chance called and said Coldpoint’s car was still there. As far as they could tell, so was he.

The lot where Brett and Chance parked was for a country-music nightclub. It was partially filled with cars. It was across the street from the police station. They found a position near the front facing the street, behind one car.

Through their windshield and the back and front windshields of the car in front of them, they had a good view of the cop shop and the parking lot with Coldpoint’s car in it. They were calling themselves the Sneaky Bitches, and even signed off together on the phone with “Sneaky Bitches rule.”

“They may have to be sedated at some point,” Leonard said.

We were hiding among the trees above the sawmill, wearing heavy coats and wrapped in blankets. We had a couple large thermoses of coffee, sandwiches, and a bag of vanilla wafers. Since I knew Leonard was not big on sharing those, and so did Chance, she had bought me a box of animal crackers and packed them for me. We had brought raincoats. It looked like wet weather might be coming. We had backpacks to store everything in. Leonard had a pistol. I had decided not to bring one; they had their place, but I hated the damn things. I had a golf club I had found buried in the grass of our side lawn, must've been left there about the time Arnold Palmer took his first swing on a golf course. Some kid probably dragged out his father's club one day, then lost interest, dropped it, and forgot about it. I had racked a mower blade on it last summer, but I'd kept the club, leaned it against the side of the carport, meaning to throw it away. It was rusted but surprisingly sturdy. I was glad to have it.

Where we sat was on a rise above the sawmill. We weren't that high above it, but it was a pretty good-size hill, and from where we crouched we could see the mill, the worn-out drive, and the pond. The pond was dark, as the moon was mostly behind a cloud. It looked like a tar pit. We had cell phones with us, on vibrate, and the plan was simple and slightly refined by Brett to include cell-phone contact.

We reasoned tonight might be when things happened, if any of our information was correct, and then again, it might merely be a cold night and we'd go home with frozen asses and nothing solved. But I doubted that. There was money to be made on betting. For the better-positioned folks in the community, dogfights, chicken fights, or human fights, it was all the same; it wasn't their pain or their blood that was in those matches, only their dollars. With everyone from city officials and law enforcement in cahoots, they felt protected.

About midnight, I began to think my speculation wasn't good enough. I was starting to miss Brett and my warm bed. We had drank about half our coffee and had eaten our sandwiches. I had also consumed an entire box of animal crackers, and Leonard was well into his bag of wafers. Why he didn't weigh three hundred pounds, I couldn't figure.

It had grown colder, and now there was a light rain, more of a mist, really. We put on our raincoats and pulled up the hoods and sat there in misery.

"It comes two in the morning, we're taking our asses home," Leonard said. "I'm cold as a sled dog's nut sack."

"Agreed," I said.

About thirty minutes later we saw several sets of car lights hazing through the rain, coming up the hillside road. A second later my phone buzzed.

"Coldpoint has left," Brett said.

"Someone is already here," I said.

"Can't be Coldpoint. He just this minute left."

"We'll see who pretty soon," I said.

"You going to be okay?"

"Have I ever not been okay?"

"Lots of times," Brett said.

"I'm going to text you when to call Marvin. He doesn't know you're calling, so you don't get him, get Officer Carroll, and be sure and call him Pookie."

"Fuck you very much," Leonard said.

I gave her Curt Carroll's number, said, "If what we think is going on is in fact going on, we're going to need a Texas Ranger, some Highway Patrol, someone not bound by jurisdiction. Marvin has friends everywhere, so he'll know who to send. The Camp Rapture sheriff's department might be in on it, so not them. If Batman is available, send him."

"Got you."

"If I don't text in thirty minutes, get someone starting this way. Make that twenty."

"Be careful," Brett said, and we ended our call. The crowd below wasn't near enough to hear me on the phone, but in a few more minutes they would be walking under us. I could hear car doors slamming and people talking as they came.

Glancing downhill, I saw Sheerfault and Bobo get out of a car, which Sheerfault had parked up close to the mill. Others had left their cars, which were parked in the line farther away, and were making their way toward the mill. There were about twelve people, not counting Sheerfault and Bobo. Everyone was wearing a raincoat or carrying an umbrella.

Bobo pulled back the plywood barrier and slid inside the mill with Sheerfault. A moment later you could see a crack of golden light through the slit in the wall and a beam of the same rising up under the pine tree that poked through the roof. Confident as they were, they weren't exactly in sneaky mode; who was going to punish them? Well, I had an idea.

Everyone outside filed in.

Headlights bounced up the drive. They belonged to a white jailhouse bus, the sort they use for transporting prisoners. The bus slipped to the side of the parked cars, and the hydraulic door hissed open. A brief moment later a man came out. It was someone I had never seen before. I could tell from the back glow of the headlights that he was wearing a sheriff's deputy shirt, jeans, tennis shoes, and a jailer's jacket and a ball cap. He had a holstered gun on his hip. A moment passed and out of the bus came four men in handcuffs, followed by a fat man with a shotgun slung over his shoulder. They were followed by some of the men I had seen there before, some of the town's bigwigs. They came off the bus and walked behind the criminals like Roman soldiers lazily making their way to a crucifixion. They went inside the mill.

More car lights cruised up the drive, and then cars began to spread out and park in a row behind the bus. Car lights were turned off and six men came out of the cars and so did one dark-haired woman, opening an umbrella as she did. I knew her from newspapers. She was a judge. Jill something or another. I think she was running for mayor next election. Her politics had been described as being to the right of Attila the Hun's. Tonight, that would most likely be confirmed.

"I don't think them convicts are having a field trip to see how the old sawmill worked," Leonard said.

"Nope," I said.

We sat and waited for some time to pass. No more cars came along. We could hear voices rising inside the mill, and then there were shouts, and even from where we sat, we could hear the sound of fists smacking.

"No gloves," Leonard said.

"Nope," I said.

We left our goods, except for our phones, Leonard's gun, and my golf club, and slipped from the hill. At the bottom of it, we crouched behind Sheerfault's car.

"I'm going to see I can get a phone video and sound recording of what's going on," Leonard said. "I'll send it to Brett as insurance."

"Video and sound recording," I said. "You sound so cute trying to be technological."

"Fuck you."

"Watch your ass."

"You'll be watching it. Try not to get a boner."

With that Leonard slipped away and began a soft trot toward the mill.

51

The voices in the sawmill rose up and fell down, yelled out, moaned and hissed, and then became a conversational hum. A moment later, the voices were loud again.

I kept an eye on Leonard. He was the near the slit in the mill, lifting his phone to film through the opening. After a few seconds, he stopped filming, looked back at me, and began to text.

TOO MANY PEOPLE. CAN'T GIT CLEAR VIEW. THEY ARE BUSY. WALKIN UP BEHIND EM TO FILM.

I sent a text quickly: THAT'S NUTS.

His return text popped up. YEP.

Leonard grinned at me, then turned back to the mill. I watched him pull the rain hood tighter around his head and slip through the crack in the door.

What a dumbass, I thought.

I should have sent Brett a text, but I didn't take time for it. I was already easing out from behind the car. I ran as softly as I could across the worn drive and to the gap that led into the mill. I leaned the golf club against the wall, peeled off my rain slicker, and tossed it aside. I picked up the club and took a peek in the mill.

Leonard was walking casually toward the back of the crowd. No one noticed him. They had their minds on what was going on inside the wire enclosure. There were some beer coolers on the ground, and a man I recognized as a councilman had a beer in his hand and was walking away from the crowd gathered at the fencing. Had he turned his head slightly, he would have seen Leonard.

Leonard stood at the back of the crowd near where they had piled their rain gear and umbrellas, raised his phone, and began to film between a split in the spectators. Through that split I glimpsed Coldpoint, Sheerfault, and Bobo close to the fence. Beyond them I caught a sight of two ragged-looking men swinging wildly at each other. There was no skill or plan to it. It was wild arm hurling. Both of them looked as if they might keel over at any moment from exhaustion. If something bad happened and one keeled over for good, there was the sawmill pool waiting.

"I think maybe we ought to bring you inside." I turned, and there was Coldpoint behind me with his handgun drawn. Our impulsiveness had caused us to lose focus, not wait until the man we knew was coming arrived.

Now he had arrived.

He was standing about five feet from me and he had the gun in one hand and an umbrella in the other hand, cocked against his shoulder. Rain ran off the umbrella and off my rain hood.

"Know you're pretty good with your hands and feet, you get up close, so let's keep the distance the way it is. And the golf club, drop it. Go inside, and don't give me shit. I want to shoot you anyway."

"The boys you hired failed you," I said. "You ought to let it go at that."

"Maybe we can get some good out of you yet."

"I don't do anal," I said.

"Go inside. I'm out of patience and I don't have a sense of humor."

I went inside and there was Leonard, behind the crowd, filming with his cell phone. You couldn't see the boxers, just the backs of people.

Leonard glanced at me and Coldpoint.

"Motherfucker," he said.

The crowd was so loud and involved they had yet to notice us.

"Hey," Coldpoint called out. "Back here."

What that led to was part of the crowd turning toward us, and coming out of it was Sheerfault. When he saw that Coldpoint had me at gunpoint, he smiled and showed his teeth wide as a piano row.

Coldpoint pushed me until I was near Leonard. Now the crowd had moved toward us. They gathered about us and forgot the two fighters in the ring of wire, and the fighters were still at it, not having noticed they'd lost their audience.

The crowd was tight around us now.

Leonard touched his phone and then dropped his arm and held the phone against his leg. Sheerfault came over and took it without a struggle. Bobo shouldered his way through the onlookers and came to stand by Sheerfault.

I glanced through a gap in the gathering, saw the two fighters had sat down in the ring, arms around one another to keep from toppling over.

"What we have here," Coldpoint said, "is a predicament."

"What you have here," I said to the crowd, "is a crime in progress. You folks don't want to be part of it, you ought to hike out, get away from this asshole and his ass hairs."

No one moved.

Sheerfault said, "That little speech wasn't very persuasive, was it." He turned toward Leonard. "What's with you, nigger, all out of smartass remarks?"

"Reached my monthly quota," Leonard said. "Next month I'll start up again."

"Always a clown, even to the last," Sheerfault said.

"You got clown-ass-whipped, is what you got," Leonard said. "I made you my bitch."

Sheerfault stepped toward Leonard. Coldpoint said, "Stop right there. Enough of this shit."

Sheerfault paused.

"Naw, let him come on," Leonard said. "He does best when there's a gun involved. He needs an edge."

"You shut up too or I'll drill Hap's spine," Coldpoint said. He sounded amazingly like a child on the playground who had just responded to being called a stupid-head.

Leonard went quiet. I could tell from the look on his face it was painful to do so.

